As I understand that passage, it amounts to this, that, as regards this option, there was between the parties only one contract, namely, the contract constituted by the provisions in the lease which I have read creating the option. The notice exercising the option did not lead, in my opinion, to the creation of any fresh contractual relationship between the parties, making them for the first time vendors and purchasers, nor did it bring into existence any right in addition to the right conferred by the option. The notice amounted to no more than the exercise by the bank of a right conferred by the option in 1936. If that be the true position, it must follow that, the only contractual right having been created before the fiduciary relationship arose, the principle underlying Vyse v. Foster (2) and the other cases following it must apply. For these reasons the bank was entitled, notwithstanding its acceptance of the executorship and trusteeship of the testator's will, to exercise the option, the conveyance must stand, and the action must be dismissed with costs.

Order accordingly.

BEAMAN v. A.R.T.S., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Singleton, L.JJ.), January 12, 13, 14, 17, February 14, 1949].

Limitation of Action—Postponement of limitation period—Conversion—“ Action based on fraud ”—“ Right of action concealed by fraud ”—Bailment of goods—Owner abroad during war—Bailee’s business closing down—Goods given away as worthless—Owner not notified—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 26 (a), (b).

In 1935, before going abroad, the owner of four packages deposited them with a company for storage. Storage charges were paid until 1938, and the owner intimated to the company that the packages were of value to her. She was prevented by the war from returning to England and in January, 1940, she wrote to the company from Turkey asking it to send the packages to her at Athens where she would go to collect them, but, owing to the entry of Italy into the war, this became impossible. The company, being Italian-controlled, wished to close down its business and in August, 1940, without informing the owner, it examined the contents of the packages and, deciding that they were worthless, gave them to the Salvation Army. It made no attempt, then or subsequently, to communicate with the owner and made no full entry in its books regarding what had been done with the goods. In 1946, the owner returned to England and claimed the packages. On Nov. 20, 1946, after being informed of the position, she started an action against the company for damages for conversion. The company pleaded the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (a), but it was contended by the owner under s. 26 of the Act that the period of limitation was postponed because the action was “ based upon the fraud ” of the company or “ the right of action was concealed by [its] fraud,” within the meaning of s. 26 (a) and (b) respectively.

HELD: (i) proof of fraud was not a necessary ingredient in an action for conversion, and, therefore, the present action was not “ based upon fraud ” within the meaning of s. 26 (a) of the Act of 1939.

(ii) the word “ fraud ” in s. 26 (b) was not confined to fraud which was in its nature sufficient to give rise to an independent cause of action, but had the same meaning as in the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 26, and in equity, and there could be fraudulent concealment of a right of action which was not subsequent to the act which gave rise to the right of action, but acquired its character from the manner in which that act was performed.

(iii) on the facts, the company’s conduct, by the manner in which it converted the owner’s chattels in breach of the confidence reposed in it and in circumstances calculated to keep her in ignorance of the wrong which it had committed, amounted to a fraudulent concealment of the owner’s right of action within the meaning of s. 26 (b), and, therefore, the period of limitation was postponed under that paragraph of the section.

1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 89, in an action for damages for conversion.

The action was brought more than six years after the date of the conversion and the defence was that the cause of action accrued at the date of conversion and, accordingly, the action was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1). The plaintiff claimed that the action was "based upon the fraud" of the defendants or that the right of action was concealed by their fraud, within the meaning of s. 26 (a) and (b) of the Act, so that the period of limitation did not run until she had discovered the fraud. DENNING, J., held that there was no fraud within the meaning of s. 26, and that the action was barred. The Court of Appeal now held that the plaintiff's right of action was concealed by the fraud of the defendants, within the meaning of s. 26 (b), and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14. The following judgments were read.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : The Limitation Act, 1939, is described in its title as "an Act to consolidate with amendments" certain earlier enactments. It must not be construed as though its object was simple consolidation. In many important respects it alters the law. For example, the appropriate period of limitation in the present appeal, which arises out of an action of conversion, is, as before, six years, but s. 3 (2) goes further and extinguishes title to the "converted" chattels. All this, however, is subject to s. 26, which is the section immediately relevant to the present question. It runs as follows :

"Where, in the case of any action for which a period of limitation is prescribed by this Act, either (a) the action is based upon the fraud of the defendant or his agent or of any person through whom he claims or his agent, or (b) the right of action is concealed by the fraud of any such person as aforesaid, or (c) the action is for relief from the consequences of a mistake, the period of limitation shall not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the fraud or the mistake, as the case may be, or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it . . ."

There follows a proviso in favour of bona fide purchasers for value. The only question raised in the present appeal is whether the plaintiff's cause of action, which arose on Aug. 14 or 15, 1940, became barred at the end of six years or is preserved by para. (a) or by para. (b) of s. 26. It is not suggested that six years have elapsed since the plaintiff discovered the fraud of which she contends the defendants were guilty or since she could with reasonable diligence have discovered it. DENNING, J., held that neither of the two paragraphs applied and dismissed the action.

The defendants were bailees for the plaintiff of four cases containing chattels belonging to her, which with their contents were admittedly converted by the defendants. It was agreed at the trial that if, despite the statute, the plaintiff should establish liability, the question of damages should be referred to an official referee. Accordingly, the value of the contents of the cases was not fully examined at the trial, although the plaintiff stated in evidence that they included jewellery and clothes and were of substantial value. The defendants, on the other hand, led evidence to the effect that the contents of the cases were, in their opinion, of no value and that in the circumstances they were justified in giving them away to the Salvation Army, together with the cases. Admittedly, they took no steps to obtain any independent opinion as to the value of the goods, and made no lists or record of them. Whatever the pecuniary value of the chattels may have been, the defendants were well aware that the plaintiff herself attached value to them, and, moreover, however trifling or non-existent their pecuniary value may have been, even if they had no more than a sentimental value, the duty of the defendants to keep them in safe custody was not in the least affected, and in the circumstances they had no right whatever to give them away, as they did, without the consent of the plaintiff. There was no shadow of justification for what they did, and the suggestion that they had in mind the interest of the plaintiff herself in saving her the cost of storage is, in my judgment, a disingenuous suggestion, as will presently appear.

It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the action was an action based on fraud in that the conversion was (it was claimed) a fraudulent one and that, accordingly, s. 26 (a) of the Act of 1939 applied. DENNING, J., held that for an action to be "based upon the fraud of the defendant" it was not necessary that fraud should be an ingredient essential to the cause of action, but he held that the allegation that the conversion itself was a fraudulent one had not been established. In my opinion, the plaintiff's argument under s. 26 (a) fails on the ground (not accepted by DENNING, J.) that the action is not based on fraud. It must be borne in mind that s. 26 is a section of general application. It applies to every sort of action which is affected by the Act. Of these many can properly be said to be based on fraud, e.g., an action for damages for deceit and an action claiming rescission of a transaction brought about by fraud. In all such cases fraud is a necessary allegation in order to constitute the cause of action. In other actions covered by the Act fraud is not a necessary allegation at all and the action of conversion is one of them.

Indeed, the word "fraudulent" in connection with conversion, however important it may be in a criminal matter, is, in the civil action of conversion, so far as regards the cause of action, nothing more than an abusive epithet. I am of opinion, therefore, that the language of s. 26, para. (a), means what it says and that the action was not based on fraud.

As I take this view, the observations of DENNING, J., on what conduct will cause an action of conversion to become an action based on fraud for the purposes of para. (a) do not call for consideration, but, on the quite different question whether the right of action was "concealed by the fraud" of the defendants, I must examine closely the facts of the case which bear on the conduct of the defendants. It will be found that I take a different view of the facts from that taken by DENNING, J. When the relevant facts are considered in their proper perspective, the conduct of the defendants did, in my opinion, amount to a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action. DENNING, J., having found that the actions of the defendants were not fraudulent so as to make the action one "based upon . . . fraud," only found it necessary to consider s. 26 (b) on the assumption that the conversion was in its origin an innocent one, and that, unless there was some subsequent fraudulent concealment, para. (b) would not apply. I may say at once that no subsequent active concealment of a fraudulent nature is relied on. This, however, does not mean that the defendants' failure to make any attempt to inform the plaintiff of what they had wrongfully done with her property is, in the circumstances, to be disregarded. It must be interpreted in relation to their previous actions.

There may, in my opinion, be fraudulent concealment of a right of action which is not subsequent to the act which gives rise to the right of action. It may acquire its character as such from the very manner in which that act is performed. It is not, I think, a right construction of the statute of 1939 to confine fraudulent concealment to what counsel for the defendants described as "fraud in the ordinary sense." This, as far as I understood him, meant fraud which in its nature is sufficient to give rise to an independent cause of action. This definition would exclude the wide range of conduct which before the statute was regarded in equity as so dishonest as to prevent the statute of limitations (or its analogous application in equity) from coming into operation. As this is an amending statute, it would, of course, have been open to the legislature to effect so sweeping a change in the law. If it had done so, a striking result would have followed. Provided an action was not based on fraud and provided there was not any subsequent active concealment of a fraudulent nature, the wrongdoer would have obtained the benefit of the statute, however furtively or surreptitiously the act complained of was committed. The manner in which equity treated, for example, a tort surreptitiously committed when the statute of limitations (or its analogous application) was pleaded, is illustrated by the case of the secret abstraction of underground minerals. In Bulli Coal Mining Co. v. Osborne (1) the Privy Council had to consider such a case. If the appellant in that case had merely been guilty of trespass, the ordinary six-years period of limitation would have applied, but the very manner in which the trespass was committed was a surreptitious one. LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD, delivering the judgment of the Board, said ([1899] A.C. 363) :

“The contention on behalf of the appellants that the statute is a bar unless the wrongdoer is proved to have taken active measures in order to prevent detection is opposed to common sense as well as to the principles of equity. Two men, acting independently, steal a neighbour's coal. One is so clumsy in his operations, or so incautious, that he has to do something more in order to conceal his fraud. The other chooses his opportunity so wisely, and acts so warily, that he can safely calculate on not being found out for many a long day. Why is the one to go scot-free at the end of a limited period rather than the other? It would be something of a mockery for courts of equity to denounce fraud as ‘a secret thing,’ and to profess to punish it sooner or later, and then to hold out a reward for the cunning that makes detection difficult or remote.”

DENNING, J., in his judgment did not in terms deal with the question of fraudulent concealment as implicit in the technique adopted in committing the tort, and, therefore, contemporaneous with it, but his finding on the question of conversion based on fraud would, I think, have led him to the conclusion that no such fraudulent concealment took place. He absolved the defendants of the dishonesty or moral turpitude which he held to be an essential element, and his reasons appear from the following passage ([1948] 2 All E.R. 94) :

“It is necessary to recapture the atmosphere of 1940. Goods and chattels were then of small concern compared to the lives of men. I think the defendants quite honestly said to themselves : ‘It is useless keeping these things lying in store any longer, with storage charges running up, doing no good to anyone, and in danger of being destroyed by the enemy. The goods do not seem to be of any real value. They have been left here for years. The owner, when we last heard from her was in Turkey, but goodness knows what she is doing now or where we can get hold of her . . . The best thing to do is to give them away to the Salvation Army where they may be of some good to somebody.’ Such conduct is not, to my mind, dishonest. It does not involve any moral turpitude.”

With all respect, I cannot accept this paraphrase as an accurate presentation of the facts. It contains matters which, I am bound to confess, are, to my mind, irrelevant and it omits matters which appear to me to be of crucial importance. For example, I must respectfully suggest that the statement that goods and chattels were then of small concern compared with the lives of men is irrelevant since no question of the lives of men arose. Moreover, during the war vast quantities of chattels were placed in the safe custody of bailees and kept faithfully in places exposed to danger as great as, if not greater than, these chattels of the plaintiff. The risk that they might be destroyed by the enemy was the plaintiff's risk, not the defendants'. DENNING, J., appears to have underestimated the readiness with which people deceive themselves into thinking their actions are honest, especially when their own interests are involved. He does not refer to the important commercial interest which the defendants had in acting as they did, and that appears to me to have misled him into accepting the protestations of the defendants' witnesses at their face value. The action of the defendants was initiated by a consideration of their own interests. They were anxious to close down their business as rapidly as possible, and the presence of the plaintiff's chattels in store with Thomas Cook & Son, Ltd., on behalf of the defendants was an embarrassment of which they were obviously anxious to rid themselves. If, indeed, they formed the opinion that it would be beneficial to the plaintiff as well as to themselves, that belief was entertained with a recklessness which I can only attribute to self-deception on their part. They would, no doubt, be shocked to hear their conduct described as fraudulent. That is, however, quite immaterial. No amount of self-deception can make a dishonest action other than dishonest, nor does an action which is essentially dishonest become blameless because it is committed with a good motive. It is goodness of motive that the learned judge ascribes to the defendants, and this seems to me to be the best that can be said for them on any view.

I will state the relevant matters as they appear to me. The defendants were bailees, and their duty was faithfully to perform their obligations as bailees wherever at any given moment the bailor happened to be living, and whatever the difficulty of communicating with her might appear to be. They must have known that the bailor was reposing confidence in them and the war was no excuse whatever for them to think otherwise. They must have known that the last thing the bailor would suppose was that they would be unfaithful to the confidence reposed in them. They must have known that by reason of that confidence there would be no reason for her to inquire whether or not they were being unfaithful to it. If on any ground they thought it desirable to deal with the plaintiff's goods in some manner inconsistent with their duties as bailees, she would rightly expect that they would communicate with her before doing so. Yet they made not the slightest effort to do so. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and continued :—] The defendants' principal purpose, if not their sole real purpose, in getting rid of the plaintiff's goods was to obtain for themselves the commercial advantage of being able to close down their business. In breach of their duty as bailees to communicate with the plaintiff before converting her goods, they recklessly and without making the slightest effort to ascertain the true position assumed that communication was impossible, and it is noticeable that, even after the Mediterranean was opened in 1943 on the surrender of Italy, they made no attempt to let the plaintiff know what they had done. They recklessly and without taking the least trouble to verify the facts assumed (what was false and on a simple examination of the records would have been shown to be false) that the plaintiff had not troubled about her goods, and that large storage charges had mounted up and would continue to mount up which the plaintiff would be unable to pay. They recklessly formed the opinion that the goods were valueless without having any independent valuation and in disregard of the fact (which, as bailees carrying on business as such, they must have known) that the absence of pecuniary value could afford no justification for disregarding their obligations. And all this they did when they must have known that the plaintiff (particularly in the circumstances brought about by the war) would be relying on them to be faithful to their trust, and for that reason would be the less likely to make inquiries as to what had happened to her property. I see no reason why, if she had had any reason to doubt the integrity of the defendants, she should not have initiated inquiries much earlier than she did, and before she returned to this country. Had she done so, she would have been able to serve her writ before the six years had run. Quite apart from their failure to inform the plaintiff of what they had done, they made no proper entry in their own books of what they had done with the goods. All that their one entry showed was that they had been given away. It did not say to whom. This failure to make a proper record was the cause of delay in tracing what had been done with the goods when the plaintiff came to claim them. A

I am of opinion that the conduct of the defendants, by the very manner in which they converted the plaintiff's chattels in breach of the confidence reposed in them and in circumstances calculated to keep her in ignorance of the wrong that they had committed, amounted to a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action. When she came to claim her goods she expected to find them waiting for her. The fact that she did so expect was due to the manner in which the defendants had chosen to act. This, in the circumstances, can, in my opinion, only be described as furtive and surreptitious. The appeal is allowed. B

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The first question is whether a claim in conversion can come within the words of the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 26 (a). The learned judge thought such a claim might be within the words if, in fact, fraud was involved. I construe the words "the action is based upon the fraud of the defendant" as covering any proceeding in a court of law, including an ecclesiastical court (see s. 31), in which fraud has to be proved for the plaintiff to succeed. There may, perhaps, be equitable claims in which there would be scope for argument whether the claim was based on fraud. In an action at common law for conversion, fraud is not a necessary or relevant allegation and such an action is not, in my opinion, based on fraud. The plaintiff, therefore, must succeed, if at all, by showing that the right of action was concealed by the fraud of the defendants or their agents within the meaning of s. 26 (b). I think "fraud" in s. 26 (b) should have the same meaning as "fraud" in the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, s. 26, and in the general equitable principles on which this section of the Act is based and which it extends. Where a word has been construed judicially in a certain legal area, it is, I think, right to give it the same meaning if it occurs in a statute dealing with the same general subject-matter, unless the context makes it clear that the word must have a different construction. I find no words pointing to a different construction, and, therefore, the principles laid down in, e.g., Re McCallum (2) are applicable. In considering what "concealment" has to be established under para. (b) of s. 26, assistance is, for the same reason, obtainable from a case such as Bulli Coal Mining Co. v. Osborne (1), where general equitable principles on this topic were considered by the Privy Council. C D E F

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:—] As I have said, the learned judge regarded s. 26 (a) of the Act of 1939 as covering a case of conversion if the facts established that it was a fraudulent conversion, within, I assume, the criminal law. In dealing with the case on this basis, the learned judge gives his reasons for coming to the conclusion that the defendants through their servants acted honestly. It is necessary to consider these as they are relevant to the question whether there was fraud within the meaning of s. 26 (b). The only possible inference from the evidence, in my opinion, was that the defendants' business was closing down. They wanted, therefore, to get rid of the goods. They did what they did for their own convenience and with complete disregard of the value which the plaintiff, as shown by her letter of seven months before, attached to her property. The learned judge said that there must be some element of moral turpitude for conduct to be held to be fraudulent. On the whole, I prefer to confine myself to seeking to apply the word "fraud" as construed in the cases to which I have referred. If G H necessary, I would hold that on the evidence as accepted by the learned judge, and having regard to the obligations undertaken and re-affirmed by the defendants, there was moral turpitude. What was done was, in my opinion, a fraud on the plaintiff within the meaning of "fraud" in s. 26 of the Act of 1939, applying the principle laid down in Re McCallum (2). I appreciate that servants of the company may have thought that the plaintiff might never come to claim these goods or that after the war they might be of no value to her or of less value than the storage charges. I think that any reasonable person, directing himself to the facts as known, would have realised that the defendants had no right to give away the plaintiff's goods and that it was dishonest to do so.

There remains the question whether the cause of action was concealed by the fraud. If Y. undertakes to store and keep the goods of X., X. is clearly entitled to assume that Y. will not give them away. If Y. does so without communicating with X., he, as it seems to me, brings himself within the principle laid down in Bulli Coal Mining Co. v. Osborne (1). That case decided that it was not necessary that the wrongdoer should have taken steps to prevent detection. Regard must be had to the nature and character of the act.

A wrongdoer who "chooses his opportunity so wisely and acts so warily that he can safely calculate on not being found out for many a long day," cannot claim the advantage of the limitation period. This seems to me to apply and to be unaffected by the fact, which I will assume in the defendants' favour, that they believed it was impossible at that time to communicate with the plaintiff. The conclusion is reinforced by the fact that no inquiries were made as to the possibility of communicating with the plaintiff at her address in Turkey in 1940, nor was any communication sent to that address after Italy surrendered in 1943. I differ from the learned judge not, I think, on any question of whose evidence should be accepted, but rather as to what matters are relevant in considering whether what was done amounted to fraud within the meaning of the section. In the earlier part of his judgment the learned judge gave a brief account of the old forms of action for detinue and trover and the modern causes of action for wrongful detention and conversion. As he stated, he attempted no precise definition, and it is unnecessary to consider what he said in detail. Some of the statements made might, I think, be found to need qualification. I agree that the appeal succeeds.

SINGLETON, L.J. : These facts are not in dispute. (i) The defendants were bailees for reward of certain goods belonging to the plaintiff. (ii) The plaintiff had paid storage charges on them until 1938. She attached value to them and wished them to be sent to her in Greece (see her letter of Jan. 31, 1940). (iii) The parties were in fairly regular correspondence until February, 1940. On Oct. 27, 1938, the defendants had written "during our last inspection of the packages they seemed to be in perfect order." (iv) The plaintiff was unable to return to England owing to the war. (v) On Aug. 14, 1940, the defendants gave instructions for the four packages to be delivered to the Salvation Army. (vi) Three of the packages were delivered to the Salvation Army on Aug. 15, 1940. One trunk was delivered elsewhere for Mr. Ingram, a shipping clerk of the defendants, who dealt with the matter. There is no record of the nature of the goods delivered to the Salvation Army except that they were three packages. (vii) The defendants did not tell the plaintiff what they had done with her goods. They did not make any attempt to communicate with her, either before or after they disposed of the goods. (viii) Towards the middle of 1946 the plaintiff returned to England and tried to find her goods, without success. Thereafter letters on her behalf were written on Aug. 29, Sept. 3, and Oct. 10, 1946. The defendants wrote on Oct. 22, 1946, a letter which was quite inaccurate except that it did state that the goods had been sent to the Salvation Army. (ix) It was not until the trial of the action (May, 1948) that Mrs. Beaman learnt that one of her trunks had been taken by Mr. Ingram for his own use.

The writ was issued on Nov. 20, 1946. The claim was for damages for conversion. The conversion took place on or about Aug. 15, 1940. The claim is barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, unless it is within the terms of s. 26. I do not think that the case falls under s. 26 (a). Conversion includes fraudulent conversion, but an action for conversion is not "based upon" fraud. It becomes necessary to consider s. 26 (b) and to ascertain whether the right of action was concealed by the fraud of the defendants or their agents. It is clear that the disposal of the plaintiff's goods was for the defendants' purposes entirely. Maybe they wished to avoid, as they thought, further responsibility for the goods, though it must not be overlooked that Mr. Ingram took a trunk for himself. The disposal of the goods in this way was a fraud on the owner. The reason they did not tell her what they had done with the goods was that they did not wish her to know. There was a chance that she might not come back to this country for many years. By concealing from her what they had done, they concealed from her the right of action which arose on the conversion of the goods. The learned judge regarded Mr. Ingram as an honest and reliable witness. Another view might have been taken, having regard to his acts and to the contradictions between him and Mr. Sawyer [another employee of the company], but the fact that Mr. Ingram was regarded in this light by the judge still leaves open the question what is the proper inference to be drawn from the concealment from August, 1940, onwards. I agree with the submission of counsel for the defendants that there must be some conscious wrongdoing. There was ample proof of that. There was wilful disposition of the plaintiff's property for the defendants' own purposes, with knowledge that the property was valued by the plaintiff. It is no answer to say: "We did not think it worth much, and so we disposed of it"; and in this regard I emphasise that, on the evidence of Mr. Ingram, he thought one trunk was of value to him, and he kept it. The disposition of the property was carried out furtively, or, at least, without the knowledge of the owner, and the fact that this had been done was deliberately concealed from her. In my view, the proper inference to be drawn in such circumstances is that the right of action was concealed by the fraud of the defendants' agents within s. 26 (b) of the Act of 1939, and that is the conclusion at which I have arrived. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs. Question of amount of damages referred to official referee.

Re BORTHWICK (deceased). BORTHWICK AND ANOTHER v. BEAUVAIS AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), February 10, 1949.]

Family Provision—"Reasonable provision for maintenance" of dependant—"Maintenance"—Conduct of dependant—Inheritance (Family Provision Act, 1938 (c. 45), s. 1 (1), (6).)

In 1909 the testator married and lived with his wife until 1925, when he became bankrupt. The wife and their children then went to live with the testator's parents, but the testator lived in lodgings and shortly afterwards began to cohabit with another woman. He did not again live with his wife, but continued his association with the other woman until shortly before his death. His financial position greatly improved, and he died in 1946 leaving a gross estate of £240,000 and a net estate of £130,000. In his lifetime he never provided more than £3 a week for his wife and family. By his will, dated Apr. 21, 1944, the testator bequeathed an annuity of £250 to his wife, and settled £5,000 on his son and his issue and £1,000 on his daughter and her issue. On an application by the widow and the daughter for reasonable provision to be made for them under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938,

A HELD: (i) the question what was "reasonable provision" within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1938 depended on the circumstances both of the dependant and of the testator, and "maintenance" for the purpose of the sub-section did not mean mere subsistence.

B (ii) the "conduct of the dependant in relation to the testator and otherwise," to which s. 1 (6) of the Act directed the attention of the court, could not mean the difference between some proper provision and inadequate, or no, provision, but meant that a dependant whose conduct was unsatisfactory should receive less than he would otherwise receive.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

A testator's widow and daughter applied for reasonable maintenance to be provided for them under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938. HARMAN, J., granted the application. The facts appear in the judgment.

D S. Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and Lightman for the plaintiffs, the widow and daughter.

A. C. Nesbitt for the first three defendants, the executors of the testator's will.

Parbury for other defendants, beneficiaries under the will.

A. G. N. Cross for the Attorney-General.

E HARMAN, J.: The testator, William Borthwick, married his wife, the first plaintiff, in 1909, when they were both 21. He was then a hairdresser's assistant, earning 26s. 0d. a week, at Hull. There were born to them four children—the first, a son born in 1913 who died in infancy; the second, a son, Reginald, born in 1917, who is a defendant; the third, a daughter, now F Mrs. Tutty, born in 1922, who is not concerned in the proceedings because she is neither a beneficiary under the will nor a dependant within the meaning of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, and, lastly, the second plaintiff, Margaret, born in 1926, who has come of age since the proceedings began. In about 1919 the testator gave up hairdressing and started G to manufacture scent with some moderate degree of success. In 1923, in partnership with his brother, he started a proprietary club in Hull. According to his wife, he neglected that business and behaved in rather an extravagant way so far as his personal expenditure was concerned. In 1925 he went bankrupt, and sent his wife and her two young children to live at his parents' house. He himself went to live in lodgings, saying that he would find a new home for the family. That, however, turned out to be the separation of the parties, H and it was not unconnected with the fact that at about that date he met a woman with whom shortly afterwards he began to live as his wife. He appears to have broken with her shortly before his death. When the testator left his wife and children at his parents' house, he made his wife an allowance of £2 a week. When Margaret was born in 1926, he increased the allowance to £2 10s. 0d., and in 1932 he increased it to £3 a week. I have no means of saying whether those were or were not reasonable allowances when first made. Some time between 1926 and 1939 a vast change came over the testator's fortunes. He migrated to the south of England and became a very substantial man. He set himself up at Hatfield in an establishment called the "Old Rectory," which was a property valued for probate at £18,000, and lived in a comparatively large way there with the woman whom I have mentioned. His wife says, and I accept it, that she knew he was in comparatively improved circumstances, but had no idea how improved. He made no further provision for her, but still paid her £3 a week. He did not make any substantial provision for the education of his son or his daughters, all of whom left school at the age of 14 to seek their livelihood in the world as best they could. A

The first will of which I know was made on June 14, 1939. By that will he made a provision for his wife of £250 a year, dividing the residue between his children. At the same time he signed a statement which, it seems to me evident, he was advised to sign having regard to the passage in 1938 of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act and the apprehension of either himself or his advisers that his will might be questioned by his wife on the ground that he had not made reasonable provision for her. The will appointed his solicitor, the defendant, Atkey, one of the executors and gave considerable benefits to him. When one finds that the statement justifying the will is witnessed by two clerks of Mr. Atkey, one cannot help feeling that Mr. Atkey had become apprehensive about the benefit which was given to him at the expense of the testator's family. The testator made further wills, with which I need not deal in detail, in 1940, 1942, and, eventually, on Apr. 21, 1944. On the signature of each of those documents he re-signed the statement of 1939 as though it were a new statement and as though the £250 a year which he had found reasonable for his wife in 1939 remained, apparently having regard to her conduct, still a reasonable provision for her in 1944, the same conduct being relied on. B C D

Under the will of April, 1944, the testator appointed two accountants, the defendants, Beauvais and Attwell, and Mr. Atkey to be his executors. He gave a legacy to the woman with whom he was living and that has been paid to her. He gave certain specific legacies to his executors of shares in a private company which were the main asset of his estate. Those shares are of great value and each executor under the will, as modified by a codicil, was to receive 2,000 shares valued for probate purposes at £7 apiece—a substantial gift. He then gave to his executors an option to purchase up to one-half of the remainder of his ordinary shares in this same company, which also was a very valuable benefit, because the price at which two of the executors, had the right to buy the shares was considerably under their probate value. That option has been exercised: there were provisions whereby the payment for those shares could be spread over a number of years which are still unexpired. By cl. 7 he bequeathed an annuity to his sister, Lillie Nicholson, a defendant here, which, in effect, was a gift of £5 a week from a fixed date. He bequeathed to his wife £250 a year payable quarterly. Both of those bequests were free of duty, and the wife got the £250 a year less tax. He gave his residue on the usual trusts for sale and conversion. Out of the ultimate residue there was to be set aside a sum of £5,000 for his son, the defendant, Reginald, and his issue, and a further sum of £1,000 is settled on his daughter, Margaret, the second plaintiff, and her issue. Subject to those two provisions, he directs his trustees to apply the residue for charitable purposes to be selected by them within a certain period. E F G H

The testator died in October, 1946, and his will was proved in January, 1947, at a gross sum of £240,000 odd. After a long controversy, it seems to be settled that the net estate within the meaning of the Act of 1938 is £130,000 or thereabouts. That is the amount, broadly speaking, which is available for division among the beneficiaries. It is agreed now before me, again after considerable controversy, that the maximum which I could provide, having regard to the terms of the Act, for the dependants of the testator, who are, in effect, the plaintiffs, would be about £2,400 a year, as against the sum which they get which is about £280 a year. There is thus a large discrepancy between what they get and what it is within my power to give them. Here was the testator living with his mistress in affluence, keeping his wife in penury. She had no means beyond the allowance he made her.

- A She does not appear to have made any protest, she does not appear to have had anything like full knowledge of how things were with him, and she does not seem to have been conscious altogether of what his obligations were. She was living on a scale very different from that which she would have enjoyed if she had been in her rightful place in his home. It is not suggested that she was guilty of bad conduct which would justify him in excluding her from his
- B home or in separating from her, still less in divorcing her. It is obvious that he and his advisers were conscious that what he was doing looked a shabby enough act and were anxious to justify it, for what motive one can very well see. The means he takes to justify it are to promulgate this statement, the effect of which is, first, that in the early part of the married life the wife was extravagant and did not keep within the amount he gave her to pay the house-
- C keeping bills, and, secondly, that he was not happy with her because she did not fulfil many of the domestic duties which he expected of a wife. I have not the least idea what that means. He then says that when he became bankrupt on his own petition she told him to clear out. One cannot but ask oneself of what she is said to have told him to clear out. The uncontradicted evidence is that she and her children were given asylum at his parents' house, but that is
- D the excuse he gives for having left her. I think this document is a thoroughly dishonest document. Whether in 1939, when the testator first penned it, he was persuaded, either by himself or his advisers or those who expected to make money out of him, that there was something in these ridiculous charges, I do not know. They are refuted, not only by the wife, but also by his own brother and sister who both gave evidence that she was a good wife to him.
- E There is no room that I can see in the evidence for any suggestion that there was any fault on the part of the wife.

It is said on behalf of the Crown, who are here as protectors of the charities who take residue, that I must take the case as I find it, not colouring my judgment in the wife's favour through indignation at the shabby behaviour of the husband, nor considering what she would have been entitled to if she

F had had her rights. It is said, truly, that, if she had lived as the testator's wife at the Old Rectory, Hatfield, £250 a year would not have been adequate provision for her, but, it is said, she managed to live for 20 years or so on this miserable pittance of £3 a week and never complained about it, and, therefore, £250 a year, which is a larger sum, is a reasonable provision for her. In other words, it is said that the worse a man treats his wife during his life the less

G he need leave her when he is dead. I cannot accept such a cynical conclusion and I turn to the Act. Section 1 (1) provides that the court has no jurisdiction unless it is of opinion that the will does not make reasonable provision for the maintenance of a dependant. It is said that maintenance is the only thing which can be regarded. That does not mean that the court can only give the dependant just enough to put a little jam on her bread and butter. It has

H already been held that what is reasonable for one may not be reasonable for another. It must depend on the circumstances of the case. It certainly depends to some extent on the circumstances of the widow, but I think it must also depend on the circumstances of the testator, that is to say, whether he died a rich man or no, because the wife of a rich man is entitled to better provision for her maintenance than the wife of a poor one. Maintenance does not only mean the food a wife puts in her mouth. It also means her clothes, the house in which she lives, and the money which she is to have in her pocket, all of which vary according to the means of her husband. Maintenance cannot mean only mere subsistence.

When one looks at sub-s. (6), one sees that one of the matters to which the court is directed to pay attention is the "conduct of the dependant in relation to the testator and otherwise." I cannot think that these words can make the difference between whether the dependant is left starving in the gutter or no. The courts have not taken that view. It must, however, mean that an extravagant or an erring wife may be given less than one against whom nothing can be said. I am also directed by sub-s. (7) to have regard to any statement in writing signed by the testator. Counsel for the plaintiff says that that statement can be used as evidence against the testator—that it shows that but for the malice which actuated the statement he would have made a better provision for his wife and that he realised that the provision he was making was not, without some excuse, a reasonable provision. So far I can go. It seems to me, that qui s'excuse s'accuse must be true of such a statement as that. I do not believe the testator's statement, and, if I disbelieve it, I am left with this, that the testator acknowledges that, if there is nothing in what he says, he would have made some further provision. If the wife had been used to living at the Old Rectory, Hatfield, and that had been the circumstance of her life for the last 20 years, it may well be that £2,400 a year would not have been too much to give her, but I do not think it would really help a woman in her position to have so much as that. She has not been used to anything on that sort of scale, and I think the circumstances in which she has been living are matters to take into account as well as the means of the testator to provide for her. I am not punishing the testator in what I propose to order. I am not saying that I approve of his actions during his life time. I am saying what I think a man in his position ought reasonably to have provided for his wife from whom he had parted through no particular fault on her part and who was living in straitened circumstances. I think the wife is entitled, in view of the ample means of the husband, to a generous scale of living regard being had to the kind of needs that she may be reasonably supposed to have, and I propose to make her income up to £1,000 a year.

That leaves the question of the second plaintiff. She is living with her mother and following some employment from which she gets a modest salary of £2 10s. 0d. a week, which, one may suppose, will increase to a certain extent. She will not, therefore, having regard to the means I propose to give her mother, be in any physical need if, as I imagine, her mother continues to live with her in amity. Nevertheless, she is, as it seems to me, reasonably entitled to something. The testator should have made more reasonable provision for her too. I propose that, while her mother is a widow and she herself is a spinster, she shall have £100 a year. If her mother remarries or dies and she remains still a spinster, she must apply again to the court if she wants further provision made for her. It is impossible at this stage to tell what may be the conditions prevailing by that time.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the residuary estate.

Re LEGAL CHARGE DATED NOV. 26, 1937.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), February 8, 1949.]

Courts Emergency Powers—Enforcement of remedy—Mortgage—Bankruptcy of mortgagor—Trustee respondent to application—“Unable immediately” to perform obligation—Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943 (c. 19), s. 1 (2) (4), s. 4 (3).

A A mortgagee applied under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943, s. 1 (2), for leave to exercise any remedy available to him to compel the performance by the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor of the obligations arising under the mortgage deed.

B HELD: (i) in determining whether or not the trustee was “unable immediately” to perform the obligation within the meaning of s. 1 (4) of the Act it was not material to consider why the bankrupt had been unable to do so before her bankruptcy.

(ii) “unable” in s. 1 (4) did not mean “unable in the prudent course of management,” but was to be given its literal meaning.

C [FOR THE COURTS (EMERGENCY POWERS) ACT, 1943, see HALSBURY’S STATUTES, Vol. 36, p. 461.]

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

Application under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943, by a mortgagee for leave to exercise his remedies against a trustee in bankruptcy.

D. B. Buckley for the mortgagee.

Stanley Rees for the trustee in bankruptcy.

D ROXBURGH, J.: This is an application by a mortgagee for leave to exercise his remedies against a trustee in bankruptcy. Section 4 (3) of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943, provides:

E “Where an application is made by the mortgagee of any property for leave to exercise against the property any of the rights or remedies mentioned in s. 1 (2) of this Act, being a right or remedy arising by virtue of a default in the payment of any mortgage money or a breach of any mortgage obligation, the appropriate court may, for the purposes of this Act, treat any person appearing to the court to be affected by the exercise of the right or remedy as if he were the person liable to pay the mortgage money or to perform the mortgage obligation or, as the context may require, as if he were the mortgagor, and may grant relief accordingly.”

F That explains why in this case the trustee in bankruptcy is respondent. The equity of redemption is vested in him, and I have no doubt he is properly a respondent. I have then to look at s. 1 (4) which provides:

G “If, on any application for such leave as is required under this section for the exercise of any of the rights and remedies mentioned in sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3) of this section, the appropriate court is of opinion that the person liable to satisfy the judgment or order, or to pay the rent or other debt, or to perform the obligation, in question is unable immediately to do so by reason of circumstances directly or indirectly attributable to any war in which His Majesty may be engaged, the court may, subject to the provisions of this Act, refuse leave for the exercise of that right or remedy, or give leave therefor subject to such restrictions and conditions as the court thinks proper.”

H Under that sub-section I have to consider whether the trustee in bankruptcy is “unable immediately” to perform the obligation by reason of the circumstances indicated in the sub-section. It is, however, submitted that a further meaning is to be extracted from s. 1 (4) and s. 4 (3) in combination, namely, that, in considering whether or not the trustee in bankruptcy is “unable immediately " to perform the obligation, I must take into account the reasons why the mortgagor was unable so to do before the bankruptcy, or, putting it in another way, why she became bankrupt. In my judgment, that is not the true meaning of these sub-sections read together. What I have to determine is whether in the circumstances the trustee in bankruptcy is unable immediately to perform the obligation, and his ability or inability to do so cannot be affected by any investigation of the financial difficulties of the mortgagor before her bankruptcy. I must, therefore, reject all the evidence which has been tendered so far as it relates exclusively to the circumstances which led to the financial difficulties and subsequent bankruptcy of the mortgagor, but I am anxious to listen to all evidence which has been filed in so far as it relates to the difficulties with which the trustee in bankruptcy finds himself confronted. [HIS LORDSHIP heard further evidence and argument and continued :] The property subject to this mortgage is a block of flats, and the evidence of the trustee is that in three months time this block of flats will be saleable for £8,000. The sum due on the mortgage is approximately £1,700. In that state of affairs it is obvious that the trustee is able immediately to perform the obligation. He is able to do it in many ways. If he feels that the building will be worth £8,000 in three months time, without doubt he can borrow the necessary money and redeem the mortgage. If he prefers, he can sell the property forthwith, realising, no doubt, less than £8,000, but much more, I feel certain, than £1,700. It being plain that the trustee in bankruptcy is able to discharge the mortgage immediately, the more difficult question whether this has anything to do with the war does not arise. I may add one further reflection. If I am wrong in my construction of the word "unable" and if it means (as has been submitted to me) "unable in the prudent course of management"—which is not the meaning I assign to it—it appears to me that in the circumstances the trustee is not unable in the prudent course of management to perform the obligation. Whether he is or is not unable in the prudent course of management to do so, in any case the court has a discretion, and I should not feel disposed to exercise my discretion in favour of the trustee when he can so easily extricate himself from any difficulty in which he finds himself. Accordingly, I give the leave asked for, and the costs of this application will be added to the security in the usual way.

Leave granted with costs.

HOLT v. W. H. RHODES & SON, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Merriman, P., Asquith, L.J., and Vaisey, J.), February 7, 9, 10, 1949.]

Master and Servant—Safe system of working—Relationship pro hac vice—Injury to driver of crane hired to stevedores—Responsibility of stevedores in respect of particular operation.

The plaintiff was in the general employment of the second defendants as a driver of a mobile crane. The crane, with his services, was hired to the first defendants, a firm of stevedores, to unload goods from a ship into a warehouse. The crane was electrically driven and power was provided by a cable which had to be connected with a point in a plug-box fixed to a pillar 12 ft. 7 ins. above the ground. The usual method of getting to that box was to drive the crane up to the pillar and use the struts at the back of the jib of the crane as a ladder. During the course of the operation the stevedores stowed round the pillar some cargo, which prevented the plaintiff from obtaining access to the plug-box by means of his crane. Having been asked by the foreman of the stevedores to move the crane, which could not be done without unplugging, the plaintiff climbed up on the cargo, fell and sustained injuries. He claimed damages from both defendants for failing to provide a safe system of working.

HELD : if the control of the operation which caused the injury had passed for the time being to the stevedores, the relationship pro hac vice of master and servant would be created between them and the plaintiff, and a duty to provide a safe system of working for that particular operation would be on the stevedores and not only the duty owed by an invitor to an invitee.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE HARRISON, sitting at Liverpool County Court, dated July 29, 1948, dismissing an action for damages for personal injuries which had been remitted from the High Court, on the ground that neither of the defendants was guilty of negligence. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal against the second defendants, Mersey Shipping & Transport Co., Ltd., the plaintiff's general employers, but allowed it against the first defendants, W. H. Rhodes & Son, Ltd., a firm of stevedores on whose work the plaintiff was engaged at the time he was injured, and ordered a new trial. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

Gorman, K.C., and Robertson Crichton for the plaintiff.

Beney, K.C., and G. B. H. Currie for the first defendants (the stevedores).

Nicklin for the second defendants (the plaintiff's general employers).

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is an appeal by the plaintiff in an action remitted from the High Court to the Liverpool County Court and tried by His Honour JUDGE HARRISON against the dismissal of his claim for damages agreed at the sum of £120 against both of two defendants. In the view which I take of this matter, it will be necessary in one respect to order a new trial, and, therefore, I desire to say as little about any controversial matters as possible, but I must say enough to make it clear why I think the learned judge was right as regards his judgment in relation to one of the defendants and why I think it is necessary that there must be a new trial as regards the other defendants.

This is a case of a not uncommon character in which, at the Mersey Docks, the owners of a travelling crane hired the crane with a driver to a firm of stevedores engaged in unloading a ship into a warehouse belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The two defendants were the owners of the crane, who are by common consent the general employers of the plaintiff, and the firm of stevedores, against both of whom a charge of negligence was brought.

The plaintiff took the crane to this warehouse at the North Brocklebank Dock for the first time. The sheds on these docks belong to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and the Board provide, among other things, power to drive cranes. That is done by fixing at some convenient point in the shed a plug-box to which can be plugged in the flexible cable which connects the power with the motor in the crane. In general, these plug-boxes are not higher than 6 ft. from the ground so that they can be reached by a man standing on the ground, but in this case the plug-box was fixed to an iron pillar and stood 12 ft. 7 ins. from the ground. If a plug-box is out of reach, it is agreed that a proper and reasonable method of getting to it is for the driver to climb up the struts at the back of the jib of the crane until he is high enough to put his plug into the plug-box. The plaintiff had been there for four days, during which time the crane worked quite efficiently. So far as the provision and equipment of the crane was concerned, the plaintiff's general employers had fulfilled all their duties to him. All the plaintiff had to do was to draw his crane, or have it drawn, close to the pillar, climb up the back of the crane, plug in, and get on with his work. There is evidence, which again I gather was not disputed, that, as his general employers knew that it was necessary that the crane should not be left plugged in at night when the warehouse was locked up, they had instructed him to disconnect the plug before leaving the crane on the premises at the end of the day.

On or about the third day of the operations the stevedores had elected to stow round the pillar on which was the plug-box some of the cargo which was being unladen from the ship and in connection with which the crane was being used, and they stowed it in such a way as to make it impossible for the plaintiff to obtain access to the plug-box by means of his crane. Some time in the afternoon of the following day the foreman, who was in charge of the work generally, told the plaintiff that he was to move his crane to some other part of the work, which it was not possible to do without unplugging. The plaintiff, therefore, climbed up the obstruction and in doing so fell between some oil drums and bags of sugar and injured himself.

I now come to the difficulty in this case. Everybody is agreed that, in so far as this action rests against either of the defendants on the relationship of master and servant (and in that I am including not merely the general relationship of master and servant but the relationship pro hac vice in regard to the particular operation which was the cause of the injury to this man) there was a duty to provide a safe system of working. There can be no doubt as a general proposition that if the general employers of the plaintiff were trying to pass the liability to the stevedores they have to discharge a very substantial burden of proof. Similarly, a heavy burden lies on the plaintiff to show that pro hac vice he can impose the duty of master on some other shoulders, namely, those of the stevedores. Unfortunately, on the very eve of the judgment the trial of this case was complicated by the fact that the plaintiff's general employers assumed through their counsel the responsibility of a master towards a servant in relation to this matter, and accepted the legal duty of providing a safe and proper system of working. It may be that, if the learned judge had taken the view that this constituted an admission, binding on these defendants, that for everything up to and including the moment at which the plug was pulled out of the plug-box, i.e., for everything which could be included in the system of working, whether they were really responsible for it or not, these defendants had accepted the responsibility, they could not have complained, but the learned judge did not do so. Having based his judgment on the assumption that this liability had been accepted by these defendants, he proceeded to deal with it, in my opinion, quite correctly, because, unless a purely artificial situation is to be raised as against the plaintiff's general employers by this admission, it seems to me to be impossible to hold them responsible for a defective system of working arising from the fact that the plaintiff in the circumstances created by the casual storing by the stevedores of this cargo round the pillar had to climb up to remove the plug. To make them responsible for such a thing would, in effect, be to say that they had to send this crane driver out with a man at his elbow to make sure that at no given moment, for some casual necessity not part of the general system of working at all, there was no sort of interference with the free access to a plug-box or anything of that sort. To impose that sort of responsibility on employers would be absurd. Even if they had sent an inspector to see that the part of the system over which they had no control at all, namely, the access to the plug-box, was everything that it should be, any reasonable employer would have been satisfied if everything proved satisfactory on two days' inspection, and there would have been an end of the matter. This accident happened on the fourth day. Except on the basis of absolute insurance, absolute warranty of safety, it is impossible to hold the plaintiff's general employers responsible for the fact that a good system provided by them had been interfered with by a casual act on the part of the stevedores.

For that there is authority. Our attention has been called to Speed v. Thomas Swift & Co., Ltd. (1) which is one of the latest cases on the duty of providing a safe system. That case was described by LORD SIMON, L.-C., in Colfar v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool), Ltd. (2) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 328) as an illustration of the doctrine of safe working which should be regarded as the extreme point beyond which that doctrine should not be extended, but, so far as the statement of the principle is concerned, no exception was taken to it, and nothing but approval was accorded to the decision. In Speed's case (1) LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1943] 1 All E.R. 541) that he agreed with the submission that the duty of providing a safe system must be considered, not generally, but in relation to the particular circumstances of each job. That does not mean that it must be considered in relation to every casual circumstance that occurs in the course of the job. The point which arises in the present case was dealt with by GODDARD, L.J., who agreed with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Speaking of the removal of a ship's rail in the process of working the ship's derricks by the "married" system as contrasted with the "single", he said (ibid., 546) :

"If the master were himself in charge of the operation and saw that the rail was properly protected, he would be fulfilling his duty of providing a proper system : if, when his back was turned or he had gone to another job, one of the men removed the protection and an accident happened, I cannot see that it could be said that the master had failed in his duty."

That seems to me exactly to cover the case which I have been putting. If the plaintiff's general employers had sent the hypothetical inspector on the first two days to see that everything in the whole system was perfect, not only that part for the provision of which they were responsible, but the part for which the stevedores would be responsible—and, indeed, to some extent the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, for they provided the power—and he had then left, having satisfied himself that everything was in order, it could not be said that the plaintiff's employers failed in their duty if somebody, by some casual act interfering with the system, created difficulties out of which the accident arose. Therefore, I regard this appeal as against the second defendants as hopeless, and, in my opinion, it ought to be dismissed.

The judgment proceeded against the stevedores on the basis of a general charge of negligence and a defence of contributory negligence. I feel that there must be a new trial because I think there was evidence which at least suggests that this was a case in which the control of the operation which caused the injury had passed for the time being to the stevedores, and also because the learned county court judge, by reason of the admission which had been made, was never asked to express an opinion on this part of the case on the basis that the stevedores were pro hac vice the masters and so bore that relation to the plaintiff. It is impossible for us to impose on the parties and on the county court judge a finding of our own on a matter on which he has not been asked to make a finding. Furthermore, I feel it impossible, even if it were open to us to do so (which I think it is not), to say that the evidence is all one way, and, therefore, that it is futile for us to send the case back for a new trial. As between the plaintiff and the stevedores, the plaintiff is asserting that he has the right of a servant against a master. If he establishes that, he is, of course, in a very different position from that of an invitee. A

I propose that the appeal, in so far as it relates to the plaintiff's general employers, be dismissed, but that, in so far as it relates to the dismissal of the action as against the stevedores, the appeal be allowed, the judgment dismissing the plaintiff's claim be set aside, and the case be remitted for re-trial to the Liverpool County Court by the other learned judge who has jurisdiction there. B

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. The learned county court judge did not decide the real issue in the case or make findings of fact which would enable us to determine it because he thought that an admission made by the plaintiff's general employers committed him as between all three parties to a particular conclusion. I think the learned judge was mistaken in attributing that effect to the admission. It could not prejudice or estop any party except the parties on whose behalf it was made, the plaintiff's general employers, and, in particular, it could not deprive the plaintiff of any rights which he possessed against the stevedores even if he did not actively protest against the admission. D The general employers could not place the plaintiff in the dilemma that he must either repel an admission by them or absolve the stevedores from liability. By giving the effect he did to the admission, the learned judge regarded himself as absolved from deciding whether the stevedores were liable to the plaintiff as masters who were under a duty to provide a safe system of work. E

VAISEY, J. : I agree.

Appeal relating to the first defendants allowed with costs. Judgment set aside and case remitted to Liverpool County Court for re-trial by another judge as between plaintiff and first defendants. FORD v. LANGFORD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Asquith, L.JJ., and Hodson, J.), January 24, 25, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Evidence—Application of Acts to dwelling-house—Burden of proof—Payment of rent—Whether tenancy or service occupation—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938 (c. 26), s. 7 (1).

By s. 7 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938: "If any question arises in any proceedings whether the principal Acts apply to a dwelling-house, it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown."

In 1926, the defendant was engaged by a Capt. B. as a gardener at £2 per week and occupied a cottage on Capt. B.'s estate. In 1944 Capt. B. died and his executors and later, a purchaser of the property, continued to employ the defendant as a gardener, he remaining in occupation of the cottage. In 1948 the plaintiff acquired the property and took proceedings in the county court for possession of the cottage. The learned county court judge held that the defendant's occupation was by way of service occupancy, and, accordingly, that the defendant was not entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts. On appeal it was argued by counsel for the plaintiff, inter alia, that the burden of proving that the defendant had paid rent for the cottage was on the defendant and was not placed on the plaintiff by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938.

HELD: section 7 (1) means that where in any proceedings the question is raised whether the Acts apply to a particular house, that house is to be deemed to be within the financial scope of the Acts unless the contrary is shown, but the sub-section does not raise a presumption regarding any other matter, e.g., whether or not a person who alleges that he is a tenant and not a service occupier has paid any rent, and, therefore, the contention of the plaintiff was right.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE KIRKHOUSE JENKINS at Hungerford County Court, dated June 21, 1948, directing the defendant to give up possession of a house known as Lovelocks Cottage.

In 1926 the defendant was engaged by a Capt. Burmester, who was the owner of a large residential estate, as a gardener at £2 a week wages. The defendant then entered into occupation of a cottage on the estate. According to him, he originally asked for 45s., but Capt. Burmester said, "No, £2 and the cottage" adding "5s. a week." In 1944, Capt. Burmester died, but the defendant remained in the cottage and continued to receive payment for his services as a gardener from the executors of the estate. In 1948, the property was sold to a Mr. Streatfield-Moore, who in turn employed the defendant, the defendant continuing to live in the cottage. At no time was any rent paid by the defendant, nor was there a rent book. Later, Mr. Streatfield-Moore sold the property to the plaintiff who claimed possession of the cottage from the defendant. In evidence in those proceedings Mr. Streatfield-Moore stated: "I bought the estate. Defendant was in the cottage. He worked as gardener for me. He never paid me money rent. It was sort of understood 5s. be deducted per week . . . The cottage was to enable him to perform the duties of gardener." The learned county court judge held that there was no such tenancy as would bring the case within the Rent Restrictions Acts as the defendant only held the cottage by way of a service occupancy. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal.

Barry, K.C., and H. D. Peacock for the plaintiff.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: stated the facts, found that there was evidence on which the county court judge could conclude that the arrangement made between the defendant and his original employer, Capt. Burmester, did not establish a tenancy within the meaning of the Rent Acts, and continued: Counsel for the plaintiff argued that before it can be said that the Rent Restrictions Acts apply to any case it must be shown that the tenant has paid a rent or is paying a rent. The authority for that is Bracey v. Pales (1). In that case SALTER, J., said ([1927] 1 K.B. 824):

"On the other hand two Scottish cases have been referred to in which it was laid down that a servant who by virtue of his employment and as part of his remuneration occupies a house belonging to his employers does so under his contract of service and not under a contract of tenancy, and that the Rent Restrictions Acts do not apply to his occupation. In my opinion it is not here necessary to decide this question, because, even if the defendant was a tenant of Mr. Bracey or the plaintiff at common law, he was not a tenant under the Rent Restrictions Acts so as to be entitled to the protection of those Acts. If he was a tenant at all, he was a rent free tenant, and the Acts do not protect a tenant who holds rent free."

In support of that argument counsel pointed out that by s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, the Act does not apply where rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof. Counsel for the plaintiff also argued that the burden was on the defendant to prove that he had paid rent for this house and that s. 7 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938 does not apply to any question relating to the payment of rent. That sub-section, it is contended, means that where in any proceedings the question is raised whether the Acts apply to a particular house, that house is to be deemed to be within the financial scope of the Acts unless the contrary is shown, and the sub-section does not raise a presumption regarding any other matter, e.g., as in the present case, whether or not a person who alleges that he is a tenant and not a service occupier has paid any rent. I agree with that argument of counsel for the plaintiff. I do not think one ought to extend s. 7 (1) so far as to put on the landlord and not on the tenant the burden of proving such a matter as is in issue here. In this case there is no satisfactory evidence that any rent was ever paid by the defendant. The interpretation I put on the conversation between the defendant and Captain Burmester is simply this: "I will pay £2 a week in wages. I shall want you to live in this cottage.

It will be very convenient to have you there, and I reckon that that cottage is worth 5s. a week." I do not think that one can infer from that that the defendant thereby began to pay rent and has since continued to do so. I think that this appeal fails.

- ASQUITH, L.J. : I entirely agree. The main point taken by the defendant is that there was no evidence on which the learned county court judge could find that his possession was a service occupation. Counsel for the defendant relied mainly on a series of decisions, mostly rather old ones, relating to the question whether or not a person has the status of service occupier or that of a tenant for the purpose of qualifying or being disqualified for the franchise or for certain offices or for the purpose of being liable or non-labile to rates. Those cases were often decided on the wording of the relevant statutes and much stress was laid on whether an employee, for the purpose of performing a contractual duty, had been required (and not merely permitted) by his employer to live in the premises in question. The man's status was only adjudged to be that of a service occupier where there was a positive requirement. Even however, in those early cases, external necessity as opposed to contractual constraint came to be regarded as sufficient in some cases to confer the status of service occupier : see, for instance, passages from other decisions, notably from WILLS, J., in Marsh v. Estcourt (2) cited by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Ramsbottom v. Snelson (3). If necessity can take the place of contractual requirement, it is not a very far cry from necessity to overwhelming considerations of convenience. However that may be, the modern decisions in cases where franchise and similar questions were not concerned do seem to me to lay down a somewhat less rigid criterion. The matter was before this court in Thompsons (Funeral Furnishers), Ltd. v. Phillips (4). It is true that the defendant in that case contracted to live at premises and to perform some of his contractual duties there. I am not overlooking that distinction between the facts of that case and the present case or the desirability of keeping in mind the facts of cases in which a general proposition is laid down. At the same time the court does appear to me in that case rather deliberately to have laid down a principle of wider application. The test laid down was whether the substance of the agreement was that the defendant was to occupy the premises as the landlord's servant in order to perform his services in part on those premises or, put in slightly different language a little earlier, whether he occupied the premises as the servant of the landlord for the purpose of performing his master's services. In the event in that case it was held that it was a service occupation and not a tenancy and this conclusion was reached, although in fact rent, so-called, was actually paid at 15s. a week. The agreement had provided for that sum to be deducted from the amount of the wages, but in this respect the agreement was departed from. In the present case, on the other hand, there was no payment of a cash rent at any stage. The evidence pointing to a payment by deduction was extremely hazy. It was rejected by the learned judge, and he was entitled to reject it.

- [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence as to the agreement between the plaintiff's immediate predecessor in title and the defendant, in which it was stated that the cottage was to enable the defendant to perform the duties of gardener, and continued :] It seems to me very difficult to say, as we are invited to say by counsel for the defendant that the words "the cottage was to enable him to perform the duties of gardener," does not afford some evidence in support of the finding or inference of service occupation, but let me assume that I am entirely wrong about that. I think the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on another ground to which he attached importance. He contends (i) that the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts cannot be invoked in favour of a rent-free tenant : see Bracey v. Pales (1), a case which I do not think has ever been doubted ; (ii) that the learned county court judge either directly or by the clearest implication found the defendant paid no rent; and (iii) that there was evidence on which he could so find. If it is necessary to decide the case on this point, in my view, all three of those propositions are well-founded. I think that it is for the defendant to prove that rent was paid in order to bring himself within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts and that the learned judge has by clear implication rejected those parts of the evidence which alone can be relied on as supporting that conclusion. Section 7 (1) of the Act of 1938 falls to be considered here. It provides :

That provision does not seem to me to raise a presumption in favour of the defendant that rent was paid. The only presumption which it seems to me to raise in his favour is that the house is within the limits of rateable value laid down in the Rent Restrictions Acts. In Wright v. Arnold (5), it was held that the provision creates no presumption in favour of the tenant that the house was a dwelling-house within the definition of dwelling-house contained in the Act. For these reasons I think that the appeal fails.

HODSON, J. : I agree that this appeal fails on the ground which has just now been referred to by ASQUITH, L.J., that the protection of the Acts is not available to a rent-free tenant, that the defendant paid no rent, and that there was evidence on which the learned county court judge could come to that conclusion.

I feel doubt whether the learned county court judge was entitled to come to the further conclusion that whether or not a payment was made by deduction from the wages which the defendant received, yet he was still a service occupant because he was required to occupy the cottage. The latest case to which we have been referred on this subject, Thompsons (Funeral Furnishers), Ltd. v. Phillips (4) was a case in which there was a clear compulsion on the defendant by contract to occupy the premises. I recognise that there may be cases in which external necessity may take the place of compulsion by contract, but I am bound to say that the position seems on the authorities to be that the occupier is, so to speak, identified with the owner in the case of service occupancy instead of having in many respects a separate identification as tenant. The point is emphasised in another connection by LORD WRIGHT, M.R., in Reed v. Cattermole (6) where he quotes the language of TINDAL, C.J., in Hughes v. Chatham Overseers, Burton's Case (7) ([1937] 1 All E.R. 550) :

“ ‘ But it may be, that a servant may occupy a tenement of his master's, not by way of payment for the services, but for the purpose of performing them ; it may be that he is not permitted to occupy, as a reward, in the performance of his master's contract to pay him, but required to occupy in the performance of his contract to serve his master ’.”

It is unnecessary to go through the cases in detail, but—and I think counsel for the plaintiff conceded this—it must be for the owner to establish that the defendant was required to occupy the premises. I find nothing in the evidence which is sufficient to justify a finding of compulsion, whether by contract or by necessity, so as to justify the use of such a strong word as “ required.” For these reasons I would rest my judgment on the point which is principally relied on by the plaintiff, namely, that no rent was paid. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, J.: The question I have to decide is whether the trustees of the testator's will are accountable to the estate for remuneration received by them as managing director and director of a company called Llewellyn's Machine Co., Ltd., the bulk of the shares in which form part of the testator's estate.

H The general principle of equity is plain. It is, that a trustee may not profit from his trust. Thus, if a trustee of shares in a company by virtue of the control over the company which those shares give him gets himself appointed to the post of director or managing director, then, although his remuneration is not paid to him in respect of the trust holding but in respect of the work he does as director or managing director, yet, because he gains that emolument by virtue of the trust holding, he is not entitled to retain the remuneration for his own benefit. That principle is well-settled, and I have been referred to two recent cases in which it has been discussed, namely, Re Macadam (1) and Re Gee (2). Far be it from me to say anything purporting to trench on that well-established and on the whole salutary rule. For the purposes of this judgment I wholly accept the position that,⁴ unless there is something in the testator's will entitling the trustees to retain any remuneration which they may receive as director or managing director of this company, then the rule must apply, but there is no rule of equity which says that a testator, if so minded, may not provide that his trustees can hold salaried offices in companies which the testator's estate controls and receive the emoluments attached to those offices without liability to account. A testator is perfectly at liberty to include such a provision in his will if he thinks fit, and, indeed, as a matter of business it is often a very sensible provision to make.

The clause in this will which is relied on as excluding the general rule to which I have referred, but is, on the other hand, said by those who oppose the trustee's right to remuneration not to be wide or explicit enough for the purpose, is cl. 11, which is in these terms :

"I also declare that my trustees may at their discretion retain any investments I may have at the time of my decease whether the same may or may not be authorised by law as investments for trust funds without being answerable for any loss thereby occasioned to my estate. And in particular in reference to the shares held by me in Llewellyn's Machine Co., Ltd., I empower my trustees to retain the said shares for so long as they shall think fit and to make such arrangements with the said company in reference thereto and for the appointment of my said trustees or either of them or any other persons as a director or managing director of the said company in my place or if thought advisable by my said trustees to dispose of my shares in the said company or any part thereof upon such terms and conditions as they shall think fit and if they shall deem it necessary or advisable so to do to take such steps as they legally can to wind up the said company."

There one has a clause in which the testator expressly provides that his trustees may make such arrangements with the company for the appointment of both or either of them or any other persons as a director or managing director of the company in the testator's place. Those words, I think, must be construed with regard to the terms of the articles of association of the company, and the testator must be deemed to have known of the contents of those articles. I think he must be deemed, when he referred to "arrangements for the appointment of the trustees or any other persons as a director or managing director," to have meant "as a director or managing director in accordance with the articles of association of the company." If one looks at the articles, one finds that they adopt the 1908 Table "A" with modifications, and the articles dealing with remuneration, so far as material for the present purpose, are arts. 69 and 72 of that Table "A." Article 69 provides :

"The remuneration of the directors shall from time to time be determined by the company in general meeting."

By art. 72 :

"The directors may from time to time appoint one or more of their body to the office of managing director or manager for such term, and at such remuneration (whether by way of salary, or commission, or participation in profits, or partly in one way and partly in another) as they may think fit, and a director so appointed shall not, while holding that office, be subject to retirement by rotation . . ."

One finds, then, that the testator has expressly empowered his trustees to make such arrangements with the company as they think fit for the appointment of themselves or any other person to offices which will or may carry remuneration. I think they can fairly be described as remunerated offices.

A What is the effect of the express authority thus given by the testator to his trustees? In my judgment, it cannot mean anything else, as a matter of common sense and as a matter of ordinary construction, than that the testator's trustees, notwithstanding that they are trustees, shall have power to make such arrangements as they think fit for their appointment as director or managing director, and, those being, under the terms of the articles, remunerated or potentially remunerated offices, the arrangements which they are empowered to make include arrangements as to the remuneration which they are to receive. That is the construction I place on the words, and I think the conclusion I have reached is reinforced by the fact that the power given by B the testator extends to making arrangements for the appointment of other persons as a director or managing director. As pointed out by counsel for the annuitants, it is hardly to be expected that any other person could be induced to take office unless the arrangements made with him included some arrangement as to his remuneration. As a matter of construction, one cannot give the word "arrangements" any narrower significance where C the persons appointed are to be the trustees themselves. True, that the testator did not say in express terms that the trustees, when they make arrangements for the appointment of themselves as director or managing director, are not to be liable to account to the estate for the remuneration derived from their office, but that seems to me to follow as a matter of necessary implication. In fact, it seems to me to be the main purpose of inserting this provision.

D For the reasons which I have endeavoured to state, the conclusion to which I have come is that, on the true construction of this particular will the plaintiffs, notwithstanding that they are trustees of the testator's will, are entitled to arrange with the company not only for their appointment as managing director and director of the company, but also for their remuneration in those capacities and, further, are entitled to retain that remuneration for E their own benefit without being liable to account to the testator's estate. That means, the shares being held as they are, that the trustees are in the invidious position of fixing their own remuneration, being completely in control of the company. In this respect they are in a position in which their duty and their interest conflict, but that is the result which must inevitably ensue F where a testator empowers his trustees to be directors of and receive remuneration as directors of a company which his representatives control by virtue of his shareholding. The fact that the construction I have placed on the will has that consequence is no ground, in my judgment, for my giving it any other construction.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), January 27, February 16, 1949.]

Administration—Will—Capital or income—Settled leaseholds—War damage Value payments—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), ss. 7 (1), 10 (2).

By his will, dated May 25, 1935, the testator gave freehold and leasehold properties to trustees on trust, until the death of his last surviving child, to pay out of the income thereof certain monthly sums to various persons, subject to the payment of all incidental expenses and outgoings, and, after provision had been made for repairs, but not for the depreciation of leasehold terms, any surplus income each year was to be divided among his children or their issue. On the death of his last surviving child, the properties were to be sold, and the proceeds thereof divided among the issue of his children. The testator died on Sept. 22, 1942. During the war, both before and after the testator's death, many of the properties suffered war damage. Claims in respect of the damage were made under the War Damage Act, 1943, and value payments had been made to the executors by the War Damage Commission. The leases of the properties which were the subject of the claims (and which had been disclaimed under the Landlord and Tenant (War Damage) Acts, 1939 and 1941) expired, for the most part, in 1960 or 1962. The question to be determined was whether the value payments received in respect of the leasehold properties should be treated as capital or income or apportioned between capital and income. The income beneficiaries contended that they should be treated as proceeds of sale of settled leaseholds, while the remaindermen contended that they were, in substance, moneys paid under a policy of insurance so that the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 20, applied.

HELD : (i) the value payments were neither proceeds of sale nor moneys paid under a policy of insurance, and, therefore, neither the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 79, nor the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 20, applied. Although s. 10 (2) of the War Damage Act, 1943, introduced the conception of a sale of the property which was the subject of a value payment, it did so merely for the quantification of the payment to be made.

(ii) on the true construction of the will, the testator desired that the benefits incidental to his leaseholds should expire with the leaseholds themselves, and, therefore, the value payments should, so far as possible, be treated in the same way as the leasehold properties from which they were derived. Accordingly, contributions made under the Act of 1943 should be treated as capital, as required by s. 66 of the Act, and recouped to corpus, and, subject thereto, each of the value payments should be invested in the purchase of an annuity for a period corresponding to the period which, at the date of the war damage, remained unexpired of the lease of the property in respect of which the payment was made, and those annuities should be applied by the trustees as though they represented the income arising from the leasehold properties.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (inter alia) whether sums received by

A the testator's executors from the War Damage Commission as value payments under the War Damage Act, 1943, in respect of settled leaseholds were to be treated as capital or income or apportioned between capital and income. ROMER, J., held that the value payments should so far as possible be treated in the same way as the leasehold properties from which they were derived, and he directed that each of the value payments should be invested in the purchase of an annuity for a period corresponding to the period which, at the date of the war damage, remained unexpired of the lease in respect of which the payment was made, and that the annuities should be applied as though they were income from the properties. The facts and the relevant clauses of the will appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

C Feb. 16. ROMER, J., read the following judgment. By his will dated May 25, 1935, the testator, Sidney Scholfield, after appointing executors and trustees and giving a small annuity, disposed of his real and leasehold properties (by cl. 4 of his will) in the following terms :

D "I give devise and bequeath all my real and leasehold properties (except my residence No. 100 Eltham Road Lee aforesaid) to my trustees upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions hereby declared of and concerning the same that is to say that my trustees shall during the lives of my children now living and the survivors or survivor of them hold the rents profits and income accrued or accruing at the time of my decease and to accrue from and after my decease of and from the said properties after payment thereof of all incidental expenses and outgoings upon trust to make the following payments (all such payments being made free of all duties) that is to say on the twelfth of each month to pay to Beatrice Louise Elizabeth the widow of my son Thomas and on her death to the children of my said son then living if more than one in equal shares the sum of £8 and to each of my other children then living during their lives and the issue of any deceased child other than the said Thomas (such issue taking their parents share in equal shares if more than one) the sum of £30 and to each of my brothers James Edward and John the sum of £10 and upon further trust on Mar. 31 next after the expiration of the period of six months from my death to prepare an account of the receipts and payments (including all amounts payable for rates and taxes due on or before that date and making provision for repairs but without making any provision for the depreciation of leasehold terms) of the said properties for the period from my death and thereafter on every subsequent Mar. 31 for the preceding twelve months and on Apr. 12 following to divide as aforesaid between my children then living other than the said Thomas and the issue of any such child who may be then dead (such issue taking their parents share and equally between them if more than one) any surplus income appearing from such account to be in my trustees' hands on the date of taking such account."

H By cl. 5 the testator declared that the said monthly payments of £30 as above directed should be paid free of taxes and duties and should be treated as payments on account of the beneficiaries' shares of the income derived from the said freehold and leasehold properties. By cl. 6 the testator directed that on the death of the survivor of his said children his trustees should sell the said real and leasehold properties and divide the net proceeds of such sale into the same number of shares as there should have been children of his other than the said Thomas leaving issue living at the date of distribution who should have attained or should attain the age of 21 years or being daughters have been married under that age and should hold one of such shares on trust for such issue of any such child and in equal shares if more than one. By cl. 7 the testator authorised his trustees to compromise any claim from the lessors of any of his leasehold properties on account of dilapidations or other breach of covenant and for such purpose to surrender any leasehold properties to the lessors. By cl. 8 the testator gave, devised, and bequeathed to his trustees No. 100, Eltham Road, Lee, aforesaid, and all the rest of his personal estate upon the usual trusts for sale and conversion and upon trust to hold the proceeds (after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses) in trust for all his children (other than Thomas) in equal shares with a substitutional gift in favour of grandchildren as therein mentioned. By cl. 9 the testator gave £1 a week to such one of his trustees as should collect the rents of his freehold and leasehold properties.

The testator died on Sept. 22, 1942, and his will was proved on Dec. 28, 1942. The testator had five children, one of whom predeceased him. The other four children are parties to this application, as also are the testator's grandchildren and great grandchildren now in being. Particulars of the freehold and leasehold properties which the testator possessed at the date of his will and of his death are stated in para. 6 of the plaintiff's affidavit sworn in support of the summons. [HIS LORDSHIP read the particulars, and continued :] The plaintiff's affidavit states that at the date of the testator's will all of the said freehold and leasehold properties were let and it is believed that the average net yearly income from the properties was approximately £2,778. During the recent war many of the said properties suffered serious war damage. In some cases the damage was suffered before the testator's death, in other cases after his death. Claims in respect of such damage were made under the War Damage Act, 1943, and value payments have been made to the executors by the War Damage Commission. In one case the amount of such payment has not been agreed. The leases of the properties which are the subject of these claims all expire (with the exception of one block) in 1960 or 1962. The leases of the properties have been disclaimed under the Landlord and Tenant (War Damage) Acts, 1939 and 1941. I was told that £2,714 is now required each year to provide for the income payments bequeathed by the testator's will. The net income now available for these payments is about £1,174 per annum, and, if the value payments which have been received were invested in authorised securities, an additional income of about £150 per annum would become available.

In these circumstances this originating summons has been issued in order to obtain the directions of the court as to the manner in which the value payments received, or to be received, should be disposed of by the trustees in administering the trusts of the testator's will. Question 1 of the originating summons is as follows :

"That it may be determined whether upon the true construction of the said will and in the events which have happened (a) the whole of the sums which have been or may hereafter be received by the trustees of the said will from the War Damage Commission by way of value payments in respect of the testator's freehold and leasehold properties which were specifically devised and bequeathed by cl. 4 of the said will ought to be invested and treated as capital on the footing that the income of the investments for the time being representing the same should be applicable in the same manner as the rents profits and income of the properties in respect of which such payments were made, or (b) any and if so what part of such sums ought to be treated as income or apportioned between capital and income."

It was conceded, and rightly, at the hearing before me that the value payments which have been received from the War Damage Commission in respect of the testator's freehold properties should be treated wholly as capital and retained and invested by the trustees accordingly. Accordingly, the question for decision is confined to the payments which have been or will be received in respect of the settled leaseholds.

The War Damage Act, 1943, s. 10 (1), is in the following terms :

- A "Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, the amount of a value payment shall be an amount equal to the amount of the depreciation in the value of the hereditament caused by the war damage, that is to say, the amount by which the value of the hereditament in the state in which it was immediately after the occurrence of the damage is less than its value in the state in which it was immediately before the occurrence of the damage."

- B Section 10 (2) provides how the value of a hereditament in any state shall be ascertained for the purpose of computing the amount of a value payment, namely, by reference to a notional sale on the hypotheses indicated by the sub-section and by sched. II, para. 2, to the Act. Section 66 of the Act provides that contributions made under the Act shall be treated for all purposes as outgoings of a capital nature. It will be seen that, although s. 10 of the Act introduces the conception of a sale of the property which is the subject of a value payment, it only does so for one purpose, namely, the quantification of the payment which is to be made. The section does not provide that the value payment, when received, is to be treated as though it represented the proceeds of sale of the property concerned and the Act nowhere lays down the manner in which, as between tenant for life and remainderman of settled property, a value payment is to be dealt with or disposed of.

The Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 79, provides :

- E "Where capital money arising under this Act is purchase money paid in respect of (a) a lease for years . . . the trustees of the settlement or the court, as the case may be . . . may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, require and cause the same to be laid out, invested, accumulated, and paid in such manner as, in the judgment of the trustees or of the court, as the case may be, will give to the parties interested in that money the like benefit therefrom as they might lawfully have had from the lease . . . in respect whereof the money was paid, or as near thereto as may be."

- F The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 74, contained similar provisions to these and the Court of Appeal considered their effect in Askew v. Woodhead (1). In that case the appellant was entitled for life under a marriage settlement to leaseholds, which were taken under the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. At the time of their compulsory acquisition these leaseholds had eight years to run and the purchase money was sufficient to provide an annuity for eight years of much larger amount than the net annual proceeds of the leaseholds. The Court of Appeal held that the appellant was entitled to receive an annuity of such an amount that the payment of it would exhaust the fund in the number of years which the leaseholds had to run. The Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 81, deals with capital arising otherwise than under the Act but, inasmuch as the question with which I am concerned is whether the value payments in issue are or are not capital, the section affords me no assistance. The Trustee Act, 1925, s. 20 (1), is in the following terms :

- H "Money receivable by trustees or any beneficiary under a policy of insurance against the loss or damage of any property subject to a trust or to a settlement within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1925, whether by fire or otherwise, shall, where the policy has been kept up under any trust in that behalf or under any power statutory or otherwise, or in performance of any covenant or of any obligation statutory or otherwise, or by a tenant for life impeachable for waste, be capital money for the purposes of the trust or settlement, as the case may be."

On behalf of the income interests which were represented before me it was contended that the value payments should be assimilated in treatment to proceeds of sale of settled leaseholds. On behalf of the remaindermen it was argued that such payments constitute, in substance, moneys paid under a policy of insurance and, as such, should be disposed of in accordance with s. 20 of the Trustee Act, 1925, or, alternatively, that they so closely resemble such policy moneys that the section should be applied by analogy. In my judgment, the value payments in question are neither proceeds of sale nor moneys paid under a policy of insurance. They resemble the latter more than the former, but the resemblance does not, in my opinion, attract the operation of s. 20 of the Trustee Act, 1925.

The testator in the case before me was at pains to ensure that the benefits incidental to his leaseholds should expire with the leaseholds themselves. Nothing was to be preserved for those interested in corpus. In the event the leaseholds have disappeared, not by expiry but by war damage followed by disclaimer. In their stead, however, are sums of money. If these sums of money are to be regarded as capital, they will eventually pass intact to those who (until the date of ultimate distribution) would have taken no benefit in the leaseholds themselves, namely, the remaindermen, and they will so pass at the expense of the income beneficiaries to whose immediate enjoyment the leaseholds had, by the will, been exclusively dedicated. It is clear that such a result would gravely disturb the manifest intentions of the testator as expressed in relation to his leasehold properties. The fact that money has, through wholly fortuitous circumstances, been substituted for an interest in property affords, in my judgment, no ground for effecting, in addition, a substitution of beneficial interests. Fairness of administration would appear to require that, so far as possible, the rights of the beneficiaries should survive the destruction of the property from which they derived the income which the testator gave them. Must, then, these rights be adversely varied by reason of any statutory requirement? Not, as I think, by reason of s. 20 of the Trustee Act, 1925, because, as I have already indicated, the value payments have not been received under a policy of insurance. They have been received from the State in pursuance of the compulsory scheme of indemnity laid down by the Act of 1943. Nor is any such requirement to be found in the War Damage Act itself, for that Act makes no reference to the matter at all. No other statute has, so far as I am aware, any bearing on the point, and, accordingly, I am not constrained by any statutory requirement to treat these value payments as capital. Nor, in my judgment, am I so constrained by any previous decision of the courts. In Re Bladon (2) it was held by the Court of Appeal that, where licensed premises form part of a settled estate and the licence is extinguished under the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1904, the proportion of the compensation allocated to the freeholder of the premises represents capital money of the estate. The decision, however, rested entirely on the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1904, s. 2, and those provisions clearly have no relevance to the present case. In Re Thompson (3) compensation was paid under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (b), on the de-requisitioning of leasehold property held on trust for sale. The tenant for life was entitled to the annual produce of the testator's residuary estate, of which the property in question formed part. HARMAN, J., held that the compensation money could not properly be described as annual produce of the residuary estate, its proper description being, in effect, dilapidations. Accordingly, he decided against the claim of the tenant for life, but it seems to me that the circumstances of that case are far removed from the circumstances of the case before me.

In my judgment, I am, accordingly, free to decide, as I do decide, that so far as possible the value payments should be treated in the same way as the leasehold properties from which they were derived. It would be right, I think, to recoup to corpus as capital the contributions made under the Act of 1943. Subject to this being done, I will direct (following Askew v. Woodhead (1)) that each of the value payments ought to be invested in the purchase of an annuity for a period corresponding to the period which remained, at the date of the war damage, unexpired of the lease of the property in respect of which the payment was made. Such annuities will be applied by the trustees as though they represented rents, profits and income arising from the testator's leasehold properties.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), February 11, 1949.]

Charitable Bequest—Gift “to use at her discretion for her work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention.”

D

By her will, dated Apr. 27, 1947, a testatrix, who died on July 1, 1947, directed that her leasehold house should be sold and one half the proceeds of sale be given to V.H.A.H. “for her to use at her discretion for her work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention.” The residuary estate was bequeathed to V.H.A.H. for the same purpose. V.H.A.H. had for many years carried on the work of receiving, sheltering and caring for unwanted or stray cats. If the cats brought to her were ill or badly injured she would have them painlessly destroyed, and for the others she attempted to find good homes.

HELD: the gifts were calculated to develop the finer side of human nature of which care for old and sick animals was a manifestation, and, therefore, were for the benefit of mankind and charitable.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the true construction of the will of the testatrix bequests to the first defendant of the residuary estate and of a moiety of the net proceeds of the sale of a leasehold house “for her to use at her discretion for her work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention” were valid and enforceable charitable gifts. ROMER, J., held that they were so.

Tonge for the plaintiff, the trustee of the will.

G. D. Johnston for the first defendant, Violet Heather Amwell Harvey, to whom the gifts to be construed were made.

F. B. Marsh for the second and third defendants, next-of-kin.

Danckwerts for the Attorney-General.

ROMER, J. : The question which I have to determine on this summons is as to the validity of a bequest contained in the will, dated Apr. 27, 1947, of a Miss Dorothy Moss who died on July 1, 1947. The will, after appointing executors and making certain specific legacies, gave a series of pecuniary legacies. They were followed by this direction :

"I direct that my leasehold house known as 20 Woodside Wimbledon aforesaid shall be sold and one half of the net proceeds of the sale to be given to my friend Violet Heather Amwell Harvey of Great Amwell Vicarage in the county of Hertford spinster for her to use at her discretion for her work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention."

The testatrix disposed of the other half of the net proceeds of sale and directed that it should be divided among certain women including "my friend Violet Heather Amwell Harvey aforesaid." She then directed that her residuary estate should be given :

" . . . unto my friend Violet Heather Amwell Harvey aforesaid for her to use at her discretion for her work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention."

The question at issue is whether these dispositions to Miss Harvey for her work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention is good or whether for any reason it fails. Miss Harvey says that if, on the true construction of this will, she is entitled to take this half of the proceeds of sale of the house and the residue for her own absolute use, she will dedicate them to the purposes which the testatrix indicated in her will. It seems to me plain that, in effect, she is a trustee of these sums, and the object, purpose and intent of the gift was that it was to be applied in furtherance of the work which she has been carrying on. I arrive at that conclusion both on the construction of the two gifts themselves and also from the fact that there is an independent gift of a share of the other half of the proceeds of sale to Miss Harvey bequeathed in such terms as to make it plain that she was to take that for her own personal benefit. Therefore, Miss Harvey is to be treated, as she is willing to be treated, as a trustee of the money.

The next question is whether the gift fails for any reason. As it is for Miss Harvey's work for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention, one looks to the evidence to see what that work is. So far as is material, the evidence shows that for many years before the death of the testatrix this lady had carried on a work mainly for the relief of cats and kittens which were in need of human assistance. She says that for more than 35 years before Dec. 10, 1947, she had at the Old Vicarage at Amwell, in Hertfordshire, carried on the work of :

" . . . receiving and sheltering cats and kittens some of which were strays and the remainder of which were brought to me by owners who no longer wanted them or could not keep them. If such cats and kittens were badly ill or hurt or otherwise beyond recovery I had them put to sleep in chloroform lethal boxes. If they were healthy I kept them for a time to endeavour to find good homes for them. Until 1939 the work gradually increased and about 1938 we sometimes had anything from 50 to 60 cats and kittens at a time under our care. When the war broke out in 1939 we had to reduce the numbers, but I have been able to increase the work again since the cessation of hostilities and in 1947 about a hundred animals passed through my hands and the number at any one time averaged about 16."

A This lady moved from the Old Vicarage to her present home at "Woodside," Hertford Heath, in Hertfordshire, and on her removal she transferred her work there and carried it on without break or interruption. She is still carrying it on at her new home, and has more accommodation there than she had previously. She says that the animal welfare work has increased and

B "... in consequence, in the case of some of the unwanted cats for whom it is unlikely a new home can be found I am obliged to put them to sleep without keeping them more than a day or so; others which are likely to get good homes I keep for as long as possible. In the case of strays I keep them a week to give them a chance of being claimed and during that time I try to find the owners. If I had more money available I could keep all these cats for longer periods which I know would be the wish to the testatrix."

C She refers to the steps she has taken to get assistance and provide proper accommodation for the animal welfare work in connection with which also she says she has frequently to consult veterinary surgeons. She shows that, although she has had grants from the funds of the Dumb Friends League and other casual financial help, she has had to spend considerable sums out of her own pocket. She says that the testatrix was a friend of hers with whom she was in frequent correspondence and that the testatrix always took a great interest in her work.

D It is said on behalf of Miss Harvey that it does not matter whether this is a charitable gift or not, because there is no element of perpetuity or uncertainty, and, therefore, it is a good trust which can be properly executed by the court. It is further said that, in any case, the gift is charitable. On behalf of the next-of-kin it is urged that the gift is bad for perpetuity and uncertainty, and that it is not a charitable gift. Inasmuch as I am satisfied that this is a valid charitable object, the bequest does not fail, and I propose to base my decision on that ground. RUSSELL, L.J., in Re Grove-Grady (1) laid it down clearly that a gift in favour of animals depends for its validity on the question whether such a gift produces a benefit to mankind. He said ([1929] 1 Ch. 582):

E "So far as I know there is no decision which upholds a trust in perpetuity in favour of animals upon any other ground than this, that the execution of the trust in the manner defined by the creator of the trust must produce some benefit to mankind. I cannot help feeling that in some instances matters have been stretched in favour of charities almost to bursting point: and that a decision benevolent to one doubtful charity has too often been the basis of a subsequent decision still more benevolent in favour of another."

G Later he said (ibid., 588):

"In my opinion, the court must determine in each case whether the trusts are such that benefit to the community must necessarily result from their execution."

H The observations of the Lord Justice on those matters received recognition in the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. National Anti-Vivisection Society (2).

Therefore, one has to see whether the present case passes that test, namely, the test whether the gift produces some benefit to mankind. In my judgment, it passes that test with honours. It seems to me that the care of and consideration for animals which through old age or sickness or otherwise are unable to care for themselves are manifestations of the finer side of human nature, and gifts in furtherance of these objects are calculated to develop that side and are, therefore, calculated to benefit mankind. That is more especially so, perhaps, where the animals are domestic animals. That appears to have been the view of the matter taken by LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in Re Grove-Grady (1) where, after referring to certain authorities, he said ([1929] 1 Ch. 570) :

"From these authorities it seems clear that if the object be to enhance the condition of animals that are useful to mankind, or to secure good treatment for animals, whether those animals are useful to mankind or not (see per CHATTERTON, V.-C., in Armstrong v. Reeves (3) and per WOOD, V.-C., in Marsh v. Means (4)), or to insure humane conduct towards, and treatment of, them whether in respect of a particular subjection of them to the use of mankind, as for food (Re Cranston (5)), or in what is called vivisection, such objects are to be deemed charitable."

It appears to me that, taking a fair view of this lady's activities as they emerge from her affidavit, it may truthfully be said of them that they conform to all those tests and criteria to which LORD HANWORTH draws attention. I need, I think, only add that a gift to the Institution of the Home for Lost Dogs was regarded as a charitable gift in Re Douglas (6).

Counsel for the next-of-kin has urged that this is not a trust for the protection of cats and kittens or protection from cruelty, but is merely a gift for their welfare. I do not take that view of the matter. The gift in the will is not merely a gift to be used at the lady's discretion for the welfare of cats and kittens. It is for the welfare of cats and kittens needing care and attention. It is plain that a gift to prevent cruelty in relation to cats and kittens would be good as having an elevating effect on mankind. For my part, I can see no difference between that and a gift the object of which is to alleviate distress among cats and kittens. It seems to me that, that being the object which the testatrix had in mind, the object which she intended to benefit, and it being, in substance, the object of the work which this lady has carried out and is now carrying out, the gift is perfectly good as being a valid charitable bequest, and I so hold.

JONES v. BELLEGROVE PROPERTIES, LTD.

Limitation of Action—Debt—Acknowledgment—Balance sheets of debtor company handed to shareholder creditor—Parol evidence to explain entries—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), ss. 23 (4), 24 (1) (2).

By s. 23 (4) of the Limitation Act, 1939, "Where any right of action has accrued to recover any debt or . . . pecuniary claim . . . and the person liable or accountable therefor acknowledges the claim . . . the right shall be deemed to have accrued on and not before the date of the acknowledgment . . ." By s. 24, "(1) Every such acknowledgment as aforesaid shall be in writing and signed by the person making the acknowledgment. (2) Any such acknowledgment . . . shall be made to the person, or to an agent of the person, whose title or claim is being acknowledged."

In 1936 the plaintiff lent £1,807 to the defendant company in which he was a shareholder. At the annual general meeting of the company in December, 1946, the plaintiff was handed by a director the accounts of the company, signed by the accountants and two directors, which included the balance sheets for the years 1939 to 1945, in each of which was the entry: "Sundry creditors £7,638 8s. 10d."

A HELD: (i) parol evidence was admissible to show that the sum mentioned in this entry included the debt due to plaintiff.

(ii) the entry, thus explained, constituted an acknowledgment of the debt due to the plaintiff within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1939, ss. 23 (4) and 24 (1).

B (iii) although the plaintiff was present at the meeting in December, 1946, in his capacity as shareholder, he was also, in fact, a creditor, and the communication then made to him was sufficient to satisfy s. 24 (2) of the Act which did not require that an acknowledgment should be in any particular form.

ACTION for money lent.

G The plaintiff, a shareholder in the defendant company, sought to recover money lent to the company in 1936. The company pleaded that the action was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (a). In reply, the plaintiff contended inter alia that there had been a written acknowledgment of the debt in balance sheets for the years 1939-1945 which had been communicated to him in 1946. BIRKETT, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Marshall, K.C., and I. H. Jacob for the plaintiff.
S. Terrell for the defendant company.

H BIRKETT, J.: The plaintiff, Francis Edward Jones, claims from the defendant company, Bellegrove Properties, Ltd., a sum now agreed at £1,807, the balance of money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant company in 1936 as set out in the particulars of the claim. The defendants say that the debt did not accrue within six years before action brought, and is, therefore, barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (a). To that defence, in his reply, the plaintiff pleads that within six years before the action the defendant company made an acknowledgment in writing, signed by their agents, Messrs. J.

Altman & Co., chartered accountants, to him that the debt now sued for remained unpaid and due to him. As particulars it is stated that at the annual general meeting of the defendant company on Dec. 31, 1946, at which the plaintiff was present, the accounts and balance sheets for the seven years ending May 21, 1945, were presented to the meeting. These accounts were signed by the accountants as agents of the defendant company, and they contained a statement that the defendant company owed their creditors, of whom the plaintiff was one, during each of the said years, the sums therein set out. Part of each of the sums so set out represented the debt of £1,807 due and owing to the plaintiff by the defendant company.

That is the first main issue in this action. The defendants say that the debt is statute-barred, and they deny that there has been any acknowledgment in writing taking it out of the Limitation Act, 1939. [His LORDSHIP recited the facts relating to the formation of the defendant company in 1936, found that the sum claimed by the plaintiff was lent by him to the company, referred to meetings of the company in 1942 and 1945 and to the appointment of a Mr. Silver as a director and continued:] It is plain that Mr. Silver was thoroughly aware of the debt owing to the plaintiff. The next meeting of the defendant company was the annual general meeting on Dec. 31, 1946, and the plaintiff said—and it is the only evidence I have before me about what happened: “Mr. Silver said: ‘These are the accounts for five or six years. Would you care to look at them?’” These were the accounts from 1939 to 1945, signed by the chartered accountants and by two of the directors of the company. In those documents, which were balance sheets as at May 21, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, and 1945, there is a figure under the heading of “Sundry Creditors £7,638 8s. 10d.” This figure included the loan made by the plaintiff to the company.

Counsel for the defendant company submitted that the debt was statute-barred by reason of the Limitation Act, 1939. Section 23 (4) of that Act, however, provides:

“Where any right of action has accrued to recover any debt or . . . pecuniary claim, or any claim to the personal estate of a deceased person or to any share or interest therein, and the person liable or accountable therefor acknowledges the claim or makes any payment in respect thereof, the right shall be deemed to have accrued on and not before the date of the acknowledgment or the last payment: Provided that a payment of a part of the rent or interest due at any time shall not extend the period for claiming the remainder then due, but any payment of interest shall be treated as a payment in respect of the principal debt.”

By s. 24:

“(1) Every such acknowledgment as aforesaid shall be in writing and signed by the person making the acknowledgment. (2) Any such acknowledgment or payment as aforesaid may be made by the agent of the person by whom it is required to be made under the last foregoing section, and shall be made to the person, or to an agent of the person, whose title or claim is being acknowledged or, as the case may be, in respect of whose claim the payment is being made.”

Counsel for the defendant company submitted that these balance sheets containing the entry, “sundry creditors £7,638 8s. 10d.”, were not a clear admission of liability to any one, and would, therefore, not be an acknowledgment within the Act of 1939. He argued that “sundry creditors” was a mere statement of fact as to liabilities to shareholders and not to creditors.

In Spencer v. Hemmerde (1) a decision of the House of Lords, LORD SUMNER stated the essential conditions of the acknowledgment which was required under the statutes existing in 1922, and said ([1922] 2 A.C. 532):

A “In the earlier case of Green v. Humphreys (2), COTTON, BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., express a view which gets rid of the old difficulties and in my opinion ought to be adopted. COTTON, L.J., recites the familiar formula: ‘The rule seems to be this, that if there is an absolute unconditional acknowledgment, not controlled by any other language in the letter, then the court comes to the conclusion that by that acknowledgment the party intends a promise to pay that which he acknowledges to be due,’ and he concludes: ‘... on a fair construction of the language there must be an acknowledgment of the claim as one which is to be paid by the writer.’ The judgments of BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ. are to the same effect. The former says: ‘It is clearly settled that to take a case out of the statute there must be an acknowledgment or a promise to pay, and that where there is a clear acknowledgment that the debt is due from the person giving that acknowledgment, a promise to pay will be inferred’; and FRY, L.J., asks: ‘... what is an acknowledgment?’ In my view an acknowledgment is an admission by the writer that there is a debt owing by him, either to the receiver of the letter or to some other person on whose behalf the letter is received.”

C Counsel for the defendant company also relied on Bowring-Hanbury’s Trustees v. Bowring-Hanbury (3) which went to the Court of Appeal. The headnote ([1943] Ch. 104) is:

D “A creditor, who was the sole executor of the will of his wife, stated, in an Inland Revenue affidavit made by him to obtain probate, that the list of debts of the estate included a sum of £9,000 due to him as representing the balance of a loan made by him to his wife after repayment to him of £1,000 in June, 1929. He became bankrupt in 1935, and the solicitors who were acting for him as executor of his wife’s estate, sent to his trustee in bankruptcy a letter enclosing a copy of the executor’s cash accounts and an estimate of the outstanding assets and liabilities. E A note was appended to this document stating that: ‘In addition to the above outstanding liabilities there is a possible claim by [the executor] for £9,000, the balance of a loan made to the deceased in 1924.’ The trustee having commenced proceedings in 1936 to recover this sum from the executor, the defence was set up that the claim was barred under the Limitation Act, 1923, s. 3. F Held, (1) that the statement in the affidavit did not constitute an acknowledgment ...”

LORD CLAUSON, delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1943] 1 All E.R. 50; [1943] Ch. 109):

G “The law as to the operation of an acknowledgment (which is authoritatively expounded by LORD SUMNER in the House of Lords in Spencer v. Hemmerde (1)) has been altered by the Limitation Act, 1939, but (see s. 33 of that Act) not so as to affect the present case. BENNETT, J., referring to the decision of NEVILLE, J., in Re Beavan (4), held that the statement in the Inland Revenue affidavit was a mere statement of facts and not an acknowledgment of anything to anybody, and could not be taken to imply a promise, and in any case was not made to the creditor or the creditor’s agent. This decision appears to us to be plainly right ... H However this may be (and we express no opinion on the point) it is a complete answer to the plaintiff’s plea based on this letter that there was no evidence of any authority given to the solicitors by the defendant, to make any acknowledgment of the debt on his behalf. We, accordingly, see no ground for interfering with the decision of BENNETT, J. ...”

Counsel for the defendant company cited these authorities in support of his contention that this statement of “sundry creditors” in the balance sheets is akin to the mere statement of facts in the affidavit to the Inland Revenue and ought to have no effect.

I do not know that the decision of ATKINSON, J., in Ledingham v. Bermejo Estancia Co., Ltd., Agar v. Bermejo Estancia Co., Ltd. (5) carries this matter much further, because in that case there was a note in the balance sheet indicating that a certain sum was due to the lender. It was cited to me for the reason that in the present case the plaintiff's name does not appear in this balance sheet. There is no specific sum allotted to the plaintiff in the general sum of £7,638, and while that decision of ATKINSON, J., could not be contested because in the balance sheet there appeared a specific acknowledgment, a specific person and a specific sum, that was not so in the present case. In the important case of Re Coliseum (Barrow), Ltd. (6), MAUGHAM, J., said ([1930] 2 Ch. 47) :

"It is now well settled that an acknowledgment will keep a debt alive only if it amounts to a fresh promise to pay (Green v. Humphreys (2)), and that the acknowledgment must be made to the creditor or to his agent : that is beyond dispute. In the present case the directors of the company, at various board meetings held from time to time, passed the balance sheets before them and two of them signed the balance sheets on behalf of the board pursuant to s. 113 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. Accordingly, had the statement been made in the balance sheet that the company owed a specified sum to a shareholder to whom the balance sheet was sent in the usual way that would have amounted, I think, to a sufficient acknowledgment within the authorities."

In the balance sheets in the present case there is a general figure of £7,638 8s. 10d. and in that general sum there is this specific sum lent by the plaintiff. That is abundantly clear, and I cannot doubt that in any case such as the present, where a balance sheet confines itself to a general figure, oral evidence is admissible to show the constituent elements of that figure. Evidence was given in this case by a witness for the defence who expressly stated that that figure includes loans to the company.

In Hartley v. Wharton (7), the defendant, after he had reached his majority, had written a letter affirming a debt incurred during his infancy. The letter read (11 Ad. & El. 935) :

"Sir, I am sorry to give you so much trouble in calling, but I am not prepared for you ; but will without neglect remit you in a short time.—Yours respectfully, Monday night, 6 o'clock."

There was no address, and it was submitted that the document was insufficient to satisfy the statute because it contained no amount and did not specify the date or the creditor's name. LORD DENMAN, C.J. (ibid., 937) said :

" . . . there was proof of the delivery of the goods ; and the question is whether the replication, alleging a ratification by writing after the defendant was of age, has been proved. There is no date to the writing ; but the Act requires none, but only a promise or ratification made by some writing signed by the party to be charged therewith. Then it is urged that the party to whom the promise was made is not named. That I do not think necessary. If such a promise were in a letter, the address would be evidence ; and, if that were in an envelope, evidence might be given to connect the two : and so evidence may be given showing for or to whom the written acknowledgment was made, by delivery or otherwise. Then it is said that no sum is named. I do not say that it might not have been desirable that the statute should have required this ; but it does not do so in fact. And the decisions of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, and of LORD TENTERDEN at Nisi Prius show that this is not necessary ; though an earlier decision of the Common Pleas points the other way."

So I entertain no doubt that evidence may be given to show that in this general sum in the balance sheet, the specific debt due to the plaintiff is owing.

In Re Atlantic and Pacific Fibre Importing and Manufacturing Co., Ltd. (8) the headnote is ([1926] Ch. 836) :

- A "A balance sheet contained in an annual report sent by a company to its shareholders and filed with the Registrar of Companies and stating the total amount of the company's indebtedness under its debentures for principal and interest accrued thereon since their issue is, although not sent to the debenture holders, a sufficient acknowledgment by the company of its liability under the debentures to take the case out of the operation of s. 3 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833."

The balance sheet stated the following liabilities (ibid., 837) :

- C " 'On debentures, £23,925 8s. 6d.' And the balance sheet in the report for the year ending Dec. 31, 1926, contained, under the heading 'Sundry creditors' the following entry : 'Accrued interest on debentures, £80,733 2s. 7d.' That sum representing the aggregate amount of interest accrued and unpaid on all the issued debentures, at the rate of 10 per cent., as from the dates on which the debentures were respectively issued. The notices and reports incorporating the balance sheets were sent to the plaintiff and those other debenture holders who happened also to be shareholders of the company, but were not sent to those debenture holders who were not shareholders, and a print of the balance sheet so signed by the directors was filed in each year with the Registrar of Companies."

CLAUSON, J., stated (ibid., 839) :

- E "In my judgment the issue of the balance sheets constituted, in the circumstances, a sufficient acknowledgment of the company's indebtedness to the plaintiff and the other debenture holders under the debentures."

In Read v. Price (9) the headnote states ([1909] 2 K.B. 724) :

"Parol evidence is admissible to prove the contents of a written acknowledgment which has been lost."

COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said (ibid., 730) :

- F "Three points were raised. The first was that any acknowledgment to take the case out of the statute of limitations applicable to the bond must be in writing, and no writing was produced. We did not call upon the counsel for the respondents to deal with that, or with the second point as to the admissibility of parol evidence of the contents of the written acknowledgment, because it seemed to us quite clear that, although the statute says the acknowledgment must be in writing, you may prove the writing in any way. You may prove the existence of the writing by the ordinary law of evidence, and when the writing is lost, and the proof of the loss is satisfactory to the court, you may give secondary evidence of the contents of the lost document, just as in cases where writing is required under the Statute of Frauds you can always prove the existence of the writing by parol evidence, if proof is given of the loss of the written document."

I can state quite shortly my own conclusions. I entertain no doubt that there was a debt in existence at the time of the issue of the writ. That has not been seriously contested. I hold that the balance sheets for 1939 to 1945 inclusive are a sufficient acknowledgment within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1939. They are in writing, signed by the agent of the defendant company

(J. Altman & Co.), and also signed by two directors of the defendant company, and I hold that the requirements of s. 24 (1) :

"Every such acknowledgment as aforesaid shall be in writing and signed by the person making the acknowledgment " have been satisfied. With regard to s. 23 (4) :

"Where any right of action has accrued to recover any debt or . . . pecuniary claim . . . and the person liable or accountable therefor acknowledges the claim . . . the right shall be deemed to have accrued on and not before the date of the acknowledgment . . . "

I hold that there was here an acknowledgment within the sub-section. With regard to s. 24 (2) :

"Any such acknowledgment . . . shall be made to the person, or to an agent of the person . . . "

It has been argued that the plaintiff was only present at the meeting in December, 1946, as a shareholder and not in the capacity of a creditor, and, therefore, the communication which was made at that meeting had no effect as an acknowledgment made to a creditor. I am unable to accept that contention. No particular form of acknowledgment is required. When the plaintiff attended the meeting it is true he went there in his capacity as shareholder, but he was also a creditor, and, in my view, it cannot be said that this is not an acknowledgment of indebtedness to a creditor merely because he happens to be a shareholder and would not otherwise have been at the meeting.

For these reasons I give judgment for the plaintiff here for the sum of £1,807, with the costs of the action.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), February 16, 1949.]

Conflict of Laws—Restraint of foreign proceedings—Burden of proof—Divorce petition—Injunction to restrain respondent from proceeding with divorce suit in France.

The jurisdiction of the English courts to restrain the respondent in a matrimonial suit in England from proceeding in another country with a suit for the dissolution of the marriage is one which should be exercised with great caution and only if it is shown that the continued prosecution of the foreign suit would be oppressive or vexatious or would cause irreparable damage to the petitioner in England.

SUMMONS by a petitioning wife asking for an injunction restraining the husband from proceeding in France with a suit for the dissolution of the marriage. WILLMER, J., held that the wife had not shown that the continued prosecution of the French suit would be oppressive or vexatious and refused the injunction. The facts appear in the judgment.

Geoffrey Lawrence for the wife.

A Hollins for the husband.

B WILLMER, J. : The petitioning wife asks for an injunction restraining the respondent husband from proceeding with certain proceedings commenced by him in the republic of France for the dissolution of the marriage. The wife in this country is proceeding against her husband on the ground of cruelty, and I am informed that in the French suit the husband is seeking a decree from the French court on the ground of the wife's desertion. The question of domicile has already been debated not only in this court but also in the Court of Appeal, and it has been decided that the wife is domiciled in this country and the husband's objection to the jurisdiction has been overruled. Nevertheless, the husband is still proceeding with his suit in France, not accepting the decision of the English courts with regard to his domicile, but believing that he will be able to persuade the French court to accept his view on that question.

D The present summons asks the court for an injunction in perpetuity. I pointed out to counsel that, on any view, it would be impossible at the present stage to grant an injunction in perpetuity, because at the present moment we do not know whether the wife's claim is or is not well founded. Counsel for the wife recognised that difficulty and said that he was prepared to accept an injunction restraining the husband from pursuing his proceedings in France until the wife obtained a decree in this country, the intention being that, if she succeeded in doing so, he (counsel) would then ask the trial judge to continue the injunction in perpetuity. I do not, however, think it is for me to look so far into the future. The question which I have to determine is whether there should or should not be an injunction restraining the husband from pursuing the French suit until such time as the trial of the suit in this country comes on. I have to ask myself what damage will ensue during that limited time if I do not grant the relief which is asked for.

F It is, I think, now settled that the court will be very slow to impose an injunction on any party seeking to proceed in a foreign country. The most recent pronouncement on the subject to which I have been referred is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cohen v. Rothfield (1). That was a case of a civil action, but in the course of it the authorities were reviewed, both cases where the same plaintiff was pursuing a remedy in two countries and also those in which a plaintiff in one country was defendant in another country. G The matter was summed up by SCRUTTON, L.J., thus ([1919] 1 K.B. 413) :

H "Where it is proposed to stay an action on the ground that another is pending, and the action to be stayed is not in the court asked to make the order, the same result is obtained by restraining the person who is bringing the second action from proceeding with it. But, as the effect is to interfere with proceedings in another jurisdiction, this power should be exercised with great caution to avoid even the appearance of undue interference with another court."

EVE, J., who delivered a judgment to the same effect, said (ibid., 417) :

"The question then arises in what circumstances and upon what principle does the court act in exercising this jurisdiction in cases where, as in this case, it is invoked on the ground that another action between the same parties and for substantially the same relief is already instituted.

Broadly speaking, I think the answer is that the court will exercise the jurisdiction where the circumstances are such as to satisfy it that continued prosecution of both actions would be oppressive or vexatious."

That is to say, I have this jurisdiction, but I am not to exercise it except with great caution and on being satisfied that the continued prosecution of the French action would be oppressive or vexatious, and, I think I should add, would cause serious, if not irreparable, damage to the wife to whom in this instance I am asked to grant this injunction. A

In Cohen v. Rothfield (1) SCRUTTON, L.J., drew a distinction between the cases where the same plaintiff is suing in two jurisdictions and those where the plaintiff in one country is the defendant in another, making it clear that in the latter case the courts will lean against interference even more strongly than in the former case. He raised, indeed, a question which had twice previously been raised in similar cases—whether there was any case in which such an order had ever been made. In reply to that inquiry he was referred to Bushby v. Munday (2) which was decided in 1821. There an order had been made where a plaintiff in this country was defendant in another country, but, apart from that one old case, no such order had been made up to 1918 when Cohen v. Rothfield (1) was decided, and I am informed by counsel that their researches have not revealed any case in which such an order has been made in the last thirty years. I approach this case, therefore, with some degree of caution when I am asked to exercise this very unusual jurisdiction. B

In my judgment, no sufficient case has been made out for making the order that I am asked to make. It appears to me that the course which the wife and her advisers have taken is misconceived. As she has obtained the judgment of the Court of Appeal establishing the English domicile for which she was contending, I should have thought that the next step to take was to set the case down for trial. Had that been done in early November it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that by today we might have been trying the suit instead of discussing what should be done about the French proceedings. Had that course been taken, had the wife proceeded with dispatch, the question which we have been discussing today would be largely academic. Even today, there is no evidence before me that any step in the French proceedings is being contemplated in the immediate or foreseeable future. Notwithstanding the loss of three and a half months' time, I see no reason why, if this case were to be set down at once, it should not be tried and disposed of long before the French proceedings come to fruition—at any rate if the French proceedings proceed at the rate which has been maintained up to now. In those circumstances, it appears to me that the wife is far from proving that in the circumstances it would be oppressive or vexatious to allow the French proceedings to proceed or that a case has been made out for interfering with the right of a party to proceed in a foreign jurisdiction. Bearing in mind the caution which has been enjoined on the court before making an order of this character, I feel that I can only decline to make the order asked for, and the application will, therefore, be dismissed. Damage—Remoteness—Breach of contract—Contract by defendant to form company—Agreement by plaintiff to contribute capital—Sale of shares to provide funds—Contract repudiated by defendant—Shares re-purchased at enhanced cost—Recovery of excess.

A The plaintiff agreed with the defendant that he would provide capital for the formation of a limited company to exploit for building purposes a material which the defendant had invented. To provide the necessary funds, the plaintiff disposed of a block of shares. The defendant subsequently refused to go on with the matter, and the plaintiff thereupon bought an equal number of the same shares. Owing to fluctuations in the market they cost him £245 more than he had received on the sale.

B HELD: the sum of £245 was recoverable by the plaintiff from the defendant as damages for breach of contract.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract.

E In 1946 the plaintiff, a civil engineer, answered an advertisement inserted in a newspaper by the agents of the defendant, the inventor of "Lignacite," a material for building purposes designed to take the place of concrete. To exploit the invention the defendant was proposing to form a limited company which would have a share capital of £8,500, of which £1,000 would be ordinary shares of £1 each allotted to the defendant and the balance a working capital of £7,500 in 6 per cent. preference shares of £1 each to be subscribed in cash by three directors in equal amounts of £2,500 each. The plaintiff agreed to subscribe £2,500 and two other intending directors, one Cox and one Baynton, agreed to subscribe £1,000 and £1,500 respectively. After consultation with the plaintiff's bank it was agreed that the four parties should form a company to be called Lignacite (South Eastern) Ltd., with a working capital of £5,000 only. This was confirmed by letters of Sept. 3 and 4, 1946, between the plaintiff and the defendant, final terms being settled at a meeting held on Sept. 9, 1946.

G In pursuance of the agreement the three directors providing capital agreed between them to find £2,000 at once, the plaintiff producing £1,000 and Mr. Baynton and Mr. Cox £500 each. To provide this sum the plaintiff disposed of a block of Central Argentine Railway shares which realised £1,042. On Sept. 11 the defendant sent a letter to the plaintiff, which the latter received on Sept. 13, stating that the proposal to form the company with a subscribed capital of £5,000 only was unacceptable to the defendant, and that, unless the plaintiff could arrange for the subscription of the complete nominal capital of £7,500, the defendant was unable to proceed further in the matter. The plaintiff thereupon re-purchased the shares which he had sold, and for them, owing to fluctuations in the market, he had to pay an additional £245.

H HUMPHREYS, J., held that there had been a breach of contract by the defendant, and that the extra cost at which the plaintiff had to re-purchase the shares was recoverable as damages.

Our note, ante.

Feb. 11. HUMPHREYS, J., stated the facts, found that there had been a concluded contract and there was a breach of that contract, and concluded:—
It is said by counsel for the defendant that the damages claimed are of a kind which the law does not recognise, and that the breach of such a contract as that with which we are concerned here does not sound in damages at all. The damages are put in the statement of claim as expense, loss and damage due to the breach of contract.

As soon as the plaintiff was satisfied that the contract was complete he sold this Argentine railway stock to implement his promise to his co-directors to find £1,000 at once and, eventually, to invest £2,500 in the company. When he received the defendant's letter of Sept. 11 on Friday, Sept. 13, it was too late for him to do anything (the next two days being Saturday and Sunday) until the following Monday, when he decided to buy back the Argentine stock. If he could have got it back at the price at which he had sold he would have suffered no loss except such small expense as he happened to have been put to. Counsel for the defendant argues that the damages claimed are not recoverable because the plaintiff's loss is really due to the fluctuations of the market. A further objection to the claim is that the damage did not arise out of the breach of contract because the plaintiff had sold his shares before there was any breach of contract, and, indeed, before there was any need for him to sell them. "My contract with you," says the defendant, "was to form a company, and you promised that, as soon as the company was registered, you would invest £2,500, but the company was not registered. It would probably have been registered in a comparatively few days, Oct. 1, having been suggested as the time for beginning the venture, but that date had not arrived. Therefore, in selling these shares when the quotation was low, you were very unwise, and it was quite unnecessary. I did not ask you to, and I am not responsible if you made a loss."

Counsel for the defendant relied on, first, Flowers v. Theobald (1). That was a case of the sale of land by the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant could not make out the title, and he offered the plaintiff the choice of either taking the title with all its faults or of having back the deposit he had paid, with interest and costs, but the plaintiff insisted on a further sum for damages in the loss of a good bargain, and the question which the court had to consider was whether he was entitled to those damages. BLACKSTONE, J., said (2 Wm. Bl. 1078):

"These covenants are merely upon condition, frequently expressed, but always implied, that the vendor has a good title. If he has not, the return of the deposit, with interest and costs, is all that can be expected."

The other judges agreed. That is true today in regard to the sale of land. In MAYNE ON DAMAGES, 11th ed., p. 227, the learned author, quoting the well-known words of Lord CHANESFORD in Hill v. Fisherhill (2 Q. B. 7 H.L. 207), said:

"The rule as to the times within which damages may be recovered upon the breach of a contract for the sale of a real estate must be taken to be without exception. If a person enters into a contract for the sale of a real estate knowing that he has no title to it, not only means of acquiring it, the purchaser cannot recover damages beyond the expenses he has incurred by an action for the breach of the contract: he can only obtain other damages by an action for deceit."

The learned author continues (ibid.):

"No doubt there is an exception to the ordinary rule of the contract law, that where a person enters into a contract with a person of sound mind, he is bound to perform it, and he is liable for damages as if the contract had been performed."

That is based on the long case of Parker v. Lewis, 10 Adams & Ellis, 254. In Hobbs v. Rowland, 4 Adams & Ellis, 254.

we think the proper rule is such a case as the present is that where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be so assessed upon an inquiry, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself.

Then to come now to the case of special circumstances. It is not suggested that there are any special circumstances in the present case, so it is the first rule that applies. In the present case the fact is: Was the action of the plaintiff a reasonable one? Was it reasonable for him, having entered into the contract on Sept. 2 at a price of £1,000 in the only way he could? I think it was extremely reasonable, indeed. I think he was bound to do it, if not under the contract with the defendant at least under his contract with the other two defendants. When on Sept. 12 he received the letter which constituted a breach of contract, what was the reasonable thing for him to do? It seems to me that the reasonable and proper thing for him to do was to take any steps which would secure him the damage which he had suffered, and the way was as simple as that was by going into the market and buying back an equivalent amount of stock. It is true that he made a loss, but if it had happened that the market had gone down instead of going up, he would have been applauded by the defendant for having prevented there being a loss. His position was the same as if this had been a contract for the sale of, e.g., wheat. Supposing the defendant had contracted to deliver in many bushels of wheat to the plaintiff and had failed to do so. The plaintiff, of course, would have gone to go into the market and buy that number of bushels of wheat, and if he had to pay more for them than he would have had to pay to the defendant, the damages would have been the extra amount which he had had to pay. That is exactly what the plaintiff did in this case. The mere fact that there were fluctuations in the market seems to me not to constitute him to say that he did the best reasonable thing he could, and the loss was not his fault. The fault was that of the defendant who failed to implement the promise. The defendant broke his contract and the plaintiff had to do the best he could in the circumstances. For these general reasons I come to the conclusion that the damages he claimed are payable, and, therefore, I give judgment for the plaintiff for £245, with costs.

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

*Re A DEBTOR (No. 400 OF 1940). Ex parte THE DEBTOR
v. DODWELL (THE TRUSTEE).*

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), January 31, February 14, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Control over trustee by bankrupt—Extent—Removal of trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), ss. 80, 105 (1).

A
A bankrupt applied under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 80 and 105 (1), for relief against the trustee in bankruptcy, including inter alia (a) an injunction restraining the trustee from disposing of any of the property comprised in the estate, (b) an order for his removal from office, (c) inquiries into his remuneration and his costs, charges and expenses in managing the estate, and (d) an order for him to pay in full all creditors other than the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

HELD: (i) although the court could in certain circumstances interfere at the instance of a bankrupt to control the actions of the trustee, ss. 80 and 105 (1) of the Act did not, in the absence of fraud, justify interference in the day to day administration of the estate or entitle the bankrupt to question the exercise by the trustee in good faith of his discretion or hold him accountable for an error of judgment. It was for the trustee alone to decide (with the permission of the committee of inspection, under s. 56) when and how to realise the estate, and he was not accountable to the bankrupt, except for the surplus to which the bankrupt was entitled under s. 69 of the Act.

(ii) the bankrupt had no right to insist on the removal of the trustee from office, or to interfere with his remuneration or the costs, charges and expenses incurred by him, unless the trustee was guilty of misconduct in which case the Board of Trade would interfere under s. 95 (2) of the Act.

E
(iii) it was for the trustee alone to settle with the creditors, and the bankrupt had no right to question his decision. The bankrupt's suggestion that one class of creditors should be paid in full while nothing was paid to another class was a negation of the whole object of bankruptcy proceedings.

H
MOTION by the bankrupt, applying under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 80 and 105 (1), for the removal of the trustee and appointment of the official receiver in his place and other relief against the trustee. HARMAN, J., held that the relief asked for could not be granted, and dismissed the application. The facts appear in the judgment.

Our. adv. vult.

Feb. 14. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. By this motion launched in November, 1948, the bankrupt seeks the following relief against the trustee : (i) an inquiry as to the disposal by the trustee of the contents of the dwelling-house occupied at the date of the bankruptcy by the bankrupt and his wife ; (ii) an injunction restraining the trustee from selling or disposing of any of the property comprised in the bankrupt's estate ; (iii) an order removing the trustee from his office and appointing the official receiver in his place ; (iv) an order that the court give directions that the bankrupt be appointed as general manager of the estate ; (v) an inquiry into the trustee's remuneration and an order of the court fixing it ; (vi) an inquiry into the costs, charges and expenses of the trustee in managing the estate and an order fixing proper charges and disallowing against the estate any excess found to have been charged ; (vii) an order directing the trustee or his substitute to pay all the creditors in full other than the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ; or, by way of alternative, (viii) an order re-vesting all the bankrupt's estate in him, and (ix) such further relief as the court thinks fit. It will be seen that the relief asked does not lack either for boldness or for novelty.

The bankrupt bases his application on the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 80 and 105 (1) which provide :

" 80. If the bankrupt or any of the creditors, or any other person, is aggrieved by any act or decision of the trustee, he may apply to the court, and the court may confirm, reverse, or modify the act or decision complained of, and make such order in the premises as it thinks just.

105 (1). Subject to the provisions of this Act, every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act shall have full power to decide all questions of priorities, and all other questions whatsoever, whether of law or fact, which may arise in any case of bankruptcy coming within the cognisance of the court, or which the court may deem it expedient or necessary to decide for the purpose of doing complete justice or making a complete distribution of property in any such case . . . "

When the motion first came on, counsel for the trustee immediately took the point by way of quasi demurrer that the bankrupt had no locus standi. He said that so long as the bankruptcy continued, the bankrupt could not be a " person aggrieved " by any act of the trustee, and that the bankrupt's only right was to take the surplus if eventually there proved to be one, or, if the trustee misconducted himself, to apply to the Board of Trade under s. 95 (2) of the Act. I was not prepared to accept this submission, and, therefore, evidence has been filed on both sides and the matter has been fully argued, but in the upshot I have only read the evidence-in-chief filed by the bankrupt, because it seemed to me, for reasons which will later appear, unnecessary, having read that, to go further. As I have not read the trustee's evidence in answer, I only assume the bankrupt's statements to be true and do not accept them. Counsel for the bankrupt expressly disclaimed any charge of fraud or dishonesty against the trustee, but complained that he was a " bad " trustee, altogether lacking in sympathy for the bankrupt, and, moreover, one who took far too low a view of the bankrupt's right to have a say in the management of the estate. I ought to say in justice to the trustee that his counsel denied the bankrupt's charges and claimed that his evidence refuted them.

This motion, pruned of its more extravagant claims, raises a question of some importance in bankruptcy law, namely, to what extent, if any, can the bankrupt call the trustee in his bankruptcy to account for his management and disposition of the estate. The point, of course, can only arise where the bankrupt can show that there is or will or might (but for the trustee's action or inaction) be a surplus in the trustee's hands after satisfying in full all the claims of the creditors. Where, as in the vast majority of cases, the estate is insolvent, the bankrupt has clearly no interest in it, and it matters not to him how it is administered, but the bankrupt has a statutory right to any surplus under s. 69 of the Act, and is, therefore, clearly concerned to increase, if he can, its amount.

Bankruptcy has been a part of our law for over a century, and in essence it has preserved the same principle throughout, namely, that the bankrupt is relieved of his debts and freed from the oppression of his creditors, but at a price, which is that he is stripped of all his property, that property vesting in a person who was originally known as the assignee, but who in more recent Acts has been described as the trustee. Under either name this person acts in the same capacity. He is, as the older Act expressed it, the assign of all the bankrupt's property. He is a trustee of it, not for the bankrupt, but for the creditors, and, until the bankruptcy process is worked out, the bankrupt has no further interest in the assigned assets. That is the price he pays for obtaining his discharge and for being freed from the fetters of his debts. It is, in fact, the alternative to languishing indefinitely in the Fleet Prison. It seems to me clear that there must be circumstances in which the court can interfere at the instance of a bankrupt to control the actions of the trustee. This is apparent from the terms of s. 80 itself, and is confirmed by the all-embracing language of s. 105. I need not, I think, attempt to define what these circumstances are. They cannot, I think (in the absence of fraud) justify interference in the day to day administration of the estate, nor can they entitle the bankrupt to question the exercise by the trustee in good faith of his discretion, nor to hold him accountable for an error of judgment. Administration in bankruptcy would be impossible if the trustee must answer at every step to the bankrupt for the exercise of his powers and discretions in the management and realisation of the property.

The whole of the bankrupt's property, as described in s. 38 of the Act, vests in the trustee under ss. 18 and 53, and s. 84 and the following sections show the trustee's duty as to accounts, and, while creditors are given certain rights to call for accounts, no mention is made of the bankrupt. By s. 87 the trustee must file statements of account every year or more often, and these must be audited by the Board of Trade, and it appears to me that these are the limits of the trustee's obligations so far as accounting is concerned. In other words, he is not accountable to the bankrupt except for the surplus. It is the right and duty of the trustee to realise that which vests in him to the best advantage, and it is for him alone to decide (under s. 56), with the consent of the committee of inspection, how best the realisation may be made. With all this, notwithstanding his interest in the surplus (if any), the bankrupt is not concerned and has no right to interfere. In fact, the creditors are not his creditors. He has got rid of them and has nothing more to do with them. This is apparent when one considers the rules, in sched. II to the Act, dealing with the proof of debts. Under r. 24 a proof may be expunged on the application of the trustee, and, under r. 26, on the application of a creditor, but it is only in cases of composition or scheme that the debtor may apply, and this point is illustrated by Re Benoist (1).

I find support for the view of the law which I have put forward in Bird v. Philpott (2). In that case FARWELL, J., had to consider the right of a bankrupt to assign the surplus in his first bankruptcy, and the question was whether the assignee of the surplus could assert his rights in priority to the trustee in a second bankruptcy. It was held that he could, and FARWELL, J., made the following observations ([1900] 1 Ch. 828):

"As I read the Bankruptcy Act, the trustee takes all the bankrupt's property for an absolute estate in law, but for limited purposes, namely, for the payment of the creditors under that bankruptcy, and that bankruptcy only—payment of principal and interest, and all the costs of the bankruptcy. Subject to that, he is a trustee for the bankrupt of the surplus. He as a trustee is in a better position than an ordinary trustee to the extent pointed out in Ex parte Sheffield, Re Austin (3) and Re Leadbitter (4), that is to say, the bankrupt has not the ordinary right of a cestui que trust to intervene until the surplus has been ascertained to exist, and all the creditors and interest and costs have been paid. He cannot trouble the trustee by taxing the bill of costs or interfere with the administration of the estate in any way, but, subject to that and subject to his non-interference with the administration and with the management of the trustee during the bankruptcy in the due course of the execution of his duty, he can, in my opinion, demand the surplus, and he has a right to the surplus—a right which he can dispose of by will or deed or otherwise during the pendency of the first bankruptcy, even before the surplus is ascertained, although such disposition will of course be ineffectual unless in the event there prove to be a surplus upon which it can operate.”

The Bankruptcy Act referred to by FARWELL, J., was the Act of 1883 which for this purpose is the same as the Act of 1914. Moreover, Jarrett v. Barclays Bank, Ltd., Nash v. Jarrett (5) shows that the representative of a bankrupt mortgagor has no locus standi to question a sale by the mortgagee during the currency of the bankruptcy, and MORTON, L.J., quoting from the judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J., in the court below, said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 75) :

“‘Upon Mrs. Jarrett being adjudicated bankrupt the whole of her property passed to and vested in the official receiver under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 53. Thereafter it was only the trustee who could deal with the property ; it was only he who could in any way effectively complain against the mortgagee. The bankrupt could not go behind the trustee.’ The judge then referred to Re Leadbitter (4) both in the High Court and in the Court of Appeal and continued : ‘The mere fact that a bankrupt has a future interest in a possible surplus does not mean that he has a present interest, and there is, in my view, nothing but confirmation of this proposition to be found in Bird v. Philpott (2) which was cited by Mr. Fortune [for the husband of the bankrupt] in favour of his argument ’.”

Before returning to the details of the relief asked, I will state the facts, so far as I have thought it necessary to go into them for the purposes of this motion. For a number of years before the 1939 war the bankrupt had been acquiring and managing house property in and around London, most of it being leasehold, and a good deal of it held on short terms of years. At the outbreak of war, he was the owner of a large number of such properties (between 800 and 1,000), details of which are set out in an exhibit to his affidavit filed on Nov. 29, 1948. Of these properties a substantial part was in mortgage to various mortgagees, but others were free from encumbrances.

The outbreak of war had a disastrous effect on businesses of this character, and it is evident that the bankrupt soon found himself in difficulties. He was, in fact, made bankrupt in November, 1940, on the petition of a creditor having a judgment against him in respect of dilapidations under certain leases. It was clearly impossible in the circumstances of the time to realise an estate of this sort at anything like its proper value, and the trustee found himself obliged to carry on as a business the management of the various properties included in the estate, and he continued to do so throughout the war. The bankrupt obtained his discharge in 1943. No dividend has ever been paid in the bankruptcy owing to difficulties which have arisen in circumstances which I need not here particularise, except to say that the greatest difficulties arose out of the position between the bankrupt and the Inland Revenue in respect of income tax during 1933 to 1939. As a result of carrying on the business, the trustee now has in his hands over £10,000, and he proposes to sell the unmortgaged part of the estate in order to provide the residue of the money necessary to pay the creditors in full, and it is this proposal which has brought about the present proceedings. None of the secured creditors has proved in the bankruptcy, all of them having elected to stand on their securities. I am told that the claims of the unsecured creditors, apart from the Crown, will amount, with interest, to about £4,000. The claim of the Crown has been admitted by the trustee at a sum in the region of £18,000.

With this premise, I turn to the relief asked for in the notice of motion. As to para. (1), the bankrupt desires, apparently, to re-open a transaction which was concluded in 1941 when the trustee sold the contents of a dwelling-house. It seems to me quite impossible at this distance of time to allow a transaction of this sort to be re-opened even if there was an allegation of unfair dealing, which there is not. The bankrupt is seeking for some ammunition with which to attack the trustee after the lapse of eight years, and this I should not allow even if, consistently with the principle enunciated, I could do so. In my judgment, I clearly could not. It was the duty of the trustee to realise the chattels belonging to or in the apparent possession of the bankrupt, and he alone had the right to do so and to exercise his own judgment in the matter. As to para. (ii), the bankrupt desires to prevent a sale on two grounds: (a) that the trustee has enough money in his hands already. This is clearly nonsense unless the Crown's claim is to be ignored, as the bankrupt says it should be, and, (b) that the season chosen by the trustee is not a favourable one. As to this, it is for the trustee alone to decide when and how to realise the estate, and, in any event, as appears by correspondence exhibited by the bankrupt himself, the trustee has already held his hand since May, 1948, to enable some practical proposal to be made by the bankrupt and nothing whatever has been done. I can grant no relief under this head. As to para. (iii), the bankrupt is labouring under some sense of grievance against the trustee, but he has, in my view, no right whatever to insist on his removal unless, indeed, he can exercise his statutory right under s. 95 (2) of the Act by appealing to the Board of Trade for the trustee's removal under that section. As to para. (iv), there is a power vested in the trustee under s. 57 of the Act, with the consent of the committee of management, to employ the bankrupt in the management of the estate, but it is a long step from this to say that the court will, or, indeed, can, insist on the trustee doing anything of the kind. The bankrupt alleges that his offers to manage the property made in 1941 were rejected in circumstances which gave him personal offence, and that, if he had been employed, the estate would have been better managed. Even if that be all true, the court cannot, and would not, if it could, override the decision of the trustee in a matter of this kind. As to paras. (v) and (vi), I have already pointed out that the bankrupt has no right to interfere in such matters as the trustee's remuneration or the costs, charges and expenses which he incurs unless such payments amount to misconduct in which case the Board of Trade will interfere under s. 95 of the Act. Apart from that, s. 82 shows that it is for the creditors to control the remuneration and costs of the trustee, who is also subject to the scrutiny of the Board of Trade having regard to s. 92 of the Act. As to para. (vii), this is, perhaps, the bankrupt's chief complaint. As I have said, the claims of the ordinary unsecured creditors are comparatively small. The large debt is that to the Crown. This is a debt for income tax going back to 1933, and it has been recently agreed by the trustee with the Inland Revenue after long negotiations. With these the bankrupt is dissatisfied. He complains that his wishes in the matter have been disregarded and that matters ought to have been better managed. Here, again, without going into the merits of the matter, it seems to me that the complaint is an idle one. It is for the trustee and for him alone to settle with the Crown as with any other creditor, and, if in the exercise of his judgment he does so, the bankrupt has no right whatever to call his decision in question. To suggest that one class of creditors should be paid in full and that nothing be paid to another class is a negation of the whole object of bankruptcy proceedings. This seems to me to be an impudent suggestion. As to para. (viii), this again I characterise as impudence. The bankrupt will regain such surplus as may be left when all the creditors have been paid. He appears, on the face of his own evidence, to have had ample time to put forward some scheme which would save his properties from sale, and he has made no concrete proposals whatever. In the circumstances, I can only dismiss his motion with costs.

Application dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Cohen, L.JJ.), February 11, 14, 15, 1949.]

Practice—Parties—Crown—Joinder as party—Hypothetical question—Possible liability to estate duty.

By his will a testator bequeathed a fund to trustees to hold for L.A. for life on protective trusts with various remainders over and with power to the trustees, with the consent of L.A., to make certain advances in favour of the issue of L.A. The trustees desired to ascertain whether, if a certain advance were made, they would be liable to account for estate duty in respect thereof which would be payable under the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, should L.A. die within five years, and they, therefore, issued a summons raising (inter alia) that question and joining the Inland Revenue Commissioners as defendants. The commissioners applied under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, to be struck out as having been improperly joined.

HELD: the question was future and hypothetical, and the trustees could not make the Crown, whether in the person of the Attorney-General or the Inland Revenue Commissioners, respondent to proceedings to decide it, whether those proceedings were begun by originating summons or by writ.

The Court of Appeal dealt generally with the question whether the Crown could be joined in proceedings, whether started by originating summons or by writ, in order to decide future and hypothetical matters such as that of a presumptive claim for estate duty under the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, and dismissed the appeal. LORD GREENE, M.R.: I will ask COHEN, L.J., to give the first judgment.

COHEN, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of HARMAN, J., ordering that the name of the Inland Revenue Commissioners be struck out from this summons, they having been, as the learned judge found, improperly joined as defendants.

The plaintiffs are the trustees of a large legacy settled by the will of the testator. As stated by the learned judge, the limitations of the will are that:

" . . . the fund stands limited in favour of one Lily Asher for a protected life interest, with various remainders over under which the defendants (other than the last defendant) have beneficial interests; in particular, a power of advancement is vested in the plaintiffs as trustees, with the consent of Mrs. Asher, in favour of her children, who are represented here."

The plaintiffs were minded to exercise that power and raise a sum of £100,000 for one of the daughters of Mrs. Asher, but were anxious as to what their position would be if they did so. They feared that they might be liable, if Mrs. Asher died within five years of the date of the advance, to account under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 8, for the duty which would in that event be payable under the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43. Accordingly, they approached the Solicitor of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, and suggested by a letter of Feb. 2, 1948, that they should join the Attorney-General as defendant to a summons which they proposed to issue. To that letter the Solicitor of the Inland Revenue Commissioners replied on Mar. 25:

"Should the proposed advance be made, it would seem that the death of Mrs. Lily Asher would give rise to a claim for estate duty (additional to that on the funds retained by the trustees till her death) in respect of: (1) any sums advanced out of the settled legacy within the five years immediately preceding her death; (2) any sums advanced outside that period of five years in relation to which Mrs. Lily Asher was not excluded or retained any benefit by contract or otherwise; (3) any advances made outside that period of five years which by reason of the protection imposed by the will were not fully effective. The official view is that the proposed plaintiffs to the summons will be accountable for any estate duty payable on the death of Mrs. Lily Asher on any sums advanced notwithstanding that such advanced sums are no longer vested in them."

That the question is hypothetical is plain since no claim for duty can arise at all unless one of the events occurs to which the Solicitor of the Inland Revenue Commissioners refers, and, if it does, the duty will only fall on the trustees if the beneficiaries to whom the advance is made do not pay it in exoneration of the trustees. Undeterred by this letter, the plaintiffs issued their summons and made the commissioners a party. The Inland Revenue Commissioners were substituted for the Attorney-General in view of the passing of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947.

The first two questions in the summons are :

- A "1. Whether, with the consent of Lily Asher who is entitled to a protected life interest in the investments and property representing the above-mentioned settled legacy and other property (hereinafter called 'the settled funds'), the plaintiffs, as such trustees as aforesaid, have power under the trusts contained in the said will and second codicil and in the events which have happened to advance a further sum of £100,000 or
- B some other and what less sum out of the settled funds on account of the expectant presumptive or vested share therein of the defendant, Lucy Sanges, in respect whereof a sum of £50,000 has been previously advanced.
- C 2. Whether any such further sum as aforesaid may properly be applied—
- D First in payment of £2,500 to the trustees of a settlement dated Apr. 29, 1931, and made by the defendant, Lucy Sanges, of the first part, Alfonso Sanges, of the second part, and Arthur Cecil Abrahams and the defendant Robert Henry Stewart Edelston Behrend, therein described as Robert Henry Behrend, of the third part, being the balance remaining unpaid of the said appointed sum of £5,000 (free of duty) thereby settled. Secondly, in payment of £47,500 to the trustees of a settlement dated Jan. 20, 1939, and made by the said Lily Asher, of the first part, the said
- E Lucy Sanges, of the second part, and the said Arthur Cecil Abrahams and Robert Henry Behrend, of the third part, being the balance remaining unpaid of the said appointed sum of £95,000 (free of duty) thereby settled. And, thirdly, in payment of any balance to the trustees of the said settlement of Apr. 29, 1931, which contains a covenant by the said Lucy Sanges to settle after acquired property. Or whether any such balance may
- F properly be paid as to £15,000 to the trustees of the said settlement of Apr. 29, 1931, and as to the residue to the trustees of the settlement of Jan. 20, 1939, as accretion to the funds thereby settled to provide for the estate duty which may become payable on the said respective sums of £5,000 and £95,000. Or how otherwise the said further sum may properly or ought to be applied.
- G I agree with the learned judge that these are questions which it is perfectly proper for the plaintiffs to ask, but I also agree with him that neither of them is a question in which the Crown is interested. If the summons were confined to these two questions, there is no doubt that the Inland Revenue Commissioners could not properly be joined as parties, because they are not persons whose rights are sought to be affected within R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5, nor would the court have ordered the commissioners to be joined under Ord. 55, r. 6. The plaintiffs, however, added a third question, namely :

- H "If the plaintiffs have power to and do advance any such further sum, whether they will be accountable for any estate duty which may become payable on such further sum on the death of the said Lily Asher, notwithstanding that such further sum is no longer vested in them, and, if so, whether they ought to make any and what provision out of such further sum or otherwise for the possibility that such estate duty may become payable."

The question in the present appeal is whether that question affords a valid ground for joining the Inland Revenue Commissioners as defendants. HARMAN, J., stated in the course of his judgment that the first question which arose was whether proceedings of this nature were available to the subject against the Crown. The Finance Acts make provision for appeals in respect of estate duty by dissatisfied subjects. Under the Finance Act, 1894, as amended by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, an appeal was by way of petition. A simplified procedure was provided for under the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, by way of originating summons. As HARMAN, J., pointed out ([1948] 2 All E.R. 587), neither of these methods was available here as they apply only where the Crown's right to estate duty has already accrued. HARMAN, J., went on to consider whether the plaintiffs were entitled to bring the Inland Revenue Commissioners before the court to decide whether in a certain event liability would attach to them if they made the advance. The learned judge said (ibid., 586):

"The plaintiffs, nevertheless, allege that there is a general right in the subject to oblige the Crown to become a defendant to proceedings by way of originating summons not provided for by any statute, and that, in fact, a remedy of this sort has always been open ever since 1894, though never before resorted to. This is a bold claim, and I do not accept it. The summary procedure by way of originating summons is not, in my judgment (unless under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, with which I will deal in a moment), available against the Crown for the determination of a question of liability to estate duty except in so far as is provided by s. 3 of the Act of 1933. There may have been cases, for aught I know, where the Crown has been willing to accede to the request of the subject to submit to the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of deciding such a question of liability, but I do not think that the Crown can be obliged to take this course, and, indeed, it would often be highly inconvenient that the Crown should be made a defendant to proceedings of a domestic character between beneficiaries under a will or settlement simply because the result of the answer to one of them might be supposed to affect some question of liability to estate duty, or, for that matter, to income tax. The plaintiffs justify this claim on the authority of Dyson v. Attorney-General (1), where the Court of Appeal held that a declaratory judgment under Ord. 25, r. 5, could be made against the Attorney-General. Those, however, were proceedings by writ, and, in my judgment, the decision in that case does not apply to the summary procedure by originating summons. FARWELL, L.J., in that case pointed out that when the interests of the Crown were only indirectly affected, the old courts of equity, whether the Court of Chancery or the Court of Exchequer, did make declaratory orders which affected the rights of the Crown. Whether the plaintiffs would have been in a better position if they had started the present proceedings by writ I need not determine, but as at present advised it seems to me that there would have been very great difficulties in their way in framing a claim that could not be struck out in limine. Moreover, the making of a declaration in such proceedings was always a matter of discretion."

With this conclusion of HARMAN, J., I completely agree, but it would be unsatisfactory to leave the matter resting on the technical point that these proceedings cannot be taken by way of originating summons, for in that event the case might be re-started by way of writ or other proceedings and the point re-argued. We, therefore, invited the plaintiffs to argue on general principles. The MASTER OF THE ROLLS asked counsel for the plaintiffs to cite any case in which a purely future and hypothetical question had come before the courts and the courts had held that they had jurisdiction to consider it. Counsel could not put forward any such case, but founded his argument on Dyson v. Attorney-General (1), Esquimalt and Nanaimo Ry. Co. v. Wilson (2), and Re Chamberlain's Settlement (3). In these cases either the Crown's rights might be affected by the order or the Crown was seeking to exact money or to compel the performance of an act.

In Dyson v. Attorney-General (1) the matter arose in this way. Under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, a number of notices had been issued by the Inland Revenue Commissioners requiring the person to whom they were respectively addressed to fill in a form commonly known as "Form No. 4," and notifying the addressee that unless he did so within 30 days of the date of the notice he would be subject to a penalty not exceeding £50. It, therefore, was a case in which the plaintiff found himself in the position that he would have to fill up a form which he contended he was under no liability to complete or subject himself to the risk of incurring a penalty of £50. Accordingly, he asked for a declaration under Ord. 25 that he was under no obligation to comply with the notice or to furnish any of the said particulars. The court came to the conclusion that a declaratory judgment could be made against the Attorney-General representing the Crown, and that the plaintiff was not bound in such a case to proceed by petition of right. It is to be observed, as I have said, that in that case there was an immediate question to be decided between the subject and the Crown, for the Crown were seeking to compel the plaintiff to fill in the form and had threatened him with a penalty if he failed to do so. In those circumstances the court had no hesitation in holding that they had jurisdiction to make the declaration asked. COZENS-HARDY, M.R., referred to some observations in Pawlett v. Attorney-General (4), by ATKYNS, B., where the learned Baron said (Hard. 469) :

"The party ought in this case to be relieved against the King, because the King is the fountain and head of justice and equity ; and it shall not be presumed, that he was defective in either. And it would derogate from the King's honour to imagine, that what is equity against a common person, should not be equity against him."

I shall revert to this citation later in this judgment.

In Esquimalt and Nanaimo Ry. Co. v. Wilson (2), again the right of the Crown was brought directly into issue because the plaintiff was seeking against the individual defendant a declaration which, if it had been granted, would have had the effect of depriving the Crown of the benefit of certain reservations which it had purported to make from its grant in favour of the individual defendant. In Re Chamberlain's Settlement (3), also there was an immediate question at issue. In that case Mr. Houston Chamberlain, who had acquired German nationality during the 1914-18 war, was contending that under English law his change of nationality would not be recognised in war time, and that, therefore, his interest under the testator's will was not subject to the charge created by virtue of art. 297 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany or the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919. If the charge had been created, it would vest in the Custodian of Enemy Property. It is plain that there was an immediate question requiring decision, and that the interests of the Crown were, or might be, affected by the order which the court were being asked to make.

It seems to me that all those cases are very different from the case which we have before us. In the present case, as I see it, there is no immediate question between the plaintiffs and the Crown and no justification for the suggestion that the Crown's rights will be affected if the advance which the plaintiffs are desirous of making to Mrs. Sanges is made. The right of the Crown will remain the same as it was before, that is, a right in a certain event (which may never occur) to make a demand for payment of duty. That right will in no way be affected by any order that is made on questions 1 and 2 of the summons. True, that the trustees, if they make the advance, may not have the money in hand in the trust to meet the demand of the Crown if it is made against them under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 8 (4), and if it be held that the trustees are liable under that section, but the right of the Crown, whatever it is, will be just the same whether or not the advance is made. No order that the court can make will in any way affect the right of the Crown under the revenue statutes.

Counsel for the plaintiffs and counsel for the beneficiaries submitted that the absence of precedent was not fatal to Mrs. Sanges's claim in the present case. They submitted that the matter came within the principle laid down in the passage I have cited from the judgment of ATKYNS, B., in Pawlett v. Attorney-General (4). They said it was contrary to justice and equity that they should be kept in the state of uncertainty in which they are at present as to their possible liability under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 8 (4), but that is a state, I am afraid, which often exists in the minds of the subject under the various taxing statutes. It does not seem to me that the existence of that state of uncertainty can justify us in creating the precedent of compelling the Crown to subject itself to the decision of a purely hypothetical case which can never arise unless Mrs. Asher dies before the expiration of five years or one of the other events referred to in the letter of Mar. 25, 1948, occurs, and which for other reasons may never arise—for instance, as the MASTER OF THE ROLLS suggested in the course of the argument, if Parliament were in the meantime to think fit to alter the law so as to place advances of this kind in the same category as gifts and to leave the burden to rest solely on the recipient. It seems to me that, if such a radical change is to be made as to compel the Crown to submit to anticipatory proceedings of this kind, such a change must be introduced by Act of Parliament and cannot properly be made by judicial decision.

I would add that one of the cases to which the learned judge referred in the court below, the decision in Re Clay (5), seems to show that there would be no jurisdiction to make a declaratory order in a case of this kind as between subject and subject. In that case, the plaintiffs sought to obtain the decision of the court whether they were liable under a deed of indemnity to the defendant. No question of construction arose, and the defendant had, in fact, made no claim. All he had done was to reserve his rights, whatever they might be. The effect of the decision is sufficiently summed up in two short passages, the first from the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, M.R., where he said ([1919] 1 Ch. 78):

“And it is not open to a person, certainly to one against whom no claim in fact has been made, to cut the matter short by bringing an action at his own option, and saying: ‘I wish to have it determined that you have no claim whatever against me’.”

The second is from the judgment of EVE, J. (ibid., 79) and is:

“So soon as it was demonstrated that no specific right had been asserted and no claim formulated, the court had, in my opinion, no jurisdiction to deal with the petition in the way in which it had been dealt with.”

In these circumstances, it seems to me clear that neither by originating summons nor by writ can the plaintiffs make the Crown, whether in the person of the Attorney-General or the Inland Revenue Commissioners, respondent to proceedings of the kind which they have now commenced. On this view the question whether, as a result of the passing of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, the procedure by originating summons is now available against the Crown in cases where it would not have been available before the passing of that Act ceases to be material, but I will add that I see no reason to differ from the conclusion which HARMAN, J., reached on that point.

There is one other matter I ought to mention. Counsel for the plaintiffs and counsel for the beneficiaries submitted that it was not really a question whether or not this was the type of case in which the court could entertain proceedings against the Crown, but was really a question of discretion. I do not think that is true, but, even if it were true, I am by no means satisfied that we ought to allow the proceedings to go on if it were abundantly clear as, in my opinion, it is in the present case, that the court would not make a declaration after the case has been heard. I do not, however, express a concluded opinion on that point, since it is not necessary for a decision of this matter. For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

- A LORD GREENE, M.R. : I agree, and only wish to add a few words. Both counsel for the plaintiffs and counsel for the beneficiaries have argued that the question which they wished the court to decide is not a future question and is not a hypothetical question. First, it was said that the Crown has expressed an opinion that in certain events it will be entitled to make a claim.
- B That expression of opinion counsel for the plaintiffs wished to lift into the order of things where the Crown makes a claim. The Crown has made no claim, for the simple reason that it is not entitled to make a claim. It will be entitled to make some claim, or it may be it will think itself entitled to make a claim, in the event of the tenant for life dying before the expiration of five years, but the fact that the commissioners have expressed an opinion does not amount
- C to the same thing as is present in such cases as we have been referred to where an actual instant claim by the Crown was concerned. Secondly, counsel for the beneficiaries emphasised the fact that for the trustees this was a practical, instant question, because, he said, without guidance from the court on this doubtful question, they will be unable to act as they would like to act. Unfortunately, it is not only trustees who may find themselves in that kind
- D of difficulty owing to the uncertain construction of some taxing Act. Any ordinary subject may find himself in precisely the same difficulty, and if these trustees could ask the court to bring the Crown here and insist on deciding a doubtful question which may or may not arise between them according to events, merely because they want guidance as to the ordering of their affairs, I can see no end to the litigation that would inevitably follow. But the argu-
- E ment, in my opinion, is fallacious, and for this reason, that, although the trustees at the moment require guidance, the question which it is suggested we ought to decide is one between the trustees and the Crown, and that is a purely hypothetical and future question. The Crown will be able to put forward a claim, rightly or wrongly, in the event of the tenant for life dying before the expiration of five years, and, if we were to decide this here and now
- F and the tenant for life were to live for more than five years, we should have given a decision binding on the Crown and effective either in favour of or against all other taxpayers on a question which had never arisen on a liability which had never matured. In my opinion, if it is desired that these courts should have power to decide hypothetical questions on the construction of taxing Acts for the guidance of the subjects of the King, that power ought to be given
- G by legislation and not by this court arrogating it to itself. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

STEAMSHIP "INDUNA" CO., LTD. v. BRITISH PHOSPHATE COMMISSIONERS. THE LOCH DEE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.). April 6, 7, 1948, January 27, February 14, 1949.]

Demurrage—Exceptions relieving from liability—Delay due to circumstances unknown to parties—Intervention of constituted authorities—Any cause beyond control of charterers—Order prohibiting night work—Inability to discharge cargo without working at night.

Under the terms of a charterparty a ship was required to discharge cargo in New Zealand at the rate of 1,500 tons a working day of 24 consecutive hours, but lay days were not to count and demurrage was not to accrue during the period of any delay or hindrance in discharging cargo by reason of, inter alia, intervention of constituted authorities or from any cause whatsoever beyond the control of the charterers, or from the inability or inefficiency of the ship to discharge. The 1,500 tons a day could not be discharged without working at night and under an order of the Waterfront Control Commission of New Zealand it was, at the time the charterparty was entered into, but unknown to both charterers and shipowners, illegal to work between 9 p.m. and 8 a.m. In consequence, delay was caused in discharging.

HELD : (i) as the delay was due to circumstances which were unknown to both the parties when the charterparty was entered into, the lay days were not to count and demurrage was not to accrue during the period of the delay.

(ii) the words "inability or inefficiency of the ship to discharge" had reference to the structural capacity and equipment of the ship, and, as the ship was capable of discharging 1,500 tons in a working day of 24 consecutive hours, the charterers could not avail themselves of these words in the charterparty.

SPECIAL CASE stated by arbitrator.

The claimants were the owners of the S.S. Loch Dee and they claimed demurrage from the respondents, charterers of the ship, under a charterparty dated Apr. 4, 1946, and amended on May 14, 1946, in respect of the discharge of cargo at a port in New Zealand. By cl. 10 of the charterparty, as amended, the cargo was to be discharged "at the average rate of 1,500 tons per working day of 24 consecutive hours (provided the ship can put it out) Sundays and holidays excepted and weather permitting . . . and in the event of any delay or hindrance in . . . discharging cargo by reason of . . . scarcity of labourers . . . intervention of constituted authorities . . . or from any other cause whatsoever beyond the control of the charterers or from the inability or inefficiency of ship to . . . discharge, the lay days not to count during the period of such delay or hindrance and demurrage not to accrue." By cl. 11 "Demurrage over and above the lay days so calculated to be paid to ship at the rate of 8*d.* per G.R.T. per day or part thereof pro rata and despatch money to be paid by owners at the rate of half demurrage per day or part thereof pro rata on working time saved in loading or discharging. By cl. 12 "Overtime . . . if ordered by the port controller or his representative, charterers to pay all extra expenses incurred." Unknown to both parties at the date of the charterparty, by an order of the Waterfront Control Commission of New Zealand night work was prohibited, and it was, therefore, impossible for the charterers to discharge the cargo at the rate provided by the charterparty. SELLERS, J., decided that the charterers were not liable for demurrage.

Mocatta and Ellenbogen for the shipowners.

Eustace Roskill for the charterers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14. SELLERS, J., read the following judgment: The parties in this case submitted the matters in issue between them to arbitration, and the arbitrator made an award in the form of a Special Case. In the arbitration the shipowners, as owners of the S.S. Loch Dee, claimed demurrage, and the charterers resisted the claim and claimed despatch money. The respective claims depend on the true effect of certain provisions or exceptions of the charterparty and their application to the facts found by the arbitrator.

The Special Case shows that the original charterparty of Apr. 4, 1946, was altered on May 14, 1946, and it was then agreed that the S.S. Loch Dee should discharge at Lyttleton and Dunedin, including Ravensbourne Wharf, New Zealand, the rate of freight to be 99*s.* 6*d.* per ton British sterling, and the rate of discharge to be 1,500 tons per day: all other terms, conditions and exceptions of the charterparty to remain unaltered. In accordance with the charterparty, the vessel loaded at Bona a cargo of phosphate rock. It was established and agreed that there was a saving of time in loading for which £248 0*s.* 3*d.* is due to the charterers. The dispute between the parties is whether the charterers are liable for demurrage in respect of the discharge against which they can set off the despatch money, as the loading and discharging times are admittedly reversible. The original contract provided for discharge in one or two of certain specified Australian ports at the average rate of 750 tons per working day of 24 consecutive hours. The alteration to the New Zealand ports not only increased the rate of freight, but, most surprisingly in view of the facts now known, doubled the rate of discharge. The facts found by the arbitrator in the supplemental award establish that it was not possible for the Loch Dee to have discharged 1,500 tons per day if discharge took place only between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. There is no express finding, but the clear inference is that it would not have been possible if overtime had been worked to 9 p.m. What was necessary if the vessel was to discharge 1,500 tons in 24 consecutive hours was to work in two shifts, one by day and one by night, as had, apparently, been the practice in the war period. So to do, when the ship arrived at the respective ports of discharge, was illegal. Before me it was agreed that, when the charterparty and the addendum were entered into, neither the shipowners nor the charterers knew that an order of the Waterfront Control Commission of New Zealand prohibited work being done between 9 p.m. and 8 a.m., but, in fact, it was so. The order did not make it illegal to discharge 1,500 tons, or any other quantity, in 24 hours, but the prohibition of night work made it impossible for the ship to discharge at that rate. The vital question which has arisen, therefore, is whether in the circumstances and under the charterparty the lay days are to be held to run notwithstanding the prohibition with regard to night work. The obligation of the charterers was to discharge at the rate of 1,500 tons per working day of 24 consecutive hours (provided the ship could put it out), subject to the stipulated exceptions, or to pay demurrage as provided by cl. 11 of the charterparty.

The charterers relied on the express provision that, in the event of any delay or hindrance in discharging cargo by reason of scarcity of labourers, intervention of constituted authorities, or from any other cause whatsoever beyond the control of the charterers, or from inability or inefficiency of the ship to discharge, the lay days were not to count during the period of such delay or hindrance and demurrage was not to accrue. There was, undoubtedly, delay from the inability to work the ship at night because of the order which prohibited night work at the ports in question, and that delay was due to a cause beyond the control of the charterers. It might also be said to be caused by the intervention of constituted authorities. The original argument that the delay was due to "scarcity of labourers" became immaterial on the new findings of fact and was not further pursued, but was kept open. On behalf of the shipowners it was contended that the exceptions so relied on do not operate to prevent the lay days running, because the exceptions only apply to some exceptional or abnormal circumstances arising or supervening after the making of the contract. The prohibition of night work, it was said, existed at the time the parties made their contract and no night work was the ordinary practice ruling at the port.

I was referred to ROWLATT, J.'s, judgment in Ciampa v. British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. (1), and, particularly, to the passage where he said ([1915] 2 K.B. 779) :

"I am not deciding that the application of the ordinary law of a country may not in some circumstances constitute a 'restraint of princes,' but I think the facts which bring that law into operation must be facts which have supervened after the ship has started on the voyage in question. When facts exist which show conclusively that the ship was inevitably doomed before the commencement of the voyage to become subject to a restraint, I do not think that there is a 'restraint of princes'."

I was also referred to the observations of BAILHACHE, J., in France, Fenwick & Co., Ltd. v. Spackman (Philip) & Sons (2) (108 L.T. 372) :

"If I had not found that the circumstances at the time of the discharge were exceptional I should have acceded to Mr. Roche's argument, that to bring themselves within the exception clause it is not enough for the defendants to say that they were prevented, but they must say that they were prevented by some cause which was exceptional. If a person contracts to discharge in 36 hours unless prevented by some cause beyond his control, and if the cause beyond his control always would prevent the discharge within that time, then, in my opinion, it is not an exception at all, and if in such a case he fails to discharge within the 36 hours he is not within the exceptions clause."

I doubt whether either learned judge was intending to lay down any general principle. The observations were, I think, directed to the facts and circumstances of the respective cases. In Ciampa v. British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. (1) the shipowners knew of the regulations in force at Marseilles, their ships had frequently been subjected to the process of fumigation there, and the learned judge found that the ship was inevitably doomed before the commencement of the voyage to become subject to a restraint. In neither of those two cases does any argument appear to have arisen on the position where both contracting parties are ignorant of the existing circumstances which, when the vessel arrived, occasioned delay. In Ciampa v. British India Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. (1) the shipowners knew the circumstances. In France, Fenwick & Co. v. Spackman & Sons (2) the decision turned on a finding of exceptional circumstances. The authorities establish that the obligation of the charterers

A to pay demurrage after the expiry of the lay days is absolute where lay days and demurrage are stipulated unless the circumstances of the delay are covered by exceptions in the charterparty or arise through the fault of the shipowner or from the loading or unloading being illegal by the law of the place where it has to be performed.

- In the present charterparty the parties have made it clear that lay days
- B are not to count where delay in discharging arises by reason of a cause beyond the charterers' control and demurrage for such period will not accrue. The intention of the parties is clearly expressed. If both parties or one of the parties knew at the time of making the contract of existing circumstances which would or might occasion delay, other considerations would arise, but where neither party knew, as here, I see no reason why effect should not be given to that
- C which they have made clear by their contract. If parties are contracting on the basis of a state of affairs known to them, or which it can be shown they were prepared to accept, then an exception relating to something outside their control would, no doubt, be construed to relate to some circumstances or event not so known or something outside the basis of their bargain, that is something exceptional or abnormal in comparison with the contemplated state of affairs.
- D In the present case the parties contemplated that 1,500 tons could be discharged in a working day of 24 hours. The prohibition upset that basis, and in that sense the circumstances were exceptional and abnormal. In this contract there are exceptions dealing with delay by reason of ice, epidemics, labour or political disturbances. Any one of these might in given circumstances be proved to have existed at the time the contract was made, but, if the circumstances
- E were unknown to the parties, it seems to me that they could be relied on if they existed and caused delay when the vessel arrived for loading or discharge. In recent years regulations have come into operation in our own country restricting and regulating trade over wide spheres of industry, and often with but little publicity. It would restrict the incidence of these exceptions to a very great extent, and would, in my opinion, defeat the obvious intention of the parties,
- F if the exceptions could be rendered ineffective by establishing that, unknown to the parties, the circumstances relied on existed a day or two, or even an hour or two, before the contract was entered into. So far as this contract is concerned, and in the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion that the charterers' contention is right, that the lay days do not count during the period when night work was not performed by reason of the prohibition.
- G The charterers also contended that, by reason of the prohibition, the ship was not able to fulfil her obligation to put out 1,500 tons in 24 consecutive hours and that there was inability or inefficiency of the ship to discharge. I feel that the words are covered by the authority of Wm. Alexander & Sons v. Akt. Dampskibet Hansa (3), and that they have reference to the structural capacity and equipment of the ship, and the arbitrator has
- H found that the Loch Dee was capable of discharging 1,500 tons in a working day of 24 consecutive hours. Ralli Brothers v. Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar (4) was quoted to support an argument that the illegality of night discharging could be relied on. In my opinion, that case has no application. The contract provided for discharge at the rate of 1,500 tons per working day of 24 hours, and it was not illegal to discharge at that rate if it could have been done. It was conceded at the hearing before me that, in so far as overtime was not worked between 5 p.m. and 9 p.m., the charterers were entitled to rely on one, at least, of the exceptions, and that the lay days do not count during such period.

The effect of the conclusion at which I have arrived is that the charterers are not liable for any demurrage, but are entitled to despatch money amounting to £248 0s. 3d. on loading, and to a further £58 7s. 1d. on discharging, and are, therefore, entitled to an award for £306 7s. 4d. on the terms indicated in the Special Case.

Judgment for the charterers with costs of setting down and hearing of the Special Case.

CROCKER HORLOCK, LTD. v. B. LANG & CO., LTD. AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Morris, J.), February 4, 7, 8, 1949.]

Agency—Commission—Commission on all orders and "all repeats"—Right to commission on "repeats" after termination of agency.

By a written agreement contained in letters dated Apr. 20, 1944, the plaintiffs, who were representatives in the London area for the first defendants, a firm of clothing manufacturers, were to receive commission at the rate of "five per cent. on all orders, whether received direct or indirect, and on all repeats . . ." An agreement made simultaneously by the plaintiffs with the second defendants, an associated company of the first defendants, provided for "commission to be 2½ per cent. on all orders received, and on all repeats whether received direct or indirect." On the agreements being determined by the defendants in breach of the contract, the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to commission on "repeats" received by the defendants after the due date for the determination of the agreements (liability for orders received up to that date being admitted).

HELD: the question in such a case must be one of the construction of the relevant documents, and, on construction, the word "repeats" in the letters meant only repeat orders received during the period of the contract.

ACTION for an account of orders received by the defendants and of commission payable by them to the plaintiffs in respect thereof, for payment of the amount found to be due, and for damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs carried on business as representatives in the London area for clothing manufacturers. The first and second defendants were clothing manufacturers carrying on business at Salford, near Manchester. On Apr. 20, 1944, after an interview between Mr. Napier, a representative of the plaintiff company, and the first defendants, the first defendants wrote the following letter to the plaintiffs: "Further to Mr. Napier's interview on the 11th instant, we confirm the arrangement that you represent us for the London area for the wholesale trade. Commission to be five per cent. on all orders, whether received direct or indirect, and on all repeats. Payable on the 20th of each month on all goods actually dispatched and invoiced . . . This provisional agreement to be for a trial period of six months from May 1, 1944, subject to renewal for a further period of, say, three years, should you reach the minimum figure of £1,000 between now and November, 1944 . . ." A letter of the same date from the second defendants made a similar arrangement for representation of the second defendants by the plaintiffs for the retail and store trade. This letter stated: "Commission to be two and a half per cent. on all orders received, and on all repeats whether received direct or indirect." The plaintiffs obtained business in excess of £1,000 in the trial period, and the agreement continued thereafter until the defendants purported to determine it by a notice given on July 1, 1947. The plaintiffs contended that the contract, by providing for payment of commission "on all orders . . . received . . . and on all repeats" entitled them to receive commission on repeat orders received after they had ceased to act as representatives of the defendants. MORRIS, J., held that "repeats" referred only to repeat orders during the period of the agency.

Vaughan, K.C., and Wiggins for the plaintiffs.
Glidewell for the defendants.

MORRIS, J., stated the facts and continued: Two main questions emerge for determination by the court. The first, which depends on the construction of the two letters of Apr. 20, 1944, is whether in the period after Nov. 1, 1947, the defendants were, under the agreement contained in those letters, accountable to the plaintiffs for commission in respect of "repeats." If they were so accountable, it is common ground that, the agreement having been repudiated by the defendants, the plaintiffs would be entitled under that head to damages referable to the anticipatory and clearly expressed breach by the defendants of their obligation under the contract. The second matter arises on a submission by the plaintiffs that the defendants were guilty of a clear breach of the contract in giving the notice of July 1, and that, even if the plaintiffs are not entitled to damages referable to repeat orders after Nov. 1, they are entitled to damages for the acknowledged breach of contract and that those damages should have reference to the loss which the plaintiffs have suffered through being prevented from acting as the defendants' representatives during the period from July 1 to the end of October. The defendants submit that, on the construction of the contract, the plaintiffs are not entitled to damages. The defendants acknowledge that there was a breach of contract, but say that no damages flow from that breach, that no damages have been proved, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any larger sum than the sum referred to in the amended defence in respect of commission due on orders received prior to Nov. 1, 1947, for the reason that that sum represents all that the plaintiffs would have received had the agreement not been terminated.

I have been greatly assisted by the submissions of learned counsel on either side who have carefully analysed the words of the two letters I have to consider and have referred me to a number of authorities which help on a determination of this question. The defendants base on a true construction of these letters their contention that nothing was payable by the defendants after Oct. 31, 1947, assuming that the agreement then came to an end. On behalf of the plaintiffs it is said that the words "and on all repeats" have reference to the period after Oct. 31, 1947, with the result that any repeat orders given in that period earned commission for the plaintiffs. It is submitted that the agreement ought not to be regarded as an area agreement, but as one rather of a personal character, with the result that the plaintiffs were to have the fruits of their labours in the sense that after the end of the contract, i.e., after Oct. 31, 1947, the plaintiffs would continue to have commission on all "repeats." Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that the words "orders whether received direct or indirect" by themselves cover all the events in regard to commission-earning during the contract period and that the words "and on all repeats" are not needed in reference to that period, but only come into operation in regard to the period after Oct. 31, 1947. Counsel contends that, if an order came from a customer and later that customer wished to have further goods, what the customer would give on the second occasion would be an order just as that which he gave on the first occasion was an order, and so, counsel submits, during the contract period the words "orders whether received direct or indirect" cover all the contingencies. The word "direct," he submits, refers to an order being sent by the plaintiffs, whereas the word "indirect" refers to an order that was not sent directly by them but was the result of an introduction by them.

It has been useful to refer to the authorities, but I agree with what has been said by both learned counsel, that one must remember that the authorities are decisions on particular words used in particular contexts and it would be wrong to seek to derive from any one authority more guidance than it was intended to afford. In Bilbee v. Hasse & Co. (1) the words were :

"As regards your commission, we hereby agree to allow you 1½ per cent. upon all orders executed by us and paid for by the customers arising from your introduction."

That case went to the Court of Appeal, as is indicated by a reference to the report in Levy v. Goldhill (2) where PETERSON, J., said ([1917] 2 Ch. 300) :

"That case went to the Court of Appeal and the decision was confirmed. As BOWEN, L.J., put it : 'The measure of his'—that is the plaintiff's—'payment was to be calculated not by the work done by him, but by the fruits of that work, and those fruits might very well accrue to the defendant after the determination of the agency'."

In Levy v. Goldhill (2) the words were :

"I agree to pay you half profits on receipt of orders (provided the customer is good). Same applies to repeats on any accounts introduced by you."

I was referred also to Faulkner v. Cooper & Co. (3), a decision of MATHEW, J., and to the decision in Weare v. Brimsdown Lead Co., Ltd. (4). In the latter case the plaintiff was employed by the defendants for twelve months as an agent for the sale of white lead manufactured by them on the terms that he was to receive 2½ per cent. commission on all sales, direct or indirect. In Cramb v. Goodwin (5) the words were :

"I accept the terms of £1 per week as salary (or expenses) and 5 per cent. commission on all business obtained by me, including repeat orders from all firms in the ground allotted to me. . . . To make it more clear, I must have the commission on all accounts I open, including all repeat orders, whether they are actually handed to me or posted on direct to you."

In giving judgment in that case, ATKIN, L.J., is reported (35 T.L.R. 478) as saying that, speaking for himself, very little assistance was to be obtained from other decisions. He said it was a question of construction of a business document, and he went on :

“The cases referred to were not of much use or guidance unless they were fully reported, setting out the circumstances in which the agreement was made and the terms of the agreement.”

I was also referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in British Bank for Foreign Trade, Ltd. v. Novimex, Ltd. (6).

I have not referred at length to the decisions in the various cases to which I have referred for it seems to me that when one notes the divergent phrases used in the different cases it does become entirely plain that the question is one of construction and that there is always danger in seeking to draw too much guidance from a decision in regard to other words in other contexts.

B Counsel for the defendants drew my attention to the fact that in Levy v. Goldhill (2), PETERSON, J., in his judgment, laid emphasis more than once on the difference between cases where the agreement was for a definite, and cases where it was for an indefinite, period. Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that it would be an erroneous test to say that merely because an agreement has a fixed term there cannot be a provision that commission is payable after the end of the term. I think counsel is correct in that submission. Everything must turn on a consideration of the exact words used.

Referring again to the words of the letter of Apr. 20, it is first to be noted that the provision is that commission is to be five per cent. “on all orders.” There is a further provision as to when the commission is to be paid—“on the 20th of each month on all goods actually despatched and invoiced”—

D but the provision is that payment is to be “on all orders.” Then the agreement goes on : “whether received direct or indirect, and on all repeats.” It would be rather a surprising result if the sentence to which I am now referring contemplated, by its first part, the contract period, and by its second part, after the word “indirect”, a period after the end of the contract. It seems to me that this wording denotes that the commission is to be five

E per cent. on all orders, and then, by way of specifying and making clear what orders are referred to, the letter goes on to say that they are orders, whether received directly or indirectly, and all “repeats.” It is to be observed that there is no mention in this letter of introducing a customer. It would have been very easy, if the parties had so wished, to provide that commission was payable at a particular rate on all orders given by a customer introduced,

F but that language is not found. It is cogently submitted by counsel for the plaintiffs that the words “on all repeats” are not really necessary, but it seems to me that those words are put there further to define and fully to clarify the meaning of the word “orders.” A situation might otherwise have arisen in which a customer gave an order and then later sent a repeat order, and some question might have arisen whether commission was payable on the latter.

G To avoid ambiguity those words were put in. If counsel for the plaintiffs is right in his submission as to what these words mean, the result would follow that, if a customer was introduced by the plaintiffs, and gave no order during the contract period, but did give an order after the contract period, no commission would be payable because it would not be a “repeat.” That would seem to me to be rather a surprising result if the intention was to relate the remuneration to orders that resulted from customers introduced by the plaintiffs.

H It is not strictly necessary to decide the question whether this agreement provided for commission on an order that came from the London area irrespective of any work on the part of the plaintiffs, but, as that has been argued and as it may be closely allied to what I have to decide, I think it is desirable to state my view on it. The agreement provides for commission to be five per cent. on all orders, but that still leaves open the question whether the reference is to all orders in the London area or to all orders in the London area from customers introduced by the plaintiffs. The agreement does not have the words, "from customers introduced by the plaintiffs"; it simply has the words "on all orders." That must have some limitation, but the limitation, as it seems to me, is the limitation of the words "London area," and the agreement, therefore, in my judgment, means that the commission is to be one of five per cent. on all orders coming from the London area during the period of the contract. If the minimum business had not been reached during the six months period, in my judgment, there would have been an end when the six months period terminated, of any obligations on the part of the defendants, save for orders received during the six months.

The letter from the second defendants has a variation of wording. The wording is: "2½ per cent. on all orders received, and on all repeats whether received direct or indirect." Do those words mean that after the first "orders received" everything that is set out is only referable to the period after the end of the contract? If so, there is no mention of orders received directly or indirectly during the contract period. It would hardly be expected that there was a fundamental variation between the intention in these two contracts, and I do not think that it was intended by the variation of wording to have any different result.

For the reasons which I have indicated, my conclusion is that by these agreements the parties provided that the plaintiffs' remuneration was to be five per cent. or 2½ per cent. on all orders, whether received directly or indirectly, and on all repeats, meaning "including all repeats," and that that remuneration was the remuneration payable during the contract period and that the parties have not provided by this contract for any payment after that period came to an end. Being so satisfied, I must award what I think are reasonable, but appropriate, damages. This must be largely a matter of estimate on the basis of the material before me. Doing the best I can, I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to the sums set out in the amended defence, namely, £205 from the second defendants and £334 from the first defendants, but I think in addition to those sums the plaintiffs should have from the second defendants a sum of £140 and from the first defendants a sum of £180.

ACTION for damages for personal injuries arising from an alleged breach of contractual duty and/or negligence.

- B The plaintiff was the wife of the tenant of one of a block of flats owned by the defendant landlords. While crossing the courtyard attached to the block and other blocks of flats of the same landlords she tripped over an irregularity in the surface and fell, breaking a jug which she was carrying and severely cutting her hand. She contended inter alia that she was an invitee of the landlords in the courtyard and was entitled to the discharge by the landlords of their duty to such an invitee as defined in Indermaur v. Dames (1).
- C HILBERY, J., held that the plaintiff was a licensee and not an invitee, and, the danger being obvious, she was not entitled to damages.

Pain for the plaintiff.

Humfrey Edmunds for the defendant landlords.

- D HILBERY, J., stated the facts, found that the plaintiff's husband, and not the plaintiff herself, was the tenant of the flat, and continued: What was the plaintiff's position? It is said she was an invitee. I will consider that question first because, as LORD DUNEDIN said in Addie (R.) & Sons (Collieries), Ltd. v. Dumbreck (2) ([1929] A.C. 372; 140 L.T. 654), the first duty of the court in such a case as this is to determine into which category a plaintiff ought to be placed. It seems to me that the plaintiff was a part of the family of the tenant and in exactly the same position as that described by LORD ATKINSON in his speech in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (3) where he was dealing with the very topic of the category in which the family of a tenant should be placed. There was no doubt that the plaintiff was where she was with the permission of the landlords, but what
- F right can she have to be put in any higher category than one there with a permission, that is, as a licensee? It is said that because she was the housekeeper of the tenant she was there on a matter of business interest which she had in common with the landlords, inasmuch as, as housekeeper, she facilitated the life of the tenant in the premises so that he continued to be the better able to pay the rent. That is a subtlety to which I am not prepared to accede.
- G To accept it would, in my judgment, be stretching to a point beyond reason what constitutes a common business interest with the landlords in law. I think the law is too strong, having regard to the case of Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (3), for any such interpretation to be put on the phrase, at any rate, by me. I am satisfied that the plaintiff was a licensee and would have owed to her by the landlords the same duty as any other
- H person who was permitted to go over this courtyard, and, as it has been argued by counsel for the plaintiff that the word "permission" is capable of being interpreted as having another meaning than that of a licence, let me say at once that I use it as equivalent to a licence. The plaintiff was there as a licensee and that was the category into which she should be put having regard to Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (3). She being in that position, the landlords owe a duty not to expose her to a concealed danger, known to them and not discoverable by her using reasonable care for her own safety. That duty is sometimes summarily expressed by saying that the landlord is under a duty not to permit the existence of a trap. It is impossible to treat this irregularity, which was open and apparent, as anything like a concealed danger. In these circumstances the plaintiff cannot claim in law to be awarded any damages for the injuries she has received, and there must be judgment for the defendants.

Factory—Safe means of access—Independent contractor—Work outside factory building—Cleaning windows—"Building operation"—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 26 (1), s. 107 (1), s. 152 (1).

By s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, "There shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, be provided and maintained safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work."

A window cleaner, working as an independent contractor, having inspected a factory, entered into a contract with the occupiers to clean the factory windows. Some of the windows had to be cleaned from the outside, and in order to reach them, the window cleaner climbed on to an asbestos roof. This roof was not strong enough to bear a man's weight unless the weight was distributed, and accordingly, the window cleaner placed his ladder flat on the roof and was walking along it when he fell through the roof and was injured.

HELD: (i) the occupier of a factory owes a duty under s. 26 (1) to an independent contractor working on the factory premises and that duty is not confined to the employees of the occupier.

(ii) the work in question was not a "building operation" within s. 152 (1) of the Act, and, therefore, was not excluded from the operation of s. 26 (1) by s. 107.

(iii) the obligation placed on the occupier under s. 26 (1) was not confined to means of access to places inside the factory building, but extended to work on the outside of the building.

(iv) on the facts, the defendants did not provide and maintain safe means of access to the place at which the window cleaner had to work, and, therefore, the cleaner was entitled to recover damages from the occupier.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of DENNING, J., dated June 11, 1948. The plaintiff, a window cleaner, claimed damages against the defendants, the occupiers of a factory, for breach of their statutory duty under s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, in respect of injuries sustained by him while cleaning the factory windows under a contract between him and the defendants. The learned judge found that, although the defendants were guilty of a breach of duty, the plaintiff's negligence was the decisive cause of the accident, and he gave judgment for the defendants. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22. The following judgments were read.

- TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of DENNING, J.,
B in favour of the defendants in an action in which the plaintiff claimed damages for personal injuries suffered by him as a result of falling through a roof consisting of asbestos slates when engaged in cleaning windows at the defendants' factory. The plaintiff was an independent contractor in business on his own account, and, after inspecting the premises in question, he agreed to clean the windows of the factory once a month for 30s. and the office windows twice a
C month for 7s. each time, making £2 4s. a month in all. In his evidence he agreed that he had to provide his own ladders and "tackle." The accident which gives rise to this action happened in November, 1946, on the occasion of his fourth visit for window cleaning purposes.

- The asbestos roofing in question covered part of the ground floor of the factory, and the plaintiff got on to the roof in order to clean some windows on
D the first and second floors which did not open and had to be cleaned from outside. He used his ladder to get to the roof and then pulled it up and put its feet on a plank which he found up there and which had been used for this purpose by the man who had cleaned these windows before the plaintiff obtained this contract. After cleaning the windows he placed the ladder horizontally along the roof and was walking along on the ladder when, according to his
E evidence, the roof gave way beneath him and he fell a distance of 12 to 15 ft. on to some toffee boilers below. The procedure was the same as that which he had adopted without mishap on the three previous occasions. The roofing consisted of asbestos sheets 2 ft. 3ins. wide with a span of 4 ft. 6 ins. between the purlins to which the sheets were riveted. The evidence showed that as a result of experience gained during the war the British standard specification
F now lays down that in the case of asbestos sheets the span between the purlins should not exceed 3 ft. and the London County Council have adopted the same requirement. There are, however, thousands of factories and buildings with roofs of asbestos sheeting with spans exceeding 3 ft. Asbestos is brittle and friable, and, accordingly, anyone having occasion to go on to such a roof should use a plank or planks, or something of the kind, so as to distribute his
G weight more evenly. The plaintiff realised this, and that was why he had placed his ladder flat on the roof and was walking along it.

- DENNING, J., appears to have rejected the plaintiff's evidence that the roof gave way under him while he was walking along the ladder and to have accepted the theory of the defendants' expert that the probability was that he had slipped while walking along the ladder and put his foot through one of the H asbestos sheets. He held that the defendants were not liable at common law as there was no failure on their part to prevent damage to the plaintiff from unusual danger of which they knew or ought to have known, he taking reasonable care for his own safety, but he found that they were in breach of their statutory duty under s. 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, so far as reasonably practicable to provide and maintain safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work. He said it was not reasonably practicable to expect the defendants to reconstruct their roof, but they could have ensured safe access by the provision of more planks or ladders. It is clear from his judgment that the learned judge took the view that it was this absence of sufficient planking that made the roof, as a means of access, unsafe and was the cause of the accident. Having thus found the defendants in breach of their statutory duty he went on to deal with the allegations of contributory negligence made against the plaintiff in these words ([1948] 2 All E.R. 251):

"The next question, however, is: How far is the plaintiff responsible? He was not a servant of the defendants. He was an independent contractor working on his own account. The duty of an employer to a servant is much higher than that of an occupier to an independent contractor. The employer owes a duty to his servant to use reasonable care in laying out the work to see that it is safe, and he has a duty to use reasonable care to provide proper plant and appliances for his servants. No such duty rests on the occupier of premises who employs a window cleaner as an independent contractor to clean his windows. In such a case it is the duty of the window cleaner to provide his own plant and appliances and to lay out the work himself so that it is reasonably safe. No occupier ever dreams of taking on himself the responsibility of telling the window cleaner how to do the work or what plant or appliances he should use. So here, although this was a factory, it seems to me that it was the plaintiff's responsibility to lay out the work properly and to provide proper plant and appliances, or, in other words, to see that there were safe means of access to the windows. That responsibility of window cleaners is well-known, and insurances are regularly taken out by them on account of it. In this case, therefore, as between the defendants and the plaintiff, it was the plaintiff and not the defendants, who was responsible for seeing that there were safe means of access. That is borne out by the evidence . . . In my judgment, therefore, although there was a breach of duty by the defendants of s. 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, there was also a breach of duty by the plaintiff in failing so to lay out the work and to provide such plant and appliances that there would be safe means of access to the windows. Having regard to the special responsibility of care and skill which is required of a window cleaner, I hold that he was guilty of negligence, and, indeed, of negligence which was the decisive cause of the accident. If he had provided safe means of access—if he had provided more planks, or even if he had walked along this ladder more carefully and had not slipped—there would have been no accident."

With respect to the learned judge I can find nothing in the evidence to support his view that the plaintiff's failure to provide the planking that might have obviated the accident or the fact that he slipped constituted negligence on his part. There was no evidence that he had expressly agreed to provide planking, nor was there any evidence that it is the custom for window cleaners to bring with them any appliances necessary to render safe any part of the premises on which they have to go in order to clean windows. Nor was there evidence that planking of the kind required is included in the "tackle" which a window cleaner is, no doubt, required to provide. Whatever the contractual duty may have been, nothing short of negligence in the performance of this duty will, in my view, suffice to relieve the occupier of the factory from the consequences of a breach of his statutory duty under s. 26 at the suit of the injured person for whose benefit the duty is imposed. Where a servant of the independent contractor is injured as a result of the failure of the contractor to provide the necessary plant, it is, no doubt, true that the occupier in breach of his statutory duty may be able to recover over from the contractor any damages he has to pay to the injured servant, or in an action in which both the contractor and the occupier are made defendants the contractor may be ordered to pay the whole or some part of the damages. This was the case in Whitby v. Burt, Boulton & Hayward, Ltd. (1). To apply this principle to a case where the injured workman is himself the contractor and where no negligence is proved against him, would, in effect, be to allow the occupier of a factory to contract out of the statute. Assuming a contractual obligation on the part of the plaintiff to provide the necessary "tackle" and assuming that this includes planking where required, I do not think on the facts of this case that his failure to provide it amounted to negligence, and it was not suggested that he was not properly using the appliances which were available.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the finding of negligence against the plaintiff on the evidence given in this particular case cannot stand, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to consider whether negligence of the kind found by the learned judge would, since the passing of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, necessarily altogether preclude him from recovering any damages. It was contended for the defendants that, even if the learned judge was in error with regard to the plaintiff's negligence, none the less his judgment should stand on the ground that the evidence disclosed no breach of statutory duty on their part. A number of points were taken.

1. It was argued that the occupier of a factory owes no duty under s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, to an independent contractor or his servants working on the factory premises. In short that the duty owed is confined to the employees of the occupier. It is true that there appear to be only two reported cases in which an independent contractor or his workmen have brought actions against factory occupiers under the safety provisions of this statute or the corresponding sections in earlier Acts. It is significant that in the first of these cases this point was never taken by the defence, while in the second it is open to some doubt whether it was raised precisely in this form. If so, it was inferentially rejected. The first of these cases is Fowler v. Yorkshire Electric Power Co., Ltd. (2), a decision of LAWRENCE, J., in favour of a servant of an independent contractor where, in the judge's view, the real blame for the accident rested on the independent contractor, who was not a party to the action. The second is the previous decision of DENNING, J., in Whitby's case (1). A study of ss. 12 to 40, which form Part II of the Act of 1937, satisfies me that this part of the Act has not the limited application contended for by the defendants, but it is sufficient for present purposes to confine my decision to s. 26, the language of which is, I think, clearly designed to include in its protection persons working in a factory whether or not they are directly employed by the occupier.

2. It was contended that the work in question was a "building operation" within the definition contained in s. 152, and, therefore, by s. 107 outside the scope of s. 26. The definition in s. 152 is:

" 'Building operation' means the construction, structural alteration, repair or maintenance of a building (including re-pointing, re-decoration and external cleaning of the structure) . . . but does not include any operation which is a work of engineering construction within the meaning of this Act."

In my view, these words are not apt to include window cleaning which is an operation quite distinct from the well known processes for the external cleansing of structures. Section 26, accordingly, applies to this operation. I should desire to reserve for future consideration whether or not s. 26 applies to building operations carried on in a factory as held by DENNING, J., in Whitby's case (1).

3. It was argued that the obligation under s. 26 to provide safe means of access is confined to places inside the factory building and does not extend to work on the outside unconnected with the operations of the factory. This argument is, I think, clearly wrong. A factory for the purposes of the Act by s. 151 includes any premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, persons are employed, and safe access must be provided to all places within the curtilage or precincts where any person has to work.

4. Finally, it was submitted that this roof was not a place where the plaintiff "had to work." It was said he was not required to work in any particular place, but it was for him to decide where and how he would work. The answer to this is that he had to work at the windows and the duty of the defendants under s. 26 was to provide safe means of access, so far as reasonably practicable, to these windows. The roof and one plank were the only means of access provided, and these have been found to have been unsafe.

For these reasons, I am unable to accept any of the contentions advanced on behalf of the defendants in support of the submission that the evidence disclosed no breach of their statutory duty under s. 26, and on this part of the case I agree with the trial judge. For the reasons stated earlier in this judgment, however, I am of opinion that this appeal succeeds, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. As to damages, the learned judge provisionally assessed the sum at £400. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that this sum is inadequate having regard to the evidence. It is sufficient to say that on a review of the evidence I see no reason for not accepting the judge's estimate. I would, accordingly, allow this appeal and enter judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £400.

SINGLETON, L.J. : This appeal, like several others which have been before the court recently, illustrates the far-reaching effects of the Factories Act, 1937. The plaintiff is a window cleaner, and he was under contract to clean the windows of the defendants' factory at 4, Leathermark Street, S.E.1, from time to time. Some of the windows were made so that they could not be opened, and these windows had to be cleaned outside as well as inside. They were some height above ground level, and, as a ladder could not be put to them, the ordinary way of approach was along the roof of a lean-to structure, part of the factory. The lower part of the roof was glass, but the upper part was of asbestos sheets which were not constructed in a manner sufficient to carry the weight of a man unless the weight was distributed by the use of planks or the like. On the roof there was a plank (6 ft. by 1 ft., we were told) which was used by the plaintiff on which to place his ladder. He used his ladder, flat on the roof, as a means of getting along the roof. He had cleaned the windows about three times before Nov. 9, 1946, on which date he met with an accident. He had finished his work and was making his way along the ladder (which was flat on the roof) with the object of descending from the roof when something happened and he fell. The asbestos roof gave under him, and he went through it and fell on a boiler in the shed below. He was injured. He claimed damages against the defendants, as occupiers of the factory, both for breach of duty under the common law and for breach of statutory duty (s. 26 of the Factories Act, 1937). It is not clear how he came to fall. The judge does not seem to have accepted his account of the accident (which was the only one given to the court), and, indeed, it does not seem a very probable account having regard to the evidence of the expert witnesses. It is more likely that he slipped (as the judge thought) or that he put a foot wrong. It is no easy matter to walk along a ladder flat on a roof which has a slight incline. DENNING, J., rejected the claim for breach of common law duty and in this I am satisfied that he was right.

The questions for the consideration of this court arise under s. 26 (1) of the Act of 1937, which provides :

"There shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, be provided and maintained safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work."

The first question is whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover against the occupiers of the factory if he sustained injuries through a breach by them of their duty under it. At one stage of the argument I felt considerable doubt on this, but I have arrived at the conclusion that the submission made on behalf of the plaintiff is right. Speaking generally, the earlier Factory Acts were designed for the protection of those employed in the factory, that is, employed by the occupiers. There has been a wide extension in this regard as is shown by later Acts, and, particularly, by an examination of the different safety provisions in Part II of the 1937 Act. Section 26 (1) deals with access to every place at which any person has at any time to work, and sub-s. (2) (under which the claim was also laid) begins with the words "Where any person is to work . . ." In order to fulfil his contract with the defendants the plaintiff had to work at the place at which he met with his injuries, and, accordingly, he would appear to be within the provisions of the section. I think he would have been if he had been working inside the factory, and I cannot see that the case is altered by reason of the fact that he was working outside in order to clean the windows of the factory which could not be opened. This was the view of DENNING, J., and it is in accordance with his decision in Whitby v. Burt, Boulton & Co. (1). It also accords with the judgment of LAWRENCE, J., in Fowler v. Yorkshire Electric Power Co., Ltd. (2) (though it is right to point out that no such question was raised in that case).

The next question is: Was it established that the defendants were in breach of their duty under s. 26 (1)? Their duty was so far as was reasonably practicable to provide and maintain safe means of access to every place at which the plaintiff had to work. The plaintiff had to clean windows some height above ground, and it might be argued that access to those windows is by means of a ladder, but I do not read the section as meaning that it is the duty of the occupier of the factory to provide a window cleaner with his plant or tackle. The section should be read as imposing on the occupier the duty, as far as is reasonably practicable, of providing him with a safe way to the place at which he has to work with the ordinary plant or tackle which a window cleaner has, including a safe place on which to put his ladder. On the evidence given the normal way of getting to these windows was by the roof of the lean-to. That was the way used by the man who had cleaned the windows before the plaintiff undertook the work, and on the roof was the plank which he had used. There is nothing to show whether or not it was provided by the defendants. This plank was only 6 ft. long, and the length of roof to be traversed by the window cleaner was about 60 ft. So far as was shown it was not possible to get a ladder from the ground to the windows. If this is right, and I think it is, there were no other means of access to the windows in question than by this roof and the roof was not constructed to carry the weight of a man unless there were planks, or the like, to distribute the weight. On these facts it seems to me that it is established that the defendants did not provide or maintain a safe means of access to the place at which the plaintiff had to work, and there was no evidence given on which they can claim any help from the words "so far as is reasonably practicable." Whether the accident happened in the way that the plaintiff described or in the way the judge thought more probable, the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the absence of a safe way along the roof. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion whether the result would have been the same if it had been proved that in such cases it was usual for the window cleaner to take with him all planks, etc., to provide a way across a roof such as this. I emphasise that there was no such evidence, and I repeat that the case concerns a factory and the duty created by statute in relation to persons who have to work in factories.

The remaining question is as to contributory negligence. DENNING, J., having found that there was a breach of duty by the defendants, came to the conclusion that as between them and the plaintiff, he, the plaintiff, was the man to provide more planks if they were needed and that, as between the parties, the responsibility rested wholly on the window cleaner. I cannot agree with this view. The judge found that the defendants had broken their statutory duty. The evidence did not establish that it was the duty of window cleaners to take all planks necessary to make a roof safe, nor that it was the custom for them to do so, nor was it proved that the defendants contracted on any such basis. The judge added ([1948] 2 All E.R. 251) :

“ If he had provided safe means of access—if he had provided more planks, or even if he had walked along this ladder more carefully and had not slipped—there would have been no accident.”

Having considered the terms of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, DENNING, J., arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiff's responsibility for the damage was the whole share and he gave judgment for the defendants. I find myself unable to agree with this, in view of the fact that the judge had found the defendants to have failed in their statutory duty in a way which must at least have had some bearing on the accident to the plaintiff. Again, there was nothing to show that the plaintiff did not walk along the ladder carefully, and a slip (if he did slip) is not of itself proof of negligence. It was for the defendants to show that the plaintiff was negligent in a way which caused, or which contributed to, the accident, and, in my view, they did not do so. The only evidence they called was that of an expert witness, a surveyor, and his evidence was directed to show that the accident could not have happened in the way the plaintiff said it did. The witness had not inspected the roof until July, 1947, long after it had been repaired. I would allow the appeal and order that judgment be entered for the plaintiff. I see nothing wrong in the provisional estimate of damages at £400, and that is the sum for which judgment should be entered.

BIRKETT, J. : In this appeal the questions for determination arose out of the circumstances in which the plaintiff, Mr. Lavender, was injured when working on the premises of the defendants, Messrs. Diamints, Ltd., in November, 1946.

The plaintiff was a window cleaner by occupation, and he had agreed with the defendants to clean certain windows in their factory at Leathermark Street, in the south east of London. The windows with which this appeal is concerned were windows that did not open, and could not be cleaned from the inside, and because of their position they could not be reached by the ordinary method of using a ladder which rested on the ground. They could be reached by means of a ladder which rested on an asbestos roof of a portion of the factory. This asbestos roof was not of modern construction, and the ladder could not rest on the asbestos roof directly because of the danger of going through the roof. It was necessary to use planking laid along the roof to take the foot of the ladder and to use the ladder itself, laid flat along the roof, to distribute the weight when the window cleaner was moving from one place to another on the roof. When the accident occurred which resulted in the plaintiff being injured, he had completed the cleaning of the windows and had laid his ladder flat along the roof and was walking along it in order to get to the side where he might descend to the ground. He said at the trial before DENNING, J., that it was when he was walking along the ladder, that the asbestos roof gave way and he fell to the floor below, but the learned judge did not accept this account of how the accident occurred and thought it much more likely that the plaintiff stepped off or slipped off the ladder when walking along it and fell through the asbestos roof by standing directly on it. In these circumstances the learned judge held that the defendants were not liable at common law because there had been no failure to perform their common law duty, but he found that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under s. 26 of the Factories Act of 1937. This section laid on the defendants the duty of providing and maintaining, so far as is reasonably practicable, safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work.

A It was submitted on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiff could not take advantage of the provisions of the section because he was not a servant of the defendants and the defendants owed no duty to him in the circumstances of this case. An examination of the precise wording of the section shows that the duty is laid in very wide terms. The safe means of access referred to in the section is to "every place at which any person has at any time to work." I cannot think that it makes the slightest difference whether the place is inside or outside the factory. It is "every place." Neither do I think that "any person" is confined to employees of the defendants and excludes a person like the plaintiff employed to clean the windows. The words "has at any time to work" must be read in their ordinary meaning, and, in my view, the plaintiff, on the day when he met with his accident, was within the terms of the section, and if it was shown that the injuries he sustained arose from a breach of the statutory duty on the part of the defendants, he was entitled to damages. What was the duty of the defendants in the circumstances of this case? The evidence showed that the only means of access to the windows in question was by way of the asbestos roof, and that the roof, as such, was not a safe means of access because of its construction, and also because of the nature of an asbestos roofing. It could only be made a safe means of access if planks or similar things were supplied. DENNING, J., seems to have taken the view that the element of danger was the absence of sufficient or adequate planking to overcome the inherent inadequacy of the roof itself. It seems to me reasonably plain that, if the plaintiff was to clean the windows in question, he had to use this roof, and was, therefore, in a place where he had to work. The duty of the defendants was to provide and maintain, so far as was reasonably practicable, safe means of access to that place, and that safe means of access depended on the provision of adequate planking. This they clearly failed to do. The learned judge then went on to say that the duty of providing the necessary planking, to make the means of access safe, rested on the plaintiff. There was no evidence before the learned judge to show that it was a usual thing for window cleaners in similar circumstances to provide planking, nor that anything was said about it when the plaintiff undertook to clean these particular windows. There was no evidence to show that the window cleaner was under any duty other than to provide the usual and ordinary equipment for his job. In my judgment, the duty of providing and maintaining safe access was on the defendants, and they were clearly in breach of that duty. In that state of affairs I cannot think that the plaintiff should be held to be guilty of negligence because he did not provide the planking; nor do I think that there was any evidence to show that, if he slipped from the ladder on which he was walking when he met with his accident, that was a negligent thing to do.

H The learned judge has held that despite the breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants the whole of the responsibility rests on the plaintiff. With this view I am unable to agree, and, in my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. The sum of £400 was assessed by the learned judge; and I think the appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £400.

HOSKING v. DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT CO., LTD. AND OTHERS.

Factory—"Gangway"—"Safe means of access"—Plank across a duct on factory grounds—Plank placed by contractors for use of their own and occupiers' workmen—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), ss. 25 (1), 26 (1).

Contractors engaged in carrying out building work on land attached to a factory dug a duct, 3ft. wide and 4ft. deep, for laying pipes, and placed a plank across it for the use of their own workmen and the workmen employed by the occupiers of the factory who had to pass across it to take coal from a coal dump to a boiler used for the factory. While the plaintiff, an inspecting engineer employed by the occupiers, was crossing the plank in the course of his work, it broke and the plaintiff fell into the duct and was injured.

An indemnity clause in the contract between the occupiers and the contractors provided: "The contractor shall be solely liable for and shall indemnify the employer in respect of and shall insure against any liability, loss, claim or proceedings whatsoever arising under any statute (other than the Workmen's Compensation and Employers' Liability Acts) or at common law in respect of personal injury to or the death of any person whomsoever arising out of or in the course of or caused by the execution of the works, unless due to any act or neglect of the employer or of any person for whom the employer is responsible."

HELD: (i) the plank was a "gangway" within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (1).

(ii) as the occupiers were carrying on work in the area of the duct and the plank was placed there by the contractors not only for their own use but also for the use of the occupiers' workmen, there was an absolute duty on the occupiers under s. 25 (1) to see that the plank was of sound construction and properly maintained, and under s. 26 (1) to provide, so far as was reasonably practicable, safe means of access, and, therefore, the occupiers were liable to the plaintiff for breaches of their statutory obligations.

(iii) the contractors were liable to the plaintiff at common law as the persons responsible for putting down the plank, and the occupiers were entitled to be indemnified by the contractors in the sum awarded as damages to the plaintiff (Whitby v. Burt, Boulton & Hayward, Ltd. ([1947] 2 All E.R. 324; [1947] K.B. 918; 177 L.T. 556), applied), notwithstanding the fact that the indemnity clause excluded liability arising from "any act or neglect of the [occupiers] or of any person for whom [they were] responsible."

ACTION for damages on the ground of negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff, William Ernest Hosking, a marine engineer, was employed as an inspecting engineer by the first defendants, de Havilland Aircraft Co., Ltd., occupiers of a factory. On a piece of ground 250 yards away from the nearest premises of the factory, a duct some 3 ft. wide and 4 ft. deep, running roughly north and south, in which it was proposed to lay pipes had been dug by the second defendants, Gee, Walker & Slater, Ltd., who were contractors engaged by the occupiers to carry out building works on the site. On the east side of the duct was a Cochrane boiler, used as a temporary boiler by the occupiers, and on the west of the duct were some coal hoppers in course of erection by the contractors. To the west of the coal hoppers were coal dumps. A plank owned by the contractors had been placed by them across the duct for the use of their own workmen and also to enable coal to be brought from the dumps to the Cochrane boiler by the occupiers' workmen. In the course of his duty as inspecting engineer, the plaintiff went to examine the progress of the work in the area where the contractors were working. He started to cross the plank, but it broke and he was thrown into the duct and received injuries to his back. He recovered from the accident, but later he was dismissed by the occupiers as being redundant, and, as he was 70 years old and suffering from a disability, he was unable to obtain fresh employment. He contended that the plank was a "gangway" within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (1), and that, as it was used by the occupiers, they were liable under that section, and also under s. 26 (1) of the Act for failing to provide a safe means of access. By their defence the occupiers denied liability and alleged that the contractors, having made the trench, were liable for the accident. After the contractors had been joined as defendants to the action, the occupiers issued against them a third party notice for indemnity, alleging that the plank was the property of the contractors by whom it had been placed across the duct. The occupiers also alleged that the contract between them and the contractors contained a clause whereby the occupiers were to be indemnified for any accident occurring through the negligence of the contractors. The contractors denied liability. LEWIS, J., found that the plank was the property of the contractors and had been placed across the duct for the use of their own workmen and also for that of the occupiers' workmen. He gave judgment for the plaintiff against both the occupiers and the contractors, and directed that the occupiers should be indemnified by the contractors in the sum awarded as damages and in costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

G Feb. 11. LEWIS, J., stated the facts and continued: The plaintiff contends that the occupiers are responsible under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (1) or s. 26 (1). To succeed under s. 25 (1) the plank in question must be considered to be a "gangway", as counsel for the plaintiff has contended. That sub-section provides:

H "All floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall be of sound construction and properly maintained."

The duty thereby cast on the occupiers of the factory to see that all gangways "shall be of sound construction and properly maintained" is an absolute duty. It is clear that this plank, if it be a gangway, was not of "sound construction" and was not "properly maintained." There is no definition of "gangway" in the Act, and I know not whether the first syllable of the word is of German or Scottish origin, but it seems to me that "gangway" must mean a way over which one goes, and I think that a plank placed across a duct for the purpose of people crossing it is a "gangway" within the meaning of s. 25 (1) of the Act.

If the plank was, as I find it was, the plank of the contractors, the next question is whether or not the Factories Act, 1937, is sufficiently wide to impose on the occupiers of the factory a liability for something which was put there, not by them, but by independent contractors to facilitate their work. On that point there is authority which would seem to show that if the gangway was placed in position by contractors and was used by, not only their own workmen, but also the workmen employed by the occupiers of the factory, the occupiers were liable under the Factories Act, 1937. That would appear to be the effect of the decision in Cox v. S. Cutler & Sons, Ltd. & Hampton Court Gas Co. (1). In that case a gas company had one of its gasholders damaged by enemy action, and it was not then being used for the purpose of making gas. Contractors were employed to reconstruct the gasholder and were given the exclusive possession of the area. A workman employed by the contractors met with an accident while engaged on the reconstruction, and it was held that the gas company were not liable as occupiers of the factory. From that it would seem to follow that, where a gangway such as this, although belonging to the contractors and placed there by them, is for the use of the occupiers of the factory, the occupiers of the factory cannot contend that they are not liable under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26 (1), which provides :

The decision in Callaghan v. Fred Kidd & Son (Engineers), Ltd. (2) appears to be clear authority for saying that s. 26 (1) makes it obligatory, "so far as is reasonably practicable," for the factory occupier to provide and maintain safe means of access. In Cox's case (1) the gas company were not using or carrying on any work on the premises. In the present case the occupiers were carrying on work in this area because they were using the Cochrane boiler which had been placed there for the purpose of their factory work.

The result, in my view, is that the occupiers are liable, but that by no means concludes the case. The contractors were the persons who put down a rotten plank to be used both by their own people and by those employed by the occupiers, and, in my judgment, they would be responsible to the plaintiff at common law for having caused this accident. The matter does not rest there, because in the third party proceedings (which I am asked to deal with in this action) reliance is placed on an indemnity which is not altogether easy of construction. The indemnity clause is in these terms :

"The contractor shall be solely liable for and shall indemnify the employer in respect of and shall insure against any liability, loss, claim or proceedings whatsoever arising under any statute (other than the Workmen's Compensation and Employers' Liability Acts) or at common law in respect of personal injury to or the death of any person whomsoever arising out of or in the course of or caused by the execution of the works, unless due to any act or neglect of the employer or of any person for whom the employer is responsible."

It is said that the closing sentence of that clause applies in this case, and that, if the occupiers were responsible for the accident because they were in breach of the Factories Act, 1937, then the indemnity does not run against the contractors. On that I need only say that, if such a state of affairs is excluded by the contract, the indemnity would appear to be entirely useless, because one has no right of indemnity against another person unless one is oneself liable. An indemnity pre-supposes that one has a liability against which someone else indemnifies one. I find it very difficult to make sense out of the indemnity clause if it means that, in circumstances such as the present, the indemnity does not apply. I am, therefore, of opinion that, not only are the contractors, as well as the occupiers, liable to the plaintiff for this accident, but under the third party proceedings for indemnity the occupiers are entitled to recover from the contractors.

- A It is argued by counsel for the plaintiff that, indemnity or no indemnity, if both defendants are liable to his client, the proper method of dealing with this case is under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6, by which, where there are joint tortfeasors, the court has power to apportion the liability, and the contribution directed may amount to a complete indemnity. I observe that in Whitby v. Burt, Boulton & Hayward, Ltd. (3) DENNING, J., on his interpretation of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26, found that the occupiers were guilty of negligence, and held that there had been a breach of the section. In that case independent contractors were doing repairs to the roof of a factory and, owing to their faulty work, some corrugated iron sheets, which were required for the repairs, collapsed. It was pleaded by the contractors that the use of the corrugated iron sheets was authorised by the occupiers of the factory, as the use of the plank was authorised in this case. In Whitby's case (3) the occupiers of the factory contended that, as the work on which the contractors were engaged was a building operation, s. 26 of the Act of 1937 did not apply, because it was not one of the sections specified in s. 107 of the Act which dealt with building operations.
- D DENNING, J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 325) :

"It is impossible to extricate building operations within a factory from other operations within a factory. Section 26, in my judgment, applies to this case and the occupiers were responsible for seeing that there was provided and maintained safe means of access."

- E The learned judge held that both defendants were liable. Judgment was entered against both defendants, but the learned judge directed that the occupiers should be indemnified in the sum awarded by the contractors, who should also pay the costs. There was not a specific indemnity there, as there is in this case, and the indemnity was given under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935.

- F In my view, therefore, there must be judgment in this case for the plaintiff. The special damage, it is agreed, amounts to £247 14s., and I propose to award the plaintiff, including that sum of special damage, the sum of £1,500 against both defendants. I make the order under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, and I say no more in regard to the indemnity clause. The occupiers shall be indemnified in that sum by the contractors, who, as in Whitby's case (3), are to pay the costs of the action.

- G Judgment for the plaintiff for £1,500 and costs. First defendants to be indemnified by the second defendants in the sum awarded and costs, including costs of the third party proceedings.

Solicitors : Barlow, Lyde & Gilbert (for the plaintiff) ; Blount, Petre & Co. (for the occupiers) ; William Charles Crocker (for the contractors).

Statutes—Construction—Breach of statutory duty—Civil action by private person—Bookmaker—Breach by occupier of dog-racing track of duty to provide space for bookmaking—Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934 (c. 58), s. 11 (2), s. 30 (1). B

By the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, s. 11 (2), so long as a totalisator is being lawfully operated on a licensed dog-racing track, the occupier “(a) shall not . . . exclude any person from the track by reason only that he proposes to carry on bookmaking on the track; and (b) shall take such steps as are necessary to secure that . . . there is available for bookmakers space on the track where they can conveniently carry on bookmaking in connection with dog races run on the track on that day; and every person who contravenes, or fails to comply with, any of the provisions of this sub-section shall be guilty of an offence.” Section 30 (1) imposes substantial penalties, on summary conviction and on conviction on indictment, for a breach of (inter alia) s. 11. C D

A bookmaker brought an action against the occupier of a licensed dog-racing track for a breach of his obligation under s. 11 (2).

HELD : on a true construction of the Act of 1934, the obligation imposed by s. 11 (2) on the occupier of a track was intended for the benefit of the public who resorted to the track and not for the benefit of the bookmakers, and a breach of the statutory duty was a public and not a private wrong, and, therefore, since penalties for the breach were provided by s. 30 (1) of the statute, it was to be inferred that the duty under s. 11 (2) was not intended to have the additional sanction of civil liability, and the bookmaker had no right of civil action against the occupier. APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., SOMERVELL, L.J., and SINGLETON, J.), dated Dec. 1, 1947, and reported [1947] 2 All E.R. 815, allowing an appeal by the defendants from a decision of OLIVER, J., dated Oct. 30, 1946, and reported on a preliminary point of law at [1946] 2 All E.R. 187.

The plaintiff, a bookmaker, brought an action against the defendants, the occupiers of a licensed dog-racing track, for breach of their statutory duty, under the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, s. 11 (2), not to exclude bookmakers from the track and to secure that space was available on the track for bookmaking purposes. OLIVER, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff and awarded him £150 damages, a declaration, and an injunction against the defendants. The defendants' appeal from this decision was allowed by the Court of Appeal on the ground that, assuming that the defendants had committed a breach of s. 11 (2), the plaintiff had no right of civil action against them. The decision of the Court of Appeal on this preliminary point was now upheld by the House of Lords.

Feb. 28. The following opinions were read.

E

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, this appeal, which is brought from an order of the Court of Appeal setting aside a judgment given by OLIVER, J., in favour of the appellant, can be determined on a preliminary point, and your Lordships need not be troubled by a detailed narration of the facts which occupied the time of the learned trial judge for many days. The single question, which your Lordships decide, is whether on the true construction of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, the appellant has, on the assumption, which for this purpose I make, that the respondents have committed a breach of s. 11 (2) (b) of the Act, a right of civil action against them. This question was answered in the affirmative by OLIVER, J., in the negative by the Court of Appeal.

G

The appellant is a bookmaker, who, before the proceedings which gave rise to this appeal, carried on the business of bookmaking on a part of a greyhound racing track known as the Wandsworth Stadium which is occupied by the respondents. I do not think it necessary to state any further details about the track or the manner in which the appellant and his fellow bookmakers carried on their business. For I am content to assume, without expressing any opinion about it, that the respondents have committed a breach of their statutory obligations. Before the passing of the Act of 1934 betting by means of the "totalisator" (a mechanical application of the pari-mutuel) on dog-racing tracks was illegal and betting on such tracks was carried on by the public with bookmakers only. Thus, bookmakers, though they had no absolute right of entry on any such tracks, had a monopoly of betting on the track if they were not excluded, and they were not likely to be excluded. It was otherwise with horse racecourses. For by the Racecourse Betting Act, 1928, the use of totalisators on such courses had already been legalised. It was in these circumstances that the Act of 1934 was passed. Its full title may be recalled :

"An Act to amend the law with respect to betting on tracks where sporting events take place, including the law with respect to totalisators on horse racecourses ; to authorise, subject to restrictions, the establishment of totalisators on dog racecourses ; to prohibit betting on tracks with young persons and pari mutuel betting except by authorised totalisators ; to amend the law with respect to lotteries and certain prize competitions ; and for purposes connected with the matters aforesaid."

It is, as its title suggests, an Act which in various respects regulates the conduct of racecourses, and, in particular, authorises or restricts, as the case may be, the means and methods of betting on such courses. There is nothing in it to suggest that it is the charter of bookmakers.

Part I of the Act which is headed "Betting" consists of the first twenty sections. By s. 1 the number of days in any year on which betting by way of bookmaking or by means of a totalisator may take place on any track is limited. Contravention of this section is an offence under the Act. By s. 2 it is provided that bookmaking shall not be carried on on any track unless the occupier of the track is the holder of a licence in force under that Part of the Act authorising the provision of betting facilities on that track. To this section there are certain provisos which I need not mention. Here, too, contravention is an offence under the Act. By s. 3 it is provided that no pari-mutuel or pool betting business shall be carried on on any track except as therein provided. Again, contravention is an offence under the Act. Section 4 prescribes the number of races and the period of hours on and in which betting by way of bookmaking or by means of a totalisator may take place. Once more contravention is an offence. I can pass over the other sections and come to s. 11, and, as it is the section on which the appellant founds his claim, I will state it in full :

"11 (1) Notwithstanding any enactment or rule of law to the contrary, it shall be lawful on any licensed track being a dog racecourse for the occupier of the track or any person authorised by him in writing (a) to set up and keep a totalisator, whether in a building or not ; and (b) on any appointed day, while the public are admitted to the track for the purpose of attending dog races and no other sporting events are taking place on the track, to operate a totalisator so set up, but only for effecting with persons resorting to the track betting transactions on dog races run on that track on that day ; and for any person to effect betting transactions by means of a totalisator lawfully operated. (2) The occupier of a licensed track (a) shall not, so long as a totalisator is being lawfully operated on the track, exclude any person from the track by reason only that he proposes to carry on bookmaking on the track ; and (b) shall take such steps as are necessary to secure that, so long as a totalisator is being lawfully operated on the track, there is available for bookmakers space on the track where they can conveniently carry on bookmaking in connection with dog races run on the track on that day ; and every person who contravenes, or fails to comply with, any of the provisions of this sub-section shall be guilty of an offence."

Section 12 enacts (with certain provisos) that nothing in the Betting Act, 1853, shall apply to anything done on any licensed track by a bookmaker on any day on which bookmaking may be lawfully carried on on that track, and s. 13 prescribes the maximum charges for admission that may be made by the occupier of a licensed track to a bookmaker or his assistant. Section 14 prohibits the occupier of a licensed track and the other persons therein mentioned from engaging directly or indirectly in bookmaking on that track.

Contravention is made an offence under the Act. Section 16 enables the licensing authority to revoke a licence in respect of a track in its area (inter alia) if the holder of the licence, or, where the holder is a corporate body, any director or the manager thereof, is convicted of any offence under Pt. I of the Act or under sched. I to the Act or of any offence involving fraud or dishonesty. By s. 17 it is provided that nothing in that Part of the Act shall be construed as requiring the occupier of a licensed track to permit betting thereon at any time at which no totalisator is being operated on that track. Section 18 deals with the powers of the Racecourse Betting Control Board under the Racecourse Betting Act, 1928, and is not strictly germane to these proceedings. Section 20 includes a number of definitions, including a very wide definition of "bookmaker."

That ends Pt. I. I need not refer to Pt. II. Part III contains the penalty clauses in ss. 29 and 30. Section 29 is :

"Where a person convicted of an offence under this Act is a body corporate, every person who at the date of the commission of the offence was a director or officer of the body corporate shall also be deemed to be guilty of that offence unless he proves that the offence was committed without his knowledge."

Section 30 (1) is :

"A person guilty of an offence under ss. 1, 2, 3 or 11, or under any section contained in Pt. II, of this Act shall be liable (a) on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding £100, and in the case of a second or any subsequent conviction for an offence under the same section, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to a fine not exceeding £200 or to both such imprisonment and such fine ; or (b) on conviction on indictment, to a fine not exceeding £500, and in the case of a second or any subsequent conviction for an offence under the same section, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year or to a fine not exceeding £750 or to both such imprisonment and such fine."

As I have already indicated, the question on this appeal arises on s. 11 (2) (b) of the Act. The appellant being, as he alleged, illegally deprived of his rights under this sub-section, on May 31, 1944, issued his writ against the respondents. He claimed a number of declarations of his rights, an injunction restraining the respondents from excluding him from their track, a mandatory order requiring them to secure for him on their track a space where he could conveniently carry on bookmaking on days on which dog races were run, and damages. After various interlocutory proceedings to which I need not refer, OLIVER, J., having already by way of preliminary judgment decided that the appellant had a right of action, on Oct. 30, 1946, made an order whereby he declared that a certain area being part of the respondents' track was "space within the meaning of s. 11 (2) (b) of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934," and granted an injunction restraining the respondents, so long as a totalisator was being operated on the track, from excluding the appellant from the track by reason only of the fact that he proposed to carry on bookmaking thereon, and further awarded him £150 by way of damages. From this judgment the respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., SOMERVELL, L.J., and SINGLETON, J.), which unanimously reversed it, holding that, even if the respondents had committed a breach of their statutory obligation in that they had not made available for the appellant a space on the track where he could conveniently carry on bookmaking, yet the appellant had not a cause of action against the respondents.

My Lords, in my opinion, the judgment of the Court of Appeal was clearly right. It is, I think, true that it is often a difficult question whether, where a statutory obligation is placed on A., B., who conceives himself to be damnified by A.'s breach of it, has a right of action against him. But on the present case I cannot entertain any doubt. I do not propose to try to formulate any rules by reference to which such a question can infallibly be answered. The only rule which in all circumstances is valid is that the answer must depend on a consideration of the whole Act and the circumstances, including the pre-existing law, in which it was enacted. But that there are indications which point with more or less force to the one answer or the other is clear from authorities which, even where they do not bind, will have great weight with the House. For instance, if a statutory duty is prescribed, but no remedy by way of penalty or otherwise for its breach is imposed, it can be assumed that a right of civil action accrues to the person who is damnified by the breach. For, if it were not so, the statute would be but a pious aspiration. But, as LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., said (1 B. & Ad. 859) in Doe d. Rochester (Bp.) v. Bridges (1):

" . . . where an Act creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner, we take it to be a general rule that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner."

This passage was cited with approval by the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C. ([1898] A.C. 394) in Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council (2). But this general rule is subject to exceptions. It may be that, though a specific remedy is provided by the Act, yet the person injured has a personal right of action in addition. I cannot state that proposition more happily, or, indeed, more favourably to the appellant, than in the words of LORD KINNEAR ([1912] A.C. 165) in Black v. Fife Coal Co., Ltd. (3):

"If the duty be established, I do not think there is any serious question as to the civil liability. There is no reasonable ground for maintaining that a proceeding by way of penalty is the only remedy allowed by the statute. The principle explained by LORD CAIRNS in Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Co. (4) and by LORD HERSCHELL in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board (5) solves the question. We are to consider the scope and purpose of the statute and in particular for whose benefit it is intended: Now the object of the present statute is plain. It was intended to compel mine owners to make due provision for the safety of the men working in their mines, and the persons for whose benefit all these rules are to be enforced are the persons exposed to danger. But when a duty of this kind is imposed for the benefit of particular persons, there arises at common law a correlative right in those persons who may be injured by its contravention."

An earlier and a later example of the application of this principle will be found in Groves v. Lord Wimborne (6) and Monk v. Warbey (7), in the former of which cases the Act in question was described by A. L. SMITH, L.J., ([1898] 2 Q.B. 406) as:

" . . . a public Act passed in favour of the workers in factories and workshops to compel their employers to do certain things for their protection and benefit."

But, my Lords, beyond the single fact that the performance by the respondents of their statutory duty will redound to the advantage of certain bookmakers, of whom the appellant may be one, I see neither in this Act nor in its attendant circumstances any element which takes this case out of the general rule which I have taken from LORD TENTERDEN's judgment in Doe v. Bridges (1). It was urged that the rule had no application where the statutory remedy was by way of criminal proceedings for a penalty, but I see no ground for this distinction. The implication is, if anything, in the opposite direction. For the sanction of criminal proceedings emphasises that this statutory obligation, like many others which the Act contains, is imposed for the public benefit and that the breach of it is a public, not a private, wrong. Then it was said that the obligation imposed by s. 11 on the occupier of a track was intended for the benefit of bookmakers, and, to make this argument more cogent, it was contended that only ss. 11, 12, 13 and 14 of the Act together with ss. 29 and 30 need be looked at in order to get that purview of the Act which the authorities prescribe. From this I dissent. Part II may, perhaps, be ignored, but Pt. I and Pt. III must clearly be read as a whole. So reading it, I have no doubt that the primary intention of the Act was to regulate in certain respects the conduct of race tracks and, in particular, the conduct of betting operations thereon. If in consequence of those regulations being observed some bookmakers will be benefited, that does not mean that the Act was passed for the benefit of bookmakers in the sense in which it was said of a Factory Act that it was passed in favour of the workmen in factories. I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that, where an Act regulates the way in which a place of amusement is to be managed, the interests of the public who resort to it may be expected to be the primary consideration of the legislature. If from the work of regulation any class of persons derives an advantage, that does not spring from the primary purpose and intention of the Act.

Then it was urged that the penalty provided by the Act was inadequate—an argument which was of weight in such cases as Groves v. Wimborne (6), but here has no validity. I see no ground for thinking that, if the respondents fail to observe their statutory duties, including those prescribed by s. 11, they will not be adequately penalised. On the contrary, the penalties are severe and, further, conviction of an offence may lead to the disastrous result of the licence being revoked. Further and weighty reasons, from which I do not dissent, were given by the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS and the other members of the court and will be given by some of your Lordships for thinking that the appellant had not established his right. I do not need to say more than that this appeal cannot succeed and move that it be dismissed with costs.

LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, the question whether the imposition of a duty by a particular statute impliedly gives a right of action to a person injured by reason of a breach of that duty frequently demands the attention of legal practitioners and of the courts. In recent years it has arisen (to name a few instances) with reference to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the Food and Drugs (Adulteration) Act, 1928, and orders made under the Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896. When the point is argued at the Bar, Doe v. Bridges (1), which was decided in 1831, is commonly taken as a starting-point, and for the last quarter of a century the debate has normally turned on the question whether the case before the court falls within the decision in Groves v. Lord Wimborne (6) or that in Phillips v. Britannia Hygienic Laundry Co. (8).¹¹ To a person unversed in the science, or art, of legislation it may well seem strange that Parliament has not by now made it a rule to state explicitly what its intention is in a matter which is often of no little importance, instead of leaving it to the courts to discover, by a careful examination and analysis of what is expressly said, what that intention may be supposed probably to be.¹² There are, no doubt, reasons which inhibit the legislature from revealing its intention in plain words. I do not know, and must not speculate, what those reasons may be. I trust, however, that it will not be thought impertinent, in any sense of that word, to suggest respectfully that those who are responsible for framing legislation might consider whether the traditional practice, which obscures, if it does not conceal, the intention which Parliament has, or must be presumed to have, might not safely be abandoned.

The questions which this traditional legislative reticence so often brings before the courts are sometimes difficult, but that raised by the present appeal seems to me, assisted as I have been by the convincing judgments of the Court of Appeal, to be comparatively simple. This being so, and as I understand that all those of your Lordships who heard the arguments are in agreement with the Court of Appeal, I will confine my observations to a single point. I agree with those who say, as was said by STEPHEN, J., (13 Q.B.D. 112) in Vallance v. Falle (9) that "the best way of finding out the meaning of a statute is to read it and see what it means," and I do not regret, any more than I understand the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS to regret, the fact that, as he said in the present case ([1947] 2 All E.R. 816), so-called rules of construction "have fallen into some disfavour." It must be recognised, however, that the courts have laid down, not, indeed, rigid rules, but principles which have been found to afford some guidance when it is sought to ascertain the intention of Parliament. In Phillips v. Britannia Hygienic Laundry Co. (8), BANKES, L.J., cited ([1923] 2 K.B. 838) a well-known passage from the speech of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council (2), in which that noble and learned Lord, referring to the statement of LORD TENTERDEN, C.J. (1 B. & Ad. 859) in Doe v. Bridges (1), spoke of the "general rule" that :

" . . . where an Act creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner . . . that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner."

LORD MACNAGHTEN, said ([1898] A.C. 397) :

"Whether the general rule is to prevail, or an exception to the general rule is to be admitted, must depend on the scope and language of the Act which creates the obligation and on considerations of policy and convenience."

In my opinion, BANKES, L.J., rightly applied this principle in Phillips's case (8). I do not agree with the submission of counsel for the appellant that it is heretical to regard criminal proceedings which may be followed by fine and imprisonment as a "specified manner" of enforcing a duty. I think that it is both orthodox and right so to regard them.

Now, the law having been thus stated and, as I believe, correctly stated in the Court of Appeal in 1923, the Act with which your Lordships are at present concerned was passed eleven years later. During that intervening period the dictum of LORD TENTERDEN had, I think, been consistently followed in the sense in which it was understood by BANKES, L.J. It is, therefore, legitimate to assume that those who were engaged in drafting the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, had in mind the principle of construction which had thus been laid down. It was not thought fit to break with tradition and to state explicitly in the Act whether or not an aggrieved bookmaker was to have a right of civil action, but Parliament must be taken to have known that, if it preferred to avoid the crudity of a blunt statement and to leave its intention in that regard to be inferred by the courts, the "general rule" would prevail unless the "scope and language" of the Act established the exception. It cannot be supposed that the draftsman was blind to the principles which the courts have laid down for their own guidance when it becomes necessary for them to fill in such gaps as Parliament may choose to leave in its enactments. There is an inevitable interaction between the methods of parliamentary drafting and the principles of judicial interpretation. I do not find in the present case any indication that Parliament sought to manifest an intention that an exception to the general rule should be created. On the contrary, whether the question is approached with, or without, such guidance as principles of construction can afford, I am clearly of opinion, in agreement with the Court of Appeal, that the language of the Act points to the opposite conclusion. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I find myself in close agreement with the judgments in the Court of Appeal. In particular, I respectfully agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that the proper approach to the case is to consider whether, on a true construction of the statute as a whole, a right of action by an individual aggrieved by the breach of one of the statutory duties ought to be implied. It would be superfluous for me to examine point by point the ground already covered by the judgments under review, but there are two topics on which, out of respect to the argument addressed to the House, I wish to add some observations.

A The first question is whether the appellant has succeeded in showing that he is a member of a group of persons who have an interest and right to enforce the duty imposed on the respondents by s. 11 (2). Obviously, the duty operates in a general way in favour of bookmakers, and bookmakers have an interest to enforce it, but the appellant did not maintain that a right to enforce it is given indiscriminately to all bookmakers as defined in s. 20 (1). It would, indeed, have been impossible, in view of the width of the definition, to maintain that every bookmaker within it has a right to compel by civil action the licensees of every racing track to take such steps as are necessary to secure that, so long as a totalisator is being lawfully operated on the track, there is available for him and other bookmakers space on the track where they can conveniently carry on bookmaking in connection with dog races run on the track on that day. The claim put forward was that the members of the group of bookmakers who had been in regular attendance at each dog racing track when the Act came into force had an individual right to enforce the performance of the duty at that track. What was to happen when a new dog racing track was commenced after the passing of the Act, or whether new members of a group were to have the right, were questions left imperfectly clarified in the argument, but this, at least, is certain, that no ingenuity can wrest from the language of the Act an implied reference to these alleged groups as the beneficiaries of the statutory duty. If it had been the intention of the legislature to confer a right of action on the members of the several groups of bookmakers, one for each racing track, it would not have omitted all reference to the groups and to their right as associated with a particular track. The vagueness of the appellant's case at this point tells strongly against it.

E The other matter with which I wish to deal concerns the penalties provided by the statute. If there is no penalty and no other special means of enforcement provided by the statute, it may be presumed that those who have an interest to enforce one of the statutory duties have an individual right of action. Otherwise the duty might never be performed, but, if there is a penalty clause, the right to a civil action must be established by a consideration of the scope and purpose of the statute as a whole. The inference that there is a concurrent right of civil action is easily drawn when the predominant purpose is manifestly the protection of a class of workmen by imposing on their employers the duty of taking special measures to secure their safety. The penalties provided by the Act apply when a breach of the duty occurs, but each workman has a right to sue for damages if he is injured in consequence of the breach. In Black v. Fife Coal Co., Ltd. (3), LORD KINNEAR was considering a statute of that type (the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887). He said ([1912] A.C. 165) :

H "There is no reasonable ground for maintaining that a proceeding by way of penalty is the only remedy allowed by the statute. The principle explained by LORD CAIRNS in Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Co. (4), and by LORD HERSHELL in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board (5) solves the question. We are to consider the scope and purpose of the statute and in particular for whose benefit it is intended. Now the object of the present statute is plain. It was intended to compel mine owners to make due provision for the safety of the men working in their mines, and the persons for whose benefit all these rules are to be enforced are the persons exposed to danger. But when a duty of this kind is imposed for the benefit of particular persons, there arises at common law a correlative right in those persons who may be injured by its contravention. Therefore, I think it is quite impossible to hold that the penalty clause detracts in any way from the prima facie right of the persons for whose benefit the statutory enactment has been passed to enforce the civil liability."

The present case, however, is concerned with a statute very different in scope, purpose and character from the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887.

I have already dealt with the uncertainty about the persons who are to benefit by s. 11 (2). It has also to be noted that the statute has not the single general object of safeguarding the livelihood of bookmakers. Its objects are complex, as its title shows, and they include the regulation of racing tracks, the regulation of betting at racing tracks, the authorisation of the establishment of totalisators at dog racing tracks, and the amendment of the law relating to lotteries and certain prize competitions. The overriding purpose is the benefit of the community, but there is also a general purpose to benefit the members of the public who attend racing tracks or take part in betting. The interest of bookmakers under s. 11 is incidental and is not one of the general purposes of the statute. The whole structure of the statute is less homogeneous than that of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and similar Acts, and this is reflected in the relevant penalty clause itself. Section 30 prescribes one scale of penalties for offences under ss. 1, 2, 3 and 11 and any section of Pt. II of the Act. These penalties are by no means negligible in themselves, for they authorise the courts to impose substantial fines and to imprison on conviction for a second or subsequent offence for a period which may be as much as six months. Their deterrent effect is, however, very much increased by the provisions of s. 29, under which a director or officer of a body corporate may be deemed guilty of an offence of which the body corporate is convicted, and still more by the power given in ss. 7 (1) (b) and 16 (1) (d) to withhold or revoke the licence required for the operation of a racing track if the applicant or licensee has been convicted of a contravention of the provisions regulating racing tracks and betting on them. The penalties, therefore, are an unusually effective sanction for the enforcement of the sections of the Act to which they relate, and stand in no need of aid from civil proceedings. There is another consideration of some importance. A single scale of fines and imprisonment covers the breach not only of the duties under s. 11 but also of a number of other duties in the performance of which neither bookmakers nor any other group of persons has a particular interest. The duty under s. 11 is certainly not more important than some of these and it is fair to infer that that particular duty was not intended to have the additional sanction of civil liability. Lastly, if civil proceedings at the instance of an individual bookmaker are competent, there is no provision that a judgment of the civil courts that s. 11 (2) has been contravened may be a cause for withholding or forfeiting a licence; and it might result that bookmakers would always resort to civil proceedings and would never initiate criminal proceedings, because it is contrary to their interest to have the number of racing tracks diminished. It is reasonably certain that that is not what the legislature intended. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading in print the speeches which have just been delivered. I agree with them and I also agree with the suggestion made in the course of his speech by my noble and learned friend, LORD DU PARCQ. In these circumstances, I do not desire to add any observations of my own. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD REID: My Lords, I need not re-state the facts of this case and I shall not discuss the authorities. I think that this case can be decided without calling in aid any legal presumption. The case turns on the interpretation of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and, in particular, on s. 11 (2) of that Act, and I find it unnecessary to go beyond the words of the Act and the circumstances in which it was passed so far as these are relevant to be taken into account in determining the intention of the legislature. The appellant founded on these circumstances and I shall state them as favourably to the appellant as I think they can be stated. The position before the Act was passed was that no bookmaker had any legal right to be admitted to any dog racing track or to be allowed to carry on his business there, but, in fact, occupiers of such tracks welcomed the presence of bookmakers. It was in their interest to do so. The growing popularity of this form of entertainment largely arose from the fact that there were ample facilities for members of the public who resorted to these tracks to make bets there during the meetings. It was illegal before the Act was passed for a totalisator to be operated on a dog racing track, and, unless bookmakers were allowed to carry on business there, it was practically impossible to provide the facilities for betting which attracted large numbers of people to the tracks. One of the purposes of the Act was to authorise occupiers of these tracks to operate their own totalisators, and it was obvious that this would put into their hands a powerful and probably highly profitable new instrument. It is in evidence that the respondents' totalisator has earned for them in one year a gross profit of nearly £200,000. Probably profits of this magnitude were not anticipated, but, if even a moderate part of this profit was thought likely, there was plainly need for regulation and the Act contains elaborate provisions for this purpose. In particular, it must have been obvious that occupiers would no longer have the same interest to admit bookmakers. Indeed, their interest might well be to exclude them or greatly to restrict their operations, because by doing so occupiers might well think that they could increase the volume of business of their totalisators and so increase their own profits. It must have been to avoid a situation of that kind that s. 11 (2) was enacted. That sub-section enacts:

“The occupier of a licensed track (a) shall not, so long as a totalisator is being lawfully operated on the track, exclude any person from the track by reason only that he proposes to carry on bookmaking on the track; and (b) shall take such steps as are necessary to secure that, so long as a totalisator is being lawfully operated on the track, there is available for bookmakers space on the track where they can conveniently carry on bookmaking in connection with dog races run on the track on that day; and every person who contravenes, or fails to comply with, any of the provisions of this sub-section shall be guilty of an offence.”

For whose benefit was this sub-section intended? The appellant's case is that it was primarily, if not solely, for the benefit of bookmakers. I do not think so. I think that it was primarily intended for the protection of those members of the public who might wish to bet on these tracks. Its effect is to prevent the totalisator from having a monopoly and to afford to the public such protection as can be given by making provision for competitive facilities for betting. I am prepared to assume in the appellant's favour that it may also have been an object of the legislature to give some protection to bookmakers (although this is by no means obvious), but it does not follow that to achieve such protection every individual bookmaker must have rights against the occupier of the track which he can enforce by civil action. Broadly speaking, the facilities which the Act requires for bookmakers are similar to the facilities which, in fact, they enjoyed before the Act was passed. I see no reason to infer from the Act, read as a whole, or from the circumstances founded on by the appellant, that the enjoyment of these facilities required or was intended to have any further protection than that afforded by the track occupier's liability to prosecution if he failed to comply with the statutory provisions.

lature is to be found in the terms of s. 11 (2) itself. I find it extremely difficult to reconcile the nature of the provisions of this sub-section with an intention to confer on individual bookmakers rights which each could enforce by civil action. If the legislature had intended to create such rights, I would expect to find them capable of reasonably precise definition, but counsel for the appellant were unable to suggest such definition and I am equally unable to do so. At first sight s. 11 (2) (a) might seem to confer on every bookmaker an unqualified right to demand admission, but counsel for the appellant admitted that this cannot be maintained. It cannot have been intended that the occupier must admit as many bookmakers as may present themselves on any occasion, whether there is room for them or not, and, if an unreasonably large number seek admittance, there is nothing in the Act to indicate who is to be admitted and who may be refused. This omission is not surprising if the obligation on the occupier is only a general obligation to admit an adequate number of bookmakers, but it is, in my view, a clear indication that no further obligation was intended to be imposed. If s. 11 (2) (a) does not create any civil right in favour of individual bookmakers, I find it difficult to suppose that s. 11 (2) (b) creates such a right. The occupier is required to take such steps as are necessary to secure "that there is available for bookmakers space on the track where they can conveniently carry on bookmaking." This cannot mean that space must be provided on every occasion for as many bookmakers as wish to carry on business on that occasion. It cannot mean that, after the allotted space is fully occupied, an individual bookmaker who cannot find room there can demand further space where he can conveniently carry on business. The occupier must provide a space which is adequate in all the circumstances and which is in a convenient situation, but if he does that he has fulfilled his statutory obligation. He is not required by anything in the Act to find a place for each bookmaker who presents himself. If the Act does not give to an individual bookmaker a right to demand a place for himself, I find nothing to suggest that it gives him any other right enforceable by civil action. The sanction of prosecution appears to me to be appropriate and sufficient for the general obligation imposed by the sub-section. I, therefore, agree that the appellant has no right to sue in respect of a breach by the respondents of their obligations under s. 11 (2) of the Act and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

GEORGE v. TOMPSON'S TRUSTEE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), February 25, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Effect on previous transaction—Attachment of debt—Completion—Garnishee order—Payment into court—Order for payment out—Payment delayed through administrative difficulty—Receiving order before payment received by creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 40 (2).

The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 40, provides: "(1) Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a debtor, or has attached any debt due to him, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution or attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor, unless he has completed the execution or attachment before the date of the receiving order, and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor, or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor. (2) For the purposes of this Act, an execution against goods is completed by seizure and sale; an attachment of a debt is completed by receipt of the debt ; and an execution against land is completed by seizure, or, in the case of an equitable interest, by the appointment of a receiver."

On Feb. 17, 1948, the plaintiff obtained judgment against T. for £38 and costs. T. made no payment, and on Feb. 24, 1948, the plaintiff issued a garnishee summons against G., in respect of a debt owed by G. to T., for payment of the amount of the judgment debt and the costs of the summons. On Feb. 28, 1948, G. paid the sum into the county court. On Mar. 1, 1948, the plaintiff, by letter, asked T. to consent to payment out to the plaintiff, and, receiving no reply, applied on Mar. 18, 1948, to the county court for payment out. An order was made in his favour on the same day, and the plaintiff immediately asked the office of the county court to pay the money to him. He was told that it was not the practice to make payments on court days, and he was unable to obtain the money. The plaintiff's request was repeated on Mar. 19, 1948, but he was told that the county court banking account was not in funds and it was necessary to wait until the account had been supplied with funds by the Lord Chancellor's office. On Mar. 23, 1948, the plaintiff made a further application for payment, but the county court office had not received the expected remittance and the payment could not be made. Later on the same day, the plaintiff was informed by the county court office that a receiving order had been made against T. and instructions had been given by the official receiver that the money should be retained in court. This was the first intimation that the plaintiff had received of a bankruptcy petition or the commission of an act of bankruptcy by T. against whom a receiving order had, in fact, been made on Mar. 19, 1948.

HELD : section 40 (2) was exhaustive in its definition of what constituted the completion of the attachment of a debt, and, therefore, as the plaintiff had not received the debt, attachment was not complete, and the plaintiff was not entitled to retain the benefit of the attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the plaintiff had completed the attachment of a debt for the purposes and within the meaning of s. 40 (1) and (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. WYNN-PARRY, J., held that the attachment was not complete. The facts are set out in the headnote.

F. H. Lawton for the plaintiff.
Curtis-Raleigh for the defendant.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : The question I have to determine is whether the plaintiff, who had obtained a garnishee order in respect of a sum of money which was paid into the county court, had, by reason of having obtained an order absolute, attached the debt, the subject of the order, so as to be able to retain the benefit of that sum against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor. A

The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 40, provides :

“(1) Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a debtor, or has attached any debt due to him, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution or attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor, unless he has completed the execution or attachment before the date of the receiving order, and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor, or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor. (2) For the purposes of this Act, an execution against goods is completed by seizure and sale ; an attachment of a debt is completed by receipt of the debt ; and an execution against land is completed by seizure, or, in the case of an equitable interest, by the appointment of a receiver.” B C

By s. 41 (1) it is provided :

“Where any goods of a debtor are taken in execution, and before the sale thereof, or the completion of the execution by the receipt or recovery of the full amount of the levy, notice is served on the sheriff that a receiving order has been made against the debtor, the sheriff shall, on request, deliver the goods and any money seized or received in part satisfaction of the execution to the official receiver.” D

Before leaving the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, I observe that in the definition section there is no definition of “execution” or “attachment.”

Section 40 and the sections corresponding to it in the earlier Acts have been the subject of consideration by the courts in a number of cases. In Re Fairley (1) E the facts were that :

“On Jan. 14, 1921, the sheriff, in executing a writ of fiери facias for £144, levied on the debtor's goods, but on Jan. 29 being paid £72 on account of the debt in addition to costs, fees and possession money, he withdrew by arrangement reserving a right of re-entry for the £72 balance. He retained the £72 received on account for fourteen days and then paid it to the execution creditors. On Mar. 16 the sheriff made a second levy, but on being paid £53 on account of the debt in addition to fees and possession money, he again withdrew reserving a right of re-entry for the £19 balance. After retaining the £53 for fourteen days he paid it to the execution creditors. On Apr. 26 the sheriff made a third levy, but the goods seized being found on interpleader to belong to a third party, he finally withdrew and made a return of nulla bona on May 2. On Sept. 8 a petition in bankruptcy based on an act of bankruptcy of Aug. 19 was presented. A receiving order was made on Sept. 29 followed by an adjudication on Oct. 1 and an order for summary administration on Oct. 3.” F G H

On those facts it was held by the Divisional Court, consisting of ASTBURY and P. O. LAWRENCE, JJ., that the execution was completed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, ss. 40 and 41, by the return of nulla bona on May 2, and the trustee had no right to the two amounts realised by that completed execution. In his judgment ASTBURY, J., said ([1922] 2 Ch. 795) :

judge below gave judgment in his favour, was whether he was entitled to recover the £125 paid to the appellants. The trustee contends that his right to recover this money arises under s. 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The trustee suggests that unless there is a sale following a seizure the execution cannot be completed within the meaning of that section. That is plainly inaccurate, as in the very next section (41) 'receipt or recovery of the full amount of the levy' is described as a completion of the execution. It is plain therefore that in s. 40 the definition, or so-called definition, in sub-s. (2), is not an exhaustive definition, but a mere description of one of many ways in which an execution can be completed. Now the main and substantive object of s. 40 is to prevent a judgment creditor retaining the benefit of a partially finished execution if a bankruptcy intervenes, and it enacts that unless the execution is completed it shall not be good as against the trustee. The trustee's contention pushed to its logical conclusion would lead to an absurd result. If an execution had been issued nineteen years before a bankruptcy, and the execution creditor had been paid the greater part of his money by arrangement and the sheriff had retired but without any seizure and sale the moneys could have been recovered in the long subsequent bankruptcy. I do not believe that that is the meaning of the section at all."

ASTBURY, J., proceeded to consider certain decisions which had been relied on by the trustee in support of the contention on which he had just expressed an adverse comment. One of those decisions was Re Ford, Ex parte Official Receiver (2) in which :

"Execution having been issued upon a judgment for £80 and costs, the sheriff on Dec. 31, 1898, levied under a writ of fiери facias. On Jan. 5, 1899, the debtor, under an arrangement with the solicitors of the execution creditors, paid the solicitors a sum of £40 on account, and gave to the sheriff authority to re-enter under the writ of fiери facias upon default in payment of any of the instalments of the balance at the agreed dates for payment. The sheriff thereupon withdrew. On Jan. 14 a receiving order was made against the debtor on his own petition ; at that date the sheriff had not re-entered under the writ of fiери facias. Held, that the execution had not been completed as to the £40 at the date of the receiving order, that the execution creditors were therefore not entitled to retain the benefit of the execution, and that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to the £40 as part of the debtor's estate."

As to this case, ASTBURY, J., said ([1922] 2 Ch. 797) :

"I do not see how it could possibly have been held otherwise. The sheriff withdrew under a distinct arrangement that he could go in again, and before he had re-entered, before the debt was paid off or the execution terminated, the bankruptcy supervened."

ASTBURY, J. (ibid.), then quotes from the judgment of CHANNELL, J., in Re Ford (2) where he said ([1900] 1 Q.B. 268) :

"If there has been only a partial execution, a levy and no subsequent completion, the intention of the Act apparently is that the other creditors may step in and insist on having the whole of the debtor's estate rateably divided. The test seems to be whether or no the execution has been partial only—that is, whether or no a partial benefit has been obtained from it ; if the execution is in that sense incomplete, the general body of creditors are entitled to have the property distributed rateably . . . It seems that if the execution creditor gets a partial benefit (here he got £40 on account) but retains anything in the nature of an incomplete execution, then he cannot retain the partial benefit which he has already received. If the respondents in the present case had accepted the £40 in full satisfraction of the debt and had not claimed a right to re-enter at some subsequent time and go on with the execution, then I think they might have retained the £40."

The judgment in Re Ford (2) proceeded on the basis that at the date of the bankruptcy the execution was incomplete, and, as I read the rest of the authorities which come within the purview of the examination made by ASTBURY, J., the same may be said of them. In Re Fairley (1) the Divisional Court only had to consider the phrase in s. 40 "an execution against goods" of the debtor, and, as regards that, ASTBURY, J., plainly expressed the view that the definition in sub-s. (2) was not an exhaustive definition, but, as I read his judgment, he does not seek to distinguish between the quality of the definition of "an execution against goods" and the quality of the definition of "an attachment of a debt" in the same sub-section. Indeed, it is a little difficult to say why one should come to the conclusion that the sub-section should be so construed as to attach a different quality to the two definitions in it. In my view, sub-s. (2) contains definitions which prima facie are not exhaustive, but are merely by way of example.

In regard to that, however, I have to consider certain of the earlier cases, particularly Butler v. Wearing (3), in which the facts were as follows :

"A creditor having obtained a garnishee order in respect of a debt due to the judgment debtor, a third person intervened claiming that the debt was due to her ; and the garnishee, under an order of the court, paid the amount into court to abide further order. A receiving order having been subsequently made against the judgment debtor, the third person withdrew her claim. Held, that there had been no 'receipt of the debt' by the creditor within the meaning of s. 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so as to entitle him to retain it against the judgment debtor's trustee in bankruptcy."

MANISTY, J., in his judgment, said (17 Q.B.D. 185) :

"As regarded garnishee orders the decisions seem to me to have been conflicting. I think that the decision in Ex parte Joselyne, Re Watt (4), is difficult to reconcile with the subsequent decision in Ex parte Pillers, Re Curtoys (5), where the Court of Appeal held that the garnishor was not entitled to the protection of s. 95 (3) of the Act of 1869 unless he had obtained actual payment of the attached debt before the order of adjudication. If it were necessary for me to decide the question, I think I should adopt the statement of the law which is given by LUSH, L.J., in that case. He says (17 Ch.D. 666) : 'The intention was that so long as the execution remained only a security for the debt, it was not to be protected. Something more must have been done ; there must have been an actual conversion of the security into money. And I think we must find some equivalent for that in the case of an attachment under a garnishee order. What is the equivalent ? The security must have been realised before there can be any protection. How can the garnishor realise the debt which he has attached ? The debt cannot be sold, and he can only realise it by obtaining payment of it from the garnishee, either voluntarily or by means of an execution upon his goods. Till that has been done I think there is no protection. It is true the words "executed by seizure and sale" have no application. But I think they do show what was the meaning of the legislature clearly enough to enable us to apply the principle, and if, for want of apt words in the section, we were to say it does not apply to a garnishee order, we should be incurring the censure which is implied in the maxim, "qui haeret in litera haeret in cortice." I am of opinion that the only equivalent for an actual sale of goods which will satisfy the words of the Act in the case of a garnishee order is an actual receipt of the attached debt by the garnishor. Till that has been done the attachment is only a security, and it is not protected by s. 95'."

- A "Now that being the view which, were it necessary, I should be prepared to adopt, I come to the consideration of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. Section 45, in effect, enacts that where a creditor has attached any debt due to him, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor unless he has completed the attachment before the date of the receiving order and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition. Sub-section (2) defines what is meant by 'completing an attachment.' For the purpose of the Act 'an attachment of a debt is completed by receipt of the debt.'
- B The question is what is meant by the words 'receipt of the debt'? Is it, as LUSH, L.J., said in Ex parte Pillers. Re Curtoys (5), an actual receipt by the garnishor, or will some kind of constructive receipt, as when the money is paid into court subject to further order, satisfy those words?"

Having dealt with the argument which had been addressed on that point, he said (ibid., 187) :

- C "The Act means what it says, that the attachment must be completed by receipt of the debt. I think that the doctrine of title by relation cannot be applied. The intention of the legislature was to get rid of all the questions which might have arisen before the Act was passed, and to put the law upon a very simple and plain foundation. A judgment creditor having attached a debt does not become entitled to retain it unless he has received the debt before the bankruptcy of the debtor. I am therefore of opinion that in this case the trustee is entitled to judgment."

It is plain that because of the facts in that case it was not necessary for the purposes of the decision of MANISTY, J., that he should hold that in no event could anything short of receipt of the money be sufficient. There the garnishee proceedings had not been completed, and on its facts the case is in pari materia with Re Ford (2) and the other cases reviewed by ASTBURY, J., in Re Fairley (1). That case, however, was treated by CAVE, J., in Re Trehearne (6), as a direct authority that there must be an actual receipt and that a constructive receipt would not do, and it appears from the examination of Ex parte Pillers, Re Curtoys (5) that the view of the Court of Appeal was that the test was not whether there had been a garnishee order absolute or not, but whether the garnishee proceedings had resulted in actual payment before the receiving order.

- F It, therefore, appears to me that although there reside in the defendant in the present case, as is frankly admitted by his counsel, no merits at all, and although the plaintiff had taken every step which lay within his power to make the attachment complete and the circumstance that at the date of the bankruptcy he was not in receipt of the money was due entirely to some breakdown in the administration of the court, I should not be justified, in view of the weight of authority, in holding that s. 40 (2) is not necessarily exhaustive in its definition and that on the question of attachment anything short of receipt of the money is sufficient to allow the garnishee to keep the fruits of his judgment. On the authorities as they stand and with the greatest reluctance I feel bound to come to the conclusion that the question in this summons will have to be answered by saying that the plaintiff had not completed the attachment of the sum in question.

TURNER v. BAKER.

Rent Restriction—"Separate dwelling"—Unfurnished tenancy—Sub-letting of one room, furnished, with use, in common with tenant, of kitchen—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 16 (1).

The tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied sub-let one room furnished and allowed the sub-tenants to share with her the use of the kitchen. In an action by the landlord for possession of the whole premises, or, alternatively, of the part let furnished, it was contended for the landlord that the house was no longer within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts as it was no longer "let as a separate dwelling" within the meaning of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16 (1).

Held: (i) the time when the landlord sought to obtain possession was the material time for determining the status of the house for the purpose of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

(ii) by reason of the agreement to share the use of the kitchen, the letting to the sub-tenants amounted to a sharing of the house (Neale v. Del Soto ([1945] 1 All E.R. 191; [1945] 1 K.B. 144; 172 L.T. 65), applied), and, in consequence, the house was no longer, either in part or in whole, "let as a separate dwelling" within the meaning of s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933, and, therefore, it was not within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and the landlord was entitled to an order for possession. Whether or not the landlord was a party to the sharing agreement, or whether that agreement was merely between the tenant and sub-tenant, was immaterial.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at Croydon County Court, and dated July 14, 1948, granting to the landlord possession of certain premises. The tenant had sub-let one room furnished and allowed the sub-tenants to share the use of the kitchen, and the learned judge held that the premises were no longer within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

Carulfield for the tenant.

Michael Hoare for the landlord.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a tenant's appeal from a judgment given by His Honour JUDGE HURST, on July 14, 1948, granting to the landlord possession, in two months, of certain premises at 22, Inwood Avenue, Old Coulsdon, Surrey. By way of preface, I wish to point out that here we are not concerned with that part of the Rent Restrictions Acts which deals with restrictions on rents during the currency of the tenancy, but solely with the restriction on the right of the landlord to obtain possession. For example, we are not concerned in the circumstances of this case with the kind of question raised by the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 2, concerning the effect of a sharing of premises on the revision of rent by a tribunal.

With regard to this question of possession, the first point to decide is : What was the status of the premises—I am designedly using a neutral word—or the relevant part of the premises when the landlord sued for possession, as he did, on June 15, 1948 ? For the first proposition Prout v. Hunter (1) is the authority. In that case the landlord had let to a tenant an unfurnished house, the tenant had let it furnished to a sub-tenant—it was common ground that the house was a dwelling-house to which the Act applied when let unfurnished—and, in relation to the questions thereby raised, BANKES, L.J., said ([1924] 2 K.B. 740) :

“The tenant, without going into occupation of it herself, furnished the flat and sublet it at a rent which included payment for the use of the furniture. The landlord, having given the tenant notice to quit, contends that inasmuch as the flat was, at the time when he gave the notice to quit and at the time when that notice expired, let as a furnished flat, the Act did not apply, and that he is therefore entitled to recover possession on the expiry of the notice. The tenant, on the other hand, contends that a house which is once within the Act is always within the Act, and that as it applied at the time of the letting to her it has not ceased to apply, and the landlord is consequently not entitled to possession.”

The learned judge then referred to the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2), proviso (i) to which deals with the question of a furnished house and is :

“ . . . this Act shall not, save as otherwise expressly provided, apply to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of . . . ”

inter alia, the use of furniture. I would observe that, as regards post-1939 tenancies, substantially the same words are enacted in s. 3 (2) (b) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. BANKES, L.J., said (ibid., 741) :

“It is argued that in s. 12 (2), the statute is dealing with the status of the house rather than with the rights of the particular party to the litigation. The Act is not to apply to a dwelling-house which is let furnished. But at what time is its status of a furnished house to be considered ? It would seem that the material time is when the landlord seeks to obtain possession. If at that time the status of the house is that of a house let as a furnished house it is immaterial that at some earlier date its status was that of an unfurnished house. In my opinion that is the true construction to put upon this difficult statute for the purpose of determining this particular question.”

I do not think it is necessary to read any passages from the other judgments, as it is quite plain that there was no dissent from that point of view, and, as I shall have occasion to show, there is other authority to the same effect.

In relation to the question what was the status of these premises on June 15, 1948, the material facts are as follows. Before Feb. 14, 1948, the premises, meaning in this connection the whole house, had been let by the landlord to the tenant's husband—and as from Jan. 6, 1948, she succeeded to his tenancy as his widow—on a weekly tenancy which admittedly brought the house within the definition of a "dwelling-house", as defined by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16 (1), as follows :

" ' Dwelling-house ' has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let."

The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, s. 7 (1), reads :

" If any question arises in any proceedings whether the principal Acts apply to a dwelling-house, it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown."

I think it is well to observe, however, that, in spite of the apparent generality of s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938, it is settled by authority, by which this court is bound, that that presumption only arises where it is first established that the premises are a "dwelling-house" as defined. That is to say, the onus of establishing that proposition rests on the tenant who asserts that there is some restriction on possession or claims the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The authority for that is Wright v. Arnold (2) and it is only necessary to read one sentence from the judgment of MORTON, L.J. Referring to s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1938, MORTON, L.J., said ([1947] K.B. 285 ; [1946] 2 All E.R. 620) :

" However, I do not think that the sub-section has such a far-reaching effect as that "

—namely, as to throw on the landlord the whole onus of proving that the premises in question were not a "dwelling-house" He continued :

" It seems to me that it can only apply where it is first established that the premises as to which the question arises are 'a dwelling-house.' That, I think, means a dwelling-house within the definition contained in the Act."

To return to the facts, on Feb. 14, 1948, the tenant sub-let a "furnished bed-sitting room, use of kitchen," at a rent of 35s. per week. The tenant's own evidence was :

" I live at 22, Inwood Avenue. Tenant of the plaintiff since Jan. 6, 1948, when my husband died. I took Setters [the sub-tenants] into the house. They had nowhere to go on marriage so I offered them to live with me. I was sorry for them. I had had no one before. I said : ' Come and live with me and share home, pay 35s. a week and so much for gas, use of bathroom and kitchen.' We have meals together and we get our own rations each."

I agree that this last sentence is only what happened ex post facto, and, therefore, is not strictly relevant in interpreting the agreement, but that is how, in fact, it worked out. The evidence continued :

" No written agreement . . . We cook together and on occasions eat together. They have the run of the place."

In March, 1948, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit expiring on Mar. 29, 1948. On June 15, 1948, in the Croydon County Court, the landlord claimed possession of the whole premises, or, in the alternative, of the part let furnished. As I have already shown, it is plainly established by Prout v. Hunter (1) that the status not only of the whole but of the part let furnished falls to be determined as at that date. The next step on that statement of the facts is to examine what the position is at common law—which I should have thought, until I heard an argument to the contrary this morning, was as clear and uncontroversial a matter as possible. Without referring to any of the authorities which were cited this morning, because they all seemed to be remarkably remote from this point, I should have thought that it was indisputable, first, that the letting of premises furnished, or, secondly, that the letting of premises whether furnished or unfurnished—coupling with the corporeal premises the right to share communal facilities with the landlord, or it may be with other tenants, or it may be with both, and whether by way of a grant of an easement or as appurtenant to the corporeal premises—was a well recognised form of letting at common law, and, consequently, that the tenant could get a declaration of his right to use, or an injunction against the withdrawal of the right to use, the facilities which were included, whether by way of easement or as appurtenances or the like.

- B By proviso (i) to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, however, a dwelling-house which is bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of the use of furniture or of attendance is excluded from the Act. I need not refer again to the corresponding section of the Act of 1939, because I think that from a passage in the evidence it is clear that this bungalow comes within the earlier Act. It is true that Prout v. Hunter (1) dealt with the status of a whole house
- C being let furnished at the material date, but Leslie & Co., Ltd. v. Cumming (3) seems to me to be important on the same point, i.e., in determining the status of the premises at the moment when the landlord obtains possession. In that case it was decided that, although the premises might, by reason of their becoming furnished premises, have lost their status within the Rent Restrictions Acts at some time after the original letting, they might, nevertheless, regain that status before the material date. ROCHE, J., after referring to Prout v. Hunter (1), said ([1926] 2 K.B. 422) :

“In that case the whole of the demised premises had been let furnished, and were in the occupation of the person who had so taken them at the date of the writ. In the present case, so far as the whole of the demised premises are concerned, they had been let furnished to [two sub-tenants] but their terms of occupation had ended long before the date of the proceedings.”

The learned judge held that that made the whole difference.

- F Barrell and Fordree (4) decided that, if the tenant sub-let part of the premises furnished, with exclusive possession of that part, the combined effect of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 and proviso (i) thereto is that the landlord can recover possession of that part as distinct from recovering possession of the whole of the premises contained in the demise. I should say, however, that the emphasis on the words “exclusive possession” of the room in question was really directed to the question whether it could be truly said that part of the premises in question was let as a “separate dwelling,” or, to use a later definition [in s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933] “part of a house being a part so let,” and was not directed
- G to the question whether, to the exclusive possession of that part, there was added the right to share other parts of the whole premises. I say that because I think it is plain from the careful collection of authorities that have been laid before us that that was a subject which at that time had not attracted much attention either in the House of Lords or in any lower court.
- H I now come to the question which was decided in Neale v. Del Soto (5), the headnote to which is as follows ([1945] K.B. 144) :

“By an oral agreement a tenant was let two unfurnished rooms in a seven-roomed house, together with the use jointly with the landlord of the garage, kitchen, bathroom, lavatory, coal-house, and conservatory. Held, that there was really a sharing of the house, each party having the exclusive use of some rooms and the two parties together having the use in common of other rooms, and was, therefore, not a letting of the two rooms as a separate dwelling within the meaning of s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920."

With regard to those facts, MORTON, L.J., said ([1945] K.B. 147; [1945] 1 All E.R. 193) :

"Were the two rooms in question in the present case a part of a house let as a separate dwelling? In my view, they were not. What was let was the two rooms together with the use, in common with the landlord, of the garage, kitchen, bathroom, lavatory, coal-house and conservatory, and it would be a misuse of language, to my mind, to say that the two rooms, and nothing more, were let as a separate dwelling. The real substance of the matter was that there was a sharing of the house. Each party had the exclusive use of some rooms and the two parties together had the use in common of other rooms."

Throughout the extract which I have just cited, I particularly emphasise the words "let as a separate dwelling."

In Llewellyn v. Hinson (6) it was decided that if, by the agreement of tenancy between the landlord and the tenant, the landlord parted with two distinct things, (i) the exclusive possession of one or more living rooms, and (ii) the user jointly with someone else of one or more other living rooms, it was immaterial whether the someone else was the landlord or another tenant, or tenants, or some other occupier. So far, the matter is clear and unambiguous, and I would only venture to say in passing that it is a matter of surprise that the point should first have arisen in 1945, although in the intervening years between 1920 and 1945 landlords did not lack vigilant and astute guardians of their interests. It is idle to speculate whether this is because landlords, their advisers, and the courts alike were so blind that the point, which was staring everyone in the face in the definition section, entirely escaped their attention, or because no one was bold enough to suggest that the quality of community extended beyond that part of the premises which was shared to that part of which exclusive possession was granted. Only the House of Lords, as regards the past, and, perhaps, Parliament, as regards the future, can solve this question. This court is clearly bound by the decision.

I must confess I am puzzled as regards subsequent development of the principle by the decisions on what are "living rooms," the sharing of which prevents the letting from being a "letting as a separate dwelling." In Llewellyn v. Hinson (6) and in Neale v. Del Soto (5), it was the kitchen, and not the bathroom or lavatory with which the kitchen was coupled, which was the living room. In Sharpe v. Nicholls (7) it was the kitchen, and, as MORTON, L.J., euphemistically observed ([1945] 2 All E.R. 59), "the rooms which are sometimes referred to as the 'usual offices'," which were said to be the living rooms. In Cole v. Harris (8) MORTON, L.J., said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 152) :

"To my mind a kitchen is fairly described as a 'living room,' and thus nobody who shares a kitchen can be said to be tenant of a part of a house let as a separate dwelling."

He gave as a reason that the kitchen was often the principal living room where the occupants spent the greater part of the day because it was the warmest part of the house. Yet the same case is authority for the proposition that the bathroom and the W.C., with the use of the garden for drying clothes which may possibly have been washed in the bathroom, are not living rooms. Yet again in Kenyon v. Walker, Stevenson v. Kenyon (9) although the bathroom and the W.C. were not held to be living rooms, the right to use a kitchen expressly for cooking purposes only—thus excluding the family user on which so much stress was laid in Cole v. Harris (8)—was held to be the sharing of a living room, and this in spite of the fact that, because friction over the cooking had arisen, the landlord had installed a separate cooker in one of the tenants' premises. Happily, it is unnecessary to resolve this puzzle, because in this case the use of the kitchen is plainly unrestricted, and is, therefore, directly covered by at least three decisions of this court.

- From that line of authorities counsel for the tenant developed a line of argument which ran as follows. (i) He said that it followed from the decision of Llewellyn v. Hinson (6) that an agreement between landlord and tenant for what I will call a "shared letting" within the decision in Neale v. Del Soto (5) did not create a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Act, and it was immaterial whether the agreed sharing was a sharing between landlord and tenant or between tenant and tenant, provided always that the landlord was a party to the agreement of sharing. (ii) If, subsequent to the tenancy agreement, the tenant, unilaterally as between himself and the landlord, created by a sub-tenancy a sharing of part of the premises between himself and the sub-tenant, that fact, while it enabled him, the tenant, to say that the premises so shared were not a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Act—and, therefore, to recover them as against the sub-tenant—did not enable the landlord so to do as against either the tenant or the sub-tenant. (iii) If the tenant created a sub-tenancy in respect of a furnished tenement, then (a) if the whole of the sub-tenancy was in the exclusive possession of the sub-tenant, the landlord could recover that part by the combined effect of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 and proviso (i) thereto and the authority of Barrell v. Fordree (4), but (b) if the sub-tenement was both furnished and shared, though the tenant could recover from the sub-tenant, the landlord could not recover against either, because proviso (i) to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 does not operate apart from sub-s. (2), the premises, by reason of the sharing, not being a dwelling-house let at a rent which includes the use of furniture. I am bound to say that this last point seemed to me to produce the curious result—at any rate, as regards the furnished part of the premises—that, whereas a sub-letting furnished enables the landlord to recover at common law either the whole premises or that part of the premises which is so sub-let, as the case may be, and whereas the sharing of a material part of the premises so that they are not "let as a separate dwelling" enables the landlord to recover at common law the whole, or part, as the case may be, so shared, the combination of these two circumstances in relation to a furnished sub-letting deprives the landlord not only of his common law rights, by some process of cancellation, but also of any other rights he may happen to have under the Rent Restrictions Acts, because these Acts have ceased to apply to the premises at all. I must say that it sounds very like a reductio ad absurdum, but it was seriously argued that the absurdity of any conclusion on these Acts is no criterion of that conclusion being wrong. The apparent absurdity, however, at least tempts one to examine the argument a little closely.
- I, therefore, go back to the first step in the argument. It is clear that in relation to a furnished sub-letting the unilateral act of the tenant as between himself and the landlord can change the status. That appears from Prout v. Hunter (1), but it also appears, taking it even more generally, from the judgment of GREER, L.J., in Haskins v. Lewis (10), the particular point in which is immaterial for my present purpose, as it was in connection with the use of part of business premises. GREER, L.J., speaking in quite general terms, said ([1931] 2 K.B. 15) :

"As I view this case it turns on these considerations. Since the decision of this court in Prout v. Hunter (1) the law is that something that the tenant has done, and with which the landlord has had nothing to do, may alter the status of the premises so as to take them out of the protection of the Acts. It seems to me that it follows from that that if the whole of the premises were let by the tenant as business premises he would have so altered the status of the premises that the Act did not apply to them. Whether by reason of another provision of the Act it would apply again to the premises if they afterwards again became a dwelling-house, it is unnecessary to decide."

I may say, in passing, that Leslie & Co. v. Cumming (3) decides that, in appropriate circumstances, premises may go in and out of the Act from time to time. GREER, L.J., continued ([1931] 2 K.B. 16) :

"At any rate the tenant in possession may alter the status of the premises so as to deprive the occupier for the time being of the benefit of the provisions of the Act with which we are dealing."

The judgments in Llewellyn v. Hinson (6) must be read, like all other judgments, in relation to the subject-matter which was being dealt with. In that case the landlord himself had, in fact, made the agreement, but there is not one word from beginning to end of the judgments which even hints at a decision that the landlord's being a party to the sharing agreement is essential in order to reverse the process of the Rent Restrictions Acts. Fundamentally, the argument is reduced to a single sentence in Kenyon v. Walker, Stevenson v. Kenyon (9). Counsel for the landlord showed that that case and that particular sentence had nothing whatever to do with the point in the present case. In Kenyon v. Walker, Stevenson v. Kenyon (9) the tenant sought to recover possession from the sub-tenant in the first of two actions on the ground that as between himself and the sub-tenant he had created, by the right to use the kitchen, a sharing agreement, and it was held that he was so entitled. Therefore, it followed that the sub-tenant's premises were not a "dwelling-house" to which the Acts applied. In the other action the landlord sought to recover as against the tenant on the ground that the tenant was alleged to be over-charging rent to the sub-tenant within the meaning of s. 4 of the Act of 1933. In the circumstances it is a little curious that the landlord entered into an alliance with the sub-tenant. It was a natural alliance in the sense that I infer, though it is not expressly stated, that both of them—through the same counsel and the same solicitor—desired to prove as against the tenant that the tenant was over-charging rent to the sub-tenant. In order to do so, however, under s. 4 of the Act of 1933, it was essential to prove that the premises were a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act to which the sharing agreement, if established, was absolutely fatal. The alliance was unnatural inasmuch as the landlord's real cause of action was, or should have been, an action for possession against both the tenant and the sub-tenant on the ground that they had entered into this sharing agreement. There is nothing whatever to show that any such case was raised. Indeed, the facts laid before the learned county court judge were inconsistent with that, and ASQUITH, L.J., who was a member of the Court of Appeal in that case, has made it plain to us that no such question was ever raised in the appeal. Accordingly, MORTON, L.J., when dealing in his judgment with Stevenson's claim, i.e., the landlord's claim against the tenant, said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 599) :

"The result is that, in my view, there was at all material times a sharing of this house between Kenyon [the tenant], on the one hand, and Mrs. Walker [the sub-tenant] and her mother, who lived with her, on the other. If that is the right view, no other point arises on either of these appeals."

The learned Lord Justice then comes to the only sentence which deals with the claim of the landlord against the tenant :

"Stevenson cannot recover possession against Kenyon because the case does not come within s. 4 of the Act of 1933 . . ."

That is because the finding in the sentence before prevented the house from being a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of the Act, so that the words in s. 4 (1) that an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply may be made or given if the court is satisfied that the rent charged for any sub-let part is excessive, could not possibly apply. MORTON, L.J., continued (ibid.):

- “ . . . and Kenyon can recover possession as against Mrs. Walker and Mrs. Springer because the arrangement they came to is not protected by the Rent Restrictions Act. Thus, the judge was right in refusing possession to Stevenson and granting it to Kenyon, and this appeal fails.”
- A That has nothing whatever to do with this case, and, once it is understood that there is no authority to the contrary, and that the whole of this case, built round that one sentence in Stevenson v. Kenyon (9) collapses, the way is open to the simple proposition that the grant of a right to share a house in which the grantor has the sole interest diminishes the grantor's interest to the extent of the grant, and, if the thing shared is of such a nature as to prevent the part of the premises in respect of which the right is granted from being “let as a separate dwelling” in the hands of the grantee, the corresponding diminution of the rights retained by the grantor must inevitably have the same result in respect of any part of the premises affected thereby. Moreover, this result has at least the merit of making sense instead of nonsense of the authorities. After all, the landlord's reversion, as such, remains unaffected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. All that the Rent Acts do is to impose restrictions on his immediate enjoyment of it. So, although the restrictions are less harsh to the landlord, does the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943. The point as regards a furnished sub-let is contained in every Rent Restrictions Act from 1920 onwards. The point as regards a sharing agreement was settled, certainly, as regards the use of a kitchen in 1945, and this agreement was made in February, 1948. What ground of complaint has the tenant, if, of her own volition, she makes arrangements which divest both herself and her tenancy of the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and so reduce the restrictions imposed on the landlord to those appropriate to an ordinary ejection action? That, and nothing else, is precisely the effect of the learned judge's judgment in this case. In my opinion, this appeal fails.

- ASQUITH, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. It has taken a long and complex argument to reach the real point to which the case narrowed down. That point is whether at the material time this house was let as a separate dwelling, and, therefore, protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts from orders for possession, notwithstanding that at that time part of the house was the subject-matter of what is familiar in these courts as a “sharing agreement” between the tenant and the sub-tenant. For the reasons given by my Lord, I agree that the answer to that question is “No,” and that it is immaterial whether the landlord was a party to or privy to the sharing agreement or whether that agreement was purely a matter between the tenant and sub-tenant. In either case, it is not possible to say that at the material time this house was let as a separate dwelling, because part of it was not separately let. Accordingly, neither in part nor in whole is the house protected, and the order for possession should be affirmed.

- VAISEY, J.: I agree in the result arrived at by my Lords, and I entirely agree with the reasons enunciated by them. If I were to add some reasons of my own, I might easily, by inadvertence, add to the already existing complexity of the reported decisions without serving any useful purpose. I, therefore, content myself with saying that the judgment of the learned county court judge in this case was, in my view, correct, and I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re BETTS (deceased). BURRELL v. BETTS AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), February 10, 11, 1949.]

Will—"Goodwill of my business and stock and plant"—Inclusion of freehold premises—"Debts due to me in respect of said business"—Sum standing to credit of banking account.

The testator, by his will dated Nov. 17, 1944, appointed his wife and the plaintiff executors and trustees of the will, and, after giving some pecuniary legacies, made the following bequest: "I bequeath to my wife the said H.J.B. and my brother J.H.B. in equal shares . . . the goodwill of my business . . . together with the stock utensils in trade vehicles and plant connected therewith [and] the debts due to me in respect of the said business . . ." At the death of the testator on Mar. 10, 1945, he was possessed of, inter alia, (a) a freehold property used by the testator for the purpose of his business and for residential purposes; and (b) £1,286 standing to the credit of his business account at the bank.

HELD: (i) in the absence of strong indication to the contrary in the will itself, a gift of an incorporeal asset such as goodwill, coupled with the gift of a number of corporeal assets, could not be construed so as to include freehold premises, and, therefore, the property did not pass.

(ii) the sum standing to the credit of the testator's business account at his death, was not a debt due in respect of the said business, the reference to "debts" in the will being primarily to trade debtors.

[AS TO WHAT IS INCLUDED IN A BEQUEST OF A TESTATOR'S "BUSINESS," see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 246, 247, para. 298; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 692-694, Nos. 5333-5350.]

Case referred to:

(1) Blake v. Shaw, (1860), John. 732; 2 L.T. 84; 44 Digest 693, 5346.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, in the administration of the estate of the testator, the property bequeathed to the testator's wife and brother in equal shares, included the whole or part of the following, inter alia: (a) The freehold property known as Goldlay House, Baddow Road, Chelmsford, in the county of Essex, in which the testator was at his death carrying on the business of yeast merchant and bakers' sundriesman; (b) The sum of £1,286 11s. 9d. being the amount which at the date of the death of the testator was standing to the credit of the business account (designated "Stephen Betts") of the testator at the Chelmsford branch of the Westminster Bank, Ltd.

By cl. 3 of his will dated Nov. 17, 1944, the testator bequeathed "to my wife the said Harriett Jessie Betts and my brother John Henry Betts in equal shares and free from all death duties the goodwill of my business of yeast merchant and bakers' sundriesman together with the stock utensils in trade vehicles and plant connected therewith the debts due to me in respect of the said business and the sum of one thousand pounds." ROXBURGH, J., held that neither the property nor the bank balance passed under the bequest.

Baden Fuller for the plaintiff, one of the executors of the will.

R. L. Stone for the first defendant, H.J.B., widow, and one of the executors.

Hillaby for the second defendant, J.H.B., brother of the testator.

L. R. Norris for the remaining defendants, nephews and nieces of the testator.

ROXBURGH, J.: The testator, Stephen Betts, by his will dated Nov. 17, 1944, after appointing his wife, the defendant, Harriett Jessie Betts, and the plaintiff, Frederick George Burrell, executors and trustees thereof and giving some pecuniary legacies, by cl. 3 made the following bequest:

"I bequeath to my wife the said Harriett Jessie Betts and my brother John Henry Betts in equal shares and free from all death duties the goodwill of my business of yeast merchant and bakers' sundriesman together with the stock utensils in trade vehicles and plant connected therewith the debts due to me in respect of the said business and the sum of £1,000."

- A At the date of his death on Mar. 10, 1945, the testator was entitled to a freehold property known as Goldlay House, Baddow Road, Chelmsford. The evidence shows that the top floor of the house had been converted into a self-contained flat in which the testator had lived with his wife, while the remainder was used for business purposes, having been specially adapted for such purposes and possessing proper outbuildings for garaging the vehicles and for storing heavy stock and refrigerators. Plans had been made for making alterations and building another warehouse.

- B The first question I have to decide is whether the bequest in cl. 3 included this property. In the light of what was said in Blake v. Shaw (1), I think that a strong context would have to be found in the will before it could be held that a gift of an incorporeal asset such as goodwill, coupled with the gift of a number of corporeal assets, could be construed so as to include freehold premises. There being no such context here, the freehold did not pass under the bequest.

- C The next matter which I have to decide is whether or not the bequest includes the sum of £1,286 11s. 9d., being the amount which at the date of the death of the testator was standing to the credit of the business account (designated 'Stephen Betts') of the testator at the Chelmsford branch of the Westminster Bank, Ltd., the question being, in particular, whether it falls within the words of the bequest "the debts due to me in respect of the said business." The evidence about the account is this :

- E "The testator kept his accounts at the Chelmsford branch of the Westminster Bank, Ltd. The one which he used for the purpose of his business was entitled 'Stephen Betts', the other which he used for his private and domestic purposes was entitled 'Stephen Betts Private Account' and cheques were drawn on such accounts accordingly. At the date of his death, the amount standing to the credit of his business account was £1,286 11s. 9d., and this item is shown on the balance sheet for Mar. 10, 1945. No items passed by the testator through his account, 'Stephen Betts Private Account,' are dealt with in the said accounts exhibited hereto, and, so far as I am aware, such account was never referred by the testator to a professional accountant."

- F I pause to observe that it is nowhere said that no money ever went into this business account which was not directly derived from the business. I have been asked to draw that inference, but I do not see any reason for doing so. In my judgment, and I am told there is no authority on this point, it is not possible to say that the sum standing to the credit of this account at the death of the testator was "a debt due to me in respect of the said business." I think that reference is intended to be primarily to trade debtors.

WOLFE v. HOGAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Evershed and Denning, L.JJ.), February 17, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—" Dwelling "—Contemplated user—Premises let for business purposes—Tenant living on premises—No knowledge by landlord—Costs—County Court or High Court scale—Proceedings arising out of Rent Acts—Decision that Rent Acts did not apply—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (2), s. 17 (2).

In 1939 the tenant negotiated with N., the lessee of premises, to take, as N.'s sub-tenant, a sub-tenancy of one large room in the premises divided into two by folding doors and one small room. The main room was a shop and the tenant intended to carry on business there, but there was no express covenant by the tenant that she would not use the premises as a dwelling-house. During the period of air-raids in the vicinity during the war N. assented to the tenant's sleeping in the demised rooms. In 1942 the freeholders sold the premises and N.'s lease terminated, but by implication the existing position as regards the tenant was continued by the new landlord, and the tenant continued to live on the premises and also to conduct her business there. It was not proved that either N. or the new landlord knew that the premises were being regularly used as a dwelling. In an action by the landlord for possession of the rooms let to the tenant :

HELD : according to the terms of the letting, the user of the rooms contemplated was as a shop, and, in the absence of proof that the landlord knew that the tenant was using the rooms as a dwelling-house and agreed to that user, the contemplated user, and not the actual user of the premises, was the essential factor, and, therefore, the demised rooms were let as a shop and not " let as a separate dwelling " within s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and the landlord was entitled to possession.

Dictum of SALTER, J., in Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B. 722 ; 134 L.T. 22), disapproved, and dictum of BANKES, L.J., in Epsom Grand Stand Association, Ltd. v. Clarke ([1919] W.N. 171), criticised.

Per DENNING, L.J. : A house or part of a house originally let for business purposes does not become let for dwelling purposes by the acceptance of rent after a change of user unless it can be inferred from the acceptance of rent that the landlord has affirmatively consented to the change of user.

On the question of costs, held, as the tenant had failed to establish that the premises were a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts, s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920, which applied only to proceedings in respect of a dwelling-house to which the Acts applied, was inapplicable, and costs were, therefore, not limited to the county court scale.

APPEAL by the tenant from a judgment of STABLE, J., dated Oct. 27, 1948, granting to the landlord an order for possession of rooms forming part of premises known as No. 15, Anderson Street, Chelsea. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of EVERSLED, L.J.

- B S. Magnus for the tenant.
L. R. Miller for the landlord.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I will ask EVERSLED, L.J., to give the first judgment.

- C EVERSLED, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of STABLE, J., relating to certain premises at 15, Anderson Street, Chelsea. The action is for possession, the plaintiff being the freehold owner of the house No. 15, Anderson Street, and the defendant, Miss Hogan, being the tenant of certain rooms on the ground floor. The substantial, and, indeed, the only, point in the appeal is whether the tenant can successfully resist an order for possession of the rooms by relying on the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. That she seeks to do by asserting that these rooms are, within the familiar language of s. 12 (2) of that Act, "let as a separate dwelling." The whole point turns on whether, on the facts of the case as found by the judge, the tenant can establish that proposition.

- No. 15, Anderson Street, Chelsea, as an entity, is, undoubtedly, what one would describe as an ordinary house. The tenant's connection with it arose in August, 1939, when she negotiated with one Noller, then the lessee of the whole of the premises, and, as a result, became a sub-tenant of Noller of the rooms in question. It is important to observe exactly what was the subject-matter of that sub-tenancy. It consisted of what was, structurally, one large room divided into two by means of folding doors. Behind that—i.e., farther from the street—there was another room. It has been described by many names, including "a kind of out shed," but I gather that it is a brick built edifice of very small dimensions, an appendage attached to the main subject of the demise, namely, the room divided, as I have said, by folding doors. The learned judge, in his judgment, said:
- E
- F

- "I believe Mr. Noller when he tells me that Miss Hogan approached him and asked him if he would let her the shop."
- G

- I pause there to observe that that main room, divided as I have stated, was physically a shop in the sense that it contained a considerable number of articles of furniture and what is called "junk," in which Mr. Noller himself was a dealer elsewhere. It is plain that the tenant's main idea was to carry on a business as an antique or "junk" dealer in this shop. The learned judge continued:
- H

"I am satisfied that there was no express covenant by Miss Hogan that she would not use the premises as a dwelling-house. I do not think that that matter was expressly and specifically mentioned, but I am satisfied that the whole of the negotiations proceeded on the footing that what Miss Hogan was taking was this composite room to use it as an antique shop. I accept Mr. Noller's evidence that she told him that she was living at a flat near by, and I am satisfied that if Miss Hogan had told Mr. Noller that she contemplated . . . using these premises as a dwelling, he would have refused to let her the premises."

The reason for that appears from the next paragraph :

"Mr Noller explained to me that there was no water laid on to the room, and there was no sanitary convenience whatever, but he was able to arrange with the tenants of the flat or maisonette immediately above this room that Miss Hogan could have the use of their lavatory and bath-room, which was on a half-way floor."

The privilege of using this bathroom and lavatory was a privilege merely, arranged by Mr. Noller, and, qua tenant, the tenant had a right only to the subject of the demise, namely, the composite room and the small room behind. The result is that we must approach this case as though there was here a contract in express terms for the letting by Mr. Noller to the tenant of premises described as a shop, but without any express covenant or prohibition in regard to the manner of user. To conclude the facts, when London was being exposed to the so-called "blitz," the tenant asked Mr. Noller whether he would have any objection to her sleeping on the premises, and he, feeling, that she might be in a difficulty in going home in the air raids, assented to that request. In 1942, the superior landlords, the owners of the freehold, parted with the freehold to the plaintiff, and the lease to Noller came to an end. Strictly as a matter of law, the sub-tenancy died with it, but in practice the existing position was continued by necessary implication between the freehold owner and the tenant. The freehold owner, who is now the landlord, beyond doubt has accepted Miss Hogan as a tenant, and the tenant must be treated as having continued as tenant of the landlord on the terms of the original contract of letting.

Beyond doubt the tenant has, for some time at any rate, lived, in the ordinary acceptance of that word, on these premises as well as conducting her business there. It is suggested that that fact was well known at all material times not only to Mr. Noller, but to the present landlord. If the facts were that the landlord of Miss Hogan, with full knowledge of what she was doing, had continued to accept her as a tenant, prima facie it would be impossible for him to deny that there had come into existence a letting of a dwelling-house, but, in my view, that does not arise. I cannot find any sufficient ground for saying that there was here proved such full knowledge of what the tenant was doing as would have justified the court in saying that there must be treated as having come into existence a letting as a dwelling-house by the assent, actual or implied, of the two parties to the letting.

That being so, the question at issue has narrowed itself down to a point not free from difficulty and interest. The learned judge treated the contract as being merely a letting of premises described as a shop and came to the conclusion that there should be implied in the contract a covenant against user otherwise than as a shop. I confess I find difficulty in accepting the view that one should, in a case of this kind, imply a restrictive covenant of that nature. No doubt these lettings are very informal and it is legitimate to try to extract from the simple and informal transaction what the real intention was, but I think it would need more than we have here to justify a conclusion that there was an implied covenant of which the tenant could be said to be in breach. On the other hand, from the terms of the contract, as I have stated it, it seems to me plain that, at the time of the letting, the user contemplated by the language that was employed was a user as a shop and not as a dwelling-house. That was the user, in fact, contemplated by the landlord, and (whatever may have been hidden in the tenant's mind) it was the user which, from the language used, the landlord might fairly assume was contemplated also by the tenant.

I turn to the terms of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 : " This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling." " Let as a separate dwelling " must refer to the subject of a contract of letting as a separate dwelling. If it is to be shown that premises come within that definition, prima facie, at any rate, as it seems to me, it must be shown that the two parties to the contract have let, on the one hand, and taken, on the other hand, the premises in question as a separate dwelling. That may be shown either by the terms of the bargain or, where one party has altered the user with the full knowledge of the other, by that other party accepting the changed position, so that there must again be implied a mutual consensus of the two parties to the contract in regard to the use. The vital fact here is that, though the tenant has used these premises for some time as a dwelling, the other party to the contract has had no full knowledge of that fact and for his part has not intended or contemplated any such user.

That, however, is not an end of the matter, because the argument of counsel for the tenant is that there is here no implied covenant—and I assume that part of his argument as I have said in his favour—and that, therefore, he is entitled to base himself on the decision in Gidden v. Mills (1). He says that the right statement of the relevant law is that if by the terms of the lease itself there is no prohibition against user as a dwelling-house, then the question : Are these premises let as a dwelling ? must be answered by reference to the fact of user at the time when the proceedings are taken, although that user may be quite unknown to the other party to the contract. Gidden v. Mills (1) came before SALTER and GREER, J.J., sitting as a Divisional Court. The subject-matter there in question was described in the relevant lease as follows : " All that piece of ground . . . with the coachhouse and stable erected thereon which said described premises are now known as No. 6 Galen Place, Bloomsbury." Then there followed certain restrictive covenants. One was that no sale by auction should take place on the premises, and there was a fairly elaborate covenant against users of a particular kind as " for a madhouse, billiard room, or public concert, music or ballroom, shooting gallery, or as or for a brothel, or as or for a foundry, hospital, infirmary," and there are set out various other types of use and occupation which were barred. That, undoubtedly, left it free for the tenant to use the premises in any other way he liked, and he was given a very large realm of choice. I further observe that there was no letting for a purpose which was in terms contemplated at the time. At the relevant date, namely, when the action came to be tried, the premises were used in part as a garage and in part as a dwelling for the tenant's chauffeur, and the question was whether they were within the Act at all. The actual decision is unimportant for the present case, but the passage on which SALTER, J., founded himself has been greatly relied on by counsel for the tenant and I must read it. SALTER, J., said ([1925] 2 K.B. 722) :

" Where premises are let to a tenant on such terms that he is free to use them as a dwelling-house, or not, as he pleases, it is impossible to say from the terms of the tenancy whether the premises are ' let as a dwelling,' or not. In such a case regard must be had to the user which is being made of the premises by the tenant or sub-tenant then in occupation at the time when possession is sought to be obtained. If they are being used as a dwelling they are ' let as a dwelling,' and no order in ejectment can be made except in circumstances which do not exist here. It must, I think, be added by way of qualification that the user as a dwelling must not be a breach of any contract on which the plaintiff in ejectment is entitled to rely. A tenant cannot deprive his landlord of his common law rights by breaking the contract of tenancy."

Counsel submits that that passage means that, unless there is a prohibition as to user, the user in fact at the material time is the decisive thing.

I have come to the conclusion that that is not a complete statement of the law. We have been referred to several cases, but I do not find any other case which throws any greater light on the present point than the one I have read, save certain observations by BANKES, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., which are set out by the editors of LAW NOTES in RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST RESTRICTIONS, 21st edn., and I think it may be convenient if I read a short passage from that book. On p. 109 the authors cite this observation from the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Barrett v. Hardy Brothers (Alnwick), Ltd. (2) ([1925] 2 K.B. 227):

"The important matter is the rights under the lease, not the de facto user."

Then comes a quotation from the judgment of BANKES, L.J., in Epsom Grand Stand Assocn., Ltd. v. Clarke (3) ([1919] W.N. 171):

"If an agreement were to let premises as a barn, the tenant, even though he lived there, could not be heard to say that they were let as a dwelling-house."

On p. 110 the learned editors refer to Gidden v. Mills (1), and they seem to indicate some doubt whether the principle as stated by GREER, J. (by which I think is meant the same one as counsel for the tenant has cited from SALTER, J.'s judgment) is now accepted as correct, and they indicate a preference, as I follow it, for the statement of BANKES, L.J. Observations of that kind must always be read in the light of the particular cases then before the judges. I hope I shall not be thought guilty of any disrespect to BANKES, L.J., if I observe that the statement quoted from his judgment would seem to be incomplete in so far as there is no mention of the bearing of the question whether the user by the tenant is one which is or is not known to or accepted by the landlord. I think that the matter is more accurately stated by Mr. MEGARRY in his book on the RENT ACTS, 4th edn., and adopt as part of my judgment the brief summary of the position which I find on p. 19 of the book:

"Where the terms of the tenancy provide for or contemplate the use of the premises for some particular purpose, that purpose is the essential factor, not the nature of the premises or the actual use made of them. Thus, if the premises are let for business purposes, the tenant cannot claim that they have been converted into a dwelling-house merely because somebody lives on the premises."

Then he refers to the two passages from the judgments of SCRUTTON, L.J., and BANKES, L.J., and says (ibid., 20):

"If, however, the tenancy agreement contemplates no specified use, then the actual use at the time when possession is sought by the landlord must be considered."

Various instances are given. I may add that in such a case, the lease being quite silent, plainly one cannot get any help from the terms of the lease whether the premises were or were not let as a dwelling, and one has to find the answer to the question by reference to the facts as they have occurred.

Again I wish to make it quite plain that I am saying nothing which should be taken as indicating that, if a tenant does change the user and creates a dwelling-house out of what was formerly a shop, and if that fact is fully known to and accepted by the other party to the contract (whether or not there is a prohibition), the result may not very well be that there will then be inferred a contract to let as a dwelling-house, although it may be a different contract in essentials from the contract which was originally made and expressed. As I have already said, that does not arise here. What does arise here is plainly a contemplation, according to the terms of the letting, of user as a shop. Nothing has since occurred which has altered that position in fact, and, in my judgment, the result is that, as the learned judge concluded, though, perhaps, on somewhat different grounds, the tenant has failed to establish her case that the premises come within the protection of the Rent Acts. There is no English case, so far as we know, which is a direct authority where there is a mere "contemplation" inferred from the term of a lease as opposed to an express prohibition, but Mr. MEGARRY cites the decision of Sheriff C. H. BROWN, K.C., and Sheriff-Substitute ORR, K.C., in Scotland in Alexander v. Adams (4). I think it may possibly be said that the sheriff-substitute construed the terms of the letting (which were simply that the landlord let a particular shop, so described, to the tenant) as containing something like a prohibition against any other user, but I do not think that the sheriff on appeal did found himself on any finding of an implied prohibition. Therefore, I agree with the decision of the sheriff, which I think is in conformity with the intention of the Act and the meaning of the relevant sub-section. For these reasons, I think that this appeal fails.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give his judgment next.

DENNING, L.J. : In determining whether a house or part of a house is "let as a dwelling" within the meaning of the Rent Acts, it is necessary to look at the purpose of the letting. If the lease contains an express provision as to the purpose of the letting, it is not necessary to look further, but, if there is no express provision, it is open to the court to look at the circumstances of the letting. If the house is constructed for use as a dwelling-house, it is reasonable to infer that the purpose was to let it as a dwelling, but if, on the other hand, it is constructed for use as a lock-up shop, the reasonable inference is that it was let for business purposes. If the position were neutral, it would be proper to look at the actual user. It is not a question of implied terms. It is a question of the purpose for which the premises were let.

These premises were let in 1939 by the head lessee to the tenant, and, on the facts, there was ample material on which the judge could find that the purpose of the letting was for use as a shop. At the beginning of the tenancy, therefore, the premises were not within the Act.

The point that has arisen in the course of the argument is : What is the effect of the tenant changing the use she made of the premises ? She changed it from use for business purposes into use for partly business and partly dwelling purposes. During the air raids in 1940 she started to sleep on the premises and she has continued to sleep there and use a part for dwelling purposes. When the notice to quit was given in 1947, she was for all practical purposes permanently residing in the back part of the room. What is the effect of that ? In my opinion, it does not give the tenant the protection of the Act. A house or a part of a house originally let for business purposes does not become let for dwelling purposes unless it can be inferred from the acceptance of rent or otherwise that the landlord has affirmatively consented to the change of user.

Let me illustrate that from the common law doctrine as to waiver of forfeiture. A breach of covenant not to use premises in a particular way is a continuing breach. Any acceptance of rent by the landlord after knowledge only waives the breaches up to the time of the acceptance of rent. It does not waive the continuance of the breach thereafter and, notwithstanding his previous acceptance of rent, the landlord can still proceed for forfeiture on that account. Indeed, in the case of a continuing breach the acceptance of rent after knowledge is only a bar to a claim for forfeiture if it goes on for so long or is accepted in such circumstances that it can be inferred that the landlord has not merely waived the breach but has also affirmatively consented to the tenant continuing to use the premises as he has done : see notes to Dumpro's case (5) in SMITH'S LEADING CASES, 12th ed., vol. 1, pp. 48 and 49.

A breach of covenant not to sublet, however, is not a continuing breach, at all events so long as the under-lease cannot be determined. It is a single breach which can be waived by acceptance of rent with knowledge. Accordingly, it has been held that, if a contractual tenant sublets without consent in breach of covenant, it may become a lawful subletting by acceptance of rent with knowledge : see Norman v. Simpson (6) and Watson v. Saunders-Roe, Ltd. (7) ; but I would point out that in the later case of Oak Property Co. v. Chapman (8), where a statutory tenant sublet without consent, this court held that the mere acceptance of rent after knowledge was not by itself sufficient and said that there must be conduct by the landlord equivalent to a consent by him to the continuance of the state of affairs created by the tenant in order that the subletting should become a lawful subletting. By parity of reasoning in this case, the mere acceptance of rent by the landlord, although it went on for some time—indeed, for four or five years—was not itself any assent to the change of user. From the very earliest times in 1942 there were letters of protest which clearly negatived any assent. The acceptance of rent has no effect in a case of this kind so as to alter the premises into controlled premises unless it can properly be inferred that the landlord has assented to the change of user and to the premises becoming let in whole or in part as a dwelling-house. That cannot be inferred here. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I also agree.

Counsel for the tenant then contended that, as the main question raised by the defence rested on the Rent Restrictions Acts, the proceedings should have been remitted to the county court, and, therefore, the landlord was not entitled to recover costs in the High Court. He relied on s. 17 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and various cases, in support of this contention.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : In my judgment, the learned judge was quite right in the conclusion that he came to, that s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920 did not apply to this case. In my opinion, for s. 17 (2) to apply it must be established that the proceedings are in respect of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts apply. The tenant here has failed to establish that these premises were a dwelling-house. ATKIN, L.J., in Russoff v. Lipovitch (9) said on the point as to how far s. 17 (2) does apply ([1925] 1 K.B. 640) :

“The result appears to me to be that the legislature intentionally increased the jurisdiction of the county court so as to allow of its dealing with all questions relating to the recovery of possession of houses to which the Rent Restrictions Act applies.”

This was not a question relating to the recovery of the possession of a house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied. It related to the recovery of the possession of a shop. For these reasons, I think the learned judge was right.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I agree.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re WELLSTED'S WILL TRUSTS. WELLSTED v. HANSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Cohen, L.J.J.), February 15, 16, 17, 1949.]

Trustee—Trustee for sale—Sale of realty—Power to apply proceeds in purchase of realty—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 28 (1) (as amended by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926 (c. 11), s. 7 and sched.)—Settled Land Act, 1925 (c. 18), s. 73 (1).

The Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 28 (1), as amended by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, s. 7 and sched., provides: "Trustees for sale shall, in relation to land or to manorial incidents and to the proceeds of sale, have all the powers of a tenant for life and the trustees of a settlement under the Settled Land Act, 1925, including in relation to the land the powers of management conferred by that Act during a minority: and where by statute settled land is or becomes vested in the trustees of the settlement upon the statutory trusts, such trustees and their successors in office shall also have all the additional or larger powers (if any) conferred by the settlement on the tenant for life, statutory owner, or trustees of the settlement, and (subject to any express trust to the contrary) all capital money arising under the said powers shall, unless paid or applied for any purpose authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925, be applicable in the same manner as if the money represented proceeds of sale arising under the trust for sale. All land acquired under this subsection shall be conveyed to the trustees on trust for sale."

By his will, dated Aug. 18, 1915, a testator, who died on Dec. 9, 1920, gave his residuary estate to trustees on trust for sale and conversion, with power to postpone such sale and conversion, and out of the proceeds thereof to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts and certain legacies. He directed that the residue should be invested, with power to his trustees to vary such investments, and that his trustees should stand possessed of the said residue and the investments for the time being representing the same on certain trusts for his widow and issue. At the date of his death, the testator's residuary estate included real property to the value of £91,000. From time to time, both before and after Jan. 1, 1926, part of the realty was sold and the proceeds invested in trustee securities. The trustees also had in hand at the date of this summons money being proceeds of the sale of realty awaiting investment. It was proposed to sell further realty, to realise some of the securities representing the proceeds of sale of realty, and to apply those sums, together with the money in hand, in the purchase of realty.

Held: (i) the powers given by s. 28 (1) included all the powers of application conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73, both as to investment and as to administration, and the trustees were, therefore, permitted to acquire land as an investment.

(ii) proceeds of sale of the trust realty remained "proceeds of sale" within the meaning of s. 28 (1) so long as they could be traced.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of VAISEY, J., dated June 14, 1948, reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 209, declaring that the trustees for sale under the testator's will had no power to apply in the purchase of realty the proceeds of the sale of land constituting the trust property. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., and in the headnote.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : This appeal raises some interesting questions as to the powers of trustees under trusts of land settled in trust for sale. Those questions depend for their solution on the true construction and effect of s. 28 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, a section which, notoriously, has given rise to considerable doubts and difficulties.

The plaintiffs are the trustees of the will of the testator, William Henry Wellsted, under which certain land was settled in trust for sale. The will contained no investment clause. The trustees have in their hands certain moneys, and they expect to have certain other moneys in the future. Those moneys were in part derived from sales of portions of the land, and one sum was derived from a receipt under the War Damage Act, 1943. The trustees also have certain investments representing the earlier proceeds of sale of other parts of the land.

The questions for our decision fall under two heads. The question of the war damage receipt is not raised in this court, because it is conceded that the language of the section with which we have to deal is not wide enough to cover that receipt, but we have to deal with the actual money which the trustees have in hand, and that would cover any other sums which they might receive on some future sale of other parts of the land. We have also to consider the investments which they hold. The trustees are anxious, at the wish of the tenant for life, to invest money in the purchase of land, and the question is whether they can do it, either so far as concerns the actual cash which they hold or as regards the proceeds of the investments which they might sell for the purpose? As the question of this power of investment in land concerned those interested in capital, VAISEY, J., required the addition as a defendant of the infant defendant to represent capital and in order that the argument against conceding these powers to the trustees might be presented to the court. VAISEY, J., held that neither of those two classes of property, the cash in hand or the proceeds of investments, were applicable in the purchase of land by way of investment.

The Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 28, is derived from the Law of Property Act, 1922, sched. IV. Under the previous legislation land held on trust for sale was dealt with in the Settled Land Acts, and, speaking broadly, to a certain extent and for certain purposes the statutory provisions relating to land held otherwise than on trust for sale were made applicable to land held on trust for sale. Broadly speaking, the way in which that was done was that land held on trust for sale was deemed to be settled land, but the powers in relation to it on that basis were subject to special provisions. In the Law of Property Act, 1922, a new departure was made in relation to land held on trust for sale. It was no longer by definition made settled land for the purpose of the Settled Land Acts. The method adopted was to confer on the trustees for sale certain powers under the Settled Land Acts. The Law of Property Act, 1925, was a consolidating Act, and it dealt with those provisions of the Act of 1922 which were conceived as ordinary property or conveyancing matters. The matters in the Act of 1922 which were properly thought of as settled land matters were embodied in the consolidating Settled Land Act, 1925, but the provision in sched. IV, to the Act of 1922, to which I have referred, was brought in to s. 28 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, with an addition introduced by the Law of Property Act, 1924. One subsequent addition was made, to which I will refer.

Two observations appear to me to have some relevance to the question which we have to decide. First, the matter of land held on trust for sale is, so to speak, lifted out altogether from the settled land legislation and inserted in the property legislation. In this property legislation it is dealt with in s. 28 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and, by reference, certain Settled Land Act powers and provisions are imported into the section. Secondly, under the old scheme, while land held on trust for sale was treated as an integral part of the settled land legislation, there was an express provision in the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 63, forbidding the investment of capital moneys in land. Such an investment was permissible in cases which fell strictly under the Settled Land Acts when the statutory powers had been exercised and capital moneys arose from sale, or whatever it might be, and under the Settled Land Act, 1882, itself those moneys could be invested in land, but where moneys arose under a trust for sale there was an express prohibition against any such investment. Under the new scheme no such express prohibition appears. It is said that that is to be explained by the fact that the whole scheme is now different from that under the old legislation. It is true that the scheme is different, but, nevertheless, I should have thought that, in view of the language used in s. 28 of the Act of 1925—language which is, to say the least of it, ambiguous whether or not the power to invest in land is imported—Parliament, having before it the old prohibition against investment in land contained in the scheme which it was re-placing by this new scheme, would, if it had intended that prohibition to persist in the new scheme, have said so in terms. That is only, so to speak, a prima facie view, and could not in any way override the language of the Act if on its true construction such an investment is prohibited, but it is a circumstance which is not to be entirely disregarded, although the weight to be given to it is of a limited nature.

Section 28 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, provides :

“Trustees for sale shall, in relation to land or to manorial incidents and to the proceeds of sale, have all the powers of a tenant for life and the trustees of a settlement under the Settled Land Act, 1925 . . .”

There are one or two things to notice about that. First, the trustees are to have the powers in relation to three subject-matters—(i) land, (ii) introduced by the alternative “or” is manorial incidents, and (iii) introduced by the word “and” is proceeds of sale. It is clear, and I think it is common ground, that the phrase “the proceeds of sale” in that context means the proceeds of a sale for which the trustees are trustees for sale. In other words, if the trustees in the exercise of the trust for sale receive certain proceeds, those proceeds are to be the subject-matter of the powers in question. At this stage I must refer to one argument, because I do not accept it. It is said that the opening words of s. 28 (1) must be construed as meaning that trustees for sale are to have, in relation to land and also “in relation to land with regard to the proceeds,” the powers set out. That would limit the powers to powers in respect of what I may call the administration of land, and not extend them to the application of the proceeds at large. That is a construction which I do not find myself able to accept. It involves writing into the sub-section words which are not there. The words, so far as they affect the proceeds of sale, are as follows : “Trustees for sale shall, in relation . . . to the proceeds of sale, have all the powers of a tenant for life,” and I cannot paraphrase that by saying that when the section says “the proceeds of sale” it really means the proceeds of sale in some limited relationship or to some limited extent. It appears to me that the phrase is quite unqualified. It is to be observed that the powers given are “all the powers of a tenant for life.” I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that the word "all" in a statute is extremely recalcitrant, and if the meaning is to be cut down so as to exclude certain things which might otherwise be included by it, that must be done in the clearest possible language. The proper way of construing a word like "all" is to say that it means "all" and does not mean "some" unless one finds a compelling context which forces one to place some limitation on the word. It is important that I should mention at this stage that what the trustees are to have under the section is "all the powers of a tenant for life and the trustees of a settlement." Emphasis in the argument is laid on the word "powers," and it is pointed out that there is a well-known distinction which every lawyer will recognise between a power and a trust.

Proceeding with the section, the next sentence is :

" . . . including in relation to the land the powers of management conferred by that Act during a minority . . . "

It was suggested, but not with much force, that the presence of an express reference to that threw some light on the intention of the earlier words and indicated that they did not confer the power to invest in land. I do not find in those words any particular guidance which need delay me. Then there comes this passage, which was inserted by amendment by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, s. 7 and sched. :

" . . . and where by statute settled land is or becomes vested in the trustees of the settlement upon the statutory trusts, such trustees and their successors in office shall also have all the additional or larger powers (if any) conferred by the settlement on the tenant for life, statutory owner, or trustees of the settlement."

It is right, I think, in construing the section, to remember that that was put in by amendment, and that in the section in its original form the words ran straight on into the following phrase :

" . . . and (subject to any express trust to the contrary) all capital money arising under the said powers shall, unless paid or applied for any purpose authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925, be applicable in the same manner as if the money represented proceeds of sale arising under the trust for sale."

I call attention to the insertion of that paragraph by way of amendment for the reason that when the following words refer to "capital money arising under the said powers," the phrase "the said powers" must relate back to the powers—I call them the Settled Land Act powers—which were conferred on the trustees by the opening words of the sub-section. That is not disputed. The reference, therefore, to "capital money" relates to capital money arising when the said powers are exercised, and a distinction is drawn—obviously, to my mind—between the proceeds of sale mentioned at the beginning of the section, which clearly refer to proceeds of the trust for sale, on the one hand, and the capital moneys arising under the imported Settled Land Act powers, on the other hand. Obviously Parliament realised that the trustees, having regard to the grant of those Settled Land Act powers, might have in their hands moneys of a capital nature which would not fall within the description of "proceeds of sale," because they would have arisen, not by an exercise of the trust for sale, but by an exercise of one of the Settled Land Act powers, and it seems to me that the object of those words was to enable such moneys to be dealt with.

The next sentence in the sub-section is :

"All land acquired under this sub-section shall be conveyed to the trustees on trust for sale."

That sentence did not appear in sched. IV to the Act of 1922, which to that extent, from the conveyancer's point of view, so to speak, was very defective, because it was essential in connection with such matters as conversion to know what the status of any land acquired under the new powers was to be. Was it to be land, or was it to be personalty? The effect of the introduction of that sentence was to give it the status of personalty, the same status as was originally possessed by the land originally settled on trust for sale.

A That is the form in which the relevant parts of the legislation stand. VAISEY, J., had to consider two arguments intended to establish that under these words the trustees had no power to purchase land by way of investment. The Settled Land Act powers to purchase land are to be found in s. 73 (1), para. (xi) of the Settled Land Act, 1925. That sub-section sets out, under 21 heads, the manner in which capital moneys arising under the Settled Land Act are to be applied, and I will read two of them. Paragraph (i) is purely an investment paragraph, referring to investment in government securities or other trust securities. Paragraph (xi) is a power to purchase land, which does not use the word "investment" at all. It provides:

B "In purchase of land in fee simple, or of leasehold land held for sixty years or more unexpired at the time of purchase, subject or not to any exception or reservation . . ."

C There are numberless other provisions under which the capital moneys may be applied, and I think it is fair to say that if s. 73 were to be excluded from the matters imported by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 28, the scope of the operation of s. 28 would be limited to an absurd degree.

D The first argument addressed to us was that s. 73 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, is excluded in toto. That argument was not pressed with any enthusiasm, because it was realised that not only had VAISEY, J., rejected it, but also that the acceptance of it would hamstring the beneficial object of s. 28. It was founded on the words of s. 28 (1) that trustees for sale are to have "all the powers of a tenant for life and the trustees of a settlement," and it was pointed out that s. 73 does not in terms confer powers, but imposes obligations. It

E says: "Capital money . . . shall, when received, be invested or otherwise applied wholly in one, or partly in one and partly in another or others, of the following modes," and that, it is said, is not properly described as a "power." It is said that that is a statutory obligation compelling the application of capital money in one or other of the manners indicated, but it is to be observed that under the Settled Land Act the choice of the object to which among those particular objects the money is to be applied lies with the tenant for life. It is the tenant for life who has the power to direct the application by the trustees of the capital moneys in one or other of these authorised manners, and, if the tenant for life gives no such direction, it is the trustees themselves who have a discretion as to which of those objects shall be the one to which the money is to be applied. It seems to me that, quite apart from the general overriding

G argument that the exclusion of s. 73 would operate in a ridiculous manner, the discretionary power of the trustees, or of the tenant for life if he is the person exercising it—under s. 28 it would be the trustees who would be exercising it—is a discretionary power of choice among a number of statutory objects which may properly be described as a "power," and if the draftsman of s. 28 had wished to draw a distinction between the sort of power which H the trustees have under s. 73 and "powers" in the strict sense, I can only wonder why he did not do so. He has used language that appears to me, on a fair construction, in the context and having regard to the subject-matter, to cover s. 73. That, as I say, was the view taken by VAISEY, J., and I respectfully agree with it.

The second argument presented to VAISEY, J., which was the main argument presented to us, was that s. 28 on its true construction is selective, that is to say, only some of the powers mentioned in s. 73 are imported by the words of reference in s. 28. At the outset, I repeat that once you say that the matters mentioned in the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73, can properly be described as "powers," you are met by the recalcitrant word "all" for s. 28 gives, not some of the powers, because it makes no selection among the powers, but "all the powers," and it would require, to my mind, the strongest context to limit the powers conferred to a selected number among the powers. Next, it is said that when you look at s. 73 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, you find that two classes of powers—and I am calling them "powers" for this purpose—are comprised in it, and that the two classes are quite distinct—purely investment powers and powers in relation to what I may describe as administration-of-settled-land powers, meaning by that phrase sales, leases, and all the things that tenants for life generally deal with. It is said (and this is what VAISEY, J., held) that, although s. 73 is included, it is only included for the limited purpose and to the limited extent of the non-investment powers contained in it. That argument is buttressed by a number of special arguments on certain words, but before referring to them, I would call attention to one or two matters on the construction of s. 73 itself, because for the purpose of meeting this argument it is necessary to examine this contention that s. 73 is dealing with two distinct classes of power. It is to be noted that in the opening words of sub-s. (1) the matters to be dealt with in the following parts of s. 73 are described by these words: "Capital money . . . shall . . . be invested or otherwise applied wholly in one, or partly in one and partly in another or others, of the following modes." The words "or otherwise applied" must imply that investment is treated as a method of application. In other words, the section is going to indicate the permitted methods of application, one of which is investment. Looking at the various heads in s. 73, the word "investment" appears in para. (i) in reference to investment in trust securities. That is the only place in which the word occurs, and in the paragraph which deals with the purchase of land the word "investment" does not appear.

I have no doubt that land may be bought for a purpose connected with settled land, or it may be bought as an investment, or it may be bought partly as one and partly as the other, or it may be bought by trustees, the tenant for life directing the purchase, with no particular ideas one way or the other. A neighbouring farm, for instance, may be bought for the benefit of the settled land, or it may be bought as an independent acquisition having benefits and merits of its own by way of investment. It may be very difficult, in relation to a particular transaction, to say whether it ought to be dubbed an investment or a Settled Land Act transaction. That difficulty appears in other paragraphs of s. 73, for instance, para. (ii)—"In discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances affecting the whole estate." It may well be that, if the money were available, it might be thought desirable to clear the estate of an incumbrance, regarding that operation as something done for the benefit of the estate. On the other hand, an incumbrance on the estate may be acquired without any eye to the benefit or otherwise of the settled land as such, but simply as an investment. If the charge was allowed to merge and disappear, it might be easier to say: "This must have been bought for the benefit of the settled land," but there is nothing to compel trustees who buy an incumbrance on the inheritance to allow it to merge in the inheritance, and they may keep it alive for such purposes as they may find convenient in the future, including a pure investment purpose. There are other paragraphs which clearly cover both pure investment purposes, pure Settled Land Act purposes, mixed purposes, or uncertain purposes where nobody has really tried to decide what is the character of the operation in question. I say that merely to show that the idea that s. 73 itself provides a guide to the dividing line between investment purposes and settled land purposes does not survive an examination of the section itself. There is no such clear line of demarcation to be found in the section, except possibly with regard to the one case of investment in trustee securities, which is defined as such.

A It seems to me, therefore, that, so far as my consideration has gone, there is no context sufficient to cut down the meaning of the word "all" in s. 28, and that to take the view which commended itself to VAISEY, J. (and with which with all respect I am venturing to differ), really involves putting a gloss on the section, and saying that by the word "all" the legislature meant "all the administrative or settled land powers conferred by s. 73, to the exclusion of all other powers conferred by that section." I do not find myself able to take that view. There are other words in s. 28 (1) which form one of the bases of the argument :

B " . . . all capital money arising under the said powers shall, unless paid or applied for any purpose authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925, be applicable in the same manner as if the money represented proceeds of sale arising under the trust for sale."

C It is said that it is highly unlikely that the legislature would have provided for a different application, or for the right to make a different application, of the actual proceeds of sale arising under the trust for sale and capital money arising under the exercises of the imported Settled Land Act powers. That argument I appreciate, but it is then said that the words "unless paid or applied for any purpose authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925," according to their true construction in that context, must exclude investments. The words "paid or applied for any purpose," it is said, are not apt to describe the

D operation of investment, and the expression contemplates, therefore, that the payment or application will be exclusive of investment, and, as the ambit of this part of the sub-section ought not to be treated as being different from the ambit of the first part of the sub-section, it must follow that in the first part of the sub-section the powers are similarly limited so as to exclude investment. In my view, the argument breaks down at the outset, because the words

E "paid or applied for any purpose" appear to me to be amply capable of application, not merely to what I have described as a Settled Land Act purpose, but also to an investment purpose, and I link up that observation with the actual language of s. 73 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, itself, which, as I have said, treats investment as a method of application. So far from those words pointing to a limitation of s. 73 powers, they appear to me to be equally

F consistent, to put it at the lowest, with an inclusion of the whole of those powers. If that be the right construction of them, it will be consistent with, and will correspond to, the construction which I have provisionally put on the opening words of s. 28. The argument is also linked with the contention that the words "in relation to the proceeds of sale" are to be read as meaning "in relation to land with regard to the proceeds of sale," and that, it is said,

G would make the earlier part consistent with the limited scope of the concluding words. I have already said all that I wish to say with regard to that argument.

That is the basic ground on which I disagree with the learned judge, and, to sum it up, it lies in these propositions. The powers given by the opening words of s. 28 (1) include the powers of application and choice of application which are conferred by s. 73 of the Settled Land Act, 1925; the word

H "all" when applied to those powers, means "all," and there is no context sufficient to cut it down so as to exclude certain of those powers; there is nothing in this context to limit the powers to the powers of a tenant for life as set out in Part II of the Settled Land Act, or to limit the application of s. 73 to powers which can properly be described as settled land or administrative powers. Had some word of a less recalcitrant nature than "all" been used, the argument would have been easier to support, but, to my mind, it is difficult to understand the argument that when Parliament uses the word

"all" it leaves it to the ingenuity of the reader to find out that it means nothing of the kind. If this section was included so as to be a guide to trustees, the use of the word "all" would be little better than a trap. It is said, on broad lines, that the conception of trustees having power to invest in the purchase of land was, in a sense, a revolutionary conception, because under the old ideas "investment" in respect of land meant investment in mortgages of land. It should not be forgotten that in the course of years investments by way of mortgage have been shown to have certain disadvantages, and anyone who has spent a lifetime in the law dealing with these matters must remember many cases where what have appeared to be good mortgages on land have led to a variety of difficulties, and trustees have come to dislike them. On the other hand, there has arisen in the course of recent years a liking by trustees for the purchase of land as an investment. House property and shop property has been found to be more desirable and more stable and to involve fewer complications, and I should not be at all surprised to find that the legislature in 1922 had an eye to that, or, at any rate, did not regard it as such a shocking and disastrous and revolutionary idea as the old-fashioned practitioner might have thought it. I cannot allow the fact that the idea of investment in land may be in a certain sense a novel one to lead me to construe what seems to me to be the definite language of Parliament in a sense limited in the way suggested.

That disposes of the general question, but it still leaves the separate question in the matter of the investments which the trustees already hold. Those investments, historically, are derived from earlier sales of land, and it might be said that where trustees for sale have sold the land in pursuance of the directions of the settlement and have invested the proceeds, the whole of the trust for sale has been carried out, and, therefore, the powers given by s. 28, which are, so to speak, temporary powers pending sale, cannot be applied. I do not think, however, that s. 28 is to be limited in that way. Verbally there is, indeed, something to be said for that view. The powers conferred are powers in relation to the proceeds of sale, and it is said that once the proceeds of sale have been received and have been invested in, say, War Loan, they cease to be "proceeds of sale" for the purpose of s. 28, and are then properly to be described, not as proceeds of sale, but as investments made out of the proceeds of sale. Therefore, it is said, the power to invest in land must be limited to what in strictness can be called the "proceeds of sale," that is to say, cash. I am not clear how far the limitation is said to go. "Cash" is a loose expression. Nowadays it does not mean mere cash in one's pocket; it includes a chose in action like money on current or deposit account at the bank. At some stage, according to the argument, what starts as money received from a purchaser as the proceeds of a sale loses the character of proceeds of sale and acquires a different character, namely, that of an investment. Counsel for the third defendant, I think quite logically, accepted as the test, which he said must be applied on the facts of each particular case, the question whether an investment has or has not been made. To illustrate the idea that he had in mind, if the money was paid into a bank or put on deposit it would still retain its quality of "proceeds of sale," but if the trustees had gone into the market and bought what was intended to be an investment, then that would not be "the proceeds of sale," and it could not be sold in order that the proceeds of its sale might be applied in the purchase of land.

If I am right in my earlier observations—that s. 28 does empower the investment of cash proceeds of sale in land—it would be illogical—not that that is unexpected in a section of this kind—to find that the power to invest in land stops at the moment when trustees invest, let me say, in a trustee security or other authorised investment. It would have this further odd result, that if the trustees, having the proceeds of sale in the strict sense, apply them (as I have held that they can apply them) in the purchase of land, that land, under s. 28 (1) is to be conveyed to the trustees on trust for sale, and if and when they sell that land the proceeds of it in their turn may properly be invested in the purchase of other land. Therefore, so long as the trustees have got land and remain trustees for sale, they can, by a continuous chain of investments in land, keep the investment in land going on for ever, but on the other hand, once that chain is broken by an investment not in land the process would be brought to an end and the power to invest the money in land would be killed for ever, because the money could never again be "proceeds of sale" in the sense desired.

- A I realise that the question is a difficult one, and one of the solutions that counsel for the first two defendants suggested does not appeal to me. It was of this nature. Looking at the concluding words of the main part of this sub-section you find that if money, the proceeds of sale, has been invested in a trust security, that money will have been invested under the powers of the Settled Land Act, the Settled Land Act gives powers to change investments, and if, by the exercise of the power, the investment is sold, it is then to be applicable, under the words of the sub-section, "in the same manner as if the money represented proceeds of sale arising under the trust for sale."
- C That would bring those moneys representing the sale money from the investment back into the opening words of the section, and would give them the status of proceeds of sale, which would mean that they, in their turn, could be invested in land. I do not like that argument, which appears to me to be attributing to Parliament a circumlocution which I do not think ought to be ascribed to it.
- D I prefer the other way in which counsel for the first two defendants put it, namely, that, in spite of an investment, "proceeds of sale" within the meaning of the sub-section are properly to be said to exist so long as they can be traced. To take the simplest possible case, if £5,000 is acquired by the sale of a house, and it is used to purchase War Loan, so long as that block of War Loan exists you can trace the proceeds of sale into it and regard it as being the proceeds of sale.
- E In the case where there is an intermingling with other types, the result may be different. I do not want to be more precise than to say that I accept the argument that so long as the proceeds can be traced they remain "proceeds of sale" within the meaning of the sub-section. Whether or not in any individual case they can be traced must depend on the facts of that case, and it is not desirable to say more about it than that.
- F Fortunately, in the present case we are not embarrassed in the application of that principle, because the investments in question do represent, in every case, the actual proceeds of the sale of land.

- I think that I have dealt with all the important points, except, possibly, s. 32 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, to which some reference was made. That section deals with settlements of personalty or of land held on trust for sale where there is an express power to invest money in the purchase of land. It deals with a much wider class of settlement than is dealt with by s. 28. It extends to personalty settlements and to cases where there is a power to invest in land included in a settlement of land on trust for sale, but the object of that section appears to me to be to get rid of the sort of difficulty that arises where land is held on trust for sale, and is, therefore, in equity regarded as personalty, and the settlement contains a power to invest money in the purchase of land without having what is very often omitted, namely, a direction that land so purchased shall be subject to the trust for sale. That gives rise to the difficulty that where land is purchased under the power, in the absence of a trust for sale in the settlement it has the quality, not of personal estate but of real estate, and s. 32 enacts that in such a case the land purchased shall be held by the trustees on trust for sale.

- H

There is one matter on s. 28 which I omitted, and I think I should say a word about it. It is with regard to the words "unless paid or applied for any purpose authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925." I do not think it is necessary to decide it, but it appears to me that there is very good ground for the view that those words are referring to the words in s. 73 of the Settled Land Act which provide that the capital money is to be applied subject to the payment of claims properly payable thereout and to the application thereof to any authorised object for which the capital money was raised. For example, where a mortgage is raised for some specific purpose, that purpose has priority over the list of purposes set out in s. 73, and it seems to me that there is ground for thinking that the words "paid or applied for any authorised purpose" in s. 28 may be referring to that. I do not think it is necessary to say, one way or the other. I merely mention it because it took up some part of the discussion. In my opinion, the judgment of the learned judge should be reversed, and there should be a declaration that the trustees are entitled to invest not merely the cash (other than the war damage cash) that they hold, but also the proceeds of the sale of the investments (if they decide to sell them) in the purchase of land.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree, and in view of the judgment which has been delivered by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in which he has considered the various arguments directed to the issues in this appeal, I can state very briefly the main ground on which I differ from the learned judge. VAISEY, J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 215):

"It is possible to say that s. 73 is not an empowering section at all, but I do not decide the case on that ground."

I respectfully agree with the conclusion that the learned judge there indicates. I think it would have been impossible to exclude s. 73 from the operation of s. 28 (1), having regard to the fact that the powers conferred by the opening words of s. 28 (1) are powers, inter alia, in relation to the proceeds of sale. Having reached the stage, therefore, that some powers, at any rate, in s. 73 are covered by the word "powers" in the opening words of s. 28 (1), I find it impossible, for the reasons which have been given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, based on the presence of the word "all", to come to the conclusion that one can on any principle select certain of the things which are authorised under s. 73 and eliminate others of things which are so authorised. That is briefly my reason for rejecting the main argument on behalf of the defendants. Other arguments were based on the later words at the end of the first paragraph of s. 28 (1), and I will say a word or two about them. Assuming that counsel for the third defendant were right in submitting that the words which provide what can be done with capital money were less extensive than the powers, as I have construed them, conferred in the opening words with regard to proceeds of sale, I could not accept that as a ground for cutting down what seems to me to be plainly conferred by way of powers in the opening two or three lines. I do not accept the submission that those later words in any way restrict what can be done with capital money. There seem to me to be two possible constructions which lead to that conclusion. One is that the words "paid or applied" cover all the modes (to use a neutral expression) set out in s. 73; the other is a construction which was referred to by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in the concluding part of his judgment—that the words "paid or applied" in this context refer to the words in the initial sentence of s. 73 (1) of the Settled Land Act, 1925. If that is right, then any capital moneys not so applied would be applicable in the same manner as if the money represented proceeds of sale arising under the trust for sale, and those words would, I think, make them subject to the same powers as the proceeds of sale referred to in the third line of the section. For those reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

COHEN, L.J. : I agree, and as we are differing from the learned judge I think I should state shortly the reasons for my conclusions. As I follow the judgment of the learned judge, he bases his conclusions, in the main, on the view that the section was not intended to have what he regarded as the far-reaching and revolutionary effect of allowing, for the first time, proceeds of a trust for sale to be invested in the purchase of land, but he (it is his language, and not my own) grasps at two small straws to keep his main argument afloat.

- A The first argument that he fastened on was the use in s. 28 itself of the words "including in relation to the land the powers of management conferred by that Act during a minority," and he said that those words might be held to indicate, by a sort of inverse application of the ejusdem generis rule, that the powers previously mentioned were, or were analogous to, powers of management.
- B I have never heard before of an inverse application of the ejusdem generis rule, and I think it would be very dangerous here to attempt to cut down, by the application of any such principle, the wide words which precede. I think that the reason for the express mention of those particular powers, as contained in s. 102 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, was supplied by counsel for the first two defendants in the course of his argument, when he pointed
- C out that sub-s. (1) of that section begins with the words : " If and as long as any person who is entitled to a beneficial interest in possession affecting land is an infant " ; and he said that if there had not been that express mention of those powers the condition precedent to their existence might not have occurred, and, therefore, in the absence of that express mention, the trustee would not have had the powers therein conferred. The second straw was
- D s. 32 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and with regard to that I entirely agree with the observations that were made by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, and I need add nothing on it.

The main ground of the learned judge's judgment was based on two passages in the judgment of UTHWATT, J., in Re Wakeman (1). The first passage is this ([1945] 1 All E.R. 422) :

- E " As regards subject-matter the main point of the section is not to encourage dealings in land but to facilitate dealings with land, and to that end powers are given which may be duly exercised if circumstances so require."

- F I do not gain any assistance from that quotation. It is to be observed that it is only stated to be " the main point " of the section. With that I entirely agree, but it is quite consistent with that view that there is the subsidiary point, namely, to enable the trustees in a suitable case to invest in land. The other passage was this (ibid., 423) :

- G " No doubt it is right, where there is used in a statute language which is capable of more than one construction, to consider and to take into account the consequences of alternative constructions and also . . . previous legislation on the same topic."

- H I respectfully agree, and no doubt that is particularly true, as counsel for the third defendant pointed out, in the case of a consolidation statute, but I think it is plain on the authorities that even as regards a consolidation statute you cannot disregard what you consider to be the plain meaning of the language used, and I agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and SOMERVELL, L.J., that there is nothing here sufficiently strong to enable us to ignore what I regard as the almost imperative word " all " in the initial words of the section. I would add that I should be reluctant to be driven to the other conclusion, if only for the reason that, if we were to accept the learned judge's judgment, as it seems to me, it would leave the legitimacy of the transaction to depend not on the transaction itself but on the state of mind of the trustees who were effecting it, a situation which I should be very loth to believe was the intention of the legislature.

There is one more thing that I desire to add. In Re Wakeman (1) UTHWATT, J., held that whatever might be the position so long as some land continued to be held on the trusts of the settlement, once all the land was sold the trust for sale had come to an end. That point does not arise for decision in this case, and in what I have said on the construction of this section I desire to reserve the question what the position would be if at the time when the question of investment arose no land was held on the trusts of the settlement. For those reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties to be paid out of the estate.

HOGAN v. BENTINCK WEST HARTLEY COLLIERIES (OWNERS), LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid), December 13, 14, 1948, February 28, 1949.]

Workmen's Compensation—Incapacity resulting from accident—Novus actus interveniens—Improper medical treatment—Ill-advised operation on injured thumb—Incapacity due to tender stump—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 9 (1).

The workman, a miner, suffered from a congenital defect, viz., two top joints to his right thumb, the additional joint forming a false thumb in addition to his normal thumb. On June 19, 1946, he met with an accident at his work and fractured the false thumb. The thumb was treated by splinting, and on Aug. 19 he returned to work. The thumb, however, continued to be painful and the workman was sent by his doctor to hospital where it was discovered that the fracture had not united, and an operation was advised and performed for the removal, not merely of the false thumb, but also of the top joint of the normal thumb. On an application by the workman for compensation on the ground of pain in the stump, the county court judge accepted the view of the medical witnesses that the operation was a proper one to cure the congenital deformity but not to cure the pain consequential on the accident, and he refused compensation on the ground that the incapacity then existing was due, not to the accident, but to the operation, which "appeared to have been ill-advised."

HELD: [LORD MACDERMOTT and LORD REID dissenting]: on a true construction of the words in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 9 (1), "where . . . incapacity for work results from the injury," it was for the arbitrator to determine as a fact whether or not the incapacity existing at the date of the arbitration resulted from the original accident or from the operation, and, as there was evidence on which he could properly find that the incapacity resulted from the operation, there was no ground for interfering with the award. In principle, there was no conflict between the line of cases headed by Humber Towing Co., Ltd. v. Barclay (1911) (5 B.W.C.C. 142) and the authorities headed by Dunham v. Clare ([1902] 2 K.B. 292; 86 L.T. 751), and the question whether a present state of incapacity was substantially the result of the original accident or of the later unskilful or negligent act of a doctor was to ask, in other words, whether the present incapacity was due to the original accident or to the intervention of a novus actus which broke the chain of causation. That question could only be answered on a consideration of all the circumstances and, in particular, of the quality of that later act or event.

APPEAL by the workman from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., BUCKNILL and ASQUITH, L.JJ.), dated Dec. 18, 1947, and reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 129, dismissing his appeal from an award of His Honour JUDGE RICHARDSON, made at Morpeth County Court and dated July 21, 1947.

The workman, who had met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 9, but the learned judge held that the incapacity existing at the date of the arbitration was due, not to the original injury, but to an ill-advised operation, and refused compensation. The Court of Appeal upheld the award, holding, reluctantly, that it was bound by authority to find against the workman. The workman's appeal was now dismissed by the House of Lords (LORD MACDERMOTT and LORD REID dissenting). The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

H Fenwick, K.C., and W. Temple for the workman.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 28. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, this appeal raises in the field of law relating to workmen's compensation a problem which in various aspects has long vexed the human mind, the problem of cause and effect, which in this relation is the problem whether a particular incapacity results from a particular injury by accident arising out of and in the course of a workman's employment. It is, I think, very unfortunate that in such a case the facts should be to such a degree obscure and the judgment of the learned county court judge so terse that it has not been easy to find out what was the evidence on which his judgment proceeded or, indeed, what were the grounds of it.

The workman, Hogan, was at the date of the arbitration, out of which this appeal arises, 37 years of age and by trade a miner. He was born with a somewhat unusual congenital defect, for he had two top joints to his right thumb, a normal top joint and an additional top joint alongside it, which I will refer to as the false thumb. He had worked for three years as a coal filler and afterwards for six years as a stoneman. This change of occupation had been necessitated by an operation to his knee which had no connection with these proceedings. His false thumb does not appear to have interfered with his work. On June 19, 1946, he met with the accident on which his present claim is founded. He was shovelling stone in the employment of the respondents: a stone fell on his false thumb and caused a fracture to it. He was attended by his own doctor, Dr. Wenn, who sent him to the Royal Victoria Infirmary at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where his injured thumb was treated by splinting. On July 1 he was examined by Mr. Raw, a surgeon, on behalf of the employers, while his thumb was still in splints. On July 19, Mr. Raw examined him again, the splint having then been removed: he found no displacement or clinical evidence of fracture, but it seems that his diagnosis was at fault. On Aug. 19, the workman returned to work, but, his thumb continuing to be painful, he again consulted Dr. Wenn and was sent by her to the Emergency Hospital at Dryburn on Sept. 3. On Sept. 12 she made a report to the employers ascribing his disablement to his congenital deformity, but on Oct. 21, having received a report from the Dryburn Emergency Hospital, which is not in evidence, she appears to have changed her opinion. At Dryburn the workman came under the care of Dr. Webb Jones. An X-ray of the false thumb revealed a fracture which had not united, and on Sept. 5 Dr. Webb Jones amputated the whole top joint of the thumb. His reason for doing so is thus summarily stated in the only notes of evidence with which the Court of Appeal and this House have been furnished. On examination Dr. Webb Jones' evidence, according to the notes, was:

"Advised amputation because of pain. On Sept. 5—not because of double joint."

Then, on his being recalled, Dr. Webb Jones' evidence was:

"Went to see doctor because of pain. Amputation due to technical considerations at time."

Your Lordships are left without any information why Dr. Webb Jones thought it expedient to remove the whole top joint of the thumb, when it was only the false thumb that was fractured. The result of the operation was unsatisfactory, for it left the workman with a tender stump which admittedly rendered him fit for light work only. It was not suggested that the amputation had been unskilfully performed.

I pause in the narrative to say that at the date of arbitration it was the incapacity due to the tender stump which was the basis of the workman's claim, and to pose the question that must be solved: "Was this incapacity the result of the injury which was caused to the workman on June 19, 1946?" I must now refer to certain further evidence as it appears in the learned judge's notes. I have already mentioned Dr. Raw. It seems that when the workman saw him on Aug. 6, he asked his advice about his false thumb. This is the note of evidence:

"Asked my advice about supernumerary thumb—told him matter between him and his doctor. Asked me what I would do. I said I would have it removed."

It is clear that Dr. Raw referred only to an amputation of the false thumb. That he thought an amputation of the whole top joint to be unnecessary appears from this further note of his evidence :

- A "December, 1946, found whole double end of thumb had been amputated—amputation not required because of injury . . . only fit for light work. Due to an amputation because of congenital deformity—not necessitated by injury."

The workman was further examined by Dr. Whyte, but only at some time after the amputation and for the purpose of giving evidence at the arbitration.

- B He saw the X-ray photograph of the fracture. His evidence was as follows :

"Present disability not due to accident, operation for congenital deformity, not necessitated in any way by accident. Looking at X-ray—fracture well out in abnormal part of thumb—no displacement. Imagine no disability."

- C In cross-examination he said :

"Operation for congenital trouble. No necessity because of fracture. Most unlikely amputation was necessary."

On this material, aided, no doubt, by his immediate recollection of the oral evidence, the learned county court judge dismissed the claim. Your Lordships have only three lines to inform you of his reasons :

- D "Onus on applicant—not satisfied incapacity due to accident. Due to operation for congenital deformity which appears to have been ill-advised. Award for respondent. Costs on Scale C."

Some further notes of the judgment were supplied to the Court of Appeal. I do not not find it easy to follow all that is in them, but they contain the salient passage to which I have already referred.

- E I have thought it necessary to refer at this length to the facts because it was urged on your Lordships that there was no evidence on which the county court judge could come to the conclusion that the present incapacity of the workman was due to anything but the original accident. It was said that the question of general importance, to which so much argument was directed, does not really arise, because the learned judge was not justified on the facts in finding that the chain of causation between the original injury and the appellant's final incapacity was broken. My Lords, I have no doubt, although I could have wished for an ampler statement, that the learned judge took the view, accepting what I understand to be the opinion of Dr. Raw and Dr. Whyte, that the amputation of the whole top joint of the workman's thumb was an ill-advised operation, which ought not to have taken place, and that the tender stump was the result of that ill-advised operation. Nor is it, in my opinion, possible for an appellate court to say that he had no material on which he could come to that conclusion. But, my Lords, though I find myself inevitably using the expression "the tender stump was the result of the operation," I do not mean to prejudice the question whether the present incapacity is the result of the original injury within the meaning and for the purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Acts. This raises directly the question of causation which I indicated at the beginning of this opinion. The Court of Appeal in the present case (LORD GREENE, M.R., and BUCKNILL and ASQUITH, L.JJ.) were unanimously of opinion that in the existing state of the law they must dismiss the appeal, for, if the county court judge found that the present incapacity was the result of an ill-advised operation, he was entitled under decisions of that court to reject the claim.

Let me then first, my Lords, say a word about the existing state of the law. The authorities have been fully examined by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Rothwell v. Caverswall Stone Co., Ltd. (1). In that case SCOTT, L.J., after an exhaustive analysis of all the relevant cases, came to the conclusion that there were two lines of authority which were irreconcilable with one another, the one line consisting of Humber Towing Co., Ltd. v. Barclay (2), Rocca v. Stanley Jones & Co., Ltd. (3) and Lakey v. Blair & Co., Ltd. (4), the other a longer line of which Dunham v. Clare (5), Ystradowen Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Griffiths (6) and Williams v. Graigola Merthyr Co., Ltd. (7), may be taken as representative. Concluding that there was this conflict, SCOTT, L.J., found himself at liberty to disregard the first line and to apply the principle of the second line of authority to the case then under appeal. But his view was not accepted by the other members of the court, LUXMOORE and DU PARCQ, L.JJ., who found no such irreconcilability. I do not propose again to review the cases, for in the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., I find so lucid and accurate a summary of the result of them that I will respectfully adopt and repeat it. DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 365):

"In my opinion, the following propositions may be formulated upon the authorities as they stand: first, an existing incapacity 'results from' the original injury if it follows, and is caused by, that injury, and may properly be held so to result even if some supervening cause has aggravated the effects of the original injury and prolonged the period of incapacity. If, however, the existing incapacity ought fairly to be attributed to a new cause which has intervened and ought no longer to be attributed to the original injury, it may properly be held to result from the new cause and not from the original injury, even though, but for the original injury, there would have been no incapacity. Secondly, negligent or inefficient treatment by a doctor or other person may amount to a new cause and the circumstances may justify a finding of fact that the existing incapacity results from the new cause, and does not result from the original injury. This is so even if the negligence or inefficient treatment consists of an error of omission whereby the original incapacity is prolonged. In such a case, if the arbitrator is satisfied that the incapacity would have wholly ceased but for the omission, a finding of fact that the existing incapacity results from the new cause, and not from the injury, will be justified. In stating these propositions I am far from seeking to lay down any new principles of construction. I have sought only to collect, by a process of induction, such general, and necessarily vague, rules as seem to emerge from the decided cases. Such rules do no more than indicate the bounds within which an arbitrator is free to decide—the province of fact. It is constantly being said, and must always be remembered, that the arbitrator is the sole judge of the facts."

In this statement I think that the most important word is the permissive "may" which is used four times, for it emphasises the fact which, to my mind, lies at the root of this controversy, that it is, first and last, a question of fact for the arbitrator to determine from what a present incapacity results. He is not, for instance, bound to find that an incapacity results from an operation, but he may do so, and, if he does and there is evidence to support his finding, that is conclusive. To this matter I return later.

Assuming, then, that this statement fairly represents, as I think it does, the present state of the law, it is clear that the Court of Appeal in this case rightly held that they could not in face of the learned arbitrator's finding decide in favour of the workman. For he was entitled to find that the present incapacity resulted from the ill-advised operation. It follows then that, if the appeal is to succeed in this House, it must be on the footing that the second

A of the propositions enunciated by DU PARCQ, L.J., is wrong in law, or, to put the matter in more concrete form, that, when in Humber Towing Co., Ltd. v. Barclay (2), the Court of Appeal sent the case back to the learned county court judge for reconsideration because he had not considered "whether the condition of the man when he came before him was or was not due substantially to the original accident or to the mismanagement of the bonesetter," that court required him to consider a question which was in law irrelevant. So, also, it would follow in the present case that the question which BUCKNILL, L.J., following the Humber case (2), as I think he was bound to do, thus stated: "Was this pain in the stump left after the operation due to the original accident or was it due to a misconceived operation which ought not to have been performed by a skilful and thoughtful doctor?" was equally irrelevant.

B Before I return to the all-important words in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, which have given rise to this controversy, I would recall what is said to be the principle of the conflicting line of authority headed by Dunham v. Clare (5). In that case, COLLINS, M.R., said ([1902] 2 K.B. 296):

C "The question whether death resulted from the injury resolves itself into an inquiry into the chain of causation. If the chain of causation is broken by a novus actus interveniens, so that the old cause goes and a new one is substituted for it, that is a new act which gives a fresh origin to the after-consequences."

D It does not appear to me, my Lords, that in principle there is any conflict between the two lines of cases that I have cited. The question whether a present state of incapacity is substantially the result of an original accident or of the later negligent act of a doctor is to ask, in other words, whether the present incapacity is due to the original accident or to the intervention of a novus actus which breaks "the chain of causation," and the question can only be answered on a consideration of all the circumstances and, in particular, of the quality of that later act or event.

E So, my Lords, I turn again to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The same words occur both in s. 8 (1), "where death results from the injury," and in s. 9 (1), "where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury." These few and plain words have to be construed, and at once I ask what possible question of law is involved in their interpretation or application. Is it not a question of fact and nothing else, whether "death results from the injury?" And, if the arbitrator finds the fact, that is the end of the matter,

F unless his finding is open to attack for the reasons which make any finding of fact impeachable. In what respect does an arbitrator misdirect himself or otherwise go wrong in law, if, finding as a fact that an operation has been ill-advised and that a present incapacity is due to that operation, he says that for the purpose of s. 9 of the Act that incapacity is the result of that operation and is not the result of an original injury? I would not, my Lords,

G embark on a discussion more suitable (as DU PARCQ, L.J., pointed out in the Rothwell case (1)) to logicians and schoolmen than to a court of law, nor would I substitute their language for the plain English of the Act of Parliament, but it is convenient to use this degree of licence and observe that an arbitrator must be entitled to make his award in the manner above indicated, unless he is bound to treat the original accident as a causa sine qua non and every-

H thing that afterwards happens as a result of that cause. This, at least, I would say is not the meaning that can be ascribed to the relevant words. Equally I would say, agreeing here with SCOTT, L.J., in the Rothwell case (1), that it is not for the arbitrator to seek out only the proxima causa and disregard all other matters. These are refinements which can only lead to confusion. The general words of the Act point to one conclusion—that the arbitrator reviewing all the facts must determine as a fact one way or the other whether the incapacity is the result of the accident. That there will be apparent inconsistencies and inequalities is inevitable. So there must be while human affairs remain infinitely variable and human judgments differ on questions of fact. But in the vast majority of cases the broad common sense which distinguishes those whose duty it is to administer this Act will lead them to a conclusion consistent with its language and purpose. Nothing could, in my opinion, be more dangerous than to attempt further to limit the bounds of that province of fact which is within their sole jurisdiction. On these considerations I see no ground for disturbing the decision of the learned county court judge.

In coming to this conclusion I have got some assistance from the not infrequent cases in which the employer has contended that the workman's incapacity is the result of his unwillingness to undergo an operation or other curative treatment. It has been held that in such cases, where the workman's refusal has in fact been unreasonable, he is not entitled to compensation. Such a view has the authority of this House: see Steele v. Robert George & Co. (1937), Ltd. (8). It has, indeed, been suggested that this is the result of some kind of "judicial legislation," whatever that phrase may mean. From this suggestion I must respectfully dissent. It is to my mind plain that such a case affords a good illustration of the common sense meaning to be attributed to the section. The man in the street and with him the learned arbitrator are entitled and are likely to say of a man, who could be cured, if he would, that his present continued incapacity is the "result" of his obstinacy and unreason, and, if they do say so, that is the end of it. On this point, also, I am happy to find myself in agreement with what DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 367) in Rothwell's case (1). In this connection it was urged that it would be strangely hard on the workman, if, on the one hand, he was liable to lose his compensation if he refused to submit to treatment, and, on the other, liable also to lose it, if, submitting to treatment, he was the victim of negligence and his incapacity could be said to be due to that. My Lords, I recognise that such a case would bear hardly on the workman. But the possibility of such hardship cannot outweigh the broad considerations which have led me to the conclusion that I have already expressed. It would be a strange thing if an arbitrator were debarred from finding as a fact that a present state of incapacity is due to the negligence of a surgeon because in another case a state of incapacity might be held to be due to the workman's unreason.

I move that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I accept without reservation the analysis and construction of the evidence and of the judgment of the arbitrator which are before the House in the judgment of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. On the facts as stated by my noble and learned friend a question arises under s. 9 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, whether the workman's incapacity at the time of the arbitration resulted from the injury by accident, and there is a preliminary question of the construction of the words "where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury," which I will consider on the assumption in the first instance that it is an open question.

Compensation under the Act is for "injury by accident" and only for "injury by accident"; injury not caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment gives no right to compensation. That is made plain by the terms of s. 1. Sections 8 and 9 are concerned only with the amount of the compensation in fatal and non-fatal cases respectively, and they must be read so as to conform to this principle, that compensation is for injury caused by the accident and not for injury otherwise caused. It was necessary to provide for the two possibilities that the conduct of the workman or the conduct of a third party might have contributed to the causation of the accident. There are, therefore, express provisions in s. 1 defining the effect on the workman's claim for compensation when the injury by accident is attributable to his misconduct or when he was at the time of the accident in breach of a regulation applicable to his employment, and in s. 30 provision is made for the distribution of liability between the employer and a third party when the injury by accident was caused in circumstances creating a legal liability in the third party. There are no corresponding provisions to deal with the situation which arises when, subsequently to the accident, the continuing injury and the associated incapacity have been prolonged or aggravated by the conduct of the workman or of a third party. These possibilities are sufficiently covered by the principle that the employer is liable in compensation only for the injury caused by the accident and no further, and no express provisions were needed. So also in the sections dealing with the amount of the compensation (ss. 8 and 9) no express provisions were needed. But it is necessary, in order to give effect to the principle that there is no liability to pay compensation except for the injury by accident, to read the words "results from" as raising the issue of the causal relation between the incapacity and the injury by accident as it is commonly understood in the ordinary affairs of life and as it would be understood by a jury in an action of damages for personal injury, if it was necessary to discriminate between injury and damage caused by the defendant's negligence and injury and damage caused by the lack of due skill or reasonable care in the treatment of the original injury. Neither the words themselves, nor the context, suggest that any special qualification of the conception of causation is intended. But, in truth, the question is no longer open. In Steele v. Robert George & Co. (1937), Ltd. (8) a case came before this House in which the employer contended that the payment of compensation should be ended because the workman had unreasonably refused medical treatment. VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., had to consider the legal basis of this contention, and he said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 448) :

"... the Workmen's Compensation Acts do not contain any express provision that the weekly payment during incapacity shall come to an end, or be reduced, if the workman unreasonably refuses to undergo a surgical operation or other medical treatment for the purpose of ending, or diminishing, the incapacity. This ground of relief to the employer is based on the view that, if the proximate cause of the continuing incapacity is the unreasonable refusal of a workman to avail himself of surgical or medical skill, it can no longer be said that the incapacity 'results from the injury' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 9, after the time when the rejected remedy might be confidently expected to bring about a cure."

Accordingly, the words "results from" have now been held to have the meaning which, apart from authority, I was disposed to assign to them, and the question which the arbitrator ought to put to himself in a case of this sort is whether the continuing incapacity is in the ordinary sense caused by the original injury or by the unskilful or negligent conduct of the doctor or surgeon. The form of the question is not meant to exclude and ought not to exclude in an appropriate case the answer that the original injury and the conduct of the doctor are each partly the cause of the continuing incapacity.

A question of causation is a question of fact, and it is none the less a question of fact though a finding that a particular event is the cause of another event, or of a particular condition of things, must involve the selection of the particular event as the cause out of the total complex of events and conditions which are necessary to the production of the given result and the treatment of the rest as a background which is practically irrelevant. It is thus that we proceed in ordinary practical affairs, and is thus that an arbitrator must also proceed in deciding a question of causation. The limits to the finality of a finding on causation by an arbitrator are that it, like other findings of fact, must not proceed on a misdirection in law and that it must be supported by legal evidence.

My Lords, the first proposition argued for the workman did not lack boldness. It was maintained that the learned arbitrator ought to have directed himself that, if the incapacity would not have existed if there had been no previous injury by accident, the incapacity must be attributed to the previous injury. It has often been said that Latin phrases cannot help to solve problems of causation, but they are sometimes so convenient a label that the careful avoidance of them becomes an inverted kind of pedantry. I will, therefore, not apologise for observing that the workman's argument is an attempt to set up the causa sine qua non as in law a sufficient basis for liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act. I think it unnecessary to spend further time in refuting an argument which is so opposed to the reasonable man's conception of causation. Counsel for the workman then fell back on the proposition that, if the workman acted reasonably in submitting to a surgical operation for the cure of his incapacity, the employer must be liable to pay compensation for any incapacity remaining after the operation, though it might be the consequence of the surgeon's ignorance or lack of skill or negligence. This is only the causa sine qua non applied as the ground of liability in the restricted field of injury by accident followed by medical and surgical treatment, and the restriction appears to be arbitrary. None of the authorities cited supports the proposition. I do not, however, intend to review them, for they were considered by DU PARCQ, L.J., in Rothwell v. Caverswall Stone Co., Ltd. (1). I agree with him and with my noble and learned friend on the Wool-sack that it is erroneous to regard the line of authority consisting of Humber Towing Co., Ltd. v. Barclay (2), Rocca v. Stanley Jones & Co., Ltd. (3) and Lakey v. Blair & Co., Ltd. (4) as inconsistent with the line of authority represented by Dunham v. Clare (5). The result of the authorities is stated by DU PARCQ, L.J., in the Rothwell case (1) in a passage which I would respectfully adopt.

[LORD MACDERMOTT then cited the passage from the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J. ([1944] 2 All E.R. 365), quoted by LORD SIMONDS in his opinion, and continued:] Three comments may be made: that in this formulation the question whether an incapacity results from the negligence or inefficient treatment of a doctor or from the injury by accident is treated as a question of fact; that no radical distinction is drawn between medical or surgical treatment and any other event which may have intervened and which may operate as a "new cause"; and, lastly, that it is assumed that neither the workman nor the employer had control over the event or act which is treated as the new cause. If either had had control the problem of liability would at once be easily solved. It must next be considered whether that formulation of the existing state of the law is also sound in law.

I start from the proposition, which seems to me to be axiomatic, that if a surgeon, by lack of skill or failure in reasonable care, causes additional injury or aggravates an existing injury and so renders himself liable in damages, the reasonable conclusion must be that his intervention is a new cause and that the additional injury or the aggravation of the existing injury should be attributed to it and not to the original accident. On the other hand, an operation prudently advised and skilfully and carefully carried out should not be treated as a new cause, whatever its consequences may be. A Court of Appeal would, therefore, be entitled to hold that an arbitrator had misdirected himself if he had made an award in favour of a workman in respect of an incapacity which he had found to be attributable to the surgeon's actionable negligence, or if he had refused to make an award where the injury by accident still subsisted, though in an aggravated form, after an operation prudently advised and properly carried out. But these limiting cases, which exemplify

A the duty of the court to decide questions of remoteness as matter of law, a duty which provides a necessary safeguard against aberrations from the standard of sound practical sense, are somewhat theoretical. For the issue before the arbitrator is not whether the surgeon's conduct was actionable, and a finding that it was actionable would be out of place. He must find the facts and among them the cause of the incapacity. If his finding is not repugnant to good sense, it cannot be set aside because a Court of Appeal may think that he has failed to place the surgeon's conduct at the correct point in the nicely graduated scale of human misfortune and fallibility that extends from venial error of judgment to actionable want of skill or negligence. That is a question on which judges and juries may differ and it is not to be solved by treating it as a question of law.

B In the present case the arbitrator found that the tenderness of the stump of the thumb, which was the subsisting injury and the cause of the existing incapacity, was the result of the ill-advised amputation. There was evidence to support the finding and I can find no misdirection apparent or latent. It was objected that the arbitrator had not found as a fact that the incapacity resulting from the original accident would have ceased if it had been suitably treated. I think that the law is accurately stated in the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., already referred to :—When the error of the surgeon is an error of omission by which the original incapacity is prolonged, the arbitrator, if he is satisfied that the incapacity would have wholly ceased but for the omission, may find that the existing incapacity results from the omission. This, however, is not a case of omission, and the objection is ill-founded when the surgeon's active intervention has been found to have been a new cause of a new incapacity, and that, I think, is the effect of the arbitrator's decision read in the light of the evidence. The arbitrator on the view which he took was, I think, entitled on the evidence to treat the original disability as displaced by a new disability.

E I would venture to add that the attribution of an incapacity to unreasonable refusal of treatment and the attribution of an incapacity to a misdirected, unskilful or negligent operation both rest on the same basis of experience that doctors and surgeons are generally to be trusted to give their patients prudent advice and to carry out treatment with reasonable care and skill; otherwise to refuse their advice might not be unreasonable, and the consequences of ill-directed or unskilful or negligent treatment might reasonably be regarded as the result of the original injury.

F I agree that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

G LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, it is necessary first to form a conclusion as to the precise meaning which should be attached to the briefly expressed findings of the learned county court judge, sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. I refer to him hereafter as "the arbitrator." He found that the operation carried out by Dr. Jones was "ill-advised," and I think he meant that it was ill-advised whether it was undertaken with the sole object of curing the pain whereof the workman complained, or wholly or partly with the object of removing the super-normal thumb, which the arbitrator described as a "congenital deformity." I think, also, that the arbitrator must have formed the view that the partial incapacity which existed immediately before the amputation would have disappeared in course of time. This seems to have been the view of Dr. Raw and Dr. Hedley Whyte and I think the arbitrator was accepting their evidence when he found that the incapacity existing at the time of the arbitration was "due to operation for congenital deformity which appears to have been ill-advised." As the arbitrator is the sole judge of fact under the Act, there are only two questions for this House to consider: (i) Did the arbitrator misdirect himself? (ii) If not, was there evidence on which the arbitrator could properly find that the incapacity existing at the date of the arbitration resulted from the operation and not from the original accident ?

In Humber Towing Co., Ltd. v. Barclay (2) the workman had broken both the bones of his forearm. A local bonesetter set the arm so negligently that the union was a vicious one and the arm became practically useless. The Court of Appeal thought that the proper question for the arbitrator to consider was whether the condition of the man, at the date of the arbitration, was due substantially to the original accident or to the mismanagement of the bonesetter. I think that in the present case the arbitrator must have asked himself a similar question, and if this is the right question for the arbitrator to consider, there can be no misdirection. It is said, however, on behalf of the workman, that this is the wrong question, and various other forms of question were suggested as being more appropriate. The Humber case (2) and other authorities were recently very fully considered by the Court of Appeal in Rothwell v. Caverswall Stone Co., Ltd. (1). In that case, the majority of the court held that the earlier cases on the subject were not contradictory or irreconcilable.

[LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON cited the propositions stated by DU PARCQ, L.J. ([1944] 2 All E.R. 365) in the Rothwell case (1), and continued :] I gratefully accept these propositions as correctly stating the law. When DU PARCQ, L.J., said (ibid.):

"This is so even if the negligence or inefficient treatment consists of an error of omission whereby the original incapacity is prolonged. In such a case, if the arbitrator is satisfied that the incapacity would have wholly ceased but for the omission, a finding of fact that the existing incapacity results from the new cause, and not from the injury, will be justified."

I think that the passage was based on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Rocca v. Stanley Jones & Co., Ltd. (3). In my view, however, Rocca's case (3) was one of improper treatment, and not of omission to treat: see the judgment of EVE, J. (7 B.W.C.C. 107) and the reference to Rocca's case (3) by LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R. (10 B.W.C.C. 64, 65) in Lahey v. Blair & Co., Ltd. (4). I am by no means satisfied that in the case of a mere omission to treat the injury, without any refusal of treatment by the workman, an arbitrator would be justified in finding that the incapacity resulted from anything other than the injury. I need not, however, pursue this matter, as the case now before your Lordships' House is far removed from a case in which there has been an error of omission. Later, DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 365):

"It is apparent that the line between those cases where a 'supervening cause' aggravates the injury and yet is not to be regarded as superseding the injury as the cause from which the incapacity results, and those others in which the cause is 'new' and the existing injury can be held to result from it alone, is a line which can only be drawn after a full examination of all the relevant facts, and then not with well-defined precision. No rule can be laid down by reference to which the arbitrator, having ascertained the facts, will be enabled to put the case infallibly on the right side of the line. If, however, he confines himself to the question formulated by LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in the Humber Towing Co.'s case (2), his own intelligence will be his surest guide, and he will, I think, be all the more likely to come to a right decision if he refuses to be drawn into a discussion of the more subtle refinements of the theory of causation."

My Lords, with these observations I entirely and respectfully agree, and they lead me to the conclusion that the arbitrator asked himself the correct question in the present case and that there was no misdirection.

I now turn to the question whether there was evidence on which the arbitrator could properly arrive at the conclusion that the workman's incapacity was due to the operation, and not to the original accident. The position at the time of the arbitration was that the workman had an existing partial incapacity for work. His right thumb had been removed and he had a stump, which, to quote Dr. Hedley Whyte, was "conical and tender." There is no doubt that it was this disability which, at that time, rendered it impossible for the workman to do more than light work, but there is equally no doubt that on June 19, 1946, the workman had suffered personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and if that injury had never occurred amputation would never have taken place. In these circumstances the arbitrator had to decide the question posed in the Humber case (2). It is true that the answer which he gave involves hardship to the workman, since the operation would never have been performed if the original accident had never occurred, and it cannot be said that the workman acted unreasonably in taking professional advice, and in submitting to the operation which was recommended by Dr. Jones. On the other hand, it may be said that hardship would result to the employers if they were held liable to pay compensation by reason of an operation which had been held as a fact to have been ill-advised. I think that the consideration of questions of hardship is of no real assistance in construing s. 9 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and I have endeavoured to disregard them. The arbitrator is the judge of fact, and, in my view, there was evidence on which he was justified in arriving at the findings of fact which I have already summarised. On these findings of fact he was justified in forming the conclusion that the workman's incapacity was due "substantially" to the ill-advised operation. This being so, whether or not I should have arrived at the same findings of fact on the evidence, I can see no ground for interfering with the award. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MACDERMOTT : My Lords, it is agreed that the appellant workman was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the respondents and also that he is partially incapacitated for work. The question for decision is whether on the facts and findings of fact the injury and the incapacity are so related as to satisfy the condition precedent to compensation which is laid down by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 9 (1), in the words, "where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury." The problem of causation thus presented necessarily hinges on the meaning and scope to be given to these words according to the true intentment of the Act, for the right to compensation is entirely statutory and independent of liability at common law. It will be convenient in the first place to consider this question of construction without reference to the series of decisions in the Court of Appeal which were cited during the argument.

My Lords, the outstanding purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Acts (in cases where death has not occurred) has been, from the beginning, to provide some means of livelihood for the workman who, by reason of accidental injury arising out of his employment, has suffered a loss of earning capacity. The relief thus afforded was a practical measure directed to the realities of a situation in which the injured workman was often without redress and unable to support himself or his dependants. With this background the words "results from" ought not, in my opinion, to be interpreted in a technical or narrow fashion or with undue regard for common law rules. I think they must be read in the light of common experience and prevailing conditions and as applicable to the sort of world which the ordinary injured workman has to face. They must be wide enough to span changes brought about by the conjoint effect of the injury and natural processes, whether anticipated or not. A trivial flesh wound admits some infection producing a permanent incapacity for work, or it acts on some existing condition so as to create a disability where there was none before. In neither case would it now be disputed that the incapacity "results from" the injury, although the latter has become but one of several causes, and not necessarily the outstanding cause at that. It is, I think, also clear that these words can embrace changes due to the conjoint effect of the injury and human intervention, but the extent to which this is so is not authoritatively defined, particularly in the field of surgical treatment, which is that germane to this appeal.

My Lords, it cannot be doubted that this legislation, with its references to medical referees, medical examinations and duly qualified medical practitioners, contemplated that a workman's injury might require surgical advice and treatment and that this might have some effect on the degree or duration of his incapacity. The workman's attitude to such treatment is, therefore, regarded as important. If he fails to submit to a medical examination (as required by ss. 17 and 18 of the Act of 1925) his rights are suspended. It may also be very relevant in applying the words of s. 9 (1), for, if the workman unreasonably refuses to undergo a surgical operation likely to terminate his incapacity, he cannot recover. That has been settled by a long series of cases including several decided in this House. The ratio decidendi appears sufficiently from the passage in the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Steele v. Robert George & Co. (1937), Ltd. (8) which reads thus ([1942] 1 All E.R. 448):

Now, if the workman has acted reasonably and a proper operation has been performed with skill and care, but without attaining the desired result—and it is common knowledge that that sometimes happens—the chain of causation must surely remain intact, and that must be the case even though there has been some change in the nature of the disabling condition as a consequence of the operation. If, for example, the amputation of a useless and disabling finger is advisable, but a skilled operation for the purpose leaves a tender stump which is equally incapacitating for work, I do not think it would occur to anyone to say that the operation was novus actus interveniens, and that the ultimate incapacity was not the result of the injury. In cases of this sort, s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1925 must be taken as envisaging, in accordance with the ordinary experience of mankind, the unsuccessful as well as the successful operation, and as wide enough to keep the former within the statutory channel of causation. But what if a proper operation, reasonably submitted to by the workman, is unsuccessful because of some negligence or inefficiency on the part of the surgeon? If that element makes a difference and suffices to break the chain of causation, it means that the treatment contemplated by the sub-section must, in its results, be without flaw or defect due to human failing or mistake. My Lords, I cannot think the legislature so intended. If I am correct in the views above expressed as to the background against which s. 9 (1) is to be read, I think it must follow that the terms of the sub-section are wide enough to allow for the fact that this is an imperfect world and that even the skilled and competent err on occasion. When, in order to rid himself of his incapacity for work, a workman reasonably submits himself to surgical treatment at the hands of a qualified practitioner, why should the risk of some error of judgment or some lack of efficiency on the part of the latter in the course of the treatment fall on the workman so as to rob him of his right to compensation ? I can see nothing in the statute to demand such a result which, to my mind, would be completely at variance with its true intent. Nor can I see how the view in favour of such a result can be maintained compatibly with the now firmly established doctrine of unreasonable refusal. It is difficult to understand how any refusal could be unreasonable if, however bright the prospects of operative treatment might be, the workman's advisers were justified in saying to him : " Before you decide you must remember that, if the surgeon—no matter how good he may be—fails to effect a cure because of some slip or mistake on his part, your right to compensation under the Act will be gone." It is one thing to venture on the personal risks of an operation and quite another to do that and hazard, in addition, the existing right of receiving a means of livelihood. I venture to think that it would be altogether alien to the spirit of this legislation were the employer entitled to say : " If you refuse this operation your compensation will stop ; but if you undergo it and it fails because of the surgeon's fault your compensation will stop in that case also." I can discern nothing in the Act to warrant the conclusion that it intended to put a reasonable workman on the horns of such a cruel dilemma. It will be remembered that, if the accident is due to negligence on the part of the workman, that, in itself, will not preclude him from the benefits of the Act unless, as provided by s. 1, it is of the grave nature therein described, and then only in certain circumstances. It would be strange, indeed, if the legislation, which thus ignores the workman's fault to such a degree, had the effect of terminating his compensation because, in the course of treatment which it contemplates, and which the workman is powerless to control, there was fault on the part of the surgeon.

My Lords, the foregoing observations, if well founded, do not mean that all untoward events following on the reasonable workman's submission to surgical aid come within what I have termed the statutory channel of causation. While, as it seems to me, s. 9 (1) plainly contemplates that mistakes may happen in the course of treatment, it is, I think, equally clear that it does not contemplate every mishap that may occur to the workman as a patient. Accordingly, if he gets burned because the hospital he has entered goes on fire, or if he is maimed because the ambulance taking him, say, from hospital to a convalescent home is involved in a street accident, I would not regard the sub-section as broad enough to link the resulting incapacity with the original injury. And I would be disposed to come to the same conclusion for the same reason in regard to acts of surgical negligence of such an exceptional kind that what has been done cannot fairly be related to an endeavour to cure or reduce the infirmity—as, e.g., where a workman loses a sound limb because the surgeon takes him for somebody else. As always, it is difficult to trace the dividing line, but I think it may be said, on the basis of the general considerations I have mentioned, that professional fault on the part of one to whom the workman has properly submitted himself will be within the statutory channel, and not novus actus, if it occurs in the course of advising or carrying out treatment with the intention of curing or reducing the workman's incapacity for work. In my opinion, there is no material distinction in this connection between fault in diagnosis or choice of treatment and fault in the actual process of treatment. If the workman reasonably submits to the ministrations of a skilled and duly qualified surgeon who happens to make a mistake, I do not think it matters for the purposes of s. 9 (1) whether the mistake was made before or during the operation.

It will be convenient at this stage to summarise the conclusions I would reach apart from authority and looking only to the terms and purpose of the statute. They may be stated thus. (i) It is within the contemplation of s. 9 (1) that an injured workman will seek skilled surgical aid, and that such aid will be as the world knows it, not always successful and sometimes at fault. (ii) If a workman reasonably seeks such aid, and, by some fault on the part of the surgeon in advice or treatment given to reduce or remove the incapacity, the workman is not cured but remains incapacitated, then the incapacity will be the result of the injury within the meaning of s. 9 (1).

My Lords, I am not aware of any decision binding this House to a different view of the law. In the Court of Appeal, however, another opinion has been maintained in a series of cases commonly called the Humber group and of which the most important are Humber Towing Co., Ltd. v. Barclay (2), Rocca v. Stanley Jones & Co., Ltd. (3), and Lakey v. Blair & Co., Ltd. (4). In my opinion, these decisions were wrong in law and should be overruled. In the Humber case (2) the court held that the county court judge ought to have found "one way or the other" whether the workman's condition "was or was not due substantially to the original accident or to the mismanagement of the bonesetter," the latter having produced a vicious union of the workman's forearm by his negligence. I do not think that was the right question. Neither in that decision nor those which followed it was an attempt made to ascertain the policy of the Act and the scope of its relevant words. The court seems to have assumed that, if there was one substantial cause, there could not be another. Whether the workman had acted reasonably in submitting to treatment by a bonesetter was not discussed in the judgment and there was, accordingly, no consideration of the important question whether the effect of treatment reasonably and properly submitted to was within the statutory channel. The succeeding cases in this group but emphasise the error. I need not examine their facts in detail. They have been reviewed in the vigorous dissenting judgment of SCOTT, L.J., in Rothwell v. Caverswall Stone Co., Ltd. (1), and I find myself in substantial agreement with his criticisms. I may observe, however, that in Lakey v. Blair & Co., Ltd. (4), it is plain that SCRUTTON, L.J., while regarding himself as bound by the earlier cases, was obviously alert to the other view, as in the course of his judgment he said (10 B.W.C.C. 66):

"I can quite understand its having been said, when an accident happens, it is reasonable for a man to go to a doctor, and there is nothing unreasonable in saying that the consequences of the accident are the consequences which happened to him from taking the reasonable course of going to a doctor, which may include that the doctor himself has made a mistake."

My Lords, the issue posed by the words of s. 9 (1) involves an issue of fact, but it cannot on that account be said that the enactment has left the arbitrator at large as to how he should decide it. Like many issues of fact, it has to be settled according to law and may be the subject of misdirection. It has to be decided in conformity with the scope and meaning of the words which the statute has used for effecting its purpose. The Humber case (2) did not decide that the issue was purely one of fact. It laid down a test to be applied and Rothwell's case (1) and this case, as well as others, were decided by the Court of Appeal on the basis that that test had become binding as a matter of law. If, as I think, the test was erroneous and insufficient to meet the requirements of the statute, it is not a sufficient answer to the present appeal to say, as do the employers, that the arbitrator was the sole judge of fact and that there was evidence to support his findings. The meaning of the Act must be ascertained and applied to his conclusions.

Counsel for the appellant workman relied on another group of Court of Appeal decisions, commencing with Dunham v. Clare (5), in which compensation was held to be payable although the death or incapacity was immediately due to some supervening cause of a natural kind—in most of the cases, a bacterial infection. These authorities did not raise any question of incompetent treatment and are, therefore, distinguishable on their facts from the Humber group. But, though this distinction may justify the view that the Court of Appeal was bound to follow that group on similar facts, I respectfully agree with the opinion of SCOTT, L.J., in Rothwell's case (1) that these two lines of authority conflict in their underlying principles. If I am right in the conclusions I have formed as to the meaning of the enactment, I think it must follow that there is no sound ground on which incapacity due to supervening bacterial infection can be distinguished from incapacity due to mistaken surgical treatment reasonably undergone by the workman. Both events are incidents of the everyday world and both, in my view, are recognised by the policy of this legislation. A It is unfortunate that Dunham v. Clare (5), the earliest of these decisions, was not considered in the Humber case (2), as, had it been, I cannot but think a closer approach to the intention of the statute would have followed.

I turn now to the facts material to this appeal. They must be gleaned from notes of the evidence and judgment which are meagre to a degree. It is regrettable that this should be so in a case of such importance to the workman and the operating surgeon. A careful scrutiny of all the available material makes it possible, however, to reach the following conclusions which are not, I believe, now in dispute. B (a) The operation for the removal of the whole top joint of the workman's right thumb was advised and performed by the operating surgeon as a cure for the pain due to the original injury which was then causing an incapacity for work. C (b) The operation, though performed with due competence, was unsuccessful in that it left a tender stump causing an incapacity for work. (c) The learned judge has found that the operation was "ill-advised." The facts on which he held this are too briefly stated to be weighed, but there was evidence to justify this finding and it must be accepted. (d) The workman acted reasonably in undergoing the operation. There is no express finding D on this, but it was not disputed and could not well be, having regard to the admitted facts. There was no suggestion that the operating surgeon was other than fully-qualified and competent and it is clear that the workman sought his aid on the advice of his own doctor, given when he complained of pain after a period of light work. My Lords, the finding that the operation was "ill-advised" means, at least, that it was not the apt way of dealing with the E limited problem of the pain caused by the unhealed fracture. I doubt if it means more, but its implications are open to question and it may be that it was intended as a finding that the treatment was wrong and the surgeon inefficient to the point of negligence. For the purposes of this opinion I shall so assume. The assumption, however, will not avail the employers if the conclusions at F which I have arrived as to the true construction of the statute are sound. From these it follows that the learned county court judge misdirected himself. He should have inquired (i) if the workman was reasonable in undergoing the operation, and (ii) if the surgeon's fault occurred in the course of advising or carrying out treatment aimed at curing the incapacity. As, had he done so, the answer to both questions would have been in the affirmative, I am of the opinion, for the reasons already given, that the appeal should succeed. I G would, therefore, allow it with costs here and in the courts below.

LORD REID : My Lords, the decision of this case depends on the true interpretation of the phrase "results from the injury" in s. 9 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. If personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment is caused to a workman, compensation is payable "where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury." H In the present case it is admitted that the workman's original incapacity resulted from injury by such an accident and that an incapacity still exists. The question is whether the workman's present incapacity results from that injury by accident.

There are many ways in which incapacity which was originally caused by injury by accident can be aggravated or prolonged by something which happens after the accident. It is clear that, if that subsequent event had nothing to do with the original injury and is now the sole cause of the incapacity, the present incapacity can no longer be held to result from the original injury.

The highest argument put forward for the workman was that, if a subsequent event could not have happened but for the original injury, then anything that results from that subsequent event must be held to result from the original injury. That would mean that, if the ambulance taking the injured man to hospital were involved in a road accident and the man was killed, or if he died as a result of food poisoning in the hospital, his death would result from the injury by accident. Assuming that the man's injury had not so weakened him as to contribute to the fatal result, I would hold in such a case that the death did not result from the injury. I think that the word "results" here implies a degree of causation which does not exist merely because one event could not have happened if another had not happened first.

On the other hand, it is not necessary that the injury by accident should be the sole or even the chief cause of the present incapacity in order that that incapacity should result from the injury. In Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Co. (9) the workman had sustained injury by accident to his knee which was sufficient to cause incapacity. He then contracted disease of his heart which was also sufficient to cause incapacity. His contracting this disease had nothing to do with the injury. His incapacity was, therefore, not solely due to the injury, but it was held to result from the injury so as to entitle him to compensation. In Laverick v. William Gray & Co., Ltd. (10) an injury by accident to the man's finger was aggravated by syphilis so that the finger had to be amputated. The arbitrator found that, if there had not been this aggravation, amputation would not have been necessary, and it was almost certain that the man would have been fit for work before the date of his decision. SWINFEN EADY, M.R., said (121 L.T. 292):

"It is the original trouble resulting from the accident aggravated by syphilis that the workman is now suffering from, and not merely this subsequently contracted disease."

In this case the principle was adopted which was applied in Doolan v. Henry Hope & Sons, Ltd. (11). That was also a case of subsequently contracted disease and BANKES, L.J., put the question thus (119 L.T. 17):

"Is the workman's condition of which he is complaining in fact due to the original injury, whatever it was, aggravated by infection or disease, or is his condition in fact due to infection or disease quite independent of the original injury?"

On the facts of the case it was held that the subsequent entry of the disease germ was a severable and independent cause and that the incapacity did not result from the original injury. It does not matter that the subsequent aggravating event was not a natural or probable result of the original injury. In Dunham v. Clare (5) erysipelas set in and the man died. This was a most unusual development, but it was held that the question was: Did the death in fact result from the injury?—and not: Was it a natural and probable result of the injury? The words of COLLINS, M.R., have often been quoted with approval. He said ([1902] 2 K.B. 296):

"The question whether death resulted from the injury resolves itself into an inquiry into the chain of causation. If the chain of causation is broken by a novus actus interveniens, so that the old cause goes and a new one is substituted for it, that is a new act which gives a fresh origin to the after-consequences."

It is needless to cite further authorities. Leaving aside for the moment the cases when the new cause which prolongs the incapacity is wrong medical or surgical treatment or an unreasonable refusal to undergo treatment, I think that it has been rightly established as regards all other cases that death or incapacity can be the result of more than one cause and that, if one of its causes is injury by accident, that is sufficient to bring the case within the Act. An incapacity may result from the injury although it also results at the same time from another independent cause. If liability to pay compensation is to cease, not only must a new cause of incapacity come in, but the old must go out : there must no longer be any causal connection between the injury by accident and the present incapacity.

A Is the rule the same when the new cause which prolongs the incapacity is wrong medical or surgical treatment ? The first of the series of cases which deal with this matter is Humber Towing Co., Ltd. v. Barclay (2). In that case the workman, who had both bones in his forearm broken by an accident, went to a bonesetter and the bones were so badly set that complete recovery was not possible. In an application by the employers for review, the arbitrator did not deal with the question of what was the cause of the man's incapacity at that time and on appeal the case was sent back. COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said (5 B.W.C.C. 144) that the arbitrator :

" . . . ought to have found one way or the other whether the condition of the man when he came before him was or was not due substantially to the original accident or to the mismanagement of the bonesetter."

C The next case in the series is Rocca v. Stanley Jones & Co., Ltd. (3). In that case the setting of a bone was found to be "a case of very bad surgery." The arbitrator found that, if the workman had been properly treated, he would already have recovered. EVANS, P., said (7 B.W.C.C. 104) that the arbitrator had found :

D " . . . that although there was an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment of this man, the incapacity from which the man was suffering, and in respect of which he was seeking compensation, was not due to the accident at all, but was due to the treatment he received at the hospital."

E The next case is Lakey v. Blair & Co., Ltd. (4). There the workman had suffered injury by accident to his big toe. Three doctors, including a specialist chosen by the man's own doctor, thought that amputation was unnecessary, but the man's own doctor thought otherwise, and the toe was amputated. It was held that the amputation was unnecessary and that the man's subsequent incapacity was due to the unnecessary operation and not to the original injury. The employer was, therefore, not liable to pay compensation. SCRUTTON, L.J., said (10 B.W.C.C. 66) :

F "The learned county court judge has asked himself the very question which two Courts of Appeal have said is the right one : Was the present condition due to the effects of the accident, or to the improper treatment by his doctor ?"

G If this is the correct test in all cases when there has been inefficient medical treatment, it prevents the arbitrator from finding that the man's incapacity is due both to the original injury and to the wrong medical treatment : it requires him to choose between these two causes and, presumably, to choose whether it is now the original injury or the wrong medical treatment which is chiefly responsible for the man's condition. Dunham v. Clare (5) was not cited in any of these cases and there was no discussion whether the question approved in these cases implied a different test from that which had been approved in other cases dealing with novus actus interveniens, or whether there was any justification for a different test in this class of case.

H I have stressed the difference between the form in which questions were framed in these different cases because I think that it may largely account for the diverging lines of authority. Whether the incapacity were prolonged by the unlikely entry of a germ or by the equally unlikely inefficiency of the doctor, I think that, if the question were put as BANKES, L.J., put it in Doolan

v. Hope (11)—Is the workman's condition now due to the original injury aggravated by the infection (or the doctor's treatment) or is it due to the infection (or treatment) quite independently of the original injury?—in most cases the answer would be that it was due to the original injury aggravated by the infection (or treatment). But, if the question were put in the same cases as SCRUTTON, L.J., put it in Lakey v. Blair & Co., Ltd. (4)—Was the present condition due to the effects of the accident or to (the infection or) the improper treatment by his doctor?—in most cases the answer would be that it was due to the infection or the improper treatment. I can see no difference in principle between the two classes of case. An injured man is equally unable to avoid the risk of his injury being aggravated by the invasion of a germ and the risk of it being aggravated by human error. I agree with the expression of opinion by LORD GREENE, M.R., in this case ([1948] 1 All E.R. 131):

“ . . . an incapacity caused immediately by unskilful treatment may, in truth, be due to the accident, and, on any proper theory of causation, ought to be attributed to the accident and not to the unskilful treatment, provided that recourse to the treatment was the natural and reasonable consequence of the accident.”

I would prefer to make a slight modification and to say that it ought to be attributed to the accident as well as to the unskilful treatment. It is enough that the accident is a cause of the present incapacity—it need not be the sole cause.

The first case in which there was a full citation of authority was Rothwell v. Caverswall Stone Co., Ltd. (1). In that case it was found that under proper treatment the man's incapacity would not have lasted more than six weeks, and that his incapacity after that time was wholly due to negligent treatment by the doctor. For the employers it was argued that, on the authority of the three cases to which I have just referred, the man was no longer entitled to compensation. SCOTT, L.J., took the view that these cases were inconsistent with the line of cases beginning with Dunham v. Clare (5), that it was, therefore, open to the Court of Appeal to reconsider the matter, that the principle established in these latter cases ought to prevail, and that the workman ought to succeed. LUXMOORE, L.J., and DU PARCQ, L.J., held that the two lines of authority were not necessarily inconsistent and that they must follow the line of authority beginning with the Humber Towing Co. case (2) and decide against the workman. I think that they were right in so holding. It might be right where the new cause which prolonged the incapacity was wrong medical treatment to apply a different test from that applied when the new cause was of another kind: there would be no inconsistency in doing so. The question whether there ought to be this difference was not open to the Court of Appeal in Rothwell's case (1) and it was not open to the Court of Appeal in the present case, but I think that it is open to your Lordships.

I do not think that much assistance towards the decision of the present case can be got from the authorities which have established the rule that, if an injured workman unreasonably refuses to undergo treatment and it can be shown that the proposed treatment would in all probability have ended his incapacity, he is no longer entitled to compensation. In the most recent case in this House, Steele v. Robert George & Co. (1937), Ltd. (8), the rule was said by LORD WRIGHT ([1942] 1 All E.R. 450) to be “a piece of judicial legislation.” I do not find difficulty in accounting for a rule which prevents a man from taking advantage of his own unreasonableness by claiming compensation which he could not have claimed if he had acted reasonably. I think that prolongation of a man's incapacity by his doctor's negligence resembles prolongation by infection of the wound much more closely than it resembles prolongation by the man's own unreasonableness, and I see no reason why an exceptional rule which applies when a man has been unreasonable should also apply when he has been unlucky in his doctor.

I recognise that a rule which has stood for nearly forty years ought not lightly to be altered. If it seemed likely that arrangements for the future have been made in reliance on what appeared to be settled law, that would be a strong reason for maintaining the existing rule. But, if this appeal is allowed,

A I do not see how any such embarrassment can follow. It may be that a certain number of cases will be found to have been decided or settled adversely to the workman which ought to have been decided or settled otherwise. But that does not appear to me to be a sufficient reason for refusing compensation now, if your Lordships should think that on a correct interpretation of the statute the learned arbitrator has misdirected himself and that compensation is due.

B What then is the existing position of the law? I should like to adopt the statement of DU PARCQ, L.J. ([1944] 2 All E.R. 365) in *Rothwell's case(1).

Let me, however, now assume that it is too late to review the rule that wrong medical treatment may break the chain of causation so that its effect cannot be held to result from the original injury. I do not think that it has ever been

C decided what degree of error or inattention is necessary to bring this rule into operation. It is clear that there are many cases of wrong treatment which cannot have this effect. A medical man may have to act in an emergency or in circumstances where there are no facilities for full diagnosis, or he may be given wrong or inadequate information by the patient or those looking after him. Moreover, there must be a permissible margin of error even for the doctor or surgeon who is highly efficient: the highest degree of skill on every occasion cannot be expected of any man. It could not, I think, be maintained that the chain of causation is broken by a mistake which is not in any degree blameworthy. Treatment by a doctor whose skill had never been of the highest order, whose methods were rather out of date and who had no access to elaborate equipment, might well be much less efficient than the treatment which

E would have been given by a first-class specialist equipped with every modern discovery and invention, and the difference might easily lead to the prolongation of an incapacity which would otherwise have been completely cured. I do not think that such a degree of inefficiency has ever been held to be novus actus interveniens. I do not find in any of the cases any warrant for applying the doctrine of novus actus interveniens unless there has been grave lack of skill

F or care on the part of the doctor. Indeed, I think that the dividing line between that degree of lack of skill or care which may break the chain of causation and that degree which will not ought to be the dividing line between that degree of lack of skill or care which may make the doctor liable in damages and that which will not.

I now turn to consider what in the present case was the fault of the doctor

G concerned. No lack of care has been suggested. The employers' case must be that the decision of Dr. Webb Jones to amputate the whole top joint of the workman's thumb involved such a lack of professional skill as to amount to novus actus interveniens, or, rather, that the facts found by the learned county court judge were such as to entitle him to reach that result. The notes of the learned judge, even with the additional notes accepted in the Court of Appeal,

H are so brief as to make it difficult to be sure what his findings of fact were. It is possible that he intended to find that in amputating the whole joint Dr. Webb Jones had a double object: that the operation was intended not only to remove the pain which resulted from the injury by accident and was at that time the cause of the workman's incapacity, but also to avoid the chance of further trouble by removing the whole of the deformed joint. But I do not think that this was the finding of the learned arbitrator. Dr. Webb Jones' evidence, according to the notes was:

"Sept. 3, 1946. Dryburn Emergency Hospital X-rayed un-united fracture. Complained of pain. Advised amputation because of pain. On Sept. 5—not because of double joint."

There was apparently no cross-examination directed to show that stopping the pain was not his sole object and that, in fact, it was because of the double joint that he decided to do as he did. It was never put to him that, if his sole object had been to stop the pain, a less extensive operation would have sufficed. A I agree with the analysis of the evidence and the findings by LORD GREENE, M.R., and with his conclusion that the judge was not questioning the truthfulness of Dr. Jones when he said why he performed the operation. It follows that the amputation was an operation intended, and solely intended, to remedy the effects of the accident. But the learned judge has found that it was a bad operation for this purpose. That it would have been a good operation if performed for a different purpose appears to me to be quite irrelevant. Once B it is clear that Dr. Jones was acting with the sole object of remedying the injury by accident, the only question is whether he acted with such lack of medical skill that his operation amounted to novus actus interveniens. The only finding of the learned judge which reflects on Dr. Jones' skill is that the operation was "ill-advised." This is not amplified in any way. I accept it C as a finding that Dr. Jones made an error of judgment, but it does not, in my opinion, amount to a finding that this was a culpable error or an error which a reasonably skilful and careful doctor would not have made, and there does not appear to have been any evidence which would have justified a finding D to this effect. I am not prepared to hold that an action by a medical man against which nothing can be said except that it was ill-advised is sufficient to bring the case within the principle of the earlier cases. In the Humber Towing Co. case (2) the workman went to a bonesetter, and the result was a condition which a qualified doctor could only have produced by grave negligence. It is worthy of note that in that case what COZENS-HARDY, M.R., thought wrong (5 B.W.C.C. 143) was that the employer should be :

" . . . an insurer of the medical man, the chemist, and the nurse who attended the man, and . . . liable in the event of any of them being guilty of gross negligence, which gross negligence might be found as a fact to be the real cause of the disability at the time the matter came before the county court judge." E

I do not think that COZENS-HARDY, M.R., would have said the same if all that had been said against the treatment was that it was ill-advised. In Rocca's case (3) the setting of the bone was found to be a case of very bad surgery. In Lahey's case the workman's doctor obstinately persisted in a course which he knew was disapproved by a number of other doctors, including a specialist. I see no reason why the scope of these authorities should be extended, and I think that it would have to be extended if it is to cover the present case. F G On this ground, also, I think that the appeal should be allowed.

There is a further reason which is of some importance. There is no finding that any other treatment would have been successful or even would probably have been successful in curing the workman's incapacity before the date of the arbitrator's decision. No doubt, an express finding to this effect might be dispensed with, if it could be inferred from the notes that some alternative H treatment had been suggested and accepted by the arbitrator as likely to lead to recovery before that date, but it is a feature of this case that no witness appears to have given definite evidence as to what ought to have been done to cure the pain or how long the incapacity would have lasted under proper treatment. So far as I am aware, it has never been held that novus actus interveniens is a reason for stopping compensation from the date of the novus actus : before compensation can be stopped it is essential to prove that, if there had been no novus actus, the incapacity resulting from the original injury would have ceased. It was argued that that is not necessary in this case because here the operation did not prolong the old incapacity: it created a new incapacity in respect of which no compensation is payable. If that were so, it would, I think, necessarily mean that, from the day of the operation which removed the cause of the old incapacity, no more compensation was due, because the old incapacity had gone: and it would not matter that, if there had been no operation, the original incapacity would have continued in existence and compensation would still have been payable for a considerable time. Hitherto, the doctrine of novus actus interveniens has operated so as to relieve the employer from paying more than he would have had to pay if there had been no novus actus. It would be novel and, I think, unjustifiable to hold that wrong medical treatment allows the employer to pay less than he would have had to pay if the right treatment had been applied. But, unless that novel view is accepted, compensation cannot be terminated until the time has come when the right treatment would have ended the incapacity, and there is nothing to show that that time has come in this case.

Re REES' WILL TRUSTS. WILLIAMS v. HOPKINS AND OTHERS.

Will—Gift to trustees as trustees—Validity.

A testator, after appointing his friend H. and his solicitor W. to be executors and trustees of his will (thereinafter referred to as "my trustees"), devised and bequeathed all his property, subject to the payments of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, to "my trustees absolutely they well knowing my wishes concerning the same and [I] direct them to permit my brother L.J.R. to have and receive the rents and profits of my property at V. . . . during his lifetime." L.J.R. predeceased the testator. Before signing his will the testator had intimated to H. and W. that he desired them after his death to make certain gifts, which amounted in value to some £8,000, and he then told them that they were to have the surplus for their own use. His residuary estate amounted to more than £30,000.

HELD: on the true construction of the will, the gift was made to H. and W. as trustees, and, the court being bound to disregard any evidence to the contrary, they were not beneficially entitled to the surplus.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Thomas Richard Rees, an absolute gift to trustees (as such) imported a gift to them beneficially of a surplus fund remaining after certain wishes communicated to them by the testator during his lifetime had been complied with. VAISEY, J., held that there was no gift beneficially to the trustees. The facts appear in the judgment. A

VAISEY, J.: This summons primarily raises a pure question of construction, and the document which falls to be construed is the will of the Rev. Thomas Richard Rees, who died on Sept. 9, 1944. By cl. 2 of the will, which was dated July 29, 1936, the testator, after revoking former wills, appointed two persons to be executors and trustees of the will. One was a great friend of his, Thomas Hopkins; the other was his trusted legal adviser, a solicitor, Mr. Roger Williams, who had acted for him for many years and was, no doubt, much in his confidence. Those two persons were stated by the testator to be referred to in the latter part of his will as "my trustees." Clause 3 contains a devise and bequest of the whole of the testator's property, subject to the payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, to the two persons I have named whom he calls, as he said he would, "my trustees." That gift is expressed to be made to them absolutely, and then follow the words: "they well knowing my wishes concerning the same." After that the testator directs them to permit his brother, who, in fact, predeceased him, "to have and receive the rents and profits" of certain specified property during his brother's lifetime. The will also contained a charging clause which authorised Mr. Roger Williams to make professional charges, a privilege which is expressed to extend also to any other solicitor, accountant, or other professional person who might become an executor of the will. On Mar. 2, 1945, probate of the will was granted to the two executors. The testator left a residuary estate amounting to upwards of £30,000 in value. The executor, Thomas Hopkins, died on Sept. 12, 1945, and his legal personal representatives are before the court as defendants. C D E F

The summons is supported by an affidavit of Mr. Roger Williams which I regard as a most proper and candid account of the circumstances which it was right to lay before the court. He tells me that the testator, who was a bachelor, had no near relations except the brother named in the will and a number of cousins; that the testator's chief concern seemed to have been for his brother's welfare, and that he had, so far as the deponent knew, no interest in or contact with the cousins; and that the testator frequently discussed what he should do with his property, and mentioned, in addition to his desire that his brother should be provided for, that a certain housekeeper should be rewarded for her services, and that there should be gifts, including charitable gifts, to other persons and objects. The testator appears to have had no definite wishes, but to have said at some time that he did not want any of his property to go to any relative other than his brother. In the end, after discussion, the testator decided to leave his estate, as he did, to the deponent, Mr. Williams, and his friend Thomas Hopkins in trust as regards the specifically described property for this brother for life on the understanding that effect should be given to G H certain wishes which he had communicated to them before signing his will. The wishes he desired the trustees to implement were nine in number and consisted of gifts of sums amounting to about £8,000 in favour of various named persons, a church, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Diocesan Pensions Board, and the housekeeper to whom I have already referred, who was to have his house and contents and the sum of £1,000. Then this statement appears in the affidavit: "Any surplus was to be retained by us for our own use." The deponent, Mr. Williams, very properly, felt somewhat uneasy as to the form of the will, and, indeed, pressed the testator to make another will in more explicit terms, but the testator relied on his friends to do what was right and proper and in the end he did not make any further disposition.

Nobody disputes or doubts that the particular directions which the testator indicated to the trustees must be carried out, but the difficulty arises with regard to what is to be done with the substantial surplus. I think that it is not unreasonable to suppose that, if the testator could be heard to say what he wanted or what he meant by his will, he would say that he wanted Mr. Williams and Mr. Hopkins to share that surplus between them, but it is a well settled principle of law that if, on the true construction of a will, a gift is made to a person as a trustee, evidence is not admissible to show that he was intended to take beneficially. For that proposition, Irvine v. Sullivan (1) and Croome v. Croome (2) are authorities. It is a principle which may (and, possibly, in this case does) operate to defeat pro tanto the wishes of the testator. That being the general principle of law, I turn again to the will. These two people were not only appointed executors; they were also appointed trustees. The trusts which they were intended to carry out are somewhat difficult to define, although, undoubtedly, they include the life interest of the brother in the property indicated in the will and also the carrying out of the known wishes of the testator to which I have already alluded.

There is a good deal of authority on this matter which is very well summarised in THEOBALD ON WILLS, 10th ed., p. 339. If I could have construed this will as though it were a gift to these two persons subject to the performance of certain trusts a different position would have arisen, but, in my judgment, this is plainly a gift to these two persons as trustees. They were so closely connected with the testator that it would not be surprising if he chose them to be the objects of his bounty in view of his lack of near relatives, but this case is not the same as those cases in which the legatees were in the position of a son or a parent or a fiancée, as in Irvine v. Sullivan (1). These persons are here only named in the will as executors and trustees. In so short a will as this, one would have thought that the emphasis in cl. 2 whereby they were appointed to those offices was something which could hardly have been forgotten in the latter parts of the document.

The statement of law in the passage to which I have referred in THEOBALD at p. 339 is as follows:

"If there is a gift intended to be beneficial to the legatee, and an obligation is then imposed on the legatee, which does not exhaust the subject-matter of the gift, the effect is the same as if it were a gift subject to the obligation. The case is more difficult if there is a gift to several persons as joint tenants subject to trusts and those persons are also executors or trustees of the will. In such a case the donees prima facie do not take beneficially, though there may be expressions in the will sufficient to give them the beneficial interest subject to the performance of the trusts. If the gift is upon trust, prima facie the donee can take nothing beneficially, though the trusts declared may not exhaust the property. But the question is one of construction upon the whole will, and where the donee in trust is a wife or relative, whom the testator may be supposed to have intended to provide for, and there are other circumstances to assist the construction, the proper conclusion may be that the donee is to take subject only to the partial trust declared. Words indicating an intention that the donee is to take beneficially, such as for his own use and benefit, or absolutely, are of course of great weight in rebutting a trust."

In Irvine v. Sullivan (1) the testator appointed A., B. and C. as trustees and gave them his property on trust for sale. Then he gave the residue to the lady to whom he was betrothed trusting "she will carry out my wishes with regard to the same with which she is fully acquainted." There it was held that the lady in question took the estate beneficially. At first sight the facts were not unlike the facts here, but they seem to me to differ in several respects including, in particular, that there trustees of the will were named and appointed to carry out the trusts and the lady who was engaged to be married to the testator was the sort of person for whom one would assume that it was likely he would wish to provide. In Croome v. Croome (2) the opening words of the judgment of COTTON, L.J., are a useful guide to the solution of this kind of controversy, but they are of general application and do not really refer to the difficulty arising in the present case, which is that the alleged beneficiaries are, in fact, described as, and, undoubtedly, are for many purposes, trustees of the will itself. I was also referred to Re Foord (3) where there was a gift to a sister, the will being a very inartistic, home-drawn one. The words there were: "All my effects I leave absolutely to my sister on trust to pay my wife £300 a year." It was held that the sister took the property subject to the annuity.

In the present case, however, I construe this will as a gift to the trustees as trustees who had bound themselves in honour to carry out the directions the testator had given to them. Even assuming that the testator, as I think I probably may, had expressed the wish that they should take the surplus, I still think, having regard to the words of this will, that I should be unable to hold that they did become beneficially entitled. I do not say that I cannot receive evidence of the wish so expressed as part of the story, but it seems to me that, if I held that these two legatees could take the property absolutely, although, as a matter of construction, they were designated throughout the will as trustees, I should be disregarding the principle of equity which I have mentioned. If I hold, as I do, that, on the true construction of this will, the gift is made to them as trustees, evidence to show that they were intended to take beneficially is evidence to which I am bound to pay no attention.

The only effect which I can give to this will in equity is to say that these two persons became trustees (a) for the particular beneficiaries indicated in Mr. Williams' affidavit, and (b) as regards the surplus fund, for the statutory next of kin of the testator and not for themselves. The costs of all parties as between solicitor and client must be taxed and paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

Order accordingly.

THE COMPANY v. MINISTRY OF FUEL AND POWER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), February 23, 1949.]

Coal—Nationalisation of industry—Interim income—“Last complete accounting period”—Accounts of company made up quarterly, but embodied in annual account—Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (c. 59), s. 22 (3) (c).

A The Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 22, which deals with the method of satisfying the right of expropriated concerns to interim income, provides by sub-s. (3): (c) . . . a concern's . . . comparable ascertained revenue . . . shall be taken to be either . . . the amount of its profits and gains . . . computed on income tax principles subject to such adaptations as may be prescribed, for its last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946, or the average of the amounts of its profits and gains . . . computed for its two complete accounting periods last before July 1 in the years 1944 and 1945 respectively (any such amount for any accounting period of more or less than twelve months being adjusted to a twelve months' equivalent thereof).

C A company from the date of its incorporation made up its accounts quarterly on the last day of March, June, September, and December, and each quarterly account was audited and entered in the company's private ledger. Until 1938 for the purposes of income tax the figures for the four quarters ending in December in each year were aggregated, but thereafter the accounts for the four quarters ending in September in each year were combined, and the combined account as on September 30 was also entered in the private ledger. The annual account presented to the annual general meeting of shareholders was the September account, the quarterly accounts not being presented. The company elected to have the computation under s. 22 (3) (c) based on its last complete accounting period.

E HELD: the last complete accounting period for the purposes of s. 22 (3) (c) was the quarter ending on June 30, 1946.

G ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the “last complete accounting period” of the plaintiff company for the purposes of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 22 (3) (c). The facts appear in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote.

Wilfrid Hunt for the company.

McMullen for the Minister of Fuel and Power.

H VAISEY, J.: This summons raises a very short, but not easy, question as to the interpretation of a section of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946. By s. 19 (2) of that Act it is provided that a nationalised company, if I may so call it, is entitled to certain interim income for a period between what is described in the Act as a primary vesting date and the date on which the final compensation is to be satisfied. That interim income is to be paid and computed in accordance with the provisions of s. 22 of the Act, and that computation is directed to be based on income tax principles by reference to the profits of the company for its last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946, or an average of its profits over two such periods. The choice is, apparently, that of the company in question. In the present case the plaintiffs, the New Rock Colliery Co., Ltd., elected to choose its last complete accounting period and not an average of two periods. At the end of s. 22 (3) (c) are these words: "any such amount for any accounting period of more or less than twelve months being adjusted to a twelve months' equivalent thereof." Those A words, in my judgment, plainly indicate that the relevant accounting period may be twelve months, less than twelve months, or more than twelve months, according, I suppose, to the practice of the company or concern claiming the benefit of the interim income.

The facts in the present case are somewhat unusual in that the plaintiff company has ever since its incorporation had its accounts made up and balance B sheet produced quarterly for the periods ending on the last days of the months of March, June, September and December. I am further told that in the preparation of each such quarterly account it has always been the company's practice to make an inventory and valuation of stock at the accounting date, C to bring the valuation into account, to make various adjustments, and to create appropriate reserves, each quarterly account being audited as soon as possible after the end of the quarter and written up in the company's private D ledger. To compute the company's income tax liability, the practice down to 1938 was to add together the income of the four quarters of the calendar year, that is, the year ending on Dec. 31, but after 1938 the four accounts taken were those preceding Sept. 30, and the combined account as on Sept. 30 in each year was written up in the private ledger. The private ledger, therefore, contains not only the quarterly accounts as they were made up every E three months, but also the combined account as made up for the four quarters ending Sept. 30 in each year. The accounts presented to the shareholders at the annual general meeting were the four quarterly accounts combined into one account in respect of the year ending, in recent years, on Sept. 30, and the necessary auditor's certificate was appended thereto. The shareholders at the annual general meeting did not receive the quarterly accounts.

The figures in the present case work out like this. If we take the three months which ended on June 30, 1946, as being the last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946, we get a figure of approximately £21,500 per annum, the three months' profit being £5,382. If we take the twelve months ending F on June 30, 1946, we get a total of £13,492, whereas, if we go back to the twelve months ending on Sept. 30, 1945, we get the much smaller figure of £2,278. In those circumstances the company ask me to decide that the three months ending on June 30, 1946, constitute the last complete accounting period for the purposes of the sub-section, whereas, on the other hand, the Minister of Fuel and Power contends that the last complete accounting period was the period of twelve months ending on Sept. 30, 1945, that being the period covered G by the combined account which was laid before the shareholders at the last annual general meeting. It seems that this company was a private company in the true sense of that expression, that is to say, there were only two shareholders, both of whom were directors. The general meeting was, no doubt, a pure formality, and there was no substantial difference between the meetings to whom the quarterly accounts were presented and those to whom the annual accounts H were presented.

I have been referred to Jenkins Productions, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) where a somewhat similar question arose under other statutory provisions. There the company had, not quarterly accounts, but half-yearly accounts, and the two half-yearly accounts were, apparently, combined and submitted to the shareholders in one annual account. On the facts of that case MACNAGHTEN, J., upheld the contention of the company that the six-monthly period was the appropriate accounting period. That decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and it was held (170 L.T. 293) :

“ . . . that the twelve-monthly account was truly made up notwithstanding there were available the interim six-monthly accounts for the auditors. The twelve-monthly account was submitted to the shareholders and was therefore a final account, which the six-monthly accounts were not.”

A LORD GREENE, M.R., giving a judgment with which the Lords Justices agreed, said (ibid., 294 ; [1944] 1 All E.R. 612) :

B “ Having regard to the fact that the twelve-monthly account in this case is nothing but a compilation from the six-monthly accounts, it is contended you cannot say that the twelve-monthly account is made up at all. In my opinion, that is an argument which will not bear examination. It seems to me that the twelve-monthly account is truly made up, notwithstanding that, there being available certain interim accounts, the auditors, in order to produce the twelve-monthly account, did not have to re-examine the books ; the material was there all ready to hand and they used it . . . Here you have a company which in fact did prepare two different sets of accounts ; one a six-monthly account prepared for the convenience of the directors ; the other a twelve-monthly account prepared for the information of the shareholders. That twelve-monthly account is one which has certain characteristics. First of all, it is to be submitted to the shareholders, who are entitled to approve or disapprove it. Therefore, in that sense, it is a final account in a way in which the accounts produced to the directors for the six months were not final accounts at all. Secondly, the accounts so submitted to the shareholders were submitted in pursuance of the statutory obligation to submit accounts. It seems to me, bearing those two considerations in mind, that the yearly accounts are primarily the more important of the two sets of accounts which this company in fact got out. Applying the language of this section to that state of affairs, which of these two sets of accounts is properly to be described as ‘ the accounts of the trade or business ’ ? Surely there can be only one answer to that question. The accounts are the important final accounts. It seems to me that these words have to be construed in the light of the well-known practice of companies to have a financial period. A company’s financial period is commonly thirteen months ; and accounts are got out in reference to that financial period. When the paragraph speaks of the accounts being ‘ made up,’ it surely must mean the accounts which are the accounts for the purposes of the company’s financial unit of time.”

For those reasons the appeal from MACNAGHTEN, J.’s judgment was allowed.

G In the present case the words of the Act are somewhat different. The reference is to “ the last complete accounting period,” and there is in the concluding words which I have quoted a distinct indication in the terms of the Act itself that the accounting period may be more or less than twelve months, a necessary adjustment for a twelve months’ equivalent being provided for. I have come to the conclusion that those final words make all the difference, and, although I am anxious not to say anything which in any way conflicts with the judgment in Jenkins Productions, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), it seems to me that here we have an indication that the last accounting period, whether it be twelve months or something else, is the one which is relevant in such a case as the present. It cannot be disputed on the evidence that the company did account quarterly. There is no evidence that the combined account was anything but the most formal combination of the four preceding quarterly accounts. Here we have a company which, with no ulterior object in view, but merely as a matter of the legitimate arrangement of its own private affairs, has for years made up its accounts, had them audited, and entered them in its ledger on a quarterly basis. Therefore, I think that the "last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946," was the three months' period which ended on June 30, 1946, and I so decide.

Declaration accordingly with costs.

DENNIS & CO., LTD. v. MUNN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ., and Jenkins, J.), February 22, 23, 1949.]

Building—Control Licence for specific work—General authority to spend £10 and £2 a month without licence—Whether additional to work covered by specific licence—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927), reg. 56A (1), (2) (as amended)—Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 74), art. 2 (1), (2).

By the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, the carrying out of certain building work is made unlawful except in so far as there is in force in respect thereof a licence granted by the Minister of Works. By a proviso to para. (2) of the regulation the Minister may by Order authorise the carrying out of work without a licence within such limits of cost as may be specified in the Order. In pursuance of this power the Minister, by the Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947, authorised the carrying out without licence of work on any single property, between Feb. 1, and July 31, 1947, costing not more than £2 a month, and, in addition work costing not more than £10 over the total period. The plaintiffs, who were builders, carried out work for the defendant costing £50 under the mistaken belief that a licence was in force for that amount whereas in fact the licence authorised the expenditure of only £34 15s. 0d. The work was carried out during two months of the period covered by Order No. 8, and the plaintiffs claimed to recover, not only the £34 15s. 0d. covered by the licence, but also the free allowance of £10 plus £2 for each of the two months, a total of £14 extra.

HELD : the liberty to spend £2 a month plus £10 given by the Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947, could not be prayed in aid to increase the amount authorised to be spent by the specific licence.

[EDITORIAL NOTE : The Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947, has been superseded by the Control of Building Operations (No. 12) Order, 1948 (S.R. & O., 1948, No. 2332).]

Case referred to :

(1) Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth, [1948] 2 All E.R. 558.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a decision of His Honour DEPUTY JUDGE KONSTAM, sitting at Marylebone County Court, dated July 28, 1948, whereby he awarded the plaintiffs the sum of £4 15s., the unpaid balance of expenditure authorised by a licence for certain building operations carried out by the plaintiffs for the defendant. The plaintiffs had claimed in addition the sum of £14 as being expenditure permitted without a licence, and their appeal was against the disallowance of this amount. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

H. G. Garland for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appeared in person.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour DEPUTY JUDGE KONSTAM, sitting at Marylebone County Court, whereby he adjudged that the plaintiffs could recover from the defendant only the sum of £4 15s. The appeal is in connection with a small amount, but the point underlying it is of some importance and not free from difficulty.

The defendant, Mrs. Munn, was the occupier of a house, 45, Beaufort Gardens, Knightsbridge, London, and on Apr. 28, 1947, she obtained from the plaintiffs a written quotation to do the following work :

“ To washing down all painted stonework on front elevation and painting with two coats of oil paint all stonework previously painted except area ; area excluding retaining wall up to ground floor to be painted with best quality oil bound distemper ; area railing to be painted in light green ; for the sum of £50.”

There had been a conversation before that quotation was given between Mr. Fabian, the director of the plaintiff company, and the defendant on the question of a licence. Mr. Fabian's evidence on that point before the learned judge was to this effect :

“ I asked her if she had a licence. She said not so far, but she would apply when she had my estimate. I gave her an approximate verbal figure of £95. She said she did not want to spend so much. I then quoted £65 for painting only stonework. She said she could get me more work if I reduced the price.”

Then he gave the quotation which I have read, and the defendant said she would get the licence. On May 8, the defendant telephoned to the plaintiffs saying that she had a licence for the work. Mr. Fabian then telephoned to the appropriate authority, found that the defendant had got a licence, and proceeded with the work. In fact, the defendant had obtained an estimate from another firm on Apr. 18, 1947, to do a large amount of internal sanitary work which was to cost £294. In addition to that, there was an estimate for external painting amounting to £34 15s. and the licence granted by the Ministry of Works was for those amounts. In due course, the plaintiffs completed the work. They sent in their bill, the defendant considered that the work had not been satisfactorily done and paid £30 on account, and the plaintiffs sued for the balance. At the trial there was a contest whether the plaintiffs had done the work in accordance with their contract, and the learned judge decided that point in favour of the plaintiffs, but he then took the point that the licence was only for £34 15s. 0d., and he ruled against the plaintiffs on the contention that they were entitled to spend another £10 plus £4 on the work under the Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 74). The learned judge decided—and this point is not disputed here—that it was a breach of reg. 56A of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, to do work in excess of the licence. He, therefore, gave judgment for the difference between £30 and £34 15s. 0d.

The question turns on the interpretation to be given to reg. 56A. I need not read the whole of it, but the material portions of it are as follows :

“(1) Subject to the provisions of this regulation the execution in the United Kingdom . . . of any operation specified in pt. II . . . shall be unlawful . . . (2) Subject to the provisions of this regulation, the carrying out in the United Kingdom, except for a purpose specified in the first column of the Table set out in pt. I of sched. 6 to these regulations, of any work specified in pt. III of that schedule or of any maintenance work on a building or on any such works as are mentioned in pt. II of that schedule, shall be unlawful except in so far as there is in force in respect thereof a licence granted by the Minister. Provided that the Minister may by Order authorise the carrying out of such work without a licence within such limits of costs as may be specified in the Order, and may prescribe different limits of cost for different classes of work or for different classes of property or for different areas . . .”

The argument put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs is that the work which was done in excess of the work permitted by the licence might properly have been done without a licence within the limits of the Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947, art. 2 of which provides :

“(1) Any person may, without a licence from the Minister of Works under para. (2) of . . . reg. 56A, carry out on any single property, during any month in the period beginning with Feb. 1, 1947, and ending with July 31, 1947, any work to which this article applies, if the cost of the work, together with the cost of any other such work previously carried out on that property during that month without such a licence as aforesaid, does not exceed the sum of £2. (2) In addition to the work authorised by the foregoing paragraph of this article, any person may, without such a licence as aforesaid, carry out on any single property during the said period any work to which this article applies, if the cost of the work, together with the cost of any other such work previously carried out on that property during that period without such a licence as aforesaid (not being work authorised by the foregoing paragraph) does not exceed the sum of £10.”

The conclusion that I have come to is that the learned judge was right when he said that, in his view, the liberty to spend £10 plus £2 a month given by the Control of Building Operations (No. 8) Order, 1947, cannot be prayed in aid to increase the amount licensed to be spent on a particular work. In my view, the proviso to reg. 56A (2) was intended to apply to small items of work of the kind specified in the Order which did not cost more than £10 or £2 in any one month and was not intended to add to the amount of a licence to do a particular work. In the present case there was a contract to do a particular work, namely, to paint the whole of this house. That work was illegal except in so far as it was covered by the licence. I cannot think that the proviso was intended to entitle the person doing the work under such a contract to exceed the licence to the amount of £10 plus £2 in every month. For these reasons, I think the learned judge was right and that the appeal must be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree. The plaintiffs undertook to paint the whole of the outside of the house at a cost of £50, whereas the licence was only for £34 15s. 0d. In so far as the work was covered by the licence for £34 15s. 0d., they have recovered payment or judgment, but the excess of £15 5s. 0d. was not covered by any licence and was unlawful. If this excessive work had been done intentionally, there could be no question whatever that they could not recover anything. The fact that it was done unintentionally does not put them in any better position. The plaintiffs seek to rely on the fact that the defendant had a general licence to do £10 worth of work and £2 in every month, and, as this work took two months, they claim £10 plus £4, making £14. The answer to that contention seems to me to be that the general licence is only available in respect of severable work—work ordered separately and executed separately. When there is one indivisible work in hand, covering more than the free allowance, a specific written licence must be obtained, and it is not permissible to increase the amount authorised by that specific licence by adding to it the free allowance. The conditions of these written licences expressly say that the specified amount shall not be exceeded. If the plaintiffs' contention were to prevail, it would be an indirect way of exceeding the amount.

JENKINS, J. : I also agree that this appeal fails. The question which it raises was really concluded in a sense adverse to the plaintiffs by the decision of the majority of this court in Jackson Stansfield & Sons v. Butterworth (1), to which we were referred in the course of the argument. In that case a builder was engaged to do some work for a garage proprietor, consisting of alterations or repairs to his garages. The estimated cost of the work was £35, and the builder obtained a licence in writing for that amount. As the work proceeded he found that more than £35 worth of work was going to be needed, and he obtained from the representative of the local authority an oral licence to complete the work, provided that the total cost did not exceed £100. On the faith of that oral assurance, he completed the work at the cost of £69 18s. 2d., and the question in issue was whether the absence of a written licence made the contract illegal quoad the excess over £35, it being conceded in argument that the contract should be considered as legal up to the licence amount of £35. It was contended on behalf of the builder that, if he failed in his claim to recover the full amount of the excess over £35 on the strength of the oral licence, he was, at all events, entitled not only to recover the £35, but to add to that sum the free amount of £10 which was allowed at that time under the Control of Building Operations (No. 6) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 86) (the precursor of Order No. 8 of 1947, which is the relevant one in the present case), and also to add one of the monthly sums of £2 which the Order of 1946 also allowed. That contention was rejected by the majority of the court, who held that the absence of writing was a fatal objection and that the builder could only recover the £35, without the additional £12. SCOTT, L.J., dealt with the matter of the £12 in these terms ([1948] 2 All E.R. 559) :

“ On Jan. 16, 1946, the Minister of Works, in exercise of his sub-delegated powers to legislate by Order conferred by reg. 56A, para. (2), made the Control of Building Operations (No. 6) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 86), which permitted such work to be carried out without a licence during the period running from Feb. 1 to July 31, 1946, up to £2 per month, and, in addition, allowed unlicensed work up to a further £10. The whole of the work was carried out in a fortnight, it being finished by July 11, 1946. The limit for unlicensed work was, therefore, £12, but there is no provision, either in that Order or in the regulation which authorised the addition of any amount for such unlicensed work to the licensed limit. I read the regulation and Order together as meaning that, when the figure for work proposed exceeds the limit allowed by the Order, the whole has to be licensed. That Order, therefore, has no relevance.”

It seems to me that that passage in the judgment of SCOTT, L.J. (which, for the reasons I have explained, was necessary to the decision) substantially answers the question raised in this appeal. I, therefore, agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Evershed and Denning, L.JJ.), February 9, 13, 11, 14, 15, 1949.]

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Lack of reasonable care by deceased for his own safety—“Last opportunity”—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (c. 28), ss. 1 (1), 4.

Section 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, provides: “Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant’s share in the responsibility for the damage.” By s. 4 “fault” is defined as “negligence, breach of statutory duty or other act or omission which gives rise to a liability in tort or would, apart from this Act, give rise to the defence of contributory negligence.”

An employee of the Swansea Corporation was, contrary to regulations, riding on steps attached to the offside of a dust lorry belonging to the corporation when an overtaking omnibus, the property of the defendants, came into collision with the lorry, the employee being struck by the omnibus and receiving injuries from which he died. In a claim by the plaintiff, the widow of the deceased, for damages for negligence against the defendants, who joined, inter alia, the driver of the dust lorry as third party, it was held that the defendants were liable to the plaintiff and were not entitled to any contribution by the third party. On appeal the court found that all three parties were to blame—the omnibus driver because he attempted to overtake the lorry on a bend in a narrow road without warning and before receiving a signal, the third party because he turned suddenly across the road without making proper use of his mirror and without giving sufficient warning, and the deceased because he had taken up a dangerous position on the steps of the dust lorry. On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that the damages should not be reduced on account of the deceased’s share of responsibility for the accident, under the Act of 1945, since he owed no duty to the driver of the omnibus not to stand on the steps of the lorry, and, therefore, could not be guilty of contributory negligence vis-à-vis the driver, and, further, since the omnibus driver saw the position of the deceased on the lorry and so had the last opportunity of avoiding the accident.

HELD: the driver of the omnibus was guilty of negligence, but the deceased man was guilty of contributory negligence (resulting in an apportionment of liability under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945) since (i) by standing where he did on the lorry he was in breach of a duty which he owed to the driver of the omnibus not to render more difficult the passing of the lorry by the omnibus and so increase the risk of a collision: dictum of LORD ATKIN in Donoghue v. Stevenson ([1932] A.C. 580; 147 L.T. 285), applied; and (ii) in any event, to constitute contributory negligence it was not necessary to show that the conduct of the deceased amounted to the breach of any duty which he owed to the defendants, but it was sufficient to show a lack of reasonable care by the deceased for his own safety: dictum of LORD ATKIN in Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. ([1939] 3 All E.R. 730; [1940] A.C. 164; 161 L.T. 377), applied.

Per curiam: Since the coming into operation of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, the doctrine of “last opportunity” has ceased to be of any practical effect, if, indeed, it had not ceased to exist before that date.

G APPEAL by the defendants against an order of CASSELS, J., dated July 13, 1948, awarding damages to the plaintiff and dismissing the defendants' claim to contribution by a third party.

The plaintiff, suing as the administratrix of her deceased husband's estate, claimed damages against the defendants, as employers of the driver of an omnibus whose negligence, resulting in a collision with a lorry, was, she alleged,
H the cause of her husband's death. The defendants denied negligence and claimed that any damages which might be awarded should be reduced on account of the contributory negligence of the deceased under s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. They also claimed that the third parties, Swansea Corporation and their employee, the driver of the lorry, which belonged to them, should contribute to the payment of such damages as joint tortfeasors under s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. CASSELS, J., held that the omnibus driver was guilty of negligence and that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence, and he awarded the plaintiff the sum of £2,326 3s. 0d., without any reduction under the Act of 1945. He also held that the first of the third parties, Swansea Corporation, would not have been liable to the plaintiff if sued separately, by reason of the defence, available to them, of common employment, and against this decision there was no appeal. He further held that the second of the third parties, the driver of the lorry, was not liable to contribute in respect of the damages payable by the defendants under the Act of 1935, since the deceased was in the position of a trespasser on the lorry, and the driver, if sued by the plaintiff, would not have been liable. The Court of Appeal found that (i) the defendants, (ii) the deceased man, and (iii) the driver of the lorry were all guilty of negligence, and ordered that the damages awarded to the plaintiff should be reduced by one-fifth on account of the deceased's contributory negligence and that such reduced damages should be paid as to two-thirds by the defendants and as to one-third by the driver of the lorry.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and Morris Morgan, for the plaintiff.

Beney, K.C., and G. P. Thomas, for the defendants.

H. E. Davies, K.C., and A. T. Davies for the third party.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendants, the Swan Motor Co. (Swansea), Ltd., from a judgment of CASSELS, J., delivered on July 13, 1948, awarding the sum of £2,326 3s. 0d. to the plaintiff, Mrs. Winifred Davies, in respect of the death of her husband, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of a driver of a motor-bus in the employment of the defendants. The accident which resulted in the death of the deceased man occurred on May 1, 1947.

This appeal raises three points. The first is: Was the driver of the omnibus negligent? The second is: Was the deceased man guilty of contributory negligence? The third has arisen in connection with some third party proceedings between the defendants and David Cecil James, the driver of the lorry on which the deceased man was riding. The claim was put forward in those proceedings by the defendants under s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. The learned judge in the court below directed that judgment be entered against the defendants and in favour of the third party. The defendants appeal against that part of the judgment. The third point, therefore, is: Were the defendants entitled to judgment against the third party? That raises the question whether the third party, if sued by the plaintiff, would have been liable in respect of the same damage as that for which the defendants have been held liable.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, said that the omnibus driver was clearly to blame, and continued:] I now come to the more difficult question: Was the deceased man, Davies, guilty of contributory negligence? Counsel for the plaintiff put forward the view that the deceased man owed no duty to the driver of the omnibus not to stand on the steps of the lorry in the way that he did. Counsel argued that the deceased was entitled to stand there and, in so doing, was not doing anything wrong vis-à-vis the omnibus driver. The answer to that point is twofold. In the first place, I am prepared to hold that, in standing where he did on the lorry, the deceased committed a breach of duty to the omnibus driver because by so doing he made the driver's task in passing the lorry more difficult that it would otherwise have been, and, to that extent, increased the risk of a collision. The classic statement on this aspect of the law is that of LORD ATKIN in Donoghue v. Stevenson (1), where he says ([1932] A.C. 580):

"The rule that you are to love your neighbour becomes in law, you must not injure your neighbour; and the lawyer's question, Who is my neighbour? receives a restricted reply. You must take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour. Who, then, in law, is my neighbour? The answer seems to be—persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question.”

- A In the present case the deceased man ought reasonably to have had in contemplation the drivers of other vehicles, as being affected by the very dangerous and unnecessary position which he took up on the lorry. By taking up that position he, to some extent, increased the width of the lorry, thereby making the passageway less broad. It is one thing for a vehicle to pass another vehicle with wooden or iron sides, and another thing for it to pass another vehicle
- B with wooden or iron steps attached to its sides and a living human body standing on those steps. The operation of passing is much more difficult in the latter circumstances. The notices which were put in evidence are material on this aspect of the case. The deceased man had been employed by the Swansea Corporation since January, 1945, and these notices were exhibited in places where he could see them. They were put up in all the corporation's depots.
- C The first of the notices is dated July 24, 1939, and reads as follows :

“Cleansing Department. Notice. It has been observed that carriers are in the habit of riding on the steps of lorries, which is a very dangerous practice, and could be the cause of injury to the man himself and to other users of the road. This practice must cease, and drivers must report any man who persists in doing so.”

- D The next notice is dated Dec. 7, 1942, and reads as follows :

“Notice. Riding on steps of motor vehicles. Despite the previous notice prohibiting employees standing on the steps of motor vehicles whilst in motion, the practice is still prevalent, with the result that three accidents have occurred in the last few months, any one of which could have proved fatal. This is a very dangerous habit, especially at the present time when so many air-raid shelters are built in the centre of streets and free passage of vehicles is somewhat restricted. In the three accidents referred to above, the employees of the department were jammed between the walls of communal shelters and the vehicles. This practice must cease immediately, and disciplinary action will be taken against E any employee disregarding this instruction. Furthermore, liability under the Workmen's Compensation Acts for accidents arising from this cause may be repudiated by the corporation.”

The next notice is dated Feb. 13, 1946, and reads as follows :

- “Riding on steps of motor vehicles. Despite the fact that notices were posted in all Cleansing Department depots on July 24, 1939, and Dec. 7, 1942, prohibiting employees of the department riding on the side steps of motor vehicles whilst in motion, the practice, unfortunately, is still prevalent, with the result that another accident occurred as recently as Feb. 1, 1946, which could have resulted in serious, and perhaps permanent, injury being suffered by the employee. This practice must cease immediately.”
- G
- H

Attention is then drawn to the last paragraph of the notice dated Dec. 7, 1942, regarding liability under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

In addition to that, there is a second answer to the point made by counsel for the plaintiff, viz., that to constitute contributory negligence it is not necessary to show that the plaintiff's conduct amounted to the breach of a duty which he owed to the defendants. It is sufficient to show lack of reasonable care by the plaintiff for his own safety. That is set out clearly in the speech of

LORD ATKIN in Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (2) ([1939] 3 All E.R. 730), as follows :

"The injury may, however, be the result of two causes operating at the same time, a breach of duty by the defendant and the omission on the part of the plaintiff to use the ordinary care for the protection of himself or his property that is used by the ordinary reasonable man in those circumstances. In that case the plaintiff cannot recover because the injury is partly caused by what is imputed to him as his own default. On the other hand, if the plaintiff were negligent, but his negligence was not a cause operating to produce the damage, there would be no defence."

Counsel for the defendants also drew our attention to a passage in CHARLES-WORTH ON THE LAW OF NEGLIGENCE, 2nd ed., p. 464, which he adopted as part of his argument. It reads as follows :

"The word 'negligence,' however, is not used in its usual meaning. Negligence ordinarily means breach of a legal duty to take care, but as used in the expression 'contributory negligence' it does not mean breach of duty. It means the failure by a person to use reasonable care for the safety of himself or his property, so that he becomes the 'author of his own wrong.' For example, if a railway train draws up at a platform which is too short for the train, a passenger in a carriage which is short of the platform owes no duty to the railway company not to alight, but if he gets out without looking where he is going it is contributory negligence on his part. A workman on a ship owes no duty to the shipowner not to fall down an open hatchway negligently left unfenced by the shipowner, but if his fall is due to his own carelessness he is guilty of contributory negligence. A member of the public owes no duty to a railway company to look out for approaching trains when he is crossing the railway by means of a public crossing, but if he omits to do so and is injured, his conduct amounts to contributory negligence. This difference in the meaning of 'negligence' as applied to a plaintiff and a defendant is pointed out by ATKIN, L.J. [Ellerman Lines, Ltd. v. Grayson (3)], where he says ([1919] 2 K.B. 535): 'The doctrine of contributory negligence cannot, I think, be based upon a breach of duty to the negligent defendant. It is difficult to suppose that a person owes a duty to anyone to preserve his own property. He may not recover if he could reasonably have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence'."

Therefore, in my view, on both grounds the deceased man was guilty of negligence.

I now come to the most difficult point in the case, namely, the question whether the injuries suffered by the deceased were the result partly of his own fault. The answer turns primarily on the interpretation to be given to s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 :

"Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage."

The definition of the word "fault" is contained in s. 4 which provides :

"The following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say . . . 'fault' means negligence, breach of statutory duty or other act or omission which gives rise to a liability in tort or would, apart from this Act, give rise to the defence of contributory negligence."

The wording of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1945 differs from the wording of s. 1 (1) of

A the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, which deals with the same point in respect of collisions between ships. There may be good reason for that. I cannot think that the legislature intended the Act of 1945 (which is described as "an Act to amend the law relating to contributory negligence and for purposes connected therewith") to alter the law which had been laid down as to the legal doctrine of causation. All that the legislature intended to do was to alter the legal consequences of negligence by both parties causing or contributing to the damage complained of. Until the Act of 1945 was passed, the rule in respect of the consequences of collisions on land was different from that in respect of the consequences of collisions at sea. The rules as to causation were the same. That is clear from the opinion of LORD ATKINSON in Anglo-Newfoundland Development Co. v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co. (4), where he says this ([1924] A.C. 415):

B "In MARDEN ON COLLISIONS, 5th ed., p. 17, it is laid down on the authority of the cases mentioned in the notes, to some of which I shall presently refer, 'that there is no difference between the rules of law and of Admiralty as to what amounts to negligence causing collision; and that, before a vessel can be held to be in fault for a collision, negligence causing or contributing to the collision must be proved,' and that in the case of a collision a ship though guilty of negligence will not necessarily be held to blame if the ship with which she collides could by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary skill and care have avoided the collision."

C It is also clear from the judgment of GREER, L.J., in The Eurymedon (5), a case of a collision between two ships. GREER, L.J., said ([1938] 1 All E.R. 126):

D "I think that the law arising out of what is usually called the Davies v. Mann (6) principle may be stated as follows: If, as I think was the case in Davies v. Mann (6), one of the parties in a common law action actually knows from observation the negligence of the other party, he is solely responsible if he fails to exercise reasonable care towards the negligent plaintiff."

E EVERSLED, L.J., has drawn my attention to an interesting note in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW of October, 1938, p. 466, which deals with The Eurymedon (5) and says this:

F "It can therefore be said—and this is the essential point of the problem—that the plaintiffs' negligence had ceased as soon as the defendant knew of it and could avoid its consequences by reasonable care. The plaintiffs, it is true, had been negligent by creating a dangerous situation which might mislead the defendants, but as soon as the latter became aware of it the danger, and therefore the negligence, came to an end."

G In the present case, if the lorry had continued to keep on its proper side of the road and the omnibus had run into or close to it and injured the deceased man, I doubt if the negligence of the deceased man would have contributed to his injuries. This case, however, is not so simple as that. On the one hand, the deceased man could not get off the steps on which he was standing when the omnibus was approaching the lorry, and, apparently, on the other hand, he could not get into the lorry without a great deal of difficulty, and the collision was due to the negligent driving of both vehicles which resulted in the collision and the injury to the deceased man. That being so, it seems to me that it is impossible to say that the dangerous position of the deceased man on the lorry had ceased to be a factor contributing to the damage that he suffered. It is difficult in a case of this kind, to say exactly whether, and if so, when, the negligence of the deceased man ceased before the injury complained of. It is clear that there can be two separate causes for a collision. There are two recent cases one has in mind on this point, in both of which there was a difference of judicial opinion. Admiralty Comrs. v. North of Scotland & Orkney &

Shetland Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. (7) was a case (not altogether unlike the present case) in which a ship was overtaking another ship on the starboard side, dangerously close. While one ship was in the process of overtaking the other, the overtaken vessel negligently allowed herself to fall off to starboard, with the result that there was a collision. Each side said that the other was solely to blame, but the House of Lords came to the conclusion that both vessels were to blame, and, on this aspect of the case, LORD SIMON said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 353):

"The suggested test of 'last opportunity' seems to me inaptly phrased and likely in some cases to lead to error, as the Law Revision Committee said in their report (Cmd. 6032, p. 16): 'In truth there is no such rule—the question, as in all questions of liability for a tortious act, is, not who had the last opportunity of avoiding the mischief, but whose act caused the wrong?' In Davies v. Mann (6), the negligence of the absent donkey-owner, serious as it was, created a static position where nothing that he could do when collision threatened would have avoided the result, whereas the negligence of the driver of the vehicle continued right up to the moment when the collision became inevitable. As by driving more carefully he could have avoided hitting the donkey, his negligence was the sole cause."

The other case is Henley v. Cameron (8). In that case the defendant had negligently left his motor-car unlighted on a highway and a motor-cyclist coming along (with headlights, and, therefore, presumably able to see it) ran into it and was killed. The question was whether the defendant, by leaving his unlighted vehicle on the road was guilty of negligence which contributed to the accident or whether the accident was solely due to the fault of the motor-cyclist, who saw the vehicle and could have avoided running into it. TUCKER, L.J., and SINGLETON, L.J., held that both parties were to blame and ASQUITH, L.J., held that the motor-cyclist was alone to blame.

I mention the difficulty of deciding these matters by way of leading up to what was said by the House of Lords in Admiralty Comrs. v. S.S. Volute (9). In that case, when dealing with the question of contributory negligence, LORD BIRKENHEAD said this ([1922] 1 A.C. 144, 145):

"Upon the whole I think that the question of contributory negligence must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it. And while no doubt, where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent negligence is the only one to look to, there are cases in which the two acts come so closely together, and the second act of negligence is so much mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act, that the party secondly negligent, while not held free from blame under the Bywell Castle (10) rule, might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution . . . The Volute, in the ordinary plain common sense of this business, having contributed to the accident, it would be right for your Lordships to hold both vessels to blame for the collision."

In the light of the ordinary, plain common-sense of this matter, the negligence of the deceased man in standing on the steps of the lorry right up to the moment of the collision (or at any rate, until he tried to climb inside the lorry), contributed to his injury. I think that what he did clearly contributed to his injury.

[HIS LORDSHIP, in conclusion, said, with regard to the apportionment of blame, that the proportions of blame should be four-fifths to James, the driver of the lorry, and one-fifth to the deceased man, the damages awarded to the plaintiff being reduced by one-fifth. As regards the apportionment of the sum awarded to the plaintiff, namely, four-fifths of £2,300 odd, the conclusion of CASSELS, J., placing two-thirds of the blame on the omnibus driver and one-third of the blame on the lorry driver should stand.]

EVERSHED, L.J. : I have reached the same conclusion. As my Lord has pointed out, three questions have been presented for our determination : (i) Whether the learned judge was justified in holding the motor-omnibus driver, and therefore, the motor-omnibus company, liable to the plaintiff for negligence ; A (ii) whether, in the action, the omnibus company can reduce its liability by virtue of the Act of 1945 by showing that the person injured, namely, the deceased, was so injured as the result partly of his own fault as defined in that Act ; and (iii), whether, in the third party proceedings, the omnibus company can call on the driver of the lorry to contribute towards the damages which they (the omnibus company) should pay to the plaintiff. Under that third head arises B a subsidiary point, whether arithmetically the figure, if any, of contribution which the driver of the lorry, James, must provide, is affected by considerations as between himself (James) and the deceased, also arising under s. 1 of the Act of 1945, for it might be that in an action brought by the plaintiff direct against James a different conclusion as to contributory negligence could be reached from that which should be arrived at in an action brought against C the omnibus company.

In approaching the questions it seems to me, first, that one must regard the judgment given, both in the action and in the third party proceedings, as a single document in the sense that it is right and proper in considering the language used by the learned judge to read his judgment as a whole. One cannot sever the judgment into two mutually exclusive parts, and, when considering his conclusion about contributory negligence, shut one's eyes to what D the learned judge found later in his judgment as regards the behaviour of the deceased in riding on the steps of the lorry.

With those preliminary observations I turn to the three questions which are presented to the court for decision. As to the first, the question whether the defendant omnibus company was properly held liable to the plaintiff, I content E myself by saying that, in my judgment, there is no ground to justify us in coming to any different conclusion from that to which the learned judge came.

The second question, as to the contributory negligence, if any, of the deceased, is plainly the question which is most difficult to answer, and I confess that my mind has undergone considerable fluctuation in the course of the arguments presented to us on that point. I start with the difficulty that the learned F judge has found in terms that there was no contributory negligence, and I only arrive at a different conclusion with diffidence, because the experienced judge who tried the case must have had well in mind all the facts of the case when he pronounced his finding. Nevertheless, as I have indicated, I do come to the conclusion that the right answer is that suggested by my Lord, namely, that the deceased did suffer damage as the result partly of his own fault, and, G expressed arithmetically, I hold that the answer to that question should be : " to the extent of one-fifth."

I was at one time in trouble to formulate any specific duty owed by the deceased to the omnibus driver which might be said to found a case of contributory negligence against the deceased, but after considering the authorities to which counsel for the defendants referred, particularly the speeches of LORD ATKIN H and LORD WRIGHT in the Caswell case (2), I am satisfied that it is not necessary to found on some breach of a specific duty owed by the deceased to the driver of the omnibus. In arriving at the conclusion at which I do arrive, I conceive it to be my duty to look at the whole facts of the case as they emerged at the trial both of the action and of the third party proceedings, and then, using common-sense, to try fairly to apportion the blame between the various participants in the catastrophe for the damage which the deceased suffered.

At one stage of the hearing we were invited to consider whether, and to what extent, the Act of 1945 had abrogated or modified what has been called the rule in Davies v. Mann (6), and what, in my view, is quite a different thing, namely, the so-called "last opportunity" rule. My conclusion is that these interesting points, if they do exist and if they should arise for decision in some case, do not in point of fact arise for decision in the present case. I hope, therefore, that I shall not be regarded as disrespectful to learned counsel and their arguments if I do not refer to the numerous authorities to which they referred in support of their arguments. I would, however, like to say this on that topic. As I understand the Davies v. Mann (6) principle, which, indeed, has already been stated by my Lord, it is this. In that case the plaintiff's negligence or fault consisted in placing a donkey on the highway, but, it having been observed in due time by the defendant, the defendant by colliding with it was treated as the person responsible for the accident, since, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could easily have avoided it. In other words, the negligence of the plaintiff had really ceased to be an operating factor in the collision. If I may apply a common phrase, the plaintiff in that case, as a negligent actor, was at the material time, functus officio—one might say functus culpa. I cannot do better than cite a passage from LORD SHAW'S speech in Anglo-Newfoundland Development Co. v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co. (4) where he says ([1924] A.C. 419):

"The principle does not apply to shipping law alone, but to all the law of contributory negligence, from Davies v. Mann (6) downwards. And I take the principle to be that, although there might be—which for the purpose of this point I am reckoning that there was—fault in being in a position which makes an accident possible yet, if the position is recognised by the other prior to operations which result in an accident occurring, then the author of that accident is the party who, recognising the position of the other, fails negligently to avoid an accident which with reasonable conduct on his part could have been avoided. Unless that principle be applied it would always be open to a person negligently and recklessly approaching, and failing to avoid a known danger, to plead that the reckless encountering of danger was contributed to by the fact that there was a danger to be encountered."

As regards the so-called "last opportunity" rule, that, as I have indicated, seems to be something different, if I have apprehended it correctly, from the rule in Davies v. Mann (6). In the "last opportunity" type of case the original negligent actor has not become functus officio, but still, it is said, the other party had an opportunity of avoiding the collision. That as a doctrine, I venture to think, has suffered a demise independently altogether of the Act of 1945. I need not refer again to the passage in LORD SIMON'S opinion in The Boy Andrew case (7) which BUCKNILL, L.J., has already cited. No doubt, in practice such a rule was found useful by judges who were anxious in the interests of justice to avoid coming to a conclusion wholly adverse to a plaintiff merely because at the material time the plaintiff was still a negligent actor to some, perhaps, quite trivial extent. The Act of 1945 has rendered no longer necessary resort to devices of that kind.

On this topic, therefore, it is unnecessary to express any concluded opinion, but I entirely share the view, as at present advised, which my brother has indicated, that such a rule as that which applied in Davies v. Mann (6) would not be, and is not, affected by the Act of 1945. In the present case it is to be observed that the deceased did not merely lie down in the street and remain there still, so that an on-coming vehicle could see him and avoid him with no less difficulty that it could avoid a vehicle drawn up stationary at the side of the road. What he did do, in disregard of prudence and the instructions which he had been given, was to elect to ride in a position of great danger on a moving vehicle. Therefore, his position in relation to other road users must, in part at least,

- at any particular point of time, depend on what the driver of his own vehicle did. When all the facts are examined (and anticipating somewhat the answer to the third question) it will be seen that the two drivers (the omnibus driver and the lorry driver) were so incautious in their performances that their two vehicles were involved in a collision. On the facts of the case it seems to me to be plain that no doctrine of "last opportunity," if such there is or was, could be applied. One could not fairly say of anybody here that they had a "last opportunity" of avoiding the accident, and, in fact, in the general melee which resulted, the deceased suffered, and suffered most grievously, partly as the result of the hazardous position which he occupied in relation to the two vehicles. Looked at in that way, this case seems to me to be different on its facts from such a case as would have arisen if the lorry had proceeded straight along the road, and the omnibus had tried to pass it without there being sufficient room for it so to do. With all respect to the learned judge in the court below, I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that his finding that there was no contributory negligence within the meaning of the Act of 1945 cannot stand, and that on the facts the fair common-sense view to take of the matter is that which has been proposed by my Lord. I only add this. I express the hope that there will be no divergence of principle or of the application of principle between the Admiralty courts and the common law courts in dealing with matters of contributory negligence under the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, and the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, respectively. In substance the intention of the two Acts is the same, so that similar principles should be applied in the same way.
- It only remains for me to add a few words in regard to the third question : Can the omnibus company require the driver of the lorry, James, to contribute to the damage which in the action the omnibus company must pay, namely, four-fifths of the figure awarded by the learned judge. Again with all respect to the learned judge, I cannot see that the answers which he accepted to that claim are made out. It seems to me that on the facts, particularly the outstanding fact that the lorry driver started to turn across the main road without giving any warning signal in time, it is impossible to resist the conclusion that James also caused in part the accident by his negligence, and, taking that view, I see no reason to differ from the apportionment of blame which CASSELS, J., thought appropriate, namely, two-thirds to the omnibus driver and one-third to the lorry driver.
- For these reasons, as well as those stated by my Lord, I have, in this difficult case, reached the conclusion that the answer is that which I have indicated, and I would, therefore, allow the appeal to the extent necessary to give effect to that result.

DENNING, L.J. : This case raises the important question, how far the doctrine of "last opportunity" has survived the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. It was well and fully argued before us, but the answer to my mind is that, as a doctrine of law, it was dead before the Act, though it remained in use by some as a practical test. Since the Act, it is no longer a practical test, and should disappear from the books. I will give my reasons.

The doctrine of contributory negligence was based on causation. If the plaintiff's negligence was one of the causes of his own damage, he could not recover anything : see Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries (2) ([1939] 3 All E.R. 730) per LORD ATKIN. To resolve the question of causation the courts used to apply the so-called doctrine of "last opportunity." That was not a principle of law, but a test of causation. It was a fallacious test, because the efficiency of the causes do not depend on their proximity in point of time, but it held sway for many years because it enabled the courts to mitigate the harshness of the doctrine of contributory negligence. After the decision of the House of Lords in The Volute (9) and Swadling v. Cooper (11) the doctrine of "last opportunity" fell into disrepute and was superseded by the simple test: What was the cause, or what were the causes, of the damage? : see the notes to Davies v. Mann (6), in SMITH'S LEADING CASES, 13th ed., vol. 2, pp. 579-589. Since the recent speeches of LORD SIMON in The Boy Andrew (7) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 353) and of LORD DU PARCQ in Grant v. Sun Shipping Co. (12) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 245) the doctrine has no place even as a test of causation.

The legal effect of the Act of 1945 is simple enough. If the plaintiff's negligence was one of the causes of his damage, he is no longer defeated altogether. He gets reduced damages. The practical effect of the Act is, however, wider than its legal effect. Previously, to mitigate the harshness of the doctrine of contributory negligence, the courts in practice sought to select, from a number of competing causes, which was the cause—the effective or predominant cause—of the damage and to reject the rest. Now the courts have regard to all the causes and apportion the damages accordingly. This is not a change in the law as to what constitutes contributory negligence—the search, in theory, was always for all the causes—but it is a change in the practical application of it. Let me illustrate this by considering how the well-known cases of Butterfield v. Forrester (13) and Davies v. Mann (6) would be decided today. If Butterfield v. Forrester (13) came up today, it would, I think, probably be found that the damage was due to two causes: (i) the negligence of the defendant in placing the obstruction on the road, and (ii) the negligence of the plaintiff in not keeping a proper lookout. It would, therefore, under the Act of 1945 be a case for contribution. Indeed, many cases have occurred since the Act where the injured plaintiff had the last opportunity of avoiding the damage, but, nevertheless, he recovered reduced damages. I refer particularly to the Factory Act cases, such as Cakebread v. Hopping (14) and the unlighted vehicle cases, such as Henley v. Cameron (8). If Davies v. Mann (6) came up today, it might well be decided in favour of the plaintiff on the ground on which it was, in fact, decided, namely, that the donkey was lawfully on the highway, c.f. Searle v. Wallbank (15), but I propose to put the special law as to animals on one side. Instead of the donkey, I will take the case of a man who negligently leaves his car parked on a dangerous bend in the road or across a railway line in the docks and it is negligently run into by an oncoming vehicle. That is a case to which the observations in Davies v. Mann (6) would appear to apply. Those observations, which were the foundation of the doctrine of "last opportunity", were re-stated in modern form by LORD SHAW in Anglo-Newfoundland Development Co., Ltd. v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co. (4) ([1924] A.C. 419, 420), and by GREER, L.J., in The Eurymedon (5) ([1938] P. 49, 50) and come to this: If the defendant actually saw that a dangerous state of affairs had been created by the negligence of the plaintiff, and the defendant thereafter, by the exercise of reasonable care, could have avoided doing any damage, then he was solely liable if he failed to exercise that care. I desire to say that, in my opinion, that is not a proposition of law, but only a test of causation, and it is a test which may sometimes lead to error. In the case I have put it is, of course, plain that, if the defendant actually saw the parked vehicle in good time and purposely ran into it—or, indeed, what comes to the same thing, if he, seeing its position, drove recklessly on that account, careless whether he hit it or not—his conduct would be so powerful a factor in producing the damage that the presence of the parked vehicle would be not itself a cause of the damage but only the circumstances in which or on which the cause operated. That is the kind of illustration taken by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Butterfield v. Forrester (13), PARKE, B., in Davies v. Mann (6) and LORD SHAW in Anglo-Newfoundland Development Co., Ltd. v. Pacific Steam Navigation Co. (4), but if the defendant did not do it purposely or recklessly, but was merely negligent, as in Davies v. Mann (6)—for instance, in not keeping a proper lookout so that he did not actually see the parked vehicle in time to pull up, or in driving too fast, so that, although he actually saw it before the accident, he could not pull up, or in not applying his brakes soon enough—then there are two causes of the accident (i) the negligence of the owner of the parked car in letting it be an obstruction on the road; and (ii) the negligence of the driver of the oncoming vehicle in driving too fast and not keeping a proper lookout, or not applying his brakes soon enough. Both are at fault, and if both vehicles are damaged, then, under the Act of 1945, which-

A ever is plaintiff or defendant, on claim or counterclaim, the damages are apportioned. That this is the correct approach can be seen by supposing that, instead of a parked car, there was a slow-moving wagon on the bend. If it was going on its wrong side, the fault of the driver of the wagon would be one of the causes of the accident, but, if it was going on its proper side, he
B would not be in fault and his conduct would not be a cause of the accident, because the law on this subject is only concerned with causes due to some-one's "fault." I do not myself believe that there is any difference in kind between negligence after seeing the danger and negligence in not seeing it. Nor do I believe that negligence in creating a dangerous obstruction ceases
C if the driver of the oncoming vehicle sees it. Even when he sees it, it may still be one of the causes of the accident. It all depends whether it is a significant factor in producing the damage or not. In the result, therefore, if it were not for the special law as to animals, I think that Davies v. Mann (6) might well be held today to be a case for a reduction in damages, because the plaintiff's own fault was one of the causes of the damage. I venture to think that, if the doctrine of "last opportunity" is discredited, so is the rule in Davies v.
D Mann (6), for, as I have always understood it, they are one and the same doctrine.

Another test of contributory negligence, as fallacious as that of "last opportunity," is the test of duty. It has sometimes been suggested that an injured plaintiff is not guilty of contributory negligence unless he is under a duty of care towards the defendant. Counsel for the plaintiff did not himself
E contend that this was a correct approach, but drew our attention to Joseph Eva v. Reeves (16) which was said to support the proposition. In my opinion, it is not a correct approach. When a man steps into the road he owes a duty to himself to take care for his own safety, but he does not owe to a motorist who is going at an excessive speed any duty to avoid being run down. Nevertheless, if he does not keep a good lookout, he is guilty of contributory negligence.
F The real question is not whether the plaintiff was neglecting some legal duty, but whether he was acting as a responsible man and with reasonable care: see per ATKIN, L.J., in Ellerman Lines v. Grayson (3) ([1919] 2 K.B. 535), approved by the House of Lords ([1920] A.C. 475-7), and Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries (2) ([1939] 3 All E.R. 730).

The correctness of these views as to contributory negligence, and, indeed,
G the necessity for them, is shown by considering how inapposite the test of "last opportunity"—or the test of duty—is in cases where the damage is due to the faults of three persons. Take the present case. The omnibus driver, it is said, actually saw the deceased man standing on the steps of the dust lorry and thus had the last opportunity of avoiding the accident. Furthermore, the deceased man owed no duty to him. Therefore, the deceased man
H was not guilty of contributory negligence vis-à-vis the omnibus driver. But the dustcart driver, it is said, did not actually know that the deceased man was on the steps, and thus had not the last opportunity of avoiding the accident. Furthermore, the deceased man owed a duty to the dustcart driver not to stand on the steps. Therefore, the deceased man was guilty of contributory negligence vis-à-vis the dustcart driver. That would be equivalent to saying that the fault of the deceased man was not a cause of the accident vis-à-vis the omnibus driver, but was a cause of the accident vis-à-vis the dustcart driver—which is absurd. If it is a cause of the accident, it is a cause vis-à-vis all concerned. This point is made plain by seeing what would happen if the plaintiff brought an action against the drivers of both vehicles. If they were both found guilty of a “fault” which caused the damage, could it possibly be said that the plaintiff’s damages were to be reduced as against one and not as against the other? And even if that were possible, what would be the proportions as between the two drivers? Would contributions be assessed on the higher or lower figure of damages? If the Act of 1945 were to involve such questions, it would introduce many complications into the law. The Act seems to contemplate that, if the plaintiff’s own fault was one of the causes of the accident, his damages are to be reduced by the self-same amount as against any of the others whose fault was a cause of the accident, whether he sues one or more of them, and they bear the amount so reduced in the appropriate proportions as between themselves: see ss. 1 (1), (3), (4) and (6) of the Act. A

While causation is the decisive factor in determining whether there should be a reduced amount payable to the plaintiff, nevertheless the amount of the reduction does not depend solely on the degree of causation. The amount of the reduction is such an amount as may be found by the court to be “just and equitable,” having regard to the claimant’s “share in the responsibility” for the damage. This involves a consideration, not only of the causative potency of a particular factor, but also of its blameworthiness. The fact of standing on the steps of the dustcart is just as potent a factor in causing damage, whether the person standing there be a servant acting negligently in the course of his employment or a boy in play or a youth doing it for a “lark,” but the degree of blameworthiness may be very different. B

Speaking generally, therefore, the questions in road accidents are simply these: What faults were there which caused the damage? What are the proportions in which the damages should be apportioned having regard to the respective responsibilities of those in fault? In the present case the first question is: What were the faults which caused the damage? The collision between the two vehicles was caused by the negligence of the two drivers—the omnibus driver because he attempted to overtake in a narrow road on a bend without warning and before receiving a signal, and the dustcart driver because he turned suddenly across the road without making proper use of his mirror and without giving sufficient warning of his intention to do so. Although those negligent acts were the cause of the collision, what was the cause of the damage to the deceased man? He was, as the judge found, in a position which he must have known was a very dangerous position, in defiance of the dictates of common sense. If he had not been in that position, he would not have been injured. His position was certainly one of the causes of the damage, just as in The Margaret (17) the improper position of the anchor was one of the causes of the damage to the barge. It would, therefore, appear that the damage was caused by the faults of all three. Counsel, however, took a special point on behalf of the dustcart driver. He contended that that driver should be exempt from any liability to contribution. He said that the deceased man was a trespasser on the step of the lorry, and, therefore, if the driver of the dustcart had been sued, he would not have been liable—that is, he would not be guilty of any “fault.” Counsel argued that the distinctions about invitees, licensees and trespassers were as applicable to vehicles as to land. I do not agree. It would, I think, be unfortunate if these refinements and distinctions were introduced into road accidents. I regard the deceased man, not as a trespasser, but as a servant acting negligently, and, indeed, disobediently, in the course of his employment. Although the dustcart driver did not actually know that he was on the step, he might have foreseen it. He would, therefore, have been liable, if sued, and was guilty of a “fault.” It is C a case, therefore, where the damage was caused by the faults of all three of them.

The only remaining question is: In what proportions should the damage be borne? I think that the deceased man was very considerably to blame, but I am not prepared to differ from the figure of one-fifth suggested by my Lord. The damages should, therefore, be reduced by that figure. They should then be borne by the omnibus company and the dustcart driver in the proportion of 2 to 1 assessed by the judge.

LONG EATON CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, LTD. v. SMITH.

D Agriculture—Wages—Benefits or advantages reckoned as wages—Tenancy of cottage—Contract of employment and tenancy agreement separate transactions—Rent higher than value of cottage fixed by statutory order—Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924 (c. 37), s. 7 (11).

E The Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, s. 7 (1), provides that, where a minimum rate of wages for agricultural workers has been fixed under the Act, it is a criminal offence to pay less than the minimum rate. Section 7 (11) provides: "Subject to any definition under this Act of the benefits or advantages which may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of cash and the value at which they are to be reckoned . . . the court may, in any proceedings under this Act, reckon as a payment of wages such amount as in the opinion of the court represents the value of any benefits or advantages . . . received by a worker under the terms of his employment." By a statutory order made under s. 8 (1) (a) of the Act of 1924, the benefits or advantages which could be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash included the provision of a cottage, the value of which was reckoned at 6s. a week.

G The contract of service of an agricultural worker to whom the statutory order applied provided merely for payment to him of a weekly wage in cash, the amount being at all times in accordance with the minimum wage for the time being in force under the statutory regulations. For the first two years of his employment he found his own living accommodation, and then, at his request, his employers allowed him to become a tenant of a cottage belonging to them on payment of a sum varying from 8s. 6d. a week to 9s. 6d. a week (the statutory rent of the cottage) and on condition that he would give up the cottage within four weeks of his ceasing to be employed by them. In an action by the employers for possession of the premises after the worker's employment had ended, the worker conceded their right to possession, but counterclaimed for the rent paid by him in excess of 6s. a week on the ground that, as 6s. was the maximum amount fixed as the value of the benefit of a cottage under the Act of 1924, the employers were not permitted to receive more than that sum as rent.

H

HELD : the letting of the cottage was not one of the terms of the worker's employment, but was a completely separate and independent transaction, and, therefore, no offence against s. 7 of the Act of 1924 had been committed and the worker was not entitled to recover any rent which he had paid in excess of 6s. a week.

APPEAL by an agricultural worker from an order of His Honour JUDGE WILLES, made at Derby and Long Eaton County Court, and dated July 22, 1948.

In an action by the employers for recovery of possession of a cottage occupied by the worker, the worker counterclaimed in respect of rent alleged to have been paid by him in excess of the rate permitted by a statutory order made under the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, s. 8 (1) (a). The learned judge made an order for possession and dismissed the worker's counterclaim. The worker appealed in respect of the counterclaim, and his appeal was now dismissed by the Court of Appeal on the ground that the contract of employment and the tenancy agreement were completely separate transactions, and, therefore, the statutory order made under the Act of 1924 did not apply to the rent paid by the worker. The facts appear in the judgment of JENKINS, J.

L. Blundell for the worker.

Argyle for the employers.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I will ask JENKINS, J., to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS, J. : The defendant, Mr. Smith, is an agricultural worker who was formerly employed as such by the Long Eaton Co-operative Society, Ltd. For the first two years, or thereabouts, of his employment he lived in a house or cottage which he rented from some landlord other than the co-operative society. On Nov. 13, 1943, at his request, he became the tenant of the co-operative society's house, No. 10, Co-Operative Street, Long Eaton, under a tenancy agreement recorded in these terms :

"I, D. A. Smith, of 2, Harrington Street, Long Eaton, do hereby accept the tenancy of the society's property situate at No. 10, Co-Operative Street, Long Eaton, on the condition that, should I cease under any cause to be employed by the society as a farm labourer, I give up the tenancy of the said property within four weeks of my being so employed by the society."

The worker remained in occupation of No. 10 under that tenancy agreement during the remainder of the period of his employment by the co-operative society, and he paid a rent of 8s. 10d., 9s. 4d., and 9s. 6d. per week during various parts of that period, the rent being, I understand, the standard rent under the Rent Restrictions Acts, plus small permitted increases made from time to time. On Jan. 31, 1948, the co-operative society gave the worker one week's notice to terminate his employment with the society on Saturday, Feb. 7, 1948. That was followed up on Feb. 14, 1948, by a notice to quit No. 10, Co-Operative Street in these terms :

"Dear Sir, Under the terms of the agreement signed by you on entering the society's employ I hereby give you four weeks' notice from Saturday, Feb. 14, to vacate the premises No. 10, Co-Operative Street."

Apparently, the worker did not vacate the premises in accordance with that notice, and, in consequence, the society sued him for possession in the Long Eaton county court. In their particulars of claim they pleaded the fact that they were the owners of No. 10, Co-Operative Street, which was let by them to the worker in connection with his employment with them as a farm labourer :

" . . . and on condition that his right to occupy the same ceased when his said employment terminated."

They further pleaded the fact that his employment had terminated on Feb. 7, and that the premises were required for occupation by a new employee, and they claimed possession accordingly. By his defence the worker challenged the society's right to possession and claimed the protection of the Rent Acts. The substantial matter in his case, however, was a counterclaim in which he alleged that under his tenancy of No. 10 he had been charged rent at a higher rate than the rate permitted by the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Acts, 1924, 1940 and 1947, or some of them, and the regulations made thereunder by the Agricultural Wages Board. He alleged, and it is not in dispute, that " the value of a cottage or house occupied as a separate dwelling by farm workers has throughout the relevant period been a benefit or advantage valued " under the legislation I have mentioned " at 6s. per week," while rent at a rate varying from 8s. 6d. to 9s. 6d. per week had been charged under the tenancy agreement in respect of No. 10, Co-Operative Street. In the course of the hearing before His Honour JUDGE WILLES, the right of the society to possession of No. 10, Co-Operative Street was conceded, so no dispute arises as to that. The real matter in issue was the counterclaim, and the learned judge dismissed the counterclaim on the ground that in the circumstances the letting of No. 10, Co-Operative Street to the worker at the contractual rent did not involve a breach of the legislation and regulations relevant to agricultural workers.

It will be remembered that for the first two years of his employment the worker found his own living accommodation. The contract of service was simply a contract to employ him as a farm labourer at so much a week in cash, and it is not disputed that the amount of the wages paid to him week by week was at all times in accordance with the minimum wage for the time being in force. Two years after he was engaged came the letting to him, at his own request, of No. 10, Co-Operative Street. Therefore, his agricultural employer became his landlord, and the rent reserved by the tenancy agreement was duly paid by him week by week to his employer in the capacity of landlord. The rent was no more than the rent properly chargeable under the Rent Restrictions Acts. I think I am right in saying also that the rent reserved for No. 10 represented some small saving to the worker over the rent which he had previously had to pay for the accommodation he had found elsewhere.

I will now turn to the relevant Acts, to some passages of which, and also of the regulations, it will be necessary to refer. The Act which is mainly relevant for the purposes of this case is the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, s. 3 of which provides :

" (1) Where a committee have fixed any minimum rate of wages or have cancelled or varied any such rate, they shall forthwith send in the prescribed manner to the Agricultural Wages Board notification of their decision. (2) The Agricultural Wages Board, on receipt of such notification, shall as soon as practicable make such order as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the decision of the committee."

That arrangement seems to have been modified by the Agricultural Wages

Section 7 of the Act of 1924 provides :

“(1) Where any minimum rate of wages has been made effective by an order of the Agricultural Wages Board under this Act, any person who employs a worker in agriculture shall, in cases to which the minimum rate is applicable, pay wages to the worker at a rate not less than the minimum rate, and, if he fails to do so, shall be liable on summary conviction in respect of each offence to a fine not exceeding £20 and to a fine not exceeding £1 for each day on which the offence is continued after conviction. (2) In any proceedings against a person under this section it shall lie with that person to prove that he has paid wages at not less than the minimum rate. (3) In any proceedings against an employer under this section the court shall, whether there is a conviction or not, order the employer to pay in addition to the fine, if any, such sum as may be found by the court to represent the difference between the amount which ought at the minimum rate applicable to have been paid to the worker during the period of six months immediately preceding the date on which the information was laid or the complaint was served and the amount actually paid to him during that period.”

Sub-sections (1) and (3) are, I think, material for the present purpose as showing the penal character of the legislation, which creates a criminal offence punishable by fine. Section 7 (9) saves the worker's right to recover any wages due to him by civil proceedings. Section 7 (10) is :

“Any agreement for the payment of wages in contravention of this Act, or for abstaining to exercise any right of enforcing the payment of wages in accordance with this Act, shall be void.”

Section 7 (11) provides :

“Subject to any definition under this Act of the benefits or advantages which may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of cash and the value at which they are to be reckoned, and to any limitation or prohibition under this Act of the reckoning of benefits or advantages as payment of wages in lieu of cash, the court may, in any proceedings under this Act, reckon as a payment of wages such amount as in the opinion of the court represents the value of any benefits or advantages (not being benefits or advantages prohibited by law) received by a worker under the terms of his employment.”

Section 8 provides for regulations. Sub-section (1) says :

“The Minister shall, in addition to any special power to make regulations given to him under this Act, have power to make regulations for the following purposes (a) for requiring the wages committees by order to define the benefits or advantages (not being benefits or advantages prohibited by law) which may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash and the value at which they are to be reckoned, and for enabling the committees by order to limit or prohibit the reckoning of benefits or advantages as payment of wages in lieu of cash, and for enabling the committees on the application of any employer or worker, to determine any question which may arise as to the value of any such benefits or advantages, or generally as to any contract of employment so far as the application of this Act thereto is concerned.”

The Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1947, repeated the Act of 1940 and the Defence (Agriculture and Fisheries) Regulations, 1939 (as amended), and contains, in s. 2, a slightly modified version of s. 8 (1) (a) of the Act of 1924. Section 2 of the Act of 1947 is in these terms :

A “ (1) The Agricultural Wages Board shall have power, for each county for which an agricultural wages committee is established under the principal Act, by order made in accordance with the provisions of sched. I to this Act (a) to define the benefits or advantages (not being benefits or advantages prohibited by law) which for the purposes of any minimum rate of wages fixed under the principal Act may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash ; (b) to determine the value at which, for the purposes aforesaid, such benefits or advantages may be so reckoned ; (c) to limit or prohibit the reckoning for the purposes aforesaid of benefits or advantages as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash ; B (d) to define, for the purposes of any differential rate of wages for overtime fixed under the principal Act, the employment which is to be treated as overtime employment.”

C A large number of orders were made under this legislation. For the present purpose it is only necessary to refer to the particular one which counsel for the worker showed us as typical, that is, No. 1345 made in relation to the county of Derby. This order sets out in a schedule the minimum wages for workers of 21 years of age and over, and for workers of varying ages less than that. In para. 10 of the schedule there is a provision about benefits and advantages :

D “ (1) For the purpose of the application of the above minimum rates of wages the Derbyshire Agricultural Wages Committee have by order dated Dec. 12, 1941, defined the following as the benefits or advantages which may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash and the values at which they are to be so reckoned, and prohibited the reckoning of any other benefit or advantage as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash :—1. Benefits or advantages :—(a) New milk. (b) Board (including any meals, but not including intoxicating drink). E (c) Lodging provided by the employer, whether in his own house or otherwise, except in any case in which the agricultural wages committee may determine that the lodging accommodation provided is so defective as to be injurious to health. (d) Cottage including any garden provided with the cottage except where the cottage is one in regard to which the medical officer of health has reported that it is in a state so dangerous or F injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation.”

In para. 10 (2) the material provision is :

G “ (d) Cottage, 6s. per week (less any charge made to the worker in respect of rates) provided that in the case of a cottage with regard to which the agricultural wages committee, on an application by or on behalf of a worker, have certified that by reason of inadequate accommodation, want of repair or sanitation or lack of water supply, the value of such cottage is less than 6s. per week, the value shall be such sum less than 6s. per week as the committee shall determine (less any charge made to the worker in respect of rates).”

H The question for this court is whether the learned county court judge was right in holding that on the facts of this case no breach of those Acts and regulations had been made out. To succeed the worker must show that he has been paid something other than the full minimum wage made up either of cash or of benefits or advantages permitted to be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of cash and reckoned at values not exceeding those authorised by the regulations, viz., so far as a cottage is concerned, 6s. per week. It is contended by counsel for the worker that the Acts and regulations have this effect. He says that they not only prohibit the payment to an agricultural worker of a sum less than the minimum wage in cash plus the giving to him of a benefit or advantage making the wage up to the minimum wage, but reckoned at a figure in excess of the permitted value, but that they also prohibit in all circumstances wherever the relation of employer and employee exists between an employer and an agricultural worker any transaction of letting of lodgings, or provision of milk, or whatever it may be, which involves the payment by the agricultural worker to his employer of a greater sum, or a greater price, than the permitted figure which is given in the regulations as the value at which those matters may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash. So, in this case, according to the argument of counsel for the worker, although in origin the contract was a contract of service into which no question of the provision of a cottage entered, yet, because the worker, while still in the employment of the society, although it was as long as two years after he entered their employment, asked to be accepted as tenant of No. 10, Co-Operative Street, the Acts and the regulations have been infringed by the co-operative society stipulating that he pay for the cottage the ordinary rent that any other tenant would be expected to pay.

I am unable to place such a construction on the Acts and regulations. What they prohibit is the payment of wages other than in cash, with the exception that benefits or advantages of certain kinds can be taken as equivalent to payment in cash up to, but not exceeding, a specified value. In my view, they clearly have not in any literal sense been infringed by anything which was done in this case. The worker was paid the full minimum wage in cash. Nothing was credited to the employer as a payment of wages otherwise than in cash in respect of any accommodation or other privilege or advantage. After the worker had received his wages in full in cash, he paid, among other things, his rent. It so happened that the landlord who received the rent was also his employer, but that circumstance did not alter the fact that the worker had received the whole of his wages in cash.

Counsel for the worker contends that, unless his argument prevails, the whole of this legislation is rendered ineffective because, he says, all that is necessary in order to avoid its effect is for an employer to say to his workman: "I will pay you the minimum wage of so much, and I can let you have a cottage at so much rent." That, if I may say so with respect, is something of a travesty of the true position which, in my judgment, is that each case must be considered on its own facts and the question in each case must be: In this case is the employee receiving the full amount of his wages in cash, or in cash plus some permitted benefits or advantages charged for at more than the permitted figure? If it is found that the contract of service was in substance a contract for so much cash, plus a house or a cottage, then, if the amount of the rent attributed to the cottage is higher than the permitted amount, it does not matter in the slightest degree whether the form of the contract was £2 a week cash, plus a cottage counted at £1 a week, or £3 a week cash "and you can have this cottage for which you will pay £1 a week." In either of those two instances the substance of the matter would have been that there was included as part of the wages a cottage reckoned for the purpose at more than the permitted figure, but that does not mean that it is never possible for an employee, as a genuinely separate transaction, to rent a house or cottage from his employer at whatever figure may be agreed between them. Whether or not the transaction is genuinely separate and distinct must be a question of fact in each case. It would be idle to attempt to give an exhaustive definition of the facts which would fall on one side of the line or the other. I am satisfied that on the facts of this case the learned county court judge was right in holding that the worker had failed to make out his case of infringement of the Acts and regulations and rightly dismissed the counterclaim.

We have been very strongly pressed with the decision of the Divisional Court in Williams v. Smith (1) where the headnote is in these terms :

A “ A worker in agriculture under his contract of service received his proper statutory wages in full. Under a separate agreement with his employer he paid back to his employer £1 each week for board and lodging with him, 15s. being the maximum amount fixed by statutory order under the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, s. 8 (1) (a), as the value of that benefit or advantage which could be reckoned as payment of wages instead of payment thereof in cash. The worker was free to lodge elsewhere, and the employer would have preferred him to do so :—Held, that as the employer had allowed the worker to board and lodge with him he might not receive from him more than 15s. per week in respect thereof, although in form the contract to pay more was distinct from the contract of service.”

C Looking at the facts of that case, it seems to me to be reasonably plain that the arrangement under which the worker was to lodge with the employer at £1 a week was part of his contract of service. It is true that it was a separate agreement, but it was entered into at the time the worker was engaged. He was to be paid the minimum wage of £1 11s. a week, and he was given the option of finding himself lodgings elsewhere in the village, or lodging with his employer and paying £1 a week. He chose the latter arrangement, and it seems to me that the upshot of the bargain he made was that he was given board and lodgings by the employer as part of his contract of service. That being so, in my opinion, Williams v. Smith (1) is a case where a benefit or advantage was reckoned in the wages at a figure higher than the permitted figure, and, none the less so because the employer paid the full wage in cash to the worker and the worker paid back £1 to the employer's wife for his board and lodging. Accordingly, I am in complete agreement with the conclusions arrived at by the Divisional Court in that particular case. It does seem to me, however, that some of the observations which fell from their Lordships went further than was necessary for the decision of the case, and, if any of those observations properly construed involve the view that, in a case like that now before the court, the house ought to be considered as a benefit or advantage included in the wages in lieu of cash at a figure higher than the permitted figure, then, in my judgment, those observations should not be accepted as representing the law.

F Bomford v. South Worcestershire Assessment Committee (2), the other authority to which we were referred, was a rating case, and, therefore, dealt with a very different subject-matter, but it did concern the rateable value of an agricultural cottage. The argument for the owner was that, having regard to the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Acts, 1924 and 1940, and to the construction placed on those Acts in Williams v. Smith (1), it was impossible for him ever in any circumstances to get a greater rent than 3s. a week for the cottage in question, which, presumably, was a cottage which no one except an agricultural worker would occupy. The argument that 3s. was an absolute limit was rejected by the court, mainly on the ground that a farmer might be so much in need of the accommodation for one of his agricultural workers that he would be prepared to pay more than 3s. a week for the cottage, bearing the additional amount he had to pay out of his own pocket. Be that as it may, the passage which, I think, is the only one which has any bearing on the present case occurs in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J., where he said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 301) :

“ The argument is that, in any event, by reason of the operation of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Acts, 1924 and 1940, and the orders made thereunder, the value, for the purposes of rating, is fixed irretrievably, once and for all, at 3s. a week because that sum has been fixed as the maximum which may be deducted from the wages fixed by the statute as payable to the farm workers. Furthermore, it has been decided by the Divisional Court in Williams v. Smith (1), the correctness of which both sides accept, that, if the cottages are let, they cannot be let to the farm worker at a rent in excess of 3s. It is said to follow from that, as a matter of law, that there is only one figure which can be taken as the gross value, namely, the figure arrived at on the basis of 3s. a week."

I cannot regard that reference to Williams v. Smith (1) as adding anything to its value as a decision. TUCKER, L.J., it will be observed, in referring to the case, said "the correctness of which both sides accept," so the question whether or not Williams v. Smith (1) was rightly decided was not in issue in Bomford v. South Worcestershire Assessment Committee (2). For the reasons which I have endeavoured to state, in my judgment, the learned county court judge was right in his conclusion in the present case, and the appeal should accordingly be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the next judgment.

DENNING, L.J. : By statute agricultural workers have to be paid at least a specified wage. It is a criminal offence to pay a wage below the minimum. The legislature realised that wages might be paid in cash or in kind. For instance, the worker might receive, in addition to cash, benefits and advantages such as the provision of a cottage, or milk, or board and lodging. The legislature, therefore, said that the court had to reckon the value of the additional benefits and advantages, translate them into cash, add that to the cash payment, and then see whether or not the minimum was paid. To relieve the courts of the task in every case of assessing the value of those benefits and advantages, power was given to county agricultural committees—now to the Agricultural Wages Board—to specify what value was to be put on the benefits and advantages. Accordingly, orders have been issued giving figures for the more usual benefits, such as a cottage, or milk, or board and lodging. If a free cottage is given, the value is to be taken at 6s. a week. If milk is provided, it is to be taken at the current wholesale price, and so forth. Those provisions are intended to translate into cash the value of benefits in kind so as to see whether the minimum has been paid or not. The legislature did not, however, specifically deal with the position which would arise if at the time of the worker's employment arrangements were made for the farmer to pay him the minimum sum for wages in cash, and then, by a transaction at or about the same time, the farmer were to agree to give the worker certain benefits in return for a payment in cash over and above the sums specified by the wages board for those benefits. If the two transactions were to be regarded in law as separate and distinct from one another, it would mean that any employer could evade the Act by a simple expedient. The excessive sum charged for the benefits and advantages could be made an indirect method of paying less than the minimum wage. What the farmer paid with one hand, he would take back with the other. Faced with a case of that kind, the court in Williams v. Smith (1) considered that the reality, and not the form, of the transaction must be regarded. If in reality the man is receiving less than the minimum wage, the employer is guilty of an offence.

The key to the question is found in s. 7 (11) of the Act of 1924, which provides that the court has to see what are "the terms of [the] employment." The employer cannot evade the Act by making, in point of form, two separate contracts. The court must look at the whole terms of the employment and see, taking them as a whole, whether or not the minimum is paid. In Williams v. Smith (1) the terms of the employment were that the worker was to receive the minimum wage of £1 11s. in cash, and pay £1 for his board and lodging, whereas the prescribed allowance was only 15s. Taking the terms of employment as a whole, therefore, the extra 5s. was, in effect, a deduction from the minimum wage, and the court held that an offence had been committed. The governing words, in my opinion, are "the terms of [the] employment." They may be found in one document or in two, in one contract or in two contracts. Whenever found, the whole must be looked at to see whether or not the minimum requirements of the Act are complied with. It is altogether different in the present case. The letting of this house was not one of the terms of the employment. It was not part and parcel of the transaction when the worker was employed, as in Williams v. Smith (1). It was a completely separate and independent transaction, and such a transaction is not touched by the Act at all. The defendant was receiving his full minimum wage throughout the period. Two years after he entered the employment the employer let him this house. He paid less rent than he had been paying for his previous house, and he only paid the rent allowed by the Rent Restrictions Acts. In those circumstances it seems to me to be wrong to say that there is any offence against the Act. To succeed the argument for the defendant must go so far as to show that there is a prohibition against any employer letting to a farm worker a house or cottage at more than 6s. a week. There is no such prohibition in the Act, and there is nothing in the Act to enable any committee or board to make any such prohibition. If the words of AVORY, J., in Williams v. Smith (1) go as far as that, I cannot agree with them. Instances have been put in the course of argument of the absurd results which would follow from the contention put before us today. It would mean that, if a worker took a house at a fair rent from a separate landlord (a third person) and then the farmer took an assignment of the lease of the house, the farmer would have to reduce the rent. It would also mean that, if a farmer let a good house which could be sub-let at considerable profit, and the tenant later entered the farmer's employment, the farmer would have to reduce the rent of the house to 6s. a week. In my judgment, there is nothing in the Act which compels us to reach any such absurd conclusions. Whenever there is a separate and independent transaction which does not form part of the terms of the employment the Act does not affect it, and this is one of those cases. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree.

Re SILVERSTON (deceased). WESTMINSTER BANK LTD. v. KOHLER AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), March 1, 1949.]

Will—Servant—Legacy to—"If in my service at the time of my death"—Receiver in lunacy of testator appointed—Employment of servant continued by receiver—Release from performing any service for testator.

By her will, dated Dec. 21, 1944, a testatrix provided : "I bequeath free of duty to the following domestic servants if they respectively shall be in my service at the time of my death and not under notice to leave whether given or received (i) to A.K. £500, (ii) to R.M. £500." On Mar. 19, 1945, a receiver of the testatrix's property was appointed, the testatrix having become a patient under the Lunacy Act, 1890, and having been removed to a nursing home. Her residence was sold pursuant to an order of the Management and Administration Department. At the date of the sale A.K. and R.M. were in the employment of the testatrix, each receiving a wage of £2 per week. By the direction of the assistant master of the Department the receiver continued the employment of A.K. and R.M. at retaining fees of £2 per week each with authority to release them from performing any service to the testatrix. The retaining fees were paid until the testatrix's death on May 31, 1948, and no services were then being performed by A.K. or R.M. A

HELD : A.K. and R.M. were in the testatrix's service at the time of her death within the meaning of the will so as to qualify under the terms of the bequest.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to decide, inter alia, whether servants receiving a retaining fee but performing no services for the testatrix at the date of her death were in her service at that date so as to qualify for legacies under her will. ROMER, J., held that they were so entitled. The facts appear in the judgment. D

Donald Cohen for the plaintiff, trustee of the will.

John L. Arnold for the first two defendants, the legatees A.K. and R.M.

E. G. Wright for the third defendant, a legatee. E

Droop for the remaining defendants, beneficiaries under the will, including an infant residuary legatee.

ROMER, J. : I have to decide whether two ladies named Annie Kohler and Rose Moody are entitled in the events which have happened to legacies on the footing that they were in the service of the testatrix at the date of her death. F

The testatrix made her will on Dec. 21, 1944, and a codicil on the same day. The legacies in question were given by cl. 5 of the will and the codicil. Clause 5 of the will says :

"I bequeath free of duty to the following domestic servants if they respectively shall be in my service at the time of my death and not under notice to leave whether given or received (i) To Annie Kohler £500, (ii) To Rose Moody £500 . . . (iv) To each of the servants indoor or outdoor who shall have been in my or my husband's service for three years prior to my decease (including the above . . . legatees) the amount of one year's wages in addition to all moneys (if any) owing to them respectively by me or my said husband at my death." G

The will was attested by two witnesses of whom Rose Moody was one. By the first codicil, which was not witnessed by Rose Moody, the testatrix bequeathed H

" . . . to my maid Rose Moody if she shall be in my service at the date of my death and not under notice to leave whether given or received the sum of £500 and also the amount of one year's wages in addition to all moneys (if any) owing to her by me at my death. In all other respects I confirm my said will."

At the date of the will the defendants Annie Kohler and Rose Moody were employed by the testatrix as domestic servants at Hans House, Hans Street, London, where the testatrix lived. On Mar. 19, 1945, a receiver of the property of the testatrix was appointed, and that receiver continued in office down to the date of the testatrix's death, which took place on May 31, 1948. The facts necessary to understand the point in issue are set out in Mr. Hulbert's affidavit in support of the summons, in which he says, after referring to the order appointing a receiver of the property of the testatrix :

" Shortly after the date of the said order the testatrix was removed to Chiswick House, Pinner, Middlesex, and her said residence was sold pursuant to an order of the Management and Administration Department. At the date of the said sale the defendants Annie Kohler and Rose Moody continued in the employment of the testatrix. They had each been in her service or that of her late husband for upwards of 3 years and they were respectively in receipt of wages at the rate of £2 per week. By the directions of the assistant master of the Management and Administration Department the said receiver continued the employment of the defendants Annie Kohler and Rose Moody in the patient's service at retaining fees of £2 per week, but with authority to release them from performing any service for the testatrix. The said retaining fees were paid until the death of the testatrix, but no services were then being performed by either of the said defendants to her. Such directions were given by the master to preserve any rights the said defendants Annie Kohler and Rose Moody might claim to payment of the said legacies of £500 and one year's wages each referred to in the said will and codicil."

On behalf of Annie Kohler and Rose Moody it is said, having regard to the language which the testatrix used, that they qualify for their legacies. It is undisputed that before the order appointing a receiver of the testatrix's property they had been in the service of the testatrix at the house in which she resided. It is equally plain that at her death neither of them was under notice to leave, so the question for decision comes down to whether it can be said that they were in the testatrix's service at the time of her death. It is contended on their behalf that when the testatrix died they were under a contract by which the receiver continued their employment at a remuneration and that it is not material whether or not they were actually performing services for the testatrix when she died. The crucial matter, it is argued, is that they had not left the testatrix's service at her death. Counsel referred me to Re Cole (1), which came before SARGANT, J., and, having considered that case, I am satisfied that it does justify the view that, assuming that in other respects these ladies were in the employment of the testatrix at the time of her death, the fact that they were not actively engaged in rendering her services does not destroy their claim.

Then arises the question whether, having regard to the fact that their employment was continued by the receiver, it can be said that they were in the testatrix's service rather than in the receiver's service at the time when the testatrix died. Counsel says it is plain that circumstances may well arise in which a person who is in the apparent employment of one person is in the actual employment of another—for example, a lady's maid is usually paid by the lady's husband. I have been referred to three cases which I will mention shortly. The first was Re Hartley's Trusts (2). The testatrix in that case had given a legacy to a servant named Mary Bond provided that Mary Bond remained in her service until her death. Later, the testatrix was removed to a lunatic asylum, and a few days later Mary Bond was dismissed by a relative who was managing the testatrix's affairs and was ignorant of the contents of her will. On the question coming before HALL, V.-C., whether, notwithstanding what had happened, Mary Bond could be described as being in the service of the testatrix at the time of her death and so entitled to the legacy, he held that after the order in lunacy which directed the establishment of the testatrix to be broken up the service of Mary Bond was at an end and in the circumstances he could not hold her to have been in the service of the testatrix at the time of her death.

In Re Lawson (3), a testator made a will in 1905 by which he bequeathed " . . . to each of my domestic servants who shall have been in my service for two years prior to my decease and shall not be under notice to leave whether given or received, the amount of one year's wages free of duty."

The testator died in April, 1912. One of the claimants for the legacy was B, a certified male nurse and masseur who was first engaged in 1907 by the receiver in lunacy of the testator's estate as an assistant attendant on the testator at a weekly wage of a guinea. He did not sleep in the house, but took some of his meals there. From November, 1910, till the testator's death, with one break, he was engaged on night duty at a salary of two guineas a week paid every fourth week. Owing to the strain of this attendance B was obliged to take a holiday of four months in 1911 with the consent of the receiver, and he received no salary during his absence. During his attendance he was free to undertake other work and did so to a limited extent. On a summons by the executors to determine the question whether B was entitled to the legacy, it was held that on the true construction of the will he was a domestic servant, the term "domestic" being equivalent to "household," and also that, although the service must be continuous for the period named, that did not involve service from day to day, and the suspension of the service, with the consent of the master, did not disentitle B to the legacy claimed. No argument there was founded on the view that this man, having been engaged by the receiver in lunacy, could not be properly regarded as in the testator's own service. EVE, J., assumed that that was the true view to take and said ([1914] 1 Ch. 686, 687):

"He was obviously a servant, and a servant of the testator, and not the less so because he was possessed of qualifications which enabled him, when not actually engaged with the testator, to add to his income by serving others . . . It is true that in this case, in the circumstances I have mentioned, no payment was made to the servant while his absence continued, but I do not think this element is of itself conclusive, coupled as it was with the arrangement that he was to return to his duties as soon as his health was restored. The result is that, in my opinion, the service of the respondent was of such a nature as to qualify him to claim, and I think he is entitled to be paid, a legacy as a domestic servant of the testator."

The last case was Re King (4), where the servants who claimed legacies under a similar type of bequest to the one I am now considering were employed, not by the receiver of the testator's estate, but by the committee of his person. The principal servant employed was a man called Oldfield, who was appointed by the committee to have charge of the testator's establishment, and Oldfield himself employed, as I understand it, other servants as well. The question was whether Oldfield and the servants whom he employed were entitled to legacies as being persons in the testator's service at his death. It was argued before YOUNGER, J., that there was a distinction between an appointment by the committee of the person and an appointment by the committee of the estate—that the committee of the estate contracts in the name of the lunatic but the committee of the person does not and is not liable to account for the allowance made to him for the maintenance of the lunatic. YOUNGER, J., in delivering judgment on the question, said ([1917] 2 Ch. 424):

"The question is whether any of them can claim this legacy as being a

A person in the testator's service at his death. In my opinion they cannot. I think these persons were either in the service of the committee of the person or, as Mr. Austen-Cartmell suggested, in the service of the court, and I do not think there was at the testator's death any person who was in his service within the meaning of the codicil. The committee of the person under a scheme in lunacy was apparently allowed a certain sum by means of which he was to provide for the comfort of the testator, including in that the engagement of a proper staff of servants; and Mr. Terrell cited an authority which shows that the committee of the person is not liable to account for the actual disposition of moneys placed in his hands for the purpose so long as he discharges the duty of maintaining the lunatic, which it is not in dispute has been properly performed in the present case. It appears, therefore, that these persons cannot be said to have been in the service of the lunatic as persons either appointed or paid by him. They were in fact paid by the committee of the person out of the money allowed to him for that and other purposes, and were also appointed mediately or immediately by him."

He then referred to Re Lawson (3) and the fact that EVE, J., allowed the legacy to the male nurse who was concerned in that case. YOUNGER, J., then said

C (ibid., 425):

"It is, however, obvious from the report either that there were special circumstances which enabled the judge to hold without question that the servant in that case was in the service of the testator, or that the point was not either taken or pressed in argument. It is certainly not discussed in the judgment, and I do not think that the decision of EVE, J. can be considered as an authority either one way or the other on the point which has been now definitely argued before me. Moreover, the difference between a receiver and the committee of the person may be, and I think properly is for this purpose, very marked. The answer to this question raised by the summons will accordingly be that the bequest did not take effect in favour of Oldfield or in favour of any of the other persons who claim it."

E I have authority there that there is a distinction, in a case of the kind now under consideration, between a receiver of the estate and a committee of the person, and I have EVE, J.'s view, or assumption on, in Re Lawson (3) that a person who is employed by the receiver of the estate of a patient can be regarded as equivalent to an employee of the patient himself.

F In those circumstances, I am satisfied that these ladies in the present case qualify under the terms of the testatrix's bequest. I am satisfied that they were in the service of the testatrix in that they were in receipt of a retaining fee which would place them under a moral obligation, at all events, to put themselves at the disposal of the testatrix if she should regain control of her affairs, and that they could, in every fair sense of the word, be regarded as being in her service. I am also satisfied that the true view of the matter is that they are to be regarded as being in her service none the less because the actual extension of their employment was effected by the receiver and not by the testatrix herself. I will, therefore, make a declaration that, in the events which have happened, both these ladies were in the service of the testatrix at the date of her death.

Order accordingly.

R. v. PORTER.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Birkett, JJ.), February 28, 1949.]

Betting—Use of room for betting—Saloon bar of public house—Need of permission of licensee—Localisation—Betting Act, 1853 (c. 119), s. 3.

The appellant, a bookmaker, was charged with using a public house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. On five days between July 14 and 29, 1948, the appellant was seen in the saloon bar taking bets to the number of 45. For the appellant it was contended that, before he could be convicted, it was necessary to show that he was permitted by the licensee to use the house for the purpose of betting, and that there must be evidence that he was carrying on his business of a bookmaker in some particular place in the saloon bar.

HELD : if a bookmaker makes a habit of using the bar of a public house for the purpose of betting, he commits an offence against the Betting Act, 1853, s. 3, the bar being a "room" for the purposes of the Act, and it is not necessary to prove that the licensee knew he was there or permitted him to be there, nor is it necessary, to constitute the offence, for him always to stand in a particular place in the bar.

APPEAL against conviction and sentence at the London Quarter Sessions on Nov. 2, 1948.

The appellant was convicted of using a public house for the purpose of betting and was ordered to pay a fine of £50 and twenty guineas costs. His appeal was now dismissed and he was ordered to pay the costs of the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Edward Clarke for the appellant.

Vernon Gattie for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The court is of opinion that this appeal fails. It is an appeal by a bookmaker who was originally summoned before magistrates for an offence against s. 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, and elected to go for trial. He was charged before the learned deputy chairman at the London Sessions for that :

" . . . on July 14, 1948, and on other days between that date and July 29, being a person using the Abbey Arms public house, Harrow Manor Way, you used the same for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto."

Section 1 of the Act of 1853, prohibits a house, office, room or other place being kept or used for the purpose of any person using the same for betting with persons resorting thereto, and s. 3 provides :

- A " Any person who being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, or either of them ; and any person who being the owner or occupier of any house, room, office, or other place, shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them ; and
- B in conducting the business of any house, office, room, or place, opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them ; shall . . . " be guilty of an offence.

- C From July 14 to 29 observation was kept on this house and the saloon bar by police officers, and on five days during that period the appellant was seen in the saloon bar taking bets to the number of 45, standing or sitting at different places in the bar. During the time he was in the bar he was taking some refreshment. Our attention has been called to evidence which shows that the licensee or his employee or wife were always in the bar while the bookmaker was there and could see what was going on, but no question relating to that was left to the jury. The learned deputy chairman in his summing-up charged the jury in this way :

- D " . . . on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary for the user to be in the position of receiving permission from the landlord. I do think it is necessary, as Mr. Gattie puts it for the prosecution, that he should be localised, which means that he is in the bar during the racing hours day by day when the police see him and he is not there merely on an
- E odd day or so, now and again, but he is doing it as a regular habit, a regular custom, and, therefore, he makes that place, for the time being, while he is operating, into a betting house and, in that sense, he can be convicted of using it for the purpose of betting."

- F In the opinion of the court, that was a correct direction to the jury as the law now stands, whatever it may have been some years ago. There was evidence that on several occasions within a limited time the appellant was using this house for the purpose of betting, and he was seen during those times to take no fewer than 45 bets on one day or another. There was, therefore, evidence for the jury that he was carrying on the business of a bookmaker in this public house.

- G The argument of counsel for the appellant, however, is that, in view of the decision in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1), and other cases including R. v. Deaville (2), which was decided in the Court of Crown Cases Reserved and would ordinarily be binding on this court, no offence was committed. His main contention is that it is necessary to show two things. First, he says, it must be proved that the appellant was in what the deputy chairman described as " a privileged position," meaning thereby that he was not in the position
- H of an ordinary user of the house, but was permitted by the licensee, expressly or impliedly, and, therefore, with knowledge of what he was doing, to use the house for the purpose of betting, and, as there was no evidence left to the jury and no finding by the jury either that the licensee permitted the appellant to use the house for this purpose or that the licensee knew that he was so using it, therefore, the conviction was wrong. Secondly, counsel submits that there must be evidence that the appellant was localised, as it was put, in the sense that he must have been standing or sitting in some particular place in the saloon bar on the occasions in question and it is not enough if he was merely in the bar, though why, providing the requirement of using the place is enough, he should have to stand in any particular part of it, I find some difficulty in following.

Counsel for the appellant relies particularly on the speech of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1). It is not necessary for this court now to consider that case since it has recently (in 1939) been explained by the House of Lords in Milne v. Comr. of Police for City of London (3), but LORD HALSBURY in his speech referred to the judgment of A. L. SMITH, L.J., in the Court of Appeal where the Lord Justice said ([1897] 2 Q.B. 279) :

"I do not propose to deal with the numerous cases which have arisen about the user of rooms at public houses by betting men when carrying on their business of betting with persons resorting thereto, for the words 'house' and 'room' are specifically mentioned in the Act as two of the prohibited places, when used by a betting-man for the carrying on the business of betting therein, and in my judgment these cases have no application to betting in an inclosure at a racecourse in the usual way as in the present case."

When one remembers that the question in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1) merely related to the legality of betting in Tattersall's Ring at a racecourse, it is impossible to suppose that the noble and learned Lords who formed the majority in that case meant to say that all the public house cases were wrong. The judgment of A. L. SMITH, L.J., was noted for special approval by LORD HALSBURY, and the Lord Justice distinctly expressed the opinion that the court were not considering cases, such as the present, of people betting in public houses and that its decision was not intended to throw any doubt on the decisions in those cases. It must be remembered that the Court of Appeal in Powell's case (1) (RIGBY, L.J., dissenting) had come to the same decision on the point before them as did the House of Lords.

A variety of other cases followed. One, to which we have been referred, was Belton v. Busby (4), the headnote of which states :

"A bookmaker was in the habit of attending at the bar of a licensed beerhouse daily at certain hours for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and he carried on there a business of ready-money betting with the knowledge and permission of the licensed occupier of the beerhouse."

It was held that the bookmaker "used" the bar of the beerhouse for the purposes prohibited by the Betting Act, 1853. Counsel for the appellant relied on the judgment of GRANTHAM, J., in that case where there was knowledge on the part of the licensee. The learned judge said ([1899] 2 Q.B. 383) :

"There is, it seems to me, this great distinction between the racecourse cases, such as Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1) and the present, that in the former the bookmakers and the members of the public who bet with them go into the racecourse inclosures on exactly the same footing; the place is open to them both on the same terms; the one has no greater right to be there than the other. But that was not the case here. The bookmaker Woods had something in the nature of a right or licence to use the bar of the beerhouse for the purposes of his betting business over and above the right of an ordinary member of the public to resort there. This seems clear from the findings of the magistrate. The case finds that he was allowed to remain there regularly for certain hours every day . . ."

There the learned judge had no difficulty in saying that that case was distinguishable from Powell's case (1), and he applied the very passages in LORD HALSBURY'S speech on which so much reliance has been placed by counsel for the appellant. BRUCE, J., did not put his judgment on that ground at all. He adopted the ground mentioned by A. L. SMITH, L.J., in Powell's case (1), which was cited with approval in the House of Lords. BRUCE, J., said ([1899] 2 Q.B. 384) :

A “I think that the room, the saloon bar, was used by Woods for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. I think that Woods was a person using the room in the sense that he regularly resorted there for the purpose of carrying on the betting business, and was the person in control of that business. Therefore, I entertain no doubt that he was guilty of an offence against the Betting Act.”

B The next case is R. v. Deaville (2). There is no doubt that in that case the court did hold that there could not be a conviction unless it could be shown that the bookmaker was carrying on his betting on the premises with the consent, express or implied, of the licensee. If R. v. Deaville (2) stood alone, it might be decisive of the present case, because in the ordinary way that case would be binding on this court and it would be difficult to distinguish the facts in it from those in the present case, but when one finds that a case, although not expressly overruled by the final court of appeal, has been so dealt with that C it is obvious that, in the opinion of that court, the case was wrongly decided, this court ought to treat the case as overruled. I may cite what LORD WRIGHT said in Noble v. Southern Ry. Co. (5) when dealing with this point. That was a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and the Court of Appeal, when it came before them on appeal from the county court judge, though they D thought that the appeal should be allowed, felt bound by an earlier decision of the Court of Appeal to dismiss it, although there were cases in the House of Lords which showed that the reasoning which had led the Court of Appeal on the earlier occasion to decide as they did decide was erroneous. LORD WRIGHT said ([1940] 2 All E.R. 392) :

E “I feel no doubt that the decision of the Court of Appeal was wrong. I can understand the difficulty in which both the county court judge and the Court of Appeal were placed in the present case. What a court should do, when faced with a decision of the Court of Appeal manifestly inconsistent with the decisions of this House, is a problem of some difficulty in the doctrine of precedent. I incline to think that it should apply the law laid down by this House, and refuse to follow the erroneous decision.”

F If I may say so with respect, I entirely agree. If we find that the House of Lords has given a decision which is manifestly inconsistent with an earlier decision of a court from which an appeal lies to the House of Lords, we ought not to follow that earlier decision whether or not it has been expressly overruled. In Milne v. Comr. of Police for City of London (3) one member G at least of the House of Lords said that R. v. Deaville (2) was wrongly decided, and it is obvious that the learned Lords did not approve of the decision in R. v. Deaville (1), but thought it was wrong. Therefore, this court ought to follow the decision of their Lordships in Milne's case (3). The point that fell for decision there was whether a bookmaker who used a telephone H to communicate between his office and a club, taking bets from members and laying the odds over the telephone, could be said to be using the club for the purpose of betting, and their Lordships came to the conclusion that in those circumstances no offence had been committed because, they said, it is impossible to say that a person uses a house merely because he telephones to that house. They pointed out how absurd it would be to say that a man who telephoned from Liverpool to a house in London or New York was using that house. All their Lordships found it necessary to go at length into the meaning of the word “user” and what amounted to user. It would be wrong to say that their observations on that matter were obiter. I think they formed part of the decision of the House. Milne's case (3) disposes once and for all of many of the difficulties which LORD HALSBURY's speech in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1) caused. In the course of his speech LORD MAUGHAM, L.C., said ([1939] 3 All E.R. 407):

"My Lords, I think we are driven to the conclusion that the owner or other persons in control of the place who open, keep or use it for the first purpose mentioned in s. 1 of the Act, are only doing something illegal if the 'user' is one which involves that the betting with persons resorting thereto is carried out by the owner, occupier or keeper, or by a person using the place in a popular sense who, if not present by himself or some agent or nominee, is permitted to exercise, or in fact exercises, some de facto control or some privilege or right over the place in question not being a control, privilege or right possessed by the public at large. Such a conclusion might be arrived at if the owner, occupier or person using the place received a commission on the bets . . . or if he allowed the bookmaker to stand outside at an open window and to call out the odds."

Then he deals with certain other illustrations. In those last words I think the noble and learned Lord was referring to a case where a man could be said to be using the premises though he was not actually physically present, but I think it is equally clear that he means that a person "uses" a place for the purposes of this Act if he uses it in the popular sense, and there is no more popular use of the word "use" than when it is said that a man "uses" a particular licensed house, meaning that he is frequently to be found there.

LORD ATKIN puts it more emphatically. He explains Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1), and says (ibid., 412):

"The present case does not raise the question whether the premises in question are a place within the meaning of the Act, the debated question which is supposed to have been decided in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1) . . . So in the public-house cases I cannot see why, if the bookmaker uses the bar of the public-house for betting in conditions which make it an offence if committed with the permission of the licensee of the premises, exactly similar user fails to be an offence if done without the licensee's permission. The user appears to be the same in both cases. I think, therefore, that R. v. Deaville (2), and the cases that followed it were wrongly decided, so far as they laid down the test of permission by the occupier."

It would certainly be a strong thing for this court to take the view that such an emphatic pronouncement as that by one of the noble and learned Lords was merely obiter and to refuse to follow it. LORD ATKIN continues (ibid., 413, 414):

"My Lords, one would agree that, if the bookmaker stood at the door and made his bets verbally with the members, he would be using the premises for betting with the members. It cannot matter whether it was during the whole afternoon or less, and it cannot matter whether he did so with the permission of the owner or not . . . I also think that he [the bookmaker] can be said to be using the premises if he has such a degree of control over them that it can be said that the premises are a place where he is carrying on his betting business. I do not think that he need have any legal right of occupation, or that he need be a partner with the actual occupier. Payments made to the occupier or keeper or user of the premises, either by way of commission or otherwise, for the privilege of betting with the persons resorting to the premises, the installation by the bookmaker on the premises of facilities for betting with him, such as a private telephone, or possibly a private letter-box . . . might well afford evidence of the question of fact whether the bookmaker was in fact carrying on his business on the premises . . . The question, then, to be considered by the tribunal of fact, whether justices or jury, when a charge is made that a bookmaker has used premises for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, is the same whether the bookmaker has been actually present on the premises or not—namely, has he in fact been carrying on his betting business there, betting with persons resorting thereto ? ”

A LORD MACMILLAN agreed with both the LORD CHANCELLOR and LORD ATKIN, and LORD WRIGHT dealt with the case at considerable length. Having made reference to LORD HALSBURY’s speech in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (1) he says ([1939] 3 All E.R. 423) :

B “ It is not clear, but I shall here assume that the opinion of the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., represented the opinions of the majority of the House. It may be that these words would, if taken in their full and literal significance, at once rule out Payne from the category of a person using the club premises. Equally, however, they would rule out other cases where the offence has been held to have been committed, rightly as I think, such as the case of the bookmaker who used a slag heap on waste land as the place for his betting business, or the workman in Scotland who, without the knowledge or permission of his employers, used the room in which they were allowed to have their dinner to conduct a betting business with his fellow workmen.”

C He refers to the decision in Young v. Darrah (6), and says :

D “ I agree with that decision. A like case would be that of a bookmaker who, without the permission of the publican or any authorised agent of his, carried on his betting business in the bar of the public-house. Permission is, I think, immaterial in cases of this type if in fact the place is used for the prohibited purpose. The offence may be committed by a licensee or by one who is not even a licensee and has no permission from the occupier.”

LORD PORTER deals with Powell’s case (1) in this way (ibid., 428) :

E “ That case is primarily a decision as to what is a ‘ place,’ and determines that Tattersalls’ ring, in which many bookmakers congregate, is not a place within the meaning of the Act, inasmuch as no bookmaker, though usually to be found at a particular spot, takes his stand at an individual place, nor has any particular spot been allotted to him. He is free to bet on any part of the course, and, though the owners of the course know that he goes to Tattersalls’ ring, yet they do not set aside any particular part of the course for his use.”

F He deals with Hawke v. Dunn (7) and says (ibid., 429) :

G “ In neither case, however, was any de jure user proved—the bookmaker, had no more rights in the ring or elsewhere on the course than any other member of the public—and no de facto user was established because no particular place was set aside for, or used by, any particular bookmaker.”

H Throughout the whole of his speech it is clear that he is of opinion it is not necessary for there to be any de jure occupation of any particular place, and he, like the other learned Lords, says that a distinction is to be drawn between a place like a ring on the racecourse and the words mentioned in the Act “ any house, office, room, or other place.”

In these circumstances, I think it must no longer be thought that R. v. Deaville (2) is good law. That case must be taken to be overruled by Milne v. Comr. of Police for City of London (3), and it must be taken to be the law that, if a bookmaker uses, that is to say, makes a habit of using the bar of a public house for the purpose of betting he is committing an offence against the Betting Act, 1853. It is not necessary that he should be found always to stand in exactly the same place. If he is in the saloon bar, that is a sufficient localisation—to use the word used in these cases—to show that he is carrying on his business there. A man can carry on his business at one end of the room, just as well as at the other. It is sufficient localisation if he is found in a room. A saloon bar for this purpose is a room. Nor is it necessary to prove that the licensee either knew he was there or permitted him to be there. If he is found there, carrying on the business of betting, that is enough to constitute the offence. That does not mean that a man who is not carrying on a bookmaker's business, but merely takes or makes a casual bet with another commits an offence. In such a case there would be no evidence that he was carrying on the business of a betting house, but, the facts found in the present case having been proved, it follows that an offence has been committed. That, in the opinion of this court, is the result of Milne v. Comr. of Police for City of London (3), and, accordingly, the appeal fails.

There is one other matter with which the court thinks it should deal. The appellant, as he was entitled to do, elected to go for trial. If he had not so elected, the case would have been dealt with by the magistrate, an appeal would have come before the Divisional Court on a Case Stated, and, if it had failed, the appellant would have had to pay the costs. Under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 38 (5), it is provided that :

“The Court of Criminal Appeal may, when they dismiss an appeal or application for leave to appeal, order the appellant or applicant as the case may be to pay the whole or any part of the costs of the appeal . . .”

We think in the present case we ought to use that power. If a bookmaker brings up a question of this sort which he thinks is important and on which he wants and obtains a decision and the decision is adverse to him, we think he ought to pay the costs. Accordingly, we dismiss the appeal and order the appellant to pay the costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

M.R. LE MEE-POWER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), March 4, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Prima facie right of petitioning creditor to order—Special circumstances to justify adjournment of petition.

The debtor entered a caveat in proceedings by the petitioning creditor in the Probate Division to obtain probate of a will, but, later, he withdrew his opposition and was ordered to pay the petitioning creditor's costs, taxed at £550. He failed to pay these costs, and also his own costs amounting to about £1,000. He then instituted proceedings in the Chancery Division, claiming that the testator had died domiciled in France and that he (the debtor) was entitled under French law to a share of the testator's estate notwithstanding the will. While those proceedings were pending the petitioning creditor presented a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor, based on the order for costs made against him in the Probate Division. At the hearing of the petition it appeared that the Chancery action was not likely to come to trial in the immediate future. The debtor asked for an adjournment pending the trial of the Chancery action as, in the event of success, he would be entitled to a large sum from the testator's estate and would become solvent, but the registrar refused an adjournment and made a receiving order.

HELD : (i) the petitioning creditor had a prima facie right to a receiving order unless the debtor established some very special circumstances which justified the court in departing from its usual practice.

(ii) having regard to all the facts, and, in particular, to the circumstances in which the debt was incurred and the nature of the dispute in the Chancery action, it was not a case in which the registrar should have departed from the usual practice.

APPEAL by the debtor from an order of Mr. Registrar PARTON, made on Nov. 17, 1948, by which he made a receiving order against the debtor.

The debtor asked for an adjournment of the bankruptcy proceedings pending the hearing of an action brought by him against the petitioning creditor in the Chancery Division, but this the registrar refused. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

V. R. Aronson for the debtor.

Milner Holland, K.C., and C. W. Chandler for the petitioning creditor.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I will ask COHEN, L.J., to give the first judgment.

COHEN, L.J. : This is an appeal from a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar PARTON against the debtor, on Nov. 17, 1948. The petitioning creditor is the step-mother of the debtor. Her husband, the debtor's father, was born in 1860, and in 1921 he sold his home in England and went abroad to Italy, where, in due course, he acquired various residences in Bordighera. There is some dispute as to the extent to which he afterwards re-visited England. I think it is clear that he did so up to 1931, but after that date nothing is known. On May 2, 1939, he married the petitioning creditor in Italy and lived with her in France from July, 1939, until his death on Feb. 21, 1944. He left a large estate and in a will made by him in February, 1937, the debtor was named as a substantial beneficiary, but, in 1939, after his marriage to the petitioning creditor the testator made a new will giving interests in his property to the petitioning creditor. Between 1939 and Apr. 22, 1940, he made a series of wills, and, by the last one, dated Apr. 22, 1940, he appointed the petitioning creditor sole executrix and left the whole of his estate to her. It is to be observed that in that last will he describes himself as "a domiciled British subject." In 1945 the petitioning creditor commenced proceedings in this country to obtain probate of the will. In those proceedings, the debtor entered a caveat, and, by his defence, he made a number of charges alleging that the testator had been induced to make his will in favour of the petitioning creditor by her undue influence. That defence was delivered on Mar. 20, 1946. By a rejoinder the debtor raised the question where the testator was domiciled for the purpose of establishing the will of 1937 by showing that it had not been revoked by the marriage of the testator to the petitioning creditor. As a result, however, of evidence obtained from a friend of the testator, the debtor came to the conclusion that he could not proceed in the probate action, and in 1948 he withdrew his opposition to the will of 1940. On Apr. 6, 1948, an order was made in the Probate Division for him to pay the costs of the probate action, taxed at some £550. It was in respect of that debt that the petitioning creditor served a bankruptcy notice, and, that not being complied with, presented the petition with which we now have to deal. In the meantime, the debtor had started new proceedings against the petitioning creditor in the Chancery Division, alleging that the testator was domiciled in France and that under French law the petitioning creditor was not entitled to more than one-quarter of the testator's estate, the debtor and his brother being entitled to the residue thereof in equal shares. The proceedings in that action have been protracted. Discovery is not yet complete, and the parties are unable to say when the action is likely to come on for trial. I think there is obviously little hope of the case coming on in the near future.

That was the position when this petition came before the learned registrar. Counsel who appeared on behalf of the debtor asked, not that the petition should be dismissed—he had no hope of that—but for an adjournment pending the hearing of the action in the Chancery Division. Counsel for the petitioning creditor opposed that application. He said that the same issue was raised in the probate proceedings. That was true, but it was not raised with the same object, and, of course, it could not be decided in the probate action once the debtor withdrew his charge of undue influence. Counsel for the petitioning creditor submitted that he was entitled to a receiving order, and, when the learned registrar suggested that he might consent to an adjournment, he refused to do so. Finally, Mr. Registrar PARTON said :

“On the whole I think I cannot refuse the receiving order if, as he does, the petitioning creditor presses for it. It will be a question for the trustee whether or not he continues the proceedings.”

Counsel for the debtor invited us to construe that short note of the decision of the learned registrar as meaning that the learned registrar thought that he had no discretion in the matter but was bound to make a receiving order if the petitioning creditor pressed for it. I am not sure that that was his meaning. I think it may well be that he thought he was bound to take into account the fact that the petitioning creditor resisted the adjournment, but it is by no means clear, and, for the purpose of my judgment, I will assume that the learned registrar did think that, as the petitioning creditor pressed for the order, he was bound to make it. It is suggested that, if he did so think, he was right on the authority of Re Whitley, Ex parte Mirfield Commercial Co., Ltd. (1) in which it was held by the Divisional Court that the fact that considerable property to which the debtors claimed to be entitled was locked up in a Chancery suit was not a sufficient ground for dismissing a petition presented against them for non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice. The petition had been dismissed by the county court registrar on the ground that in the circumstances no receiving order ought to be made against the debtors. It appears from the report of the case that the decision of the registrar had been based on an earlier decision of Ex parte Tynte, Re Tynte (2), a case of an entirely different character which was of no assistance in deciding Re Whitley (1). In those circumstances the Divisional Court was faced with the exercise by the registrar of his discretion on a wrong principle, and was, therefore, compelled to consider the case on its merits, and, on the particular facts, the court held that the petitioning creditor was entitled to his order. I do not think it is right to read that case as deciding that the learned registrar had no discretion in the matter. If that were not the correct interpretation of the case, I think counsel for the debtor would be right when he said that it was inconsistent with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Yeatman, Re Yeatman (3). In that case there were proceedings on a bankruptcy petition and the question was whether there should be an adjudication. It appeared that there was an action pending before FRY, J., the result of which might be that the debtors would have funds available to satisfy the debt claimed by the petitioning creditor, and it appeared that the action would be tried in a few days. In those circumstances, JAMES, L.J., said (16 Ch.D. 287):

A "But the more serious objection arises out of the suggestion that in the action before FRY, J., a fund may be forthcoming which will be available to pay the debt claimed by the [debtors]. If that is so, it is not desirable that an adjudication should be made. It is proper that the hearing of the appeal should stand over until after that action has been decided, when we shall be able to see whether there is any foundation for the appellant's suggestion. The appeal will stand over for that purpose only."

B It seems to me that the proper inference to draw from Re Whitley (1) and Ex parte Yeatman (3) is that there is a discretion in the matter, that in a proper case the court can grant an adjournment, and that it is the duty of the learned registrar in each case, in considering how to exercise his discretion, to have regard to the circumstances of the case. Assuming, in the present case, that the learned registrar has not exercised his discretion and that we have to do so, what are the facts to be taken into account? Counsel for the debtor says that we must first take into account that these Chancery proceedings are not frivolous with no possible chance of success. I do not propose to say more about that, because it would be very wrong for this court on the very slender matter before it—nothing but the pleadings and the wills—to express any opinion as to the result of the action. I cannot say it is a frivolous action, but, on the other hand, it is not plain on the pleadings that it is bound to succeed. We have to have regard to a number of other circumstances, and, although the authorities show that the learned registrar has a discretion, we should not forget that the petitioning creditor is a judgment creditor for a debt which arose in very peculiar circumstances. She was subjected to an offensive attack by this debtor which in due course he had to withdraw, and, in defending herself, she incurred costs of £550. It may well be thought unreasonable that she should be compelled to sit by and allow the debtor to pile up further costs in an action which may not be tried for some time and which she will have to resist. That seems to me to be an important element. Moreover, if a receiving order is made, the debtor will not be entirely without protection. If the debtor could prove any collusive arrangement between the petitioning creditor and the trustee, when appointed, there is no doubt that he would have a right to bring the matter to the notice of the court under s. 80 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Further, why should we assume that the trustee is going completely to disregard the possibility of a surplus for the debtor? Counsel for the petitioning creditor has offered an undertaking that, if the debtor became an adjudicated bankrupt, his client would do all in her power to see that the official receiver remained as trustee of the estate. I think it is probable, although I am in no way seeking to interfere with the discretion of the trustee, that in the circumstances of this case he might think it proper to keep the bankrupt informed as to the steps he was taking in relation to the action on which the result of the bankruptcy proceedings so much depends.

H In my opinion, the short ground on which this appeal fails is that the petitioning creditor has a prima facie right to an order unless the debtor has established some very special circumstances which justify the court in departing from its usual practice. Having regard to all the circumstances, and, in particular, to the circumstances in which the debt was incurred and the nature of the dispute in the Chancery action, this is not a case in which the learned registrar should have departed from the usual practice. I would add that there may be an advantage in having an independent person in charge of the Chancery action. A settlement would plainly be desirable in the interests of all parties, including the debtor, and the chances of such a settlement would be better if there were an independent person in charge of the action. For these reasons, I think that the order which the learned registrar made should be upheld.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I speak with some diffidence on any matter of A bankruptcy practice, but, if I had had to deal with this case as the learned registrar had to deal with it, I should have made the receiving order he made.
The debtor has already instituted abortive proceedings in connection with this estate and incurred costs which he estimates at £1,000, and the petitioning creditor has incurred costs amounting to £550. None of these costs has been paid by B the debtor. The debts in connection with which this receiving order was made amount to some £2,000. I agree that we ought not to express any opinion about the success or failure of the Chancery proceedings, but, if the debtor is successful, he may receive from the estate of his father a sum very much larger than that. I see no reason to suppose that the interests of the debtor in the Chancery action will not be properly considered if the question of a settlement arises. For those reasons, as well as for the reasons given by my C Lord, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

R. v. LICENSING AUTHORITY FOR GOODS VEHICLES FOR THE METROPOLITAN TRAFFIC AREA. Ex parte E B. E. BARRETT, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Birkett, JJ.),
March 1, 2, 1949.]

*Road Transport—Carriage of goods for hire—Restriction on area of operation—Application to licensing authority to specify new "operating centre"—
Desire to carry goods more than 25 miles from true centre—Transport Act, 1947 (c. 49), ss. 52 (1), 58 (4).* F

By the Transport Act, 1947, s. 52 (1): "... it shall be a condition of every A licence . . . that, except under . . . a permit granted by the [British Transport] Commission, goods shall not be carried for hire or reward in any authorised vehicle if the vehicle, at any time while the goods are being so carried, is more than 25 miles from its operating centre . . ." By s. 58 (1) "operating centre" is defined as "the premises specified in the application for the licence as the permanent base or centre from which it is intended that the vehicle will normally be used for the purpose of carrying goods for hire or reward." G

Public carriers holding an A licence in respect of their vehicles were H permitted under s. 52 (1) of the Act of 1947 to carry goods only as far as the northern suburbs of London, the rest of London being more than 25 miles from Luton, where the industry on which they relied for their customers was established. Instead of exercising their right under s. 52 to apply to the Transport Commission for a permit to carry goods beyond the 25 miles limit, the carriers applied to the licensing authority for the Metropolitan Traffic Area under s. 58 (4) of the Act to move their operating centre from Luton to London Colney, which would enable them to carry goods into any part of London. The licensing authority refused the application on the ground that the true operating centre remained at Luton, and, therefore, the carriers' proper course was to apply to the Transport Commission under s. 52 for a permit to extend their area of operation. The carriers applied for an order of mandamus on the ground that the licensing authority had declined to exercise his jurisdiction under s. 58 (4) of the Act on account of the existence of s. 52.

HELD : (i) sections 52 (1) and 58 (4) of the Act of 1947 were not alternative provisions available to carriers to secure the same result, but were two distinct provisions intended to deal with two different sets of circumstances.

(ii) in refusing the application the licensing authority had not declined to exercise his jurisdiction under s. 58 (4), but had properly taken into account the carriers' right to apply for an extension of their area of operation under s. 52 and the prohibition contained in that section against goods being carried more than 25 miles from the operating centre, and, therefore, mandamus would not issue.

MOTION for an order of mandamus.

The applicants, public carriers, who held an A licence in respect of their vehicles, applied under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 58 (4), to the responsible licensing authority to move their operating centre from Luton to London Colney, which would bring the whole of London within the 25 miles area of operation permitted by s. 52 (1) of the Act. The licensing authority refused the application on the ground that, on the facts, the true operation centre remained at Luton and the carriers' proper course was to apply to the Transport Commission, under s. 52, for a permit to extend their area of operation. The carriers applied for an order of mandamus directing the licensing authority to exercise his jurisdiction under s. 58 (4), on the ground that he had declined to do so. The Divisional Court now held that the licensing authority had not declined to exercise his jurisdiction under s. 58 (4), and refused the order.

The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, K.C., and David Karmel for the carriers.
The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.), and H. L. Parker for the licensing authority.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and Stockdale for the Railway and Road Transport Executives (on behalf of the British Transport Commission).

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : In this case counsel for the applicants obtained leave to move for an order of mandamus directed to the licensing authority for the metropolitan area under the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, and the Transport Act, 1947, and the grounds on which the mandamus was sought were (i) that the licensing authority

" . . . declined jurisdiction by holding that, whatever the merits of the applicants' case might be, the said application ought, on the proper construction of the Transport Act, 1947, to have been made to the British

“ . . . he arrived at his conclusion without having any or any proper regard to the applicants’ evidence or to the merits of the applicants’ case.”

The two sections of the Transport Act, 1947, which we have to consider are ss. 52 and 58. Section 52, which is contained in pt. III of the Act, is one of a group of sections which are headed: “Restrictions on carriage of goods for hire or reward otherwise than by [Transport] Commission.” Section 52 (1) provides:

“On and after the appointed day, it shall be a condition of every A licence and every B licence that, except under and in accordance with a permit granted by the Commission, goods shall not be carried for hire or reward in any authorised vehicle if the vehicle, at any time while the goods are being so carried, is more than 25 miles from its operating centre, and the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, shall have effect as if the said condition were included among the conditions specified in s. 8 (1) of that Act.”

An A licence and a B licence are licences granted under the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, the only difference between them being that an A licence is a licence granted to a public carrier, and a B licence is one which is granted to a person who desires to carry his own goods, or to carry goods for hire or reward subject to conditions imposed by the licensing authority.

Section 58 provides:

“(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, in this Part of this Act, the expression ‘operating centre’ means, in relation to a vehicle authorised to be used under an A licence or a B licence, the premises specified in the application for the licence as the permanent base or centre from which it is intended that the vehicle will normally be used for the purpose of carrying goods for hire or reward . . . (3) On an application after the passing of this Act for an A licence or a B licence, the applicant may, if he thinks fit, request the licensing authority to whom the application is made to specify a point in the area of the authority which is to be treated as the operating centre of the authorised vehicles, and where such a request is made, the licensing authority may, if he thinks fit, specify as the operating centre for all or any of the authorised vehicles any such point in his area as he thinks fit. (4) Where an A licence or a B licence is in force at the passing of this Act, the holder of the licence may, within the prescribed time, make such a request as is specified in sub-s. (3) of this section to the licensing authority by whom the licence was granted, and that sub-section shall, with the necessary modifications, apply accordingly.”

To deal briefly with the facts of the case, the applicants carried on business at Luton, and, at the time of the passing of the Act, an A licence was in force in respect of their vehicles. Therefore, as public carriers, they could use their vehicles a distance of 25 miles in any direction from Luton, which, in other words, was the centre of the circle with a radius of 25 miles within which they were entitled to operate. They desired to carry goods a greater distance than 25 miles in one direction because the circumference of the circle within which they were entitled to travel only takes in, to the south, the northern suburbs of London. It would, therefore, be a great convenience to their customers and to themselves if the applicants could carry goods more than 25 miles from Luton, i.e., more into the centre of London than they can at the present time. Therefore, they went before the licensing authority for the Metropolitan Traffic Area, and asked to have their operating centre moved from Luton to London

Colney, which is some 12 or 14 miles nearer London than is Luton. If their operating centre were fixed as London Colney instead of Luton, it would enable them to run their vehicles into any part of London that they might desire.

The real basis of the argument of counsel for the applicant was that ss. 52 and 58 of the Act of 1947 are alternative sections, i.e., a person who desires to achieve the object which the applicants had can apply either to the British Transport Commission for permission to run more than 25 miles or to the licensing authority to grant a new operating centre from which he would be able to run 25 miles and so achieve the same result as if he were permitted to go more than 25 miles from his original centre. It will be seen, however, that the two bodies to whom the applications have to be made are not the same. To operate one's vehicle for a greater distance than 25 miles, permission has to be obtained from the British Transport Commission. To change the operating centre permission has to be obtained from the licensing authority. When the Act is considered carefully, I think that the argument of counsel for the Railway and Road Executives (the delegates of the British Transport Commission) that these two sections are not alternative is right. In truth, they deal with two different things. As defined in s. 58 (1) :

“ . . . ‘operating centre’ means, in relation to a vehicle . . . the premises specified in the application for the licence as the permanent base or centre from which it is intended that the vehicle will normally be used for the purpose of carrying goods for hire or reward.”

There may be a case, such as was suggested by counsel for the licensing authority in his argument, where carriers have a number of vehicles, with A or B licences, which are used for carrying goods from some particular place, e.g., Covent Garden market, but which are ordinarily kept at some distance away because, it may be, there is no other satisfactory garage accommodation available. It is then open to the licensees to go to the authority and say : “ Our vehicles work from Covent Garden market. That is the true operating centre of the vehicles, and it is nothing to the point that we have to garage them three or four miles away. Therefore, we ask you to allow us to change the centre of the circle within which we are entitled to operate to the place from which, in fact, we do our work.” That seems to me to be the kind of matter with which s. 58 is designed to deal, and in the case with which we are now dealing no one suggests that the true operating centre of these vehicles is anything but Luton. The business which the applicants carry on is that of conveying straw hats to various establishments and business houses, particularly in London. Luton (and not London Colney) is the principal manufacturing centre, in England, of straw hats, and the applicants have only one customer in London Colney, so there is no question what is the true operating centre of their vehicles. It is Luton and not London Colney. It is clear that what the licensing authority decided in this case was to this effect : “ You are asking me to alter the operating centre, but now that I have heard and appreciated the facts, it appears plain to me that what you are really asking for is permission to run more than 25 miles from your operating centre, and I am not going to allow an application, which ought to be made under s. 52, to be made under the colour of an application under s. 58.” By the words “ under the colour ” I am not suggesting that there was anything improper in the application, because this was a point on which it was perfectly legitimate to get a decision, but it seems to me that the licensing authority is clearly entitled to say : “ It would be wrong to give people who operate lorries from Luton to convey goods from Luton for Luton manufacturers an operating centre at a place where there are no manufacturers and from which they do not collect goods when the effect of doing so would be to enable them to run their vehicles for a considerably greater distance from their real operating centre than 25 miles. If they want that permission, they must go to the British Transport Commission and apply to be allowed to run greater distances than 25 miles." I think that when the purposes of ss. 52 and 58 are appreciated, it becomes clear that they are not alternative sections, but are sections which are intended to deal with different sets of circumstances. In my opinion, the application fails and must be dismissed.

HUMPHREYS, J. : It is not for us to say whether the licensing authority was right or wrong. There was brought before the authority an application under this Act of Parliament. He heard it fully—there is no question about that—and gave a considered judgment. It is said, on this application for an order of mandamus, that that judgment amounted to a declining of jurisdiction. There is no allegation in this case that the tribunal at the outset refused to consider the application. It did consider it, but that does not prevent an order for mandamus going, if, eventually, the tribunal, having heard evidence and argument, wrongly declined jurisdiction. I think it is plain that the licensing authority refused this application under s. 58 because of the provisions of s. 52 of the Act of 1947. The best proof of that is that he did not mention any other ground in his careful, considered judgment. Therefore, the question is this: Was the licensing authority entitled, in the exercise of his discretion, to take into consideration the existence and the terms of s. 52? In my opinion, clearly he was. A tribunal, in considering whether it will grant an application, is entitled to—and, indeed, must—take into account other sections of the Act than the particular section under which it is asked to grant a licence. That is elementary. Though the language of this judgment was, perhaps, not very happily chosen, what emerges, I think, from it is that the licensing authority was considering s. 52 as distinct from s. 58, and did say that he refused the application on its merits. He did not think it was necessary to give these additional facilities to the applicants, and he came to this conclusion partly because he had considered the provisions included in s. 52 (1) and especially the prohibition contained in that sub-section against persons carrying goods more than 25 miles from their base of operation unless they could get a permit from the Transport Commission. Whether he was right or wrong, I do not stop to consider, and I do not think that is a question for this court. It may be that it would have been better if he had merely said: "I decline this application on its merits," and said nothing about s. 52, but I think it is greatly to the credit of the licensing authority—recognising, as, no doubt, he does, that he is a single individual appointed to be the sole judge, without any right of appeal from his decision—that he thought it right that he should state what was in his mind. I also think it right that he should do so and that other persons in a similar position should do so, and I do not think the court ought lightly to say that he has refused jurisdiction because he has based his judgment mainly on the existence of the provisions of s. 52. For these reasons, I agree with the judgment of my Lord.

BIRKETT, J. : In the initial stages of the argument, I was attracted by the submissions made by counsel for the applicants. One form of the argument presented was that Parliament had given to the subject two distinct and separate rights which, in his discretion, he could choose to exercise, and that what had happened in this case was that an applicant, proceeding under a particular section, had been declined his rights under that section. At the same time I was troubled by the reflection that, although the central ground of the submission was that jurisdiction had been declined, yet all the time there were present all the outward and visible signs of the jurisdiction having been exercised. All the witnesses were heard, the evidence was put forward quite freely, and there was a most helpful discussion of the whole scheme of the Act.

I think it is important to remember the exact point which is at present before this court. It is a motion ;

“ . . . for an order of mandamus that the licensing authority for goods vehicles for the Metropolitan Traffic Area re-hears and determines an application by B. E. Barrett, Ltd., under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 58 (4), requesting him to specify a point to be treated as the operating centre of certain vehicles, in respect of which they hold a public carriers’ A licence upon the grounds set forth in the copy statement.”

A Among those grounds, the first and the chief is that the licensing authority wrongly declined jurisdiction. On that matter I should like to refer to a few words from the judgment of BANKES, L.J., in R. v. Port of London Authority. Ex parte Kynoch, Ltd. (1). BANKES, L.J., said ([1919] 1 K.B. 183) :

B “ Every case must depend on its own particular circumstances ; but decided cases furnish some rules which ought to govern the court in the exercise of its discretion to grant or refuse the prerogative writ of mandamus. There must be something in the nature of a refusal to exercise jurisdiction by the tribunal or authority to whom the writ is to be directed. A refusal may be conveyed in one of two ways : there may be an absolute refusal in terms, or there may be conduct amounting to a refusal.”

C In the case with which we are now dealing, counsel for the applicant suggested that it was the second head on which he relied. BANKES, L.J., proceeded (ibid.) :

D “ In the latter case it is often difficult to draw the line between those cases where the tribunal or authority has heard and determined erroneously upon grounds which it was entitled to take into consideration and those cases where it has heard and determined upon grounds outside and beyond its jurisdiction ; but this conclusion may be drawn from decided cases, that there is no refusal to hear and determine unless the tribunal or authority has in substance shut its ears to the application which was made to it, and has determined upon an application which was not made to it.”

E He then quoted FARWELL, L.J., in R. v. Board of Education (2) ([1910] 2 K.B. 179) :

F “ ‘ If the tribunal has exercised the discretion entrusted to it bona fide, not influenced by extraneous or irrelevant considerations, and not arbitrarily or illegally, the courts cannot interfere ; they are not a court of appeal from the tribunal, but they have power to prevent the intentional usurpation or mistaken assumption of a jurisdiction beyond that given to the tribunal by law, and also the refusal of their true jurisdiction by the adoption of extraneous considerations in arriving at their conclusion or deciding a point other than that brought before them, in which cases the courts have regarded them as declining jurisdiction ’.”

G In the present case the application was made under the Transport Act, 1947, s. 58 (4). The whole point of the application that was made to the licensing authority was for the fixing of a notional point at London Colney which should be the applicants’ new operating centre. It was conceded both by counsel for the applicants and by counsel for the Railway and Road Transport Executives that the authority had full discretion to deal with the application under s. 58.

H It seems to me, on full reflection, that it was vital for the proper exercise of that discretion that the licensing authority should consider the part which s. 58 played in the whole scheme of transport comprehended in the sections in pt. III of that rather complicated Act. It would have been quite impossible, in my judgment, to exercise a proper and equitable discretion without full consideration of the background of legislation of which s. 58 forms part. It was said by the applicants : The evidence was fully placed before the licensing authority, and he gave the fullest opportunity to all interested parties to express their views. No complaint can be made on that head, but when the language of his decision is looked at, his hearing all the evidence is vitiated because the construction to be put on the language is that he had virtually declined to exercise jurisdiction in this matter. At the Bar it was called "plain English," but it would not be the first time that words expressed in plain English have been the subject of very much disputation. However, the language of the decision does lend colour, certainly at first sight, to the view that could be taken that the licensing authority had listened to all the evidence but, that, when he came to make his decision, he held that everything he had heard was irrelevant. I think the true view was that the licensing authority heard all the evidence, listened to full argument, took into consideration the scheme of the Act, and, particularly, pt. III and the particular provisions of ss. 58 and 52, and then said: "In the exercise of my discretion, having heard and listened to all the relevant matters, I refuse this application. I think that the real purpose of this application was the purpose which is more appropriately and more properly comprehended under s. 52 of the Act of Parliament." In so doing, in my opinion, the licensing authority exercised a proper discretion, and it could not be said—which is the central and fundamental thing which counsel for the applicants must establish in order to succeed—that he declined jurisdiction. For these reasons, I agree with the two judgments which have just been delivered and with the results which follow therefrom.

Application refused. One set of costs awarded to respondents.

KREMEZI v. RIDGWAY.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), February 21, 22, 23, 1949.]

Conflict of Laws—Contract of marriage—English and foreign law the same—Difference in remedy for breach—Jurisdiction of English court—Performance of the contract—Full relation of husband and wife.

While in Greece, an English naval officer entered into a contract of marriage with a Greek girl, resident in Athens. Later the contract was renewed in England, with the intention that the new contract should be in substitution for the previous one. The marriage was to take place in Athens but the parties intended to make their matrimonial home in England. In an action for breach of promise of marriage:

HELD: (i) on the facts, the intention of the parties was that the contract should be governed by English law.

(ii) as there was no difference between English law and the Greek code in the law affecting the contract and the contractual obligations, but merely a difference in the remedy, the English court had jurisdiction in the matter.

Hansen v. Dixon, (1906) (96 L.T. 32), applied.

Per HILBERY, J.: the performance of the contract which the parties had under consideration when they entered into the contract was not exhausted on the performance of the marriage ceremony, but included their intended residence together in England after the marriage.

[AS TO LAW GOVERNING CONTRACTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, pp. 263-268, paras. 321, 322; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 11, pp. 388-392, Nos. 641-663.]

Cases referred to :

(1) Hansen v. Dixon, (1906), 96 L.T. 32 ; 11 Digest 392, 661.

(2) Hamlyn & Co. v. Talisker Distillery, [1894] A.C. 202 ; 71 L.T. 1 ; 58 J.P. 540 ; 11 Digest 389, 643.

A ACTION for damages for breach of promise of marriage. The breach of the contract being admitted, the question was whether the contract was governed by Greek law, under which damages would be restricted to the cost of the trousseau and other expenses necessitated by the contract and lost through its breach, or by English law, under which the damages would be at large. HILBERY, J., directed the jury that the damages should be assessed according to English law.

B Scott Henderson, K.C., and J. T. Molony for the plaintiff.
Fearnley-Whittingstall and Godfrey Carter for the defendant.

C HILBERY, J. : The contract sued on in this case, which is admitted—and, incidentally, the breach of it, an unjustifiable breach, is now admitted—was made, on the first occasion, in Greece, but later it was made again in England with the intention that the new contract should be a solemn substitution for any previous contract between the parties. The contract so made in England was by an exchange by the plaintiff and the defendant of mutual promises to marry. It is the mutuality of promises which English law regards as essential if a contract is to be made, and, therefore, the undertaking was one which the English law recognises as a contract. The defendant, an Englishman, born and domiciled here, is an officer in His Majesty's Navy. He proposed the marriage, and his intention was to live here with his wife after the contemplated marriage and to make the matrimonial home in England. I am satisfied that it was the intention of the plaintiff to adopt her husband's home and people, but it was arranged that the marriage ceremony should take place at Athens, the place of the plaintiff's home where her parents resided. To that extent the contract was to be performed in Athens and not in England.

E In those circumstances, according to the principles of international law, what is the law which governs the contract ? If it is Greek law, then the damages are confined to a reasonable sum for the trousseau or other incidental expenses necessitated by the promise and lost because of the breach. If, however, it is English law, the damages are at large, the action being one of the exceptional actions in contract where English law allows more than the strict measure of damages ordinarily applicable to contract. In my view, the guiding principle is still to be found—as BRAY, J., said in Hansen v. Dixon (1)—in the leading judgment of LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in Hamlyn & Co. v. Talisker Distillery (2) where LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., said ([1894] A.C. 207) :

G “Where a contract is entered into between parties residing in different places, where different systems of law prevail, it is a question, as it appears to me, in each case, with reference to what law the parties contracted, and according to what law it was their intention that their rights either under the whole or any part of the contract should be determined. In considering what law is to govern, no doubt the lex loci solutionis is a matter of great importance. The lex loci contractus is also of importance. In the present case the place of contract was different from the place of its performance.

H It is not necessary to enter upon the inquiry, which was a good deal discussed at the Bar, to which of these considerations the greatest weight is to be attributed, namely, the place where the contract was made, or the place where it is to be performed. In my view they are both matters which must be taken into consideration, but neither of them is, of itself, conclusive, and still less is it conclusive, as it appears to me, as to the particular law which was intended to govern particular parts of the contract between the parties.”

In Hansen v. Dixon (1), BRAY, J., came to the conclusion that, in the state of things that he reviewed, he saw nothing to remove the presumption that the contract was to be governed by English law. The learned judge said (96 L.T. 34):

"... there was this additional circumstance—namely, that according to the evidence of the plaintiff which I accept, it was quite clear that it was intended that the marriage should take place in England and that the married home was to be here. I have, therefore, no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the intention of the parties was that English law should prevail."

In the present case it was intended that the marriage ceremony should take place in Greece, but every conclusion in the case points to the intention of the parties being that the contract, made in England on the proposal of the defendant, an Englishman, to the plaintiff, who had then come to England, was that she should be his wife in England, and, therefore, their exchange of mutual promises constituted a contract which the parties intended should be governed by English law. I do not see anything, except the mere fact that the ceremony was to be performed in Athens, which could possibly be said to challenge that intention, and that fact alone—that element in the performance of the contract—does not alter the view I have formed that the whole intention of the parties was that the contract was to be governed by English law.

If it is necessary for my decision (though I doubt it), I would say that, while it is true that this peculiar type of contract—the exchange of mutual promises to marry—ends, so far as legal enforcement is concerned, on the performance of the marriage ceremony, none the less the performance which the parties contemplated at the time they exchange mutual promises is not exhausted by the performance of a mere ceremony. I am quite sure that no young woman, when she accepts a proposal of marriage and a contract is formed, would be satisfied if she were told that all the young man is undertaking by the promise is to go through a form or a ceremony with her. What the parties intend is an exchange of mutual promises to become one another's spouses—to become husband and wife with all that that should entail.

There is, however, another point. From the evidence of the Greek lawyers it appears that there is no difference between English law and the Greek code in the law affecting the contract and the contractual obligations, but that there is merely a difference in the remedy. The Greek code gives a cause of action for breach of contract, but limits the damages recoverable to the actual expenditure which was reasonably incurred on account of the contract. As BRAY, J., said in Hansen v. Dixon (1), however, the mere fact that the remedy given by the foreign law is different will not disturb the jurisdiction of the English court, and, therefore, for this reason as well, I am satisfied that the decision to which I have come is the right one. In these circumstances, I shall tell the jury that this is a matter which must be considered by them, and I shall direct them accordingly to English law.

Re LATTAS SETTLEMENT. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. LATTAS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 3, 1949.]

Power of Appointment—Special power—Exercise—Expression in will of intention to exercise—“I give devise and appoint all my property”—Non-objects of power named as substitutional beneficiaries.

A In 1901, by a settlement made in consideration of marriage, after the limitation of life interests to the wife and the husband respectively, a power to appoint the trust funds by deed or will to the children or remoter issue of the marriage was given to the survivor of the spouses. In default of appointment the trust funds were directed to be held in trust for the children of the marriage at 21, or in the case of a daughter at 21 or marriage, in equal shares if more than one. The settlement also contained a covenant by the wife to settle after-acquired property. There was issue of the marriage a son and a daughter. On Oct. 21, 1926, the wife died, and, as the after-acquired property clause in the marriage settlement had not been complied with, a deed dated June 29, 1927, was entered into whereby the mutual rights of the wife's executors and the trustee of the settlement were adjusted and the husband covenanted not to exercise his power of appointment in favour of the remoter issue. On May 21, 1929, by a further deed, to which all interested persons were parties, certain funds were withdrawn from the marriage settlement and re-settled on similar trusts but with extended powers of investment. On Apr. 27, 1943, the daughter died, having reached the age of 21 but without ever having been married. By his will, dated Mar. 13, 1946, the husband, having appointed the son and another to be his executors, gave a pecuniary legacy, and provided: “Subject as aforesaid I give devise and appoint all my property real and personal unto my said son in fee simple and absolutely Provided always that if my said son shall die in my lifetime leaving issue living at my death who shall attain the age of 21 years such issue shall take and if more than one in equal shares the property which their father would have taken hereunder.” The husband died on June 17, 1947. He had no powers of appointment other than those referred to.

F HELD: the will operated as an exercise of the husband's powers of appointment both over the funds remaining in the marriage settlement and those re-settled by the deed of 1929.

H ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of a will, the testator had exercised a limited power of appointment under a marriage settlement. VAISEY, J., held that the power had been exercised, and directed that a further summons should be taken out pro forma to raise a similar question with regard to other funds subject to a re-settlement, and said that he would make the order indicated both on the summons before him and on the further summons. The facts appear in the judgment.

Swingland for the plaintiff, the Public Trustee, trustee of the marriage settlement. A

E. G. Wright for the first defendant, the son.

Tonge for the second defendant, one of the executors of the daughter, who would be entitled in default of appointment.

VAISEY, J. : This summons raises a question whether the will of the testator, Mr. William Latta, operated in relation to certain trust funds as a valid exercise of certain powers of appointment. B

The testator was married in 1901, and by a settlement made in consideration of that marriage certain property was settled on the part of his wife, Mrs. Janet Halley Latta, nee Cuthbertson. The settlement is in common form. It gave to the wife the first life interest, to the husband the second life interest, and, after the death of the survivor of the two persons, the capital was directed to be held in trust for all or such one or more of the issue of the marriage, whether children or remoter issue, as the husband and wife should jointly by deed appoint, and, in default of such appointment, as the survivor of them should by deed or will or codicil appoint, with a trust in default of appointment for the children of the marriage at 21, or in the case of a daughter at 21 or marriage, in equal shares if more than one. It is also material to note that the settlement contained a covenant on the part of the wife to settle her after-acquired property of a value of £1,000 or more with certain exceptions to which I need not refer. The settlement provided that during their joint lives the husband and wife should have power to appoint new trustees. That last mentioned power was exercised in 1913 when the Public Trustee was appointed sole trustee of the settlement in place of the original trustees, one of whom was dead and the other of whom retired. The wife died on Oct. 21, 1926. There was issue of the marriage only two children, a daughter, Margaret Cuthbertson Latta, who is now dead, and a son, Gordon Cuthbertson Latta, the first defendant. The wife did not concur with the testator in any exercise of the joint power of appointment reserved to them by the settlement. After her death it was found that the covenant on her part for the settlement of her after-acquired property had been overlooked or disregarded. To deal with that situation a deed, dated June 29, 1927, was executed. It was expressed to be supplemental to the settlement, and it contained provisions whereby the mutual rights of the wife's executors and the trustee of the settlement were adjusted. The parties to the deed were the testator, Mr. Latta, the daughter and the son, the executors of the wife, and the Public Trustee as trustee of the settlement. In order that the deed might be completely effective the husband released his power of appointment under the settlement so far as that power authorised him to benefit the issue of the marriage more remote than the daughter and the son, but he reserved the power to appoint to the daughter and son or either of them. Certain investments were then transferred to the Public Trustee and were accepted as a complete satisfaction of the wife's obligation to put her after-acquired property into settlement. A further deed dated May 21, 1929, was made between the testator, the son, and the daughter of the first part, the Public Trustee of the second part, and the testator and the son of the third part. The purpose and object of that deed, to which, be it noted, every person who could possibly be interested was a party, was to withdraw some portion of the trust fund from the ambit of the marriage settlement and to re-settle that portion on the same trusts as had C
H

previously been applicable to it under the settlement, but with an extended power of investment. That portion of the trust fund was taken out of the Public Trustee's hands as trustee of the marriage settlement and placed in the hands of the testator and the son as trustees on corresponding referential trusts. The clause relevant to the present application is cl. 2 which provides that the testator and the son

A " . . . agree to hold the scheduled investments [i.e., the withdrawn investments] upon such of the trusts and with and subject to such of the powers and provisions of the said [marriage] settlement as in the events which have happened are now subsisting and capable of taking effect," but subject to further provisions which are not material for me to state.

B At that point it will be observed that both funds were held (one by the Public Trustee as trustee of the marriage settlement, and the other by the testator and his son under the deed which I have just been describing) on trust in the events which had happened for the testator for life with remainder to the son and the daughter as he should by deed or will appoint and in default of such appointment to the son and daughter in equal shares.

C The daughter died on Apr. 27, 1943, without having been married. She made a will which was proved by her brother and one Charles Aikin Lawford, the second defendant. By that will, as I understand, she benefited certain persons not parties to the present summons. On Mar. 13, 1946, the testator made his will, by which he appointed his son and another person to be executors. He gave a specific legacy of £5,000 and then cl. 3 provides :

D " Subject as aforesaid I give devise and appoint all my property real and personal unto my said son in fee simple and absolutely Provided always that if my said son shall die in my lifetime leaving issue living at my death who shall attain the age of 21 years such issue shall take and if more than one in equal shares the property which their father would have taken hereunder."

E On May 18, 1946, the testator made a codicil in which he increased the amount of the legacy, but in all other respects confirmed his will. He died on June 17, 1947, without having further altered his will which was proved in due course. The settled funds, therefore, which remained under the control of the Public Trustee, the trustee of the settlement at the date of the testator's will and also at the date of his death consisted of the funds originally settled and those brought in by the deed of June 29, 1927, excluding the withdrawn investments. The value of the funds remaining under the control of the Public Trustee is upwards of £30,000. The value of the funds withdrawn and placed in the referential settlement is not disclosed in the evidence. The Public Trustee, the plaintiff on this summons, is in no way concerned with the referential settlement, and the summons relates only to the funds in the hands of the Public Trustee and does not refer to the funds in the referential settlement.

G The point now raised is familiar because testators frequently use expressions which are consistent both with the exercise and with the non-exercise of powers which they possess, and it is always a question of weighing the considerations which are in favour of the view that the power is exercised against the considerations which point the other way. Here the indications on each side are very few and slight. On the one hand, the testator undoubtedly uses the word "appoint." On the other hand, he has included among the objects of his bounty not only his son, who was admittedly an object of both the powers which the testator possessed, but he has purported to benefit by way of substitution the son's issue in the event of the son predeceasing him, which event did not, of course, happen. His power to appoint to the issue of the son had been released by the deed of June 29, 1927, and that release was emphasised by the testator having covenanted in plain terms not to exercise it in favour of any issue of his remoter than his son and daughter.

There is a wealth of authority on this kind of point. I do not propose to attempt an elaborate review of the cases because I do not think I could do it in any form different from that which appears in my judgment in Re Holford's Settlement (1). There I came to the conclusion that, in spite of the fact that there were some indications in the will of an intention to exercise the powers, on the balance of considerations the powers had not been exercised. The case which seems to me to be nearest to the present one and to throw the most light on it is Re Mayhew (2). There the testatrix said :

"I appoint devise and bequeath my real estate and the residue of my personal estate to my trustees upon trust to sell or convert the same into money and to pay and divide the proceeds (after paying my debts funeral and testamentary expenses) equally between [four named nephews and nieces] or such of them as shall be living at my decease."

They all survived the testatrix who had a testamentary power to appoint a certain share among her nephews and nieces. Evidence was admitted to show that she had no other power of appointment, and it was held that the power was exercised. I have evidence before me that the testator in the present case had no other testamentary powers of appointment except those to which I have referred, and, so far as I am aware, he never exercised his power of appointment as survivor by any deed. Re Mayhew (2) was a decision of FARWELL, J. That very learned judge was notably an authority on all questions relating to powers of appointment. He said the case was near the line and came to the conclusion that the power had been exercised. He said ([1901] 1 Ch. 679), "I start with the fact that the gift is to objects of the power." Then he calls attention to the fact that there was evidence that the testatrix had no other power, and went on (ibid.) :

"She uses the words 'I appoint devise and bequeath.' Now, the word 'appoint' is a word of art, prima facie having reference to powers only. I do not of course say that if there were no other words of disposition the word 'appoint' in itself would not pass all the testatrix's property. But here I have the three words 'appoint devise and bequeath,' and the word 'appoint' in this collocation necessarily refers to a power. I therefore read the will as if the testatrix had said 'I devise and bequeath, and in exercise of every power enabling me in this behalf I appoint.'"

After saying that he had had some doubt at first whether the word "appoint" might not be satisfied by limiting its reference to any power acquired after the date of the will, he refers to the previous cases of Re Teape's Trusts (3) and Re Swinburne (4) in both of which it was held there was a sufficient reference to a special power. Then FARWELL, J., pointed out that in the case before him the words "devise and bequeath" would be sufficient in themselves to exercise a general power so that he was only following the general rule and giving effect, so far as possible, to every word used by the testator, saying that the word "appoint" must necessarily refer to a special power. There, putting on the one side the word "appoint" and the fact that the beneficiaries were objects of the power, and setting on the other side the otiose or incorrect direction that the trustees should sell and convert the appointed fund into money and pay the testatrix's debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, the learned judge came to the conclusion that the power was well exercised.

In Re Swinburne (4) a decision of PEARSON, J., a testatrix had a testamentary power of appointment among certain nephews and nieces. By her will she gave all the real and personal estate of which she might be seised or possessed at the time of her death or over which she might have any testamentary power of disposition to trustees on trust for sale and conversion and to stand possessed of the proceeds (which she described as "my said trust funds") on trust to pay costs and expenses and to pay her debts and funeral expenses and certain pecuniary legacies and then on trust as to two one-fourth parts of her trust funds respectively for persons who were objects of the power and

A on trust as to the other two one-fourth parts respectively for persons who were not objects of the power. She declared that, in case of the failure of the trusts thereinbefore declared of any of the one-fourth parts of her trust funds, the one-fourth part, or so much thereof of which the trusts should fail, should be held on the trusts thereinbefore declared of the others or other of the fourth parts of which the trusts should not fail. It was held that the testatrix had
B manifested an intention to exercise the power, and that as to one moiety of the brother's property the power was well exercised. The judgment of PEARSON, J. (27 Ch.D. 702) begins by pointing out that :

"The testatrix has contrived to express her will in such a way as to create as much difficulty as possible in the construction of it. The first question is : Did she intend to exercise at all the special power of
C appointment given to her by her brother's will, or did she only intend to exercise any general power of appointment by will which she might have ? It is conceded that she had in fact no other testamentary power of appointment, and if I come to the conclusion that she did not intend to exercise this special power, I shall in fact strike out of the will the words 'over which I may have any testamentary power of disposition.' I think I D cannot do that."

The learned judge came to the conclusion that the power of appointment had in all the circumstances been fully exercised.

Among the cases to which I referred in Re Holford's Settlement (1), there are several which seem to me to be helpful including Re Ackerley (5), Re
E Milner (6) and Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm (7). The last was the case of a will which contained no reference to the power but did include the words "over which at the time of my decease I shall have any beneficial disposing power by this my will." There the gift was made to trustees on trust partly for persons who were objects of the power and partly in excess of the power. It was held that the power was exercised by the will, the trusts so far as they
F were in excess of the power being inoperative.

Here it is contended by counsel for the second defendant that the testator is undoubtedly dealing with the property, both his own property and the property which he was appointing, as one mass, but in both Re Mayhew (2) and Re Swinburne (4) the same criticism was advanced, and it was, nevertheless, held that the will operated to exercise the power. In my judgment, this testator,
G by using the word "appoint," has used a word to which, if possible, I must give effect. Following the two cases to which I have referred, Re Mayhew (2) and Re Swinburne (4), I do not think I am justified in saying that that word was inserted merely in case the testator should thereafter be given some power of appointment which did not belong to him at the date at which he made his will. I think that the testator intended to exercise the power of appoint-
H ment in favour of his son, and that that intention extends not only to the funds in the hands of the Public Trustee, but also to the funds in the hands of the son as surviving trustee under the deed of May 21, 1929. I agree that, if the son had predeceased the testator, the substitutional gift to the son's issue could not have operated on the trust fund by reason of the testator's partial release of his power, but I cannot see that there is any difference between a case in which the non-objects are brought in by way of substitutional gift and the case in which there are objects and non-objects mixed up as in Re

Swinburne (4). Although, as so many judges have said, in this class of case the dividing line may be narrow and the guidance given by the authorities is none too easy to follow, I think on the whole, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case, that the will did operate to exercise both the powers of appointment which were vested in the testator at the time of his death.

Order accordingly. Costs as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the funds in the hands of the Public Trustee.

EGERTON v. EGERTON.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), February 18, March 9, 1949.]

Variation of Settlement—Income of trust fund to be paid to wife if marriage undissolved—Power to husband to appoint by will in favour of second wife—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 192.

The husband and wife were married in 1928, and there were no children of the marriage. By cl. 3 of an ante-nuptial settlement, to which the wife was a party, it was provided that after the husband's death, if the intended marriage should be subsisting and undissolved at the date of his death and if the wife should survive him, the trustees were to pay the annual income of the trust fund to the wife during her lifetime. The settlement further provided that, subject to cl. 3, the husband might by deed or will appoint, in favour of any other wife who might survive him, all or any part of the annual income of the fund. On June 27, 1947, the wife was granted a decree nisi on the ground of the husband's adultery, and on Aug. 15, 1947, the decree was made absolute. On Aug. 19, 1947, the husband re-married and on Nov. 17 he died, leaving a will dated Sept. 14, 1947. By his will the husband exercised the power of appointment conferred on him by the settlement, partly in favour of the second wife, partly in favour of his sister, and, after the death of the second wife, in favour of his sister's children living at the date of his death. The wife had an annual income of £1,099 and had supported herself since 1931. The husband's only income had been £650 derived from the settlement. The second wife was without income apart from the provision made for her under the will, and the sister had an income of £1,089. On an application by the first wife for a variation of the settlement by directing the trustee to pay the income of the trust fund to her during her life,

HELD: although in a proper case, in which the innocent party could show a change of circumstances, the court might be prepared to vary such a settlement, in view of the terms of cl. 3, of which the wife was aware, the lawfully acquired interests of the beneficiaries under the husband's will, and also the pecuniary means of the various parties and the relative financial position of the husband and wife during their marriage, the settlement ought not to be varied.

A APPLICATION for the variation of a settlement.

The wife, having obtained a decree absolute of divorce, sought to vary an ante-nuptial settlement by directing the trustees of the settlement to pay the income of the trust fund to her during her lifetime. The settlement provided that, if the marriage should be undissolved at the husband's death, the trustees were to pay the income to the wife during her lifetime, but, subject thereto, the husband might by will appoint the income in favour of any other wife. The husband who, before his death, had re-married, by will appointed the income of the trust fund in favour of his second wife (who had no other means), his sister and his sister's children. BARNARD, J., held that in the circumstances the settlement ought not to be varied.

Cur. adv. vult.

- D Mar. 9. BARNARD, J., read the following judgment. The parties were married on Apr. 14, 1928, and there are no children of the marriage. At the time of the marriage the wife was a Mrs. Crawshay, she having divorced her former husband. In May, 1946, the husband petitioned for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the wife's alleged desertion, and at the hearing on June 27, 1947, the wife, having obtained leave to amend her answer and to charge adultery, was granted a decree nisi on the prayer of her answer.
- E This decree was made absolute on Aug. 15, 1947. On Aug. 19, 1947, the husband re-married, and on Nov. 17, 1947, he died, leaving a will dated Sept. 14, 1947, which has been duly proved. On Mar. 18, 1948, the wife, by leave of the court, she being out of time, filed a notice applying for the variation of an ante-nuptial settlement dated Apr. 13, 1928. The parties to this settlement were the husband, the wife, and trustees. The husband brought into
- F settlement approximately £18,000, on trust for the annual income thereof to be applied during his lifetime for the benefit of himself, the wife, and any other wife and issue of his, and any person who, if he had died intestate, would have been entitled to the trust fund or the income thereof, as the trustees should in their discretion think fit. By cl. 3 of the said settlement, after the husband's death, if the said intended marriage should be subsisting and undissolved at
- G the date of his death and if the wife should survive him by seven days, the trustees were to pay the annual income thereof to the wife during her lifetime without power of anticipation during coverture. The settlement provided that, if there were no children or remoter issue of the husband who attained a vested interest under the settlement, the trustees should stand possessed of the trust fund in trust for the husband, and, subject to the provisions of cl. 3, the husband
- H might by deed or will appoint in favour of any other wife who might survive him, during her life or any less period, all or any part of the annual income of the trust fund. The settlement further gave power to the trustees, in their discretion and at the request of the husband, to raise out of the trust fund any sum or sums not exceeding £5,000 and pay or apply the same to or for the benefit of the husband absolutely. The gross annual income from the trust fund is approximately £650. The trustees paid the annual income to the husband during his life, and at his death this was his only source of income.

By his will, the husband, in the exercise of the power of appointment conferred on him by the settlement, directed that the trustees were to hold the settled fund on trust as to one equal fourth share, both capital and income, for his second wife absolutely, and as to one other equal fourth share thereof on trust as to capital and income for his sister absolutely, and as to the remaining moiety of the said fund on trust to pay the income arising therefrom to his second wife during her life with power for the trustees at their uncontrolled discretion to raise and pay out of the capital thereof any sum or sums not exceeding in the whole £5,000 to or for the benefit of the second wife, and, subject thereto, from and after her death on such of the children of his sister as should be living at the date of his death. The second wife is entirely without means apart from the provision made for her by the will. The first wife, however, has an annual income of about £1,099 and she has entirely supported herself since 1931. It is also clear from her own evidence given at the trial that from the date of her marriage until 1931, when she and the husband parted, the husband, whose only income was the £650 per annum derived from the settlement, was more of a financial liability than an asset. The wife's income, which was derived from her former husband, Mr. Crawshay, on her re-marriage to the husband was reduced by about £1,000 per annum to the said £1,099. The husband's sister, Lady Mary Cecilia Boyd, who is a beneficiary under his will, lives with her husband in Kenya and has an income of about £1,089 per annum. Her husband is apparently of no occupation and has no private means of his own. Lady Mary Cecilia Boyd has three children all of whom are still living and two of whom are under age.

The registrar has recommended the following variation of the settlement :

"That it be ordered that in spite of the appointment contained in the husband's said will, the trustees do during the lifetime of the [first wife] pay to her one fourth part of the income arising from the settled fund instead of the said Lady Mary Cecilia Boyd and that should the [first wife] survive the second wife, they should pay the income of a moiety of the said fund to her for the remainder of her life instead of to the children of the said Lady Mary Cecilia Boyd, but that the discretion of the trustees arising under the said appointment to raise and pay out of the capital of the said moiety sums not exceeding £5,000 to or for the benefit of the second wife be not interfered with, and that the necessary variation or rectification of the said settlement be made accordingly."

The first wife now seeks to have the registrar's report varied by directing the trustees of the settlement to pay the income of the trust fund to her during her life notwithstanding the fact that at the date of the husband's death the marriage was not then subsisting and undissolved. The second wife, the trustees of the settlement, the executors and trustees of the husband's will, and Lady Mary Cecilia Boyd and her three children all oppose any variation of the settlement.

The jurisdiction to vary marriage settlements is derived from s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and this section gives the court a very wide discretion. Counsel for the first wife has referred me to the judgment of GORELL BARNES, J., in Hartopp v. Hartopp and Akhurst (1) in which the learned judge said ([1899] P. 72) :

"Now, the guiding principle which will be found running through the cases is, in my opinion, this: Where the breaking up of the family life has been caused by the fault of the respondent, the court, exercising its powers under the above section, ought to place the petitioner and the children in a position as nearly as circumstances will permit the same as if the family life had not been broken up."

No one could quarrel with this statement as a guiding principle, but at the same time I think it would be wrong to interpret it as meaning that it is a principle which must be applied in every case, regardless of its facts. That would, in my opinion, be placing fetters on the discretion of the court which the legislature never intended. I have also been referred to March v. March and Palumbo (2) where SIR J. P. WILDE, the Judge Ordinary, in his judgment, set out (L.R. 1 P. & D. 443) certain matters for consideration, namely :

A "The relative sums contributed by each party, the conduct of each, the total amounts of their joint income, the relation it bears to the requirements of the parties, and their respective prospects of increased income . . ."

I should like to add a further matter for consideration, which is of great significance in the case before me, namely, the precise terms of the settlement which it is sought to vary. The wife was a party to this settlement and was fully aware of the terms of cl. 3, which made it clear that, if her marriage was not subsisting and had been dissolved at the instance of either party before the death of the husband, she had no interest whatsoever in the settlement.

B I am not suggesting that in a proper case, in which the innocent party could show a change of circumstances, the court would not vary a settlement, the terms of which were similar to the terms of this settlement. Such a variation as the wife seeks would put her in a far better financial position than she was ever in during her marriage. On this point counsel for the wife relies on a decision of FINNEMORE, J., in an unreported case of Burghley v. Burghley (3), heard on Oct. 24, 1947. There the wife petitioner had received a fortune of £100,000 since the marriage, but, none the less, she sought to vary the settlement in her favour and succeeded on her application. FINNEMORE, J., stated in his judgment that the mere fact that the wife had received this large sum of money was not in itself conclusive evidence that the variation of the settlement was not necessary. I entirely agree, but the case is of little or no assistance to me because the facts were so dissimilar to the facts of the case now before me. As FINNEMORE, J., himself states in the course of his judgment :

E "Every case has to be considered on its own facts, and the principles which are laid down are not intended to be exhaustive for all cases."

In the present case at any time after the presentation of the petition the wife could have given notice of her application to vary this settlement. She did nothing until more than six months after the final decree when she applied under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1937, r. 44 (1), for leave to make this application out of time. In the meantime the husband had made a will exercising the power of appointment under the settlement and had then died. On his death his second wife, his sister and her children all lawfully acquired an interest in his estate. Giving due consideration to the terms of cl. 3 of the settlement, the lawfully acquired interests of the second wife, Lady Mary Cecilia Boyd and her children, the pecuniary means of the various parties, and the relative financial position of the husband and the wife during the subsistence of their marriage, I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to vary this settlement.

Application to vary settlement refused.

MAYNE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), March 4, 1949.]

Settlement—Accruer—Accruer to funds which had not “failed or determined”— Fund paid absolutely to beneficiary in accordance with trusts of the settlement.

By a settlement dated Jan. 3, 1903, W.B.H., provided a separate trust fund for each of his four children, Lionel, Kate, Mabel and Elsie. The trustees were directed to hold Lionel's fund on certain trusts until he reached the age of thirty years “And shall if and when the said Lionel shall attain the age of thirty years stand possessed of ‘Lionel's Trust Fund’ in trust for the said Lionel absolutely.” The share of each of the other children was directed to be held on certain trusts, and an accruer clause provided: “Provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared that in case the trusts hereinbefore declared concerning any of the said trust funds namely ‘Kate's Trust Fund’ ‘Mabel's Trust Fund’ ‘Elsie's Trust Fund’ and ‘Lionel's Trust Fund’ shall fail or determine then subject to the trusts powers and provisions herein declared and contained or by law vested in the said trustees or trustee concerning the same trust fund and to every or any exercise of any such powers such trust fund as well as any share or shares accruing or added thereto by virtue of this proviso and the income thereof shall go and accrue by way of addition to the others or other of the said trust funds of which the trusts hereinbefore declared shall not then have failed or determined and if more than one in equal shares and proportions and every such accruing share shall be held on the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions herein declared and contained concerning the said trust fund to which the same shall be added or as near thereto as circumstances will permit And in case the trusts hereinbefore declared of each of the other of the said trust funds shall then have failed or determined the said trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of such trust fund including all additions or accretions thereto under this proviso In trust for . . . A.W.H. his executors and administrators.” On Oct. 22, 1914, Lionel reached the age of thirty, and his share was paid over to him. On July 7, 1944, Lionel died. On Jan. 20, 1948, Mabel died a spinster, thereby bringing the accruer clause into operation.

HELD: the fact that Lionel had become absolutely entitled and had had his share paid to him did not result in the trusts of “Lionel's Trust Fund” having so determined as to exclude the fund from the accruer brought about by the death of Mabel without issue.

[AS TO TRUSTS IN DEFAULT OF ISSUE, GENERALLY, see HALSBURY, Hails-ham Edn., Vol. 29, pp. 608-614, paras. 884-889; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 40, pp. 575-577, Nos. 1104-1122.]

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of an accruer clause in a settlement (which excluded from sharing in the accruer trust funds of which the trusts had failed or determined), a fund which had, under the trusts of the settlement, been paid absolutely to a beneficiary was excluded from sharing in the accruing fund. JENKINS, J., held that it was not excluded. The facts appear in the judgment.

R. Cozens-Hardy Horne for the plaintiff, one of the trustees of the settlement.
J. F. Bowyer for the first five defendants, beneficiaries under the settlement.

Baden Fuller for the sixth and seventh defendants, personal representatives of Lionel.

JENKINS, J.: This case concerns the destination of one of the trust funds settled by a settlement dated Jan. 3, 1903, and made by William Balle

Huntington. The scheme of the settlement was to create a separate trust fund of certain specified investments for each of four children of the settlor. I do not think I need go in detail into the settlement trusts declared concerning each share, except to say that they were not of an unusual character. They were trusts for the child and for the child's issue on more or less usual lines. It is, however, to be noted that in the case of the son, Lionel, the trustees were directed to hold his fund on trusts to take effect until he was 21, trusts applicable between the age of 21 and the age of 30 :

"And shall if and when the said Lionel Welby Huntington shall attain the age of thirty years stand possessed of 'Lionel's Trust Fund' in trust for the said Lionel Welby Huntington absolutely."

Lionel attained the age of 30 years on Oct. 22, 1914, and died on July 7, 1944. The defendants in the present proceedings include his executors. One of the four children, Emily Mabel Huntington, died on Jan. 20, 1948, a spinster, and the question which I have to decide concerns the effect of an accruer clause in the settlement having regard to the fact that before the death without issue of Emily Mabel Huntington, thereby bringing the accruer clause into operation with respect to her share, Lionel had become absolutely entitled and had had his share paid over to him under the trust applicable on his attaining the age of 30.

The accruer clause is in these terms :

"Provided always and it is hereby agreed and declared that in case the trusts hereinbefore declared concerning any of the said trust funds namely 'Kate's Trust Fund' 'Mabel's Trust Fund' 'Elsie's Trust Fund' and 'Lionel's Trust Fund' shall fail or determine then subject to the trusts powers and provisions herein declared and contained or by law vested in the said trustees or trustee concerning the same trust fund and to every or any exercise of any such powers such trust fund as well as any share or shares accruing or added thereto by virtue of this proviso and the income thereof shall go and accrue by way of addition to the others or other of the said trust funds of which the trusts hereinbefore declared shall not then have failed or determined and if more than one in equal shares and proportions and every such accruing share shall be held on the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions herein declared and contained concerning the said trust fund to which the same shall be added or as near thereto as circumstances will permit And in case the trusts hereinbefore declared of each of the other of the said trust funds shall then have failed or determined the said trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of such trust fund including all additions or accretions thereto under this proviso In trust for the said Arthur William Huntington his executors and administrators."

It will be observed that the accruer directed by this clause is "by way of addition to the others or other of the said trust funds of which the trusts hereinbefore declared shall not then have failed or determined." The words "shall not then have failed or determined" give rise to the difficulty because, as I have mentioned, Lionel had become absolutely entitled to his share, which had been paid out to him, before the accruer clause took effect with respect to "Mabel's Trust Fund." It is argued that "Lionel's Trust Fund" cannot participate in this accruer inasmuch as it is, within the meaning of the clause, a trust fund of which the trusts had determined before the date of accruer. Obviously the trusts had not failed, but it is said that they had determined because, Lionel having become absolutely entitled, the trustees had paid his trust fund to him so that it was completely out of their hands, they had no further function to perform as trustees with respect to it, and it could not be said that the fund remained in Lionel's hands subject to any trusts whatever.

The effect of that contention, if it prevailed, would be to make the accruer of "Mabel's Trust Fund" an accruer in equal shares between "Kate's Trust Fund" and "Elsie's Trust Fund" to the exclusion of "Lionel's Trust Fund." On the other hand, it is said that, whatever the word "determined" may mean in some contexts, it is clear that here it is not used in the sense I have mentioned. To put it in another way, there has been no determination of the trusts of "Lionel's Trust Fund" in the sense in which the word "determined" is used here.

The argument for the exclusion of "Lionel's Trust Fund" from participation in the accruer derives some support from the forms in PRIDEAUX'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING, 23rd ed., dated 1937. The learned editor of that edition includes (vol. 3, pp. 745, 746, 788) specimen forms of accruer clauses. The form of the accruer clause on pp. 745 and 746, which is typical, is this:

"If any daughter (child) of mine shall not have any child who under the trust in default of appointment hereinbefore contained attains a vested interest in (his or) her share, Then subject to the trusts and powers . . . the original share of such daughter (child) of mine, and also any share or shares accruing under this provision, and all accumulations . . . shall accrue to and be held [then follows a general power of appointment] And in default of and subject to any such appointment: In trust for my other children or child (not being daughters (children) or a daughter (child) the trusts for whom and whose issue have failed or determined otherwise than by the absolute payment or transfer of a share) who attain the age of 21 years, or being female marry under that age, and, if more than one, in equal shares."

It will be observed that in that form the accruer is expressed, as in the settlement which I have to construe, to be in favour of the "other children or child not being daughters (children) or a daughter (child) the trusts for whom and whose issue have failed or determined," but after this reference to the failure or determination these words are put in: "otherwise than by the absolute payment or transfer of a share." It is argued that the precedent excludes children the trusts for whom and whose issue have failed or determined, just as the accruer clause in the settlement before me excludes any trust fund of which the trusts hereinbefore declared have failed or determined, but that the precedent, having made that exclusion, goes on to limit it by saying: "otherwise than by the absolute payment or transfer of a share." There are no similar words in the accruer clause here, and it is argued, therefore, that, in the view, at all events, of the draftsman of the precedents, the exclusion of a share the trusts of which have failed or determined would exclude a share which had been paid to someone absolutely entitled, and the words "otherwise than by the absolute payment or transfer of a share" were considered necessary to prevent the reference to determination extending to determination by payment of an absolutely vested share.

I have been referred to a number of editions of PRIDEAUX'S PRECEDENTS and it seems that the words "otherwise than by the absolute payment or transfer of a share" first appeared in the 1913 edition, the editors of earlier editions, apparently, having thought that the desired result could be produced by the simple exclusion from the benefit of the accruer of shares the trusts of which have failed or determined. So far as counsel's researches have gone, the particular form of words seems to be peculiar to PRIDEAUX'S PRECEDENTS, the form in KEY AND ELPHINSTONE'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING, and I think also in Mr. ROSE'S CONVEYANCING PRECEDENTS, proceeding on a somewhat different principle, the accruer being made simply to the shares of the other children with a provision to the effect that accruing shares shall be held on the same trusts as the original share. That form, of course, gets over any such difficulty as is now raised, and yet it has the desired result of bringing the accruing share ultimately over to what I may call the "effective" settled shares, because, although the accruer in the first instance would include a share the trusts of which had failed, the portion accruing to such a share would forthwith accrue over again to the shares the trusts of which were still subsisting. By the use of that form the result is, as desired, to make the accruer be for the benefit of the "effective" shares and no others.

- A The presence in PRIDEAUX'S PRECEDENTS of the words "otherwise than by the absolute payment or transfer" to a person absolutely entitled, no doubt, does give rise to a question because prima facie the editors of conveying precedents do not put in words which are mere surplusage, and so the presence of these words in the forms I have quoted does inject a doubt whether the word "determined" may not include determination by absolute payment
- B or transfer. Be that as it may, the question which has to be decided concerns the meaning of the words "fail or determine" in this particular accruer clause. I think in some contexts it might be truly said that the trusts of a settled share have determined when the person entitled has become absolutely entitled and the fund has been paid over to him, but it does not follow that in all contexts the words have that meaning. Here the settlor in the accruer clause refers
- C specifically to "the trusts hereinbefore declared concerning any of the said trusts funds namely 'Kate's Trust Fund' 'Mabel's Trust Fund' 'Elsie's Trust Fund' and 'Lionel's Trust Fund'," and he introduces the accruer clause in case the trusts of any of those specifically mentioned trust funds shall fail or determine. When he says "fail or determine" at that point in the accruer clause he clearly cannot, in my judgment, mean to include determination by
- D payment to somebody absolutely entitled because it cannot have been his intention that when somebody became absolutely entitled the accruer clause should operate and take the share away from him or her. I do not think it is any answer to say that the accruer is made "subject to the trusts powers and provisions herein declared." The fact remains that the accruer is limited to operate with respect to shares the trusts of which have failed or determined,
- E and, if they have failed or determined, then it operates "subject to the trusts powers and provisions herein declared."

Accordingly, in my judgment, the trusts of "Lionel's Trust Fund" cannot have failed or determined within the meaning of that phrase where it first occurs in the accruer clause. It follows that when the phrase occurs again in the passage setting out the destination of the accruing share and one finds

F that the destination is limited to "trust funds of which the trusts hereinbefore declared shall not then have failed or determined," the word "determined" cannot extend to a share paid out to somebody absolutely entitled, for I think that this precisely similar phrase occurring twice in the same clause must be given the same meaning in the two places in which it occurs. I think it is reasonably plain that the settlor is dividing the trust funds into two classes.

- G With regard to trust funds the trusts of which fail or determine, the accruer clause comes into operation against those. On the other hand, with regard to shares the trusts of which have not failed or determined, the accruer clause operates in favour of those. It is to be noted in the ultimate trust the same phrase occurs again: "And in case the trusts hereinbefore declared of each of the other of the said trust funds shall then have failed or determined," the
- H ultimate trust is to take effect. I should have thought it would be very difficult to construe "failed or determined" in that place in the clause as extending to a share paid out to somebody absolutely entitled, for, if that were so, then in all circumstances, so far as I can see, the ultimate beneficiary must be the cestui que trust under the ultimate trust, for, unless the settlement were framed so as to go on for ever and thus infringe the rule against perpetuities, there would be bound to come a time when some person or persons became absolutely entitled to the fund and it was paid over to them, and, of course, in that third passage, in which the words "failed or determined" occur, it is equally true that the meaning to be attributed to them must, according to all ordinary principles of construction, be the same as the meaning they bear where they previously occur.

The precise meaning of the words "fail or determine" is rather difficult to define, but I think that the words "or determine" are added to this common conveyancing phrase so as to meet the case of what may in a sense be termed a partial failure. Frequently clauses of this kind with regard to ultimate trusts are introduced simply by the words "if the trusts hereinbefore declared shall fail," and that I should have thought would in all ordinary circumstances be quite enough, but there is, perhaps, a possibility that it might be argued in certain circumstances that, although the trusts of the fund or of the particular share had come to an end, they could not be said to have failed. A simple reference to failure, it might be argued, is only appropriate to total failure, so that where income has been applied, or powers have been exercised, in favour of a beneficiary entitled to a limited interest or contingently entitled and then the trusts fail, it might be said that the words "shall fail" simpliciter would not be appropriate because the trusts have come into operation and have been in operation up to a point and to a certain extent and then have come to an end. All doubts of that sort would be resolved by adding the words "or determined." That makes it clear that such partial failure as I have endeavoured to describe would suffice to bring the accruer or the ultimate trust, whatever it may be, into operation. I think, in this case, the use of the double expression "fail or determine" can be accounted for in that way without pressing the meaning of the word "determine" so as to make it include a share, such as Lionel's share, which had become absolutely vested and had been paid out. I certainly do not think there is anything in the phrase "fail or determine" to constrain me as a matter of language to come to any such conclusion. In the context where the phrase occurs it seems to me reasonably plain that any such conclusion would be the wrong one, as the result which it would produce would, so far as I can see, be in the highest degree capricious in that it would or might exclude from participation in the accruer persons whom one would think the settlor would have most intended to benefit.

For these reasons, notwithstanding the forms which appear in PRIDEAUX'S PRECEDENTS and the ingenious argument presented to me by counsel for the first five defendants, I am of opinion that "Lionel's Trust Fund" should participate in the accruer brought about by the death of Mabel without issue and is not excluded from such participation by the limitation of the trust funds in whose favour the accruer is to take place to the "trust funds of which the trusts hereinbefore declared shall not then have failed or determined." In my judgment, the trusts of Lionel's share had not failed or determined, but there was still in operation the trust for him absolutely, and the fact that the trustees had paid his fund over to him did not bring about a failure or determination of that trust for the purposes of this accruer clause.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties to be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of "Mabel's Trust Fund."

Case referred to:

C (1) Andrews v. Merton and Morden Urban District Council, (1921), 56 L. Jo. 466; 26 Digest 402, 1261.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of MORRIS, J., dated Oct. 18, 1948 (reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 780).

D The plaintiff, who was thrown from his bicycle and injured owing to the defective condition of the surface of a road, claimed damages from the defendants, the highway authority, on the ground that they had carried out repairs to that part of the highway so negligently that it had again become out of repair by the time of the accident. MORRIS, J., held that the lack of repair of the highway arose from non-feasance and not from misfeasance in repairing the road negligently, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable. The Court of Appeal now confirmed this decision.

E H. G. Garland for the plaintiff.

Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans for the defendants.

TUCKER L.J.: The sole question is whether or not the condition of this road was due to non-feasance or misfeasance on the part of the defendants.

F There are no records to show that any repairs have been carried out at this part of the road, but occasionally tar-macadam was used for patching as a temporary measure and MORRIS, J. was satisfied that there was a "patching up" with tar-macadam which would not be recorded in the corporation's records. The law on this matter has been stated by HORRIDGE, J. in Andrews v. Merton and Morden Urban District Council (1). I am of opinion there was no evidence to show that this temporary operation of patching was negligently performed. If there was any negligence on the part of the defendants, I should have thought it existed in the failure to substitute for a temporary repair a more permanent repair at an earlier date. I find myself completely in agreement with the way the matter was dealt with by MORRIS, J., and I think this appeal fails.

H ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: J. C. Brookhouse and C. L. MacDougall (for the plaintiff); William Charles Crocker (for the defendants).

Re GUNTER'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. OWEN v.
PRITCHARD-BARRETT AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 10, 1949.]

Settlement—Exclusion from participation—Exclusion on death of life tenant of “an eldest son entitled for the time being under my will to my real estates for his life”—Exclusion of deceased eldest son who had been life tenant under will. A

In 1901 R.G. settled certain property on trust for his daughter Ursula for life, and thereafter in the events which happened the trustees were directed to stand possessed of the trust moneys “upon trust for all the children of the said R.G. (other than an eldest son or only surviving son or an eldest or only surviving daughter entitled for the time being under his will to his real estates for his or her life) who being a son or sons shall attain the age of 21 years or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry in equal shares.” By his will, dated June 2, 1905, R.G. devised his real estate to his eldest son, N.G., for life and thereafter to the use of N.G.’s sons and other issue. In September, 1905, R.G. died, and N.G. died in August, 1917. In 1942, Ursula died, whereupon the ultimate trusts of the settlement took effect. B

HELD: on the true construction of the settlement and in the events which had happened the class of children entitled on Ursula’s death under the settlement did not include N.G., he having been entitled during his life to the real estate devised by the will. C

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the true construction of a settlement and in the events which had happened the class of children of Sir Robert Gunter entitled to participate in the settlement funds on the death of the life tenant, Ursula Fanny Gunter, included Sir Robert’s eldest son, Sir Nevill Gunter, who had predeceased Ursula. VAISEY, J., held that Sir Nevill was not included. The facts appear in the judgment. G

E. G. Wright for the plaintiff, a trustee of the settlement.

J. F. Bowyer for the first defendant, interested in the residuary estate of a son of Sir Robert Gunter. H

Lindner for the remaining defendants, a child of Sir Robert Gunter, personal representatives of a deceased child and trustees of daughters’ marriage settlements.

VAISEY J.: This summons raises a short but not an easy question as to the proper construction of a certain clause in a settlement made on June 11, 1901, by Sir Robert Gunter. The trusts, so far as it is necessary to describe them, were for one of his daughters, Ursula Fanny Gunter, during her life, and, subject to her life interest and after her decease, in default of her having children (she had none), the trustees were directed to stand possessed of the trust moneys :

- “ . . . upon trust for all the children of the said Sir Robert Gunter
A (other than an eldest son or only surviving son or an eldest or only surviving daughter entitled for the time being under his will to his real estates for his or her life) who being a son or sons shall attain the age of 21 years or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry in equal shares.”
- I have to decide the meaning and effect of the words in the exception.
- B The settlor, Sir Robert Gunter, made his will on June 2, 1905. So far as it is material to mention the contents of that will, he devised his real estate, subject to certain rent charges and life insurance premiums, to the use of his eldest son, Robert Benyon Nevill Gunter, who was afterwards known as Sir Nevill Gunter, and his assigns during his life without impeachment of waste, and after the death of Sir Nevill Gunter to the use of his sons and other issue
C as therein mentioned. There was an ultimate limitation to the settlor's younger son and his daughters in what is described as the usual form of a strict settlement, the details of which it is unnecessary for me to mention. On Sept. 18, 1905, the settlor died, and his will was duly proved. He had eight children. The first, Sir Nevill Gunter, whom I have already mentioned, survived his father for 12 years and died on Aug. 20, 1917. There was a second son who
D died in 1900 before the date of the settlement, a bachelor and intestate. There was a third son, the defendant, George Gunter, and there were five daughters, including the daughter, Ursula Fanny Gunter. That lady died in 1942, and thereupon the ultimate trusts of the settlement took effect.
- The question I have to decide is whether, on the true construction of the settlement and in the events which happened, the class of children of the settlor between and among whom on the death of the tenant for life, Ursula Fanny Gunter, the trust fund became divisible included or did not include
E Sir Nevill Gunter. I turn back to the excepting words. All the children of Sir Robert Gunter, the settlor, are to participate subject to their attaining 21, or, in the case of the daughters, attaining that age or marrying, with the exception of the eldest son or only surviving son or only surviving daughter
F entitled for the time being under the settlor's will to his real estates for his or her life. What would have happened if Sir Nevill Gunter had died in the lifetime of her father is a question which has not arisen and on which I need express no opinion. I think that the excepting words have to be read, in the events which have happened, as omitting the references to “surviving son or an eldest or only surviving daughter,” because in point of fact Sir Nevill
G Gunter left, as I understand it, male issue who have succeeded to the estates under the will, so that no other son other than Sir Nevill Gunter ever became entitled at any time under the settlor's will to a life estate in the settlor's devised real estate. Omitting the words which appear to me to be irrelevant, the person or persons excepted from the trust is or are the persons who come within the description of an eldest son entitled for the time being under the H will to the settlor's real estates for his life. One thing is perfectly clear. If I read the words “for the time being” in the natural sense in which those words prima facie have to be read in a case of this description, they would refer obviously to the point of time which is mentioned, that is to say, the date of the decease of the tenant for life, Ursula Fanny Gunter. The funds have to be held after her decease in trust for all the children other than the eldest son entitled for the time being under his will to his real estates for his life.

There is a somewhat bewildering mass of authority on this type of problem, and certain authorities have been quoted to me at the Bar. First, there is Ellison v. Thomas (1); secondly, Law Union & Crown Insurance Co. v. Hill (2); and thirdly, Re Leeke's Settlement Trusts (3). I confess that I find these authorities extremely difficult to reconcile, and I am convinced that, if a larger number of authorities had been cited to me than those three, I should have found even greater confusion. There is no doubt that Ellison v. Thomas (1) was extraordinarily near to the present case. By a settlement, a sum of money was directed to be raised after the death of the survivor of two persons, and be held in trust for all the children of the tenant for life of hereditaments settled by a contemporaneous deed other than and besides an eldest or only son for the time being entitled under the last mentioned settlement to the estates thereby settled in possession or in remainder immediately expectant on the decease of the survivor of the tenant for life and a prior tenant for life.

It was held :

" . . . that the exclusion applied only to the person who was the eldest son at the time appointed for raising the money, and that the representatives of an eldest son who had died before that period were entitled to participate in the money."

In Law Union & Crown Insurance Co. v. Hill (2) the excepting words were "other than and except an eldest or only son for the time being entitled to the possession" of certain estates after the decease of a named person "as tenant for life or any greater estate or interest whatsoever." The named person and the eldest son, being then respectively tenant for life and tenant in tail in remainder of the estates, executed deeds under which the estates were disentailed and sold and the proceeds invested by the trustees under the trust under which the son took a beneficial interest. The testator died in 1875 and the named person, Richard, died in 1899. There it was held that Richard's eldest son was not at his father's death "entitled" to the rents, etc., of the estates within the meaning of the exception clause and, therefore, was not excluded from the succession to the testator's estates.

It is remarkable that Ellison v. Thomas (1) does not seem to have been referred to in that case. What is more strange is that in Re Leeke's Settlement Trusts (3), before SIMONDS, J., neither of the two earlier cases which I have mentioned, appears to have been cited. It may well be that before SIMONDS, J., a similar discretion was exercised by the learned counsel who argued the matter in selecting only a few of the many authorities which were undoubtedly material for the consideration of the court. I do find, however, in the judgment of SIMONDS, J., in Re Leeke's Settlement Trusts (3) some observations which appear to me to be helpful in reaching a conclusion in this present case. SIMONDS, J., in referring to the speech of LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., in Collingwood v. Stanhope (4) (L.R. 4 H.L. 52) quoted these words ([1937] 2 All E.R. 566, 567) :

" 'The court, with regard to all questions arising on provisions for children under a marriage settlement, holds that the principal intent to be imputed to the parties (however differently that intent may be expressed, so long as it is not contrary to what is actually found in the settlement) is a desire to provide equality for the children, that one child should not take a double portion, and that no child should be excluded.' So it is that, though an 'eldest' son or an 'elder' son is, by the terms of a settlement, excluded from portions, and a certain son has in nature that character, yet he is not excluded if he does not in fact succeed to the settled estates; for, in such a context, as LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., said, in Duke v. Doidge (5) : 'Eldership not carrying the estate along with it is considered not such an eldership as will exclude.' . . . I have,

A in examining the general principles according to which the court construes an exclusion clause, more than once used a loose expression, 'succeeds to the estates,' which, at that stage of my consideration, was accurate enough, but it is now necessary to examine more closely what are the circumstances which, when the date of distribution arrives, enable one to say of a child that he has or has not, or had or had not, such an estate as to exclude him from portions. It is, for instance, clear that it is not necessary, in order that he may be excluded, that he should in fact enjoy an estate in possession in the settled estates at the date of distribution. It is sufficient, as LORD WESTBURY pointed out in Collingwood v. Stanhope (4), that the person who is to be excluded should at some time have been entitled to the estate; and, as CHITTY, J., held in Re Fitzgerald's Settled Estates (6), it is sufficient to exclude him if, being then entitled to an estate in remainder, he has, with the assistance of his father, the tenant for life, procured for himself, out of the settled estates, a benefit exceeding any share of portions which could come to him."

B In that case the excluded person had, so to speak, an estate in futurity which excluded him from sharing in the portions.

C In the present case Sir Nevill Gunter's life estate had long come to an end when the tenant for life under the settlement died. The problem is whether I must read the clause as excluding "the eldest son entitled at the death of the tenant for life under the settlor's will to his real estates for his or her life," or whether I must read it as excluding "the eldest son who under the provisions of the will had been for a time entitled for his life to the real estates settled by the settlor's will." With a good deal of hesitation I have come to the conclusion that by having become entitled for a time under the will to the settlor's real estates for life Sir Nevill Gunter is effectively excluded by the excepting words from the class of children who were entitled in remainder under the terms of the settlement. It seems to me that I have really ample authority for deciding this case either way, but, looking, as I think SIMONDS, J., invites me to do in Re Leeke's Settlement Trusts (3), at the reasonable and probable purpose and intention of this excluding clause, I think the more reasonable view to take is that the class of children who were to participate in this fund does not include any one of them who had in the past or who was at the time entitled to the life estates in the property, and that, in consequence, I must answer the question which I am asked in the summons by declaring that "on the true construction of the settlement and in the events which have happened the class of children did not include the late Sir Nevill Gunter, but that those who are entitled to participate in the funds are the children other than the child deceased at the date of the settlement and other than Sir Nevill Gunter himself."

F Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be taxed and paid out of the fund.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Singleton, L.JJ., and Birkett, J.), February 15, 16, March 10, 1949.]

Damages—Measure of damages—Loss of future earnings—Deduction of amount representing yearly payments of income tax.

The defendants, who were held liable in damages to the plaintiff, a medical practitioner, for personal injuries caused by their negligence, contended that, in assessing the amount to be awarded in respect of loss of future earnings, there should be deducted an amount to represent the income tax which would have been payable by the plaintiff from year to year had he continued his practice.

HELD: the defendants were liable to the plaintiff for the loss of the gross earnings that he would have received but for their negligence, and no deduction could be made on the ground that those earnings would have been liable to income tax.

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated July 23, 1948, awarding the plaintiff £24,000 as damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the first defendant.

The appeal related only to the amount of damages and not to the question of negligence. Before the accident the plaintiff, a medical practitioner, was in general practice and was also a radiologist. As a result of his injuries he had to give up his general practice, but was able after a while to continue as a radiologist. The defendants contended (a) that the amount of damages awarded in respect of loss of future earnings was so excessive as to warrant interference by the Court of Appeal, and (b) that there should be deducted from the sum awarded an amount to represent the income tax which would have been payable by the plaintiff on his yearly earnings if he had continued his practice. The Court of Appeal reduced the damages in respect of future loss of earnings from £20,000 to £10,000, making the total sum awarded £14,000 instead of £24,000, but held that there should be no deduction in respect of the income tax which would have been payable by the plaintiff on his yearly earnings, had he remained in practice. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Berryman, K.C., and Blain for the defendants.

Beresford, K.C., and Pollock for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 10. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., by which he awarded the plaintiff the sum of £24,000 by way of damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the first defendant. Negligence is not now in issue and this appeal relates only to the damages which the defendants contend are so excessive as to warrant interference by this court according to the principles governing this matter which are so well known that they do not require repetition.

- A The plaintiff is a doctor, aged 51 who, prior to the accident, practised at Great Waltham, near Chelmsford. He suffered serious injuries, the chief of which consisted of a fracture of the pelvis, fracture of the external tuberosity of the right tibia, with sprain of the internal lateral ligament of the knee joint and haemarthrosis, and contusion of the abdominal muscles causing aggravation of a pre-existing inguinal hernia. It is hardly necessary to add that he also suffered from severe shock. Fortunately he made a wonderful recovery.
- B The fractured pelvis yielded to treatment, and a successful operation for hernia was performed. The accident happened on Nov. 28, 1947, and by Jan. 21, 1948, the agreed medical report showed that his general physical condition appeared satisfactory, and there was no objective evidence of any upset of his nervous system. The serious feature of the case is that the injury to the right tibia and knee joint, not in itself of major severity, occurred at the seat of an extremely severe arthritis produced by an old war injury of 1916 with the result that it now constitutes a permanent and substantial disability rendering him physically incapable of carrying out the arduous duties of a general practitioner. He has, accordingly, been compelled to give up this part of his practice which he had previously carried on in partnership. The plaintiff is, however, a skilled radiologist, and, as the duties of a radiologist are almost entirely sedentary, this branch of medicine will be within his capacity.
- D In arriving at the sum of £24,000, the learned judge stated that he awarded £4,000 in respect of the plaintiff's pain and suffering, loss of amenities and agreed special damage down to the date of trial, and the balance of £20,000 represented compensation for estimated loss of earnings for the remainder of his working life, which the learned judge reckoned at 15 years. He took the loss of earnings at roughly £2,000 a year, making £30,000, and then discounted this by a third to allow for contingencies, for the fact that he would be receiving a large capital sum down, and for his increased earnings as a radiologist.

- The evidence in regard to the plaintiff's professional earnings showed that in the previous three years his average income from the general practice had been £1,900. The plaintiff's partner did not assist in the radiology work, but the fees therefrom formed part of the profits of the partnership. Over the previous three years the total radiology fees had averaged £800 and in the last year had amounted to £1,286, earned in from 15-20 hours a week devoted to this branch of the work. They were derived from two appointments which the plaintiff held at local hospitals. He will now be at liberty to devote the whole of his working time to this specialised branch, and, moreover, will not have to share these fees with his partner, so that, although the loss on the general practice would on these figures amount to about £2,000, there would be a gain of some £400 or thereabouts in the radiology fees. It appears, however, that there is every prospect of an appreciable increase from this source. Even if the X-ray work at these two hospitals is not sufficient to occupy him for more than 15-20 hours a week, it would seem that other similar appointments may be obtained, and it is always open to him to set up as a radiologist on his own account. I cannot think that in assessing his loss of earnings at £20,000 the learned judge can have given sufficient weight to this important factor coupled with the pre-existing serious arthritic condition of the knee, which might in any event have necessitated premature retirement from general practice. This is not the case of a professional man earning large fees who has been put out of practice for the remainder of his life. Fortunately, he is still able to carry on a highly skilled specialised branch of his work at which he had earned £1,200 in the last year, and to which he can now devote his full time. It is, of course, a grievous blow to him to have to give up his general practice, and it will in all probability, at any rate at first, seriously affect his earnings, but, none the less, I think the figure of £20,000 is so greatly in excess of a proper estimate of his loss that I would reduce it to £10,000, which, with the sum of £4,000 attributable to the other matters referred to above, would reduce the total sum to £14,000, subject to a further consideration with which I will now deal.

It is contended on behalf of the defendants that the sum ultimately arrived at should reflect the fact that it is not subject to income or sur-tax, whereas the fees which the plaintiff would have received would have been reduced by the incidence of these taxes. It is, I think, significant that, although income tax rose to 5s. in the £ in the year 1916-17 and has never since gone below 4s. this point was never raised in any reported case in this country until 1933 when it was rejected by DU PARCQ, J., in Fairholme v. Firth and Brown, Ltd. (1). After an interval of thirteen years and with the introduction of the "P.A.Y.E." regulations [made under the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, s. 11], it was again raised before ATKINSON, J., in Jordan v. Limmer & Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., Ltd. (2), and met a similar fate. Neither of those cases was taken to this court, and we are, accordingly, called on to deal with it for the first time.

Fairholme's case (1) was a claim for damages for wrongful dismissal, but I can see no distinction in principle between that case and the present. It can, no doubt, be said in a case of damages for wrongful dismissal that it is difficult to see why the party who has broken his contract should benefit from his breach by paying less by way of damages than if he had paid the salary due under his agreement with the plaintiff, but considerations of this kind are irrelevant to the only question involved in the assessment of damages, whether for breach of contract or tort, namely: What is the sum required so far as possible financially to effect restitutio in integrum? Where, therefore, loss of salary or earnings is the basis of the claim for damages, whether for breach of contract or in tort, the same considerations must apply. In the present case, the plaintiff, but for his accident, would have earned £x in fees in any year ending Apr. 5. On Jan. 1 in the following year, a sum would become due to the Inland Revenue in respect of those fees, which sooner or later would presumably be paid. In the next year, these fees would affect the incidence of sur-tax. In the meanwhile, the plaintiff would have had the use of the money. It would have belonged to him. His patients could have been sued if they did not pay, and he would have recovered against them judgment in full without any deduction in respect of income tax. On what principle, then, can the defendants, who have rendered the earning of these fees impossible, be heard to say that the loss should be estimated, not at the sum which the plaintiff would have received from his patients, but at a lower figure based on an estimate of tax which he would have been called on to pay at some future date? It seems to me, apart from authority and apart from the practice which has prevailed for so many years, that restitutio in integrum requires the plaintiff to be put in the position in which he would have been vis-à-vis his patients, that is, to receive his fees in full, and that questions of his ultimate liability to the revenue authorities are matters which do not concern the defendants. It is possible that different considerations might arise in cases under the "P.A.Y.E." regulations, such as that before ATKINSON, J., in Jordan v. Limmer & Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., Ltd. (2), where the plaintiff never would have received his wages in full, but I am not to be taken as casting any doubt on the correctness of the decision of the learned judge in that case.

We have been referred to two cases in Scotland. In one of them, namely, M'Daid v. Clyde Navigation Trustees (3), LORD SORN, Lord Ordinary, decided that the incidence of income tax should be taken into consideration in the assessment of damages, and in the other, namely, Blackwood v. Andre (4), LORD KEITH, Lord Ordinary, took the contrary view, and refused to follow the decision of LORD SORN. In my view, the two English cases, Fairholme v. Firth & Brown, Ltd. (1), and Jordan v. Limmer & Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., Ltd. (2), were rightly decided. It seems to me that the fallacy, if I may respectfully say so, of the contrary view is that it proceeds on the basis that the court can inquire into what happens to the money after it has become the income of the recipient. Where tax is deductible at source, it is true that that part of the income is only notional income, but where, as in this case, the money would have been received free from deduction, the gross sum would have become in law and in fact part of the plaintiff's income. For these reasons, I would make no further deduction from the sum of £14,000. I would, for the reasons previously stated, allow this appeal and substitute the sum of £14,000 for the sum of £24,000 awarded by the learned judge.

SINGLETON, L.J. [after stating the facts, as set out by TUCKER, L.J., and holding, for the same reasons as TUCKER, L.J., that the sum of £10,000 should be substituted for the sum of £20,000 awarded by the learned judge in respect of loss of earnings in the future:] When the case was before the court of first instance, no argument was put forward to the effect that the judge, in assessing damages, must have regard to the fact that the plaintiff would have had to pay income tax on his yearly earnings. Indeed, the figures agreed as out-of-pocket loss included a sum for loss of earnings without any such deduction. Before this court counsel for the defendants submitted that the incidence of income tax, and sur-tax in a case to which it applied, ought to be remembered in any such assessment. It is right to say that, in arriving at a sum of damages in respect of loss of future earnings, the court must make the best estimate it can of future loss. If the basis of calculation is £2,000 a year, and income tax is 9s. in the £, it is obvious that a plaintiff may recover on this head more than his actual pecuniary loss. Equally, it can be said that, if a wrongdoer can claim the benefit of a high rate of tax, or of the fact that a plaintiff was a sur-tax payer, he escapes some portion of his liability because of the financial position of the injured party. It is difficult to see why he should be allowed to do so.

It is surprising that this question has not come up for consideration in the Court of Appeal until now. It is of great importance. ATKINSON, J., had to consider a similar point in Jordan v. Limmer & Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., Ltd. (2), and he decided that, where a plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries claims, as an item of special damage, the amount of wages lost owing to his incapacity for work, in assessing the sum to which he is entitled no regard must be paid to the fact that a weekly sum for income tax is deducted from his wages, and the sum awarded must be the full rate of wages for which provision is made by the terms of his contract of employment. In so deciding, the learned judge followed the decision of DU PARCQ, J., in a wrongful dismissal claim, Fairholme v. Firth and Brown, Ltd. (1), and he pointed out ([1946] K.B. 359; [1946] 1 All E.R. 528) that:

"... it may be that the inland revenue authorities may consider that they are entitled to make an assessment on a plaintiff who has recovered damages which include loss of wages, but that is a matter for them."

That was an instance of wages actually lost before the date of trial. In the argument before this court, it was assumed that the sum of £20,000, being an award of general damages, was not subject to a claim for income tax. It may well be that in such a case the Revenue ought to have a remedy of some kind, for if, through negligence on the part of a defendant, damages are sustained by the person injured and by the State, the negligent party ought not to reap any benefit or to escape full responsibility for the damage because of the incidence of tax on the injured party. And if it is said that the Revenue does not, or may not, suffer, as some one else will do the work and so pay the tax, still it is to be remembered that an injury which prevents a man from working is the cause of loss to the State. In a case in which the out-of-pocket loss of an injured plaintiff is assessed or agreed, and the sum includes an amount of £x for loss of earnings for a period up to the date of trial, I see no sound reason why the Revenue should not have a claim to tax on that amount. It is money which the plaintiff would have earned had he not been prevented from working; it is paid by the wrongdoer instead of by the employer; there is no difficulty in arriving at the amount—it is generally agreed. If the plaintiff keeps the whole of it, he is financially in a better position than he would have been if he had continued to work, in which case his earnings would have been subject to tax. True, it is awarded as part of a sum of general damages, and in such a case income tax is not usually chargeable: see Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Ballantine (5), and also Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Barnato (6). The question of damages in respect of the loss of future earnings is much more difficult. I am content to assume that in neither case can income tax be recovered from a successful plaintiff in such a case. Whether some alteration in the law is desirable is not a matter for this court. It is not without interest to observe that the defendants agreed the out-of-pocket loss and only raised the question which they raise in this appeal when they came to this court, and, of course, they do not seek to go behind their agreement on the loss of earnings up to the date of trial.

Towards the end of his judgment in Jordan's case (2), ATKINSON, J., said ([1946] K.B. 359; [1946] 1 All E.R. 528):

"Therefore, although the argument that the plaintiff will be getting more, if no deduction is made, than he would have got if he had not been injured, is, as I have said, an attractive one, I think the practice of ignoring this result is now too well established for a judge of first instance, at any rate, to interfere with it."

Some three months before the decision of ATKINSON, J., the question had arisen in Scotland in M'Daid v. Clyde Navigation Trustees (3). The report of that case was not before ATKINSON, J. In that case LORD SORN, Lord Ordinary, held that, where loss of earnings became a factor in assessing an award of damages to a pursuer, if these earnings would have been liable to taxation that fact should be taken into consideration and some deduction should be made in respect of this liability. There is much in the reasoning of LORD SORN which appeals to me. If the assessment of damages is based on the gross loss of earnings of an injured person (and if no portion of the sum awarded is subject to income tax) it seems to me that the assessment is not based on the pecuniary loss sustained. In other words, if the calculation was precisely accurate arithmetically, a plaintiff would recover more than his pecuniary loss. The question again came up for consideration in Scotland in Blackwood v. Andre (4), when LORD KEITH, Lord Ordinary, expressed a directly opposite view to that of LORD SORN in M'Daid v. Clyde Navigation Trustees (3), holding that, in assessing the damages due to an injured pursuer, the court has no concern with the incidence of taxation, and, where loss of earnings is a factor in the assessment, no deduction can be made on the ground that these earnings would have been liable to tax.

Though the principle has always been to seek to arrive at the pecuniary loss of the individual, the practice in the courts of this country has consistently been not to have regard to income tax in the assessment of damages, and

A to alter the practice now would lead to great confusion and would add immeasurably to the difficulty of assessing damages and in the direction to be given to a jury. Consider the cases of four different men each earning £2,000 a year. A. has no other income, but has a wife and young children. B. is a bachelor with an investment income of £2,000 a year. C. has a farm on which he makes a loss of £500 a year which can be set off against his other income for tax purposes. D. by covenant or otherwise has disposed of half his income. If each of those four men is injured and away from work for a year, is the assessment of pecuniary loss to be on a different basis in each case because the amount of tax payable by each on his earned income differs? A man's income is his own and he can do with it what he likes. Income tax is a charge on the person, and not on property or gains. By the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 1, it is to be charged "in respect of all property, profits, or gains," and, under sched. D., 1 (a) (ii), tax is to be charged in respect of the gains to any person from employment or vocation. No question arises in this case under the regulations made under the "P.A.Y.E." system [under the Finance (No. 2 Act) Act, 1940, s. 11], and their effect was not fully argued, but I think it is right to say that I do not see that they have changed the basic position. Income tax remains a charge on the person, and not on his profits or gains from his employment or on his property. In my opinion, the claim of the defendants that tax should be taken into consideration in assessing damages should be rejected. I do not think that the court ought to alter what has been the recognised practice for so long. It is for the revenue authorities to consider whether the law as it stands meets such cases. I am in favour of allowing the appeal to the extent of reducing the damages to the sum of £14,000.

BIRKETT, J. [after stating the facts]: The conclusion to which I have come is that, when all the factors are considered, and, particularly, the fact that the plaintiff, happily, has ready to his hand the lucrative work of a radiologist, to which he can devote the whole of his time, and from which his earnings may quite reasonably be expected to increase greatly beyond his past earnings, the amount of £20,000 is much too high and ought to be reduced. I would allow the £4,000 awarded by the learned judge in respect of pain and suffering and loss of amenities to stand, but I would reduce the sum of £20,000 to the sum of £10,000 and make the judgment £14,000 instead of £24,000.

Apart from the general submission on behalf of the defendants that the sum of £24,000 awarded by the learned judge was excessive, a further submission was made that the damages awarded to the plaintiff, whatever their amount, should be calculated, so far as the loss of future earnings was concerned, by deducting some amount to represent the taxation which would have been imposed on the plaintiff's earnings had he continued his practice from year to year. In my opinion, the answer to this submission is that, when assessing the damages of an injured taxpayer, the court has no concern with the incidence of taxation. It is a little extraordinary, and, perhaps, a little illuminating, to observe that in all the years that judges and juries have been assessing damages for loss of earnings and earning capacity only four cases have come before the courts when the point was expressly raised, two in England and two in Scotland. In Fairholme v. Firth and Brown, Ltd. (1), DU PARCQ, J., said (149 L.T. 333):

"... in assessing the damages this suggested deduction ought not to be made."

The true view, in his opinion, was that it was the employers' duty to pay the salary agreed. The employee was under a duty to the Crown to pay the tax on his income, including his salary. The incidence and extent of the tax were matters between the Crown and the employee, and were no concern of the employer. In Jordan v. Limmer and Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., Ltd. (2), ATKINSON, J., adopted the view taken by DU PARCQ, J. The English decisions, therefore, are both one way. In Scotland in M'Daid v. Clyde Navigation Trustees (3), LORD SORN, Lord Ordinary, held that the tax should be deducted when assessing damages, although it was recognised in the judgment that very great practical difficulties would occur in so doing. But, later in Blackwood v. Andre (4), LORD KEITH, Lord Ordinary, expressly disagreed with the decision of LORD SORN and refused to follow it. For my part, I think the essence of the decision lies in the words of LORD KEITH when he said (1947 S.C. 334):

"The court, in my opinion, has no concern with the incidence of taxation in assessing the damages of an injured taxpayer."

I am content to say that I am of the same opinion. If it were otherwise and the court, in all cases of this nature, had to concern itself with the incidence of taxation when assessing damages, great difficulties, and, as I think, considerable injustice, would arise. In many cases the court would be without the material on which to form a considered view, and without the means of compelling the material to be produced.

In the present case, if the plaintiff had not been injured and disabled, he would have continued to earn fees from his general practice, and they would have been paid to him, of course, without any deduction of tax and without reference to tax of any kind. The question of taxation would only arise when the fees had been paid, and when the plaintiff had brought into account any other sources of income and had settled the allowances to which he was entitled. The amount of tax he would have to pay might differ from year to year, but with all these things the defendants certainly have nothing to do, and are, equally certainly, not entitled to say that, as wrongdoers, they should receive an abatement of the damages they ought to pay by deducting tax, solely for their benefit. The State would certainly lose, and the measure of the State's loss would be the measure of the defendants' gain. The plaintiff, in common with all other plaintiffs in the like case, is entitled to restitution, as far as it can be achieved, restitution for the loss which he has sustained as the result of the injury he has suffered at the hands of the defendants. The loss which he has suffered is the power to earn fees from his patients in his general practice, and his right to receive those fees from his patients without deduction of any kind. In my opinion, the defendants are liable to the plaintiff for the loss of the gross earnings he would have received but for their negligence, and they are not entitled to say that the damages they must pay ought to be reduced by the deduction of tax. I would allow this appeal, and reduce the damages to £14,000.

Appeal allowed with costs.

DUDLEY AND DISTRICT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY v. EMERSON AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 8, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Tenant—Dwelling-house subject to mortgage—Lease by mortgagor—Mortgagor's statutory power of leasing excluded—Default in payment of instalments due under mortgage—Position of tenant—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 99 (1)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1).

By a mortgage, dated Dec. 5, 1946, the mortgagor charged a dwelling-house, to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, with the payment by weekly instalments of the sum secured and interest thereon. The mortgage contained inter alia a clause expressly excluding the mortgagor's power of leasing under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), and the mortgagee was empowered to enter into possession of the property on default of payment of a certain number of weekly instalments. In January, 1947, F.G. occupied the house under a tenancy agreement with the mortgagor. The weekly instalments due under the mortgage having fallen into arrears, the mortgagee claimed possession of the property, but the claim was resisted by F.G. on the ground that he was the lawful tenant of the house and entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

HELD: the clause in the mortgage excluding the mortgagor's power of leasing under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), did not deprive the mortgagor of the power of granting a lease apart from the statute, and, although the lease was not binding on the mortgagee, the tenancy was lawful, and, at the relevant time (i.e., at or just before the time of the mortgagee's claim to possession), F.G. was lawfully in possession of the property to an extent sufficient to justify his claim to protection under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1).

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by mortgagees, under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, asking for delivery of possession of the property, a dwelling-house, subject to the mortgage.

The first defendant, the mortgagor, did not enter an appearance, but the second defendant, who was in occupation of the house, under a tenancy agreement granted to him by the mortgagor, claimed the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. VAISEY, J., held that, although the lease granted by the mortgagor to the second defendant was not, on the facts of the case, binding on the mortgagees, the second defendant's tenancy was lawful and he was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The facts appear in the judgment.

J. W. Mills for the mortgagees.

Heathcote-Williams for the second defendant.

The mortgagor did not appear.

VAISEY, J. : This case raises a point which it is surprising to find has not been decided long ago. The action is one in which the Dudley and District Benefit Building Society are the plaintiffs, and Edward Emerson and Fred Goodlad are defendants. The relief sought is an order that the defendants and each of them do deliver up to the plaintiffs possession of certain property at Walsall which was subject to a mortgage, dated Dec. 5, 1946, and made by Edward Emerson, the first defendant, in favour of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, therefore, are the mortgagees, the first defendant, Edward Emerson, is the mortgagor, and the second defendant, Fred Goodlad, claims to be a tenant of the property under a tenancy agreement granted to him by Emerson. The terms of the mortgage, so far as they appear to be relevant to the question which I have to determine, are that there was a covenant on the part of Edward Emerson to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of £1,020, with interest thereon as therein mentioned, with a provision that that sum and the interest thereon should be paid off by weekly instalments of £1 14s. each. Preceding that covenant there was a charge by Edward Emerson, as mortgagor of the property, in favour of the plaintiffs. The mortgage contained a definite provision that at any time before the mortgage should have been discharged it should be lawful for the plaintiffs, without any further consent by the mortgagor, to do all or any of a number of specified things, including the entry into possession of the property, subject, however, to the proviso that the plaintiffs should not exercise the power of entering into possession unless and until the mortgagor should have made default for a period in payment of the instalments due under the mortgage. The only other clause of the mortgage to which I need refer is cl. 7 which expressly excludes the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1). That sub-section enacted that mortgagors of land while in possession should have power from time to time to make leases of the mortgaged property or any part thereof.

An officer of the plaintiffs has sworn an affidavit in support of this application, which is made by summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, and he says, among other things, that on the application for the advance of the £1,020 the mortgagor stated that the property was for his immediate occupation. The officer in question further deposes that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the mortgagor has never been in occupation of the property, that only twelve weekly instalments under the mortgage have been paid, and there are now 91 weeks of instalments in arrear. The total amount owing on the security of the mortgage with interest thereon, calculated up to the date of the swearing of the affidavit, was something more than the original advance, that is to say, £1,074 11s. 9d. The mortgagor has been duly served with the proceedings, but he has not appeared and he does not, apparently, desire to resist the plaintiffs' claim for possession, but the second defendant says that he is entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts on the ground that he is the properly constituted tenant of the property from the mortgagor and has been so since January, 1947. He exhibits the rent books which were issued to him by the mortgagor, he says that he has paid the rates and the water rates and has always been willing to pay the rent in respect of the property, and he asks leave to defend the action and claims the protection of the Rent Acts.

The standard rent of the house was 16s. 6d. per week, and there is no doubt that, if the second defendant is entitled to the protection of the Acts, the rental and rateable value of the property are such as to bring the case within that protection. The main statutory provision on which the second defendant relies is the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), which reads thus :

A "No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order or give such a judgment, and either (a) the court has power so to do under the provisions set out in sched. I to this Act; or (b) the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation is available . . ."

Nothing arises under the terms which will enable the court to give such an order or judgment, and I think it must be admitted that, if the second defendant is a tenant within the meaning of that section, he is entitled to resist the plaintiffs' claim.

B I do not get much assistance from the definition clause, s. 12 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. Section 12 (1) (f) provides :

"The expressions 'landlord,' 'tenant,' 'mortgagee,' and 'mortgagor' include any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord, tenant, mortgagee, or mortgagor."

C As I read that section, it merely adds to the prima facie meaning of the word "landlord" any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord, to the meaning of the expression "tenant" any person from time to time deriving title under the original tenant, and so with the expressions "mortgagee" and "mortgagor." It does not seem to me that I can read D that definition as being intended to describe someone as a tenant who derives title under an original mortgagor. Nor do I get any help under s. 12 (1) (g), which defines the "landlord" as including, in relation to a dwelling-house, a person who would but for the Act be entitled to possession of the dwelling-house, and further states that the expressions "tenant and tenancy" include sub-tenant and sub-tenancy, and the expression "let" includes sub-let.

E Several cases have been cited to me, and I would refer first to Iron Trades Employers Insurance Assn., Ltd. v. Union Land and House Investors, Ltd. (1). There FARWELL, J., considered what was the operation and effect of a tenancy or lease granted by a mortgagor who was not in the position, as the mortgagor here is not in a position, to bind the mortgagee by the creation of such a lease or tenancy. In that case there was a charge on certain freehold properties

F to the plaintiffs, and the defendants covenanted with the plaintiffs that they would not, without certain previous consents, exercise the power of leasing or agreeing to lease conferred by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99, on a mortgagor while in possession. By a tenancy agreement dated a week after the legal charge, the defendants, i.e., the mortgagors, granted a yearly tenancy of part of the premises included in the legal charge. The plaintiffs, G the mortgagees, were not asked for and did not give their consent to the execution by the defendants of the tenancy agreement and no counterpart thereof had at any time been delivered to the plaintiffs in accordance with s. 99 (11) of the Act of 1925. It was held there that the defendants, in granting the lease, were not exercising their statutory power, and that, consequently,

H they did not commit any breach of the covenant against such leasing which was contained in the legal charge. During his judgment, FARWELL, J., pointed out that, quite apart from the Act of 1925 and the corresponding, though not altogether identical, provisions of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a mortgagor had always possessed the power to grant a lease which was binding on himself and those deriving title under him, although not binding on the mortgagee. The learned judge pointed out ([1937] Ch. 317; [1937] 1 All E.R. 484) that any lease granted by the mortgagor to some third party would be in no way binding on the mortgagee and as between the lessee and the mortgagee would create no estate or interest, but so far as the mortgagor, who had granted the lease, was concerned

“ . . . it was binding upon him as against the lessee, and he was estopped from disputing it and as against the mortgagor or against any one other than a person having a title paramount to the mortgagor, e.g., the mortgagee, such a lease was good and the lessee was entitled to the benefit conferred thereby . . . ”

Later in his judgment, the learned judge said ([1937] Ch. 321 ; [1937] 1 All E.R. 486) :

“ As I have said, the Conveyancing Act, 1881, did not in my judgment destroy any power which the mortgagor had to grant a lease which would not be binding on the mortgagee, although binding as between himself and the lessee, and I am unable to find anything in the Act of 1925 which has any such effect.”

He pointed out that s. 99 of the Act of 1925 did not in terms state that the only power of granting leases was to be the statutory power, and the learned judge could see nothing to suggest that it was intended to deprive the mortgagor of the power of granting a lease apart from the statute, although that lease was not binding on the mortgagee. He then considered the terms of the covenant which was supposed to have been broken in that case and came to the conclusion there was no breach because the tenancy which had been granted was not, and did not purport to be and could not operate as, the grant of a lease by which the mortgagee was bound, but I read that judgment as being clearly indicative of the view of FARWELL, J., that a lease granted by a mortgagor while in possession—and the lease in the present case to the second defendant was so granted—stands in a very different position from a lease which was granted by a complete stranger or somebody who had no shadow of title to the property that he was attempting to demise.

Therefore, when I approach the proposition of deciding whether the second defendant was lawfully or unlawfully in possession of the property, I am led to the conclusion, by the reasoning of the case to which I have just referred, that it is more accurate to describe his possession as lawful than as unlawful. True it is that it was not binding on the mortgagee, but I venture to think, when one looks at the scope and intention of the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts, that is by no means conclusive of the matter.

I have said that this case, in my judgment, depends on whether at the relevant time the possession of the second defendant was lawful. What is that relevant time ? For that I look at the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Norman v. Simpson (2), and, as I understand it, the conclusions which were reached by SCOTT, L.J., and MORTON, L.J., were that the relevant time was at or just before the assertion of the paramount title by the person who claims possession. Here, although it seems rather a curious conclusion at which to come, I venture to think that the second defendant was lawfully in possession to an extent sufficient to justify his claim to protection under the Rent Restrictions Acts. After all, the position of a sub-tenant, for which the Acts make special provision bringing the sub-tenant into direct contractual relationship with the lessor of the head tenant, is sufficiently analogous to the present position not to warrant any great surprise at the consequences of the conclusion to which I have come. I refer to s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 which says :

“ Where the interest of a tenant of a dwelling-house to which this Act applies is determined, either as the result of an order or judgment for possession or ejectment, or for any other reason, any sub-tenant to whom the premises or any part thereof have been lawfully sub-let shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be deemed to become the tenant of the landlord on the same terms as he would have held from the tenant if the tenancy had continued."

It was pointed out on behalf of the plaintiff society that that expression "deemed to become" was rather indicative that some special provision was necessary in order to create the artificial relationship, but, however that may be and however strange may be the consequences of the conclusion to which

A I have come, it seems to me that, if the test really is the legality or otherwise of the second defendant's tenancy, I am bound to hold that his tenancy and his occupation of the premises under the tenancy is and was lawful.

A point was taken under the attornment clause in the mortgage, to which I need not refer in particular, and if that particular clause had been operative, I think it would have given rise to some very interesting considerations, but,

B as the attornment was only of such part of the property as was in the occupation of the mortgagor, and as the evidence is that the mortgagor was never in occupation of the property or any part of it, I think that no reliance can be placed on that clause or on any consideration which arises out of it.

Martin v. Watson (3), an Irish case, is cited by the editors of LAW NOTES in their treatise, RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST RESTRICTIONS, 21st ed.,

C p. 94, as authority for the proposition which I have here had to consider, viz. :

" . . . that the lessee of a mortgagor claims under him and gets the benefit of the Act as against the mortgagee, though the lease be void as against the mortgagee."

I am bound to say that, if that were so, and if Martin v. Watson (3) did so decide, I should feel very much disposed to follow it and let that be an end of the matter, but when I look at the report, I find it rather difficult to get

D that positive finding out of the facts and out of the decision. The summons must be dismissed with costs.

Order accordingly. Plaintiffs to pay the taxed costs of the second defendant. Plaintiffs' costs against the first defendant to be taxed and added to the security.

G Family Provision—Reasonable provision for maintenance of dependant—Dependant incapable by reason of mental disability—Will made on footing that State would provide for dependant—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (c. 45), s. 1 (1).

H By his will, dated May 14, 1947, a testator gave his freehold house to L., a stranger in blood, and left the residue of his estate to trustees on trust as to capital and income for such of his three children as were living at his death in equal shares. The testator died on Oct. 25, 1947, and was survived by three daughters, his wife having predeceased him. His daughter M. had gone through a form of marriage, but the marriage had been annulled and she had been a patient in a private mental hospital since Mar. 15, 1945, and was incapable of maintaining herself. M.'s private means amounted to about £140 a year, and during his life the testator had provided £250 a year for her upkeep in the hospital. The provision for her which he made by his will would produce £72 a year, while the cost of her maintenance was about £360 a year. Evidence was given that, in view of the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, the testator intended to leave the State to take care of M. and that he would only be responsible until the day to be appointed under the Act for its commencement. On an application by M. under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, for reasonable provision to be made for her maintenance out of the testator's estate,

HELD: the testator was entitled to distribute his estate on the footing that M. could and should take advantage of the provisions of the Act of 1946, and, therefore, the provision made for her by his will was reasonable having regard to her existing needs.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by which the plaintiff applied under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), for reasonable provision to be made for her out of the testator's estate.

The testator had made his will on the footing that the State would provide for the plaintiff, a patient in a mental hospital, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, and, therefore, he had not provided for the full cost of her maintenance. ROXBURGH, J., held that the provision made by the testator was reasonable. The facts appear in the judgment.

Plowman for the plaintiff.

J. H. A. Sparrow for the first and second defendants, the executors.

Milner Holland, K.C., and Newsom for the third defendant, Mrs. Ada Lucas, a specific legatee.

Peter Foster for the fourth and fifth defendants, the sisters of the plaintiff.

ROXBURGH, J.: This is an interesting case under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 of which provides:

"(1) Where, after the commencement of this Act, a person dies domiciled in England leaving (a) a wife or husband; (b) a daughter who has not been married, or who is, by reason of some mental or physical disability, incapable of maintaining herself; (c) an infant son; or (d) a son who is, by reason of some mental or physical disability, incapable of maintaining himself; and leaving a will, then, if the court on application by or on behalf of any such wife, husband, daughter or son as afore-said (in this Act referred to as a 'dependant' of the testator) is of opinion that the will does not make reasonable provision for the maintenance of that dependant, the court may order that such reasonable provision as the court thinks fit shall, subject to such conditions or restrictions, if any, as the court may impose, be made out of the testator's net estate for the maintenance of that dependant."

The testator made his will on May 14, 1947. He appointed John Arthur Chatterton and John Decker to be his executors, and he devised and bequeathed to the defendant, Ada Lucas, the wife of William Haslam Lucas, free of all duties the freehold residence known as "Downside," Roedean Road, Brighton, and "my furniture and effects of household use or ornament therein and belonging thereto." He devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate to the defendants, John Arthur Chatterton and John Decker, on trust for sale and conversion and to hold the proceeds thereof

"Upon trust as to both capital and income for such of my three children Jean Elizabeth, Mary Eleanor and Ruth as are living at my death and attain the age of 21 years or marry under that age in equal shares provided that if any of my said children shall predecease me leaving issue living at my death such issue if and when they attain the age of 21 years or marry under that age shall take by substitution and if more than one in equal shares."

A The testator died on Oct. 25, 1947, domiciled in England, and his will was proved on Apr. 24, 1948. The testator's wife predeceased him. The testator and his wife had three daughters all of whom have been married. Two of the daughters are the defendants, Jean Elizabeth Chatterton, wife of the defendant, John Arthur Chatterton, and Ruth Fortune. About them I know nothing more than that they are children of the testator. The third of the daughters was the plaintiff, Mary Eleanor Hayward. She was married, but her marriage was annulled. I do not think it necessary for me to say anything about the circumstances of the annulment except that they were such that she was not in a position to obtain, and did not obtain, any maintenance from her former husband.

C At the date of this summons the plaintiff was about 38 years of age. She is a patient at St. Andrew's Hospital, Northampton, a private mental hospital, suffering from schizophrenia, and there is no doubt that she is a daughter of the testator who is, "by reason of some mental . . . disability, incapable of maintaining herself". She first entered this hospital on Mar. 15, 1945, as a voluntary patient, but since May 28, 1945, she has been detained there. When she went into the hospital the testator was abroad and did not himself select the institution.

D In 1929, the legatee, Mrs. Lucas, was living apart from her husband and became associated with the testator whose wife at that time was in a mental home. The testator could not then have obtained a divorce because his wife's state of health was not a ground for divorce. When, in 1938, it became possible for the testator to obtain a divorce, that was not done. About 1930 the testator purchased the lease of the house "Downside," and in May, 1930, he and Mrs. Lucas moved into that house which was partly furnished by Mrs. Lucas and was intended for a joint home for the testator and Mrs. Lucas. During the years in which Mrs. Lucas lived with the testator he was often ill and she nursed him. He made her some gifts, but not in any sense extravagant gifts. She seems to have done a great deal for the testator. There is no doubt that she and he were on most affectionate terms. Mrs. Lucas says :

G "I am well acquainted with the deceased's three daughters, and we were all on very friendly terms, the eldest daughter choosing me as god-mother to her first baby. The deceased gave them all good general and professional educations, and, having done that, expected them to look after themselves. He often said : 'I teach my birds to fly and expect them to do so.' Further in the case of the plaintiff who married a man without means the deceased bought and stocked a chemist shop in London for her. This business was allowed to dissipate and run itself out through neglect and lack of interest. During the war years her husband became a commissioned officer, and later we learned that their marriage had been annulled. Shortly afterwards we heard she had been taken ill with pneumonia and the deceased again subscribed for her maintenance and also paid the rent of her flat in London. Soon after we had news that she had gone as a voluntary patient to St. Andrew's Hospital, Northampton, for which deceased was again called upon to pay. Undoubtedly, all this added worry had a very depressing effect on the deceased and his desire to go on living entirely left him. Some three months before the deceased died Mr. Chatterton came to Downside on business connected with the plaintiff. The deceased then informed him in my hearing that he was a poor and sick man, that he had no intention of keeping the plaintiff all her life, that she had been married for ten years and no one ever assisted him in similar circumstances, and that as the State were nationalising all hospitals the State must take care of her and that it was his intention to carry on only until that time. He left no doubt whatever as to his intentions in the matter."

The solicitor who prepared the will in question, after explaining the instructions which he received, states :

"On May 14 the testator called at my office and executed the engrossment of the will in the form in which it had been sent to him. I have a distinct recollection that I referred in conversation with him on this occasion to the increase in succession duty contained in the Budget proposals which were then before Parliament and pointed out that the devise of Downside to Mrs. Ada Lucas free of all duty would put a heavy burden on the residuary estate. At that time I had no clear idea what the value of the estate would be, but I was under the impression that it would be greater than turned out to be the fact. I have an equally distinct recollection that the testator told me plainly that he had no desire to vary the provisions of the will. He said that Ada Lucas was the one person whom he desired above all else to benefit from his will, that she had done a great deal for him in recent years, that she could look to no one but himself to provide for her, that she had shewn far more concern for his comfort and happiness than any of his daughters, and that two of his daughters had husbands to provide for them. As to the third daughter the testator said that she was in a mental home and must take her chance."

A good deal of play has been made with that phrase "must take her chance," but I think I ought to read it in connection with the statement which he made to Mr. Chatterton very shortly afterwards. I take it that what the testator meant was this : "My daughter is in St. Andrew's Hospital. It may be taken over by the State or it may not. If it is taken over by the State, she will remain in St. Andrew's Hospital at the cost of the State. If it is not taken over by the State, St. Andrew's Hospital cannot put a detained person out into the street. They will have to make arrangements for her reception in a home which has been taken over by the State." That is what I think he meant by saying "she must take her chance." Then the statement goes on :

"He further said that he had paid hundreds of pounds a year for the support of his wife in a mental home (as to my knowledge was the fact), and he added that he did not consider it his duty to do the same thing after his death for his daughter, who, in any event, had inherited some money from her mother and would receive a share of his residue. The testator stated these points to me with great clarity and force."

The National Health Service Act, 1946, was passed on Nov. 6, 1946, that is to say, before the date of the will. Section 1 provides :

"(1) It shall be the duty of the Minister of Health (hereafter in this Act referred to as 'the Minister') to promote the establishment in England and Wales of a comprehensive health service designed to secure improvement in the physical and mental health of the people of England and Wales and the prevention, diagnosis and treatment of illness, and for that purpose to provide or secure the effective provision of services in accordance with the following provisions of this Act. (2) The services so provided shall be free of charge, except where any provision of this Act expressly provides for the making and recovery of charges."

Section 3 provides :

"(1) As from the appointed day, it shall be the duty of the Minister to provide throughout England and Wales, to such extent as he considers necessary to meet all reasonable requirements, accommodation and services of the following descriptions, that is to say: (a) hospital accommodation."

A By s. 79: "... 'hospital' means any institution for the reception and treatment of persons suffering from illness or mental defectiveness," and " 'Illness' includes mental illness." So the testator knew that an Act had been passed which provided for the maintenance of his daughter free of charge so long as her disability continued, but he did not know when the appointed day was going to be, for the day was not appointed until after his death, he having died on Oct. 25, 1947. During the testator's lifetime he paid £250 a year, or thereabouts, for the maintenance of the plaintiff at this hospital. B Mr. Peers, the receiver of the plaintiff's estate, in his affidavit, says:

C "The minimum cost of maintaining the plaintiff at the said hospital is at present £327 12s. 0d. per annum without allowing for any extra comforts or other incidentals. The actual cost of maintenance for the year ending on June 30, 1948, was £367 1s. 6d. as is shown by my second account as such receiver as aforesaid. I am informed by the medical superintendent of the said hospital by letter dated May 7, 1948, that the Minister of Health has disclaimed the said hospital, and that there will, therefore, be no change in its administration in consequence of the National Health Service Act, 1946, coming into operation on July 5, 1948."

D The plaintiff's own resources are: (i) investments in court derived from her mother's estate producing an income of about £50 per annum; (ii) a profit rental of about £90 per annum from the sub-letting of a flat at 414, Park West, Marble Arch. Mr. Peers says:

E "The said sum of £90 per annum is, however, very precarious because the plaintiff's lease of the flat is terminable on three months' notice and during her incapacity she could not avail herself of the protection under the Rent Acts should her tenancy be determined. The existing sub-tenancy is a furnished letting. I estimate that the income available for the plaintiff's maintenance in the said hospital is about £230 per annum short of her requirements."

F The testator's net estate is approximately £23,341, subject to any order I may make as to the costs of these proceedings. The estimated income of the plaintiff in respect of her one-third share of the residuary estate of the testator is £72 per annum. If I take the income of the net estate as being £700 per annum, and then [under s. 1 (3) (b) of the Act of 1938] take half of that, which would be £350 per annum, and deduct from that £72 per annum, I am left with £278 G per annum which is the maximum which I could award to the plaintiff under this Act. The exact value of the devise to Mrs. Lucas cannot be ascertained because the exact value of the house cannot be ascertained without selling it, but I think it would be approximately true to say that it is worth about £400 per annum to her. So that what the testator did was to give Mrs. Lucas property which, when realised, would produce for her approximately £400 per annum and H leave to each of his three daughters a share of residue which would produce approximately £72 per annum.

The question which I have to determine is whether I ought to say that his will does not make a reasonable provision for the maintenance of the plaintiff. The first and largest question is whether it was reasonable for the testator to make provision for the plaintiff on the footing that she could and should be maintained free of charge under the National Health Service Act, 1946, because it is quite certain that if he was unreasonable in proceeding on that footing he has not made reasonable provision for her. In my judgment, he was entitled to make provision on that footing. No doubt, people who have private means of their own are still free to choose between accepting the benefits of the National Health Service Act and paying substantial sums for the preservation of their liberty of choice, but it is too late in the day to say that it is humiliating anybody to suggest that they ought to take advantage of the State facilities. In other words, I think that this testator was entitled, if he was so minded, to distribute his estate on the footing that his daughter could, as she certainly could, and should take advantage of the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946. On that footing, apart from the interim period to which I will refer, the provision which he made was, in my judgment, entirely reasonable having regard to her existing needs. There is, apparently, no hope for her recovery, and what she has, plus a third of the residue which might well, in the case of a lady situated as this lady is, be applied in the purchase of an annuity, is sufficient for her. A

The only matter which remains is the interim period. The testator did not know how long it would be before the hospitals were taken over by the State because at the date of his death the appointed day had not been announced, but he had no reason to suppose that it was going to be a long period. The Act had been passed and though the £90 which the plaintiff has from Park West is undoubtedly precarious, it has not come to an end. The testator had made a very substantial payment to the home almost immediately before his death, and for some reason which is not explained the receiver had accumulated a balance of £140. Therefore, the moneys available were quite sufficient to maintain this lady at this home during the interim period between the testator's death and the appointed day without recourse to any capital. If some slight recourse to capital had been necessary, it could have been made against the capital of one-third of the residue. B C D

If I am right in my view that the testator was entitled to act on the footing that his daughter could and should take advantage of the National Health Service Act, it seems to me impossible to hold that the will did not make reasonable provision for her maintenance. As this question of the effect of the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, is rather one of principle, and as, therefore, this matter might be considered elsewhere, I think I should add that, if I had come to the conclusion that the will did not make reasonable provision for the maintenance of the plaintiff, I should have made some additional provision for her in respect of the period between the testator's death and the period, say, of three months after the date of this order, that being a reasonable period for her removal to some State institution. E F

Order accordingly. Plaintiff to pay the costs as between party and party of the third defendant. The executors to raise and pay their own costs out of the estate in due course of administration. No other order as to costs.

THE SOBIESKI.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Singleton, L.JJ.), December 13, 14, 15, 16, 1948, January 31, March 7, 1949.]

Shipping—Collision—Ship in convoy, escorted by naval escort, and vessel on crossing course—Escort vessels equipped with radar and linked with convoy by radio-telephone communication—Failure of senior officer to warn convoy—Liability for contributing negligence—Application of Maritime Conventions Act, 1911 (c. 57), s. 1 (1).

In the early morning of Apr. 13, 1945, S.S. Esperance and S.S. Sobieski collided in the English Channel. The Esperance, having been detached from an up-channel convoy, was making her way, in dense fog, towards the Nab Tower in order to enter the Solent. The Sobieski was the commodore ship of a fast two-ships convoy proceeding from the Solent to Havre with troops and escorted by five naval craft, the senior escort officer, L., being on board H.M.C.S. Loch Alvie. The escort vessels were fitted with radar and the Sobieski was not, but the Sobieski and the other vessel in the convoy and each of the escort vessels were linked by radio-telephone communication. It was the duty of escorts, besides giving the convoy protection against enemy attack, to keep a radar watch for surface vessels which might involve the units of the convoy in the risk of collision, and it was the practice for the senior naval officer to advise the commodore of any alteration of course which he might consider necessary to avoid other traffic. After the escorts joined the Sobieski's convoy and about twenty minutes before the collision, the Loch Alvie's radar picked up a surface vessel, unquestionably the Esperance, and, after further reports of its movements, L. formed the view that there was a probability that it would be necessary to advise the Sobieski to make an alteration of course, but, before he had decided to communicate with the Sobieski and about ten minutes before the collision, an enemy submarine was detected, and, in accordance with routine orders, the Loch Alvie went into the attack and, with other units, dropped depth charges, as a result of which her radar apparatus was temporarily put out of action and remained so until after the collision. On discovering that the radar was out of action, L. sent a signal, about five minutes before the collision, to another unit of the escort asking whether the Sobieski was "standing into danger" and after a delay of several minutes was answered in the negative. In the meanwhile, the Sobieski, which had heard signals for a pilot (sent out, in fact, by the Esperance), had signalled by radio-telephone to the Loch Alvie asking whether the signals were from her, to which the Loch Alvie replied in the negative. The Sobieski had not stopped her engines on first hearing the signals from the Esperance, nor did she stop them or slow down until the Esperance came into view about thirty seconds before the collision. The Esperance had not been sounding the recognised fog signal, a single prolonged blast at intervals.

Claims alleging negligence were made by the Esperance and the Sobieski against each other. The Sobieski also claimed against L. for negligence in respect of the damage sustained by the Sobieski in the collision. The Court of Appeal (reversing the finding of the court below) found both the Sobieski and the Esperance guilty of negligence and apportioned the blame between them. The final question to be determined was whether L. could be held liable to the Sobieski.

HELD : (i) L. owed a duty to the Sobieski to exercise reasonable care in the performance of his duty to inform the ship of any unexpected dangers to her which he could detect by radar ; he failed to perform that duty ; and so he was guilty of negligence which contributed to the collision.

(ii) the Loch Alvie was not at fault as a result of L. failing to warn the Sobieski, and, therefore, the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, had no application, and the claim of the Sobieski against L. failed at common law because of the contributory negligence of the ship.

Decision of PILCHER, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 78), reversed in part.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs and CROSS-APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of PILCHER, J., delivered on Nov. 10, 1947 (reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 78).

The plaintiffs, the owners of the S.S. Esperance, her master, officers and crew, claimed in negligence against the owners of the S.S. Sobieski and against Commander Layard, the naval officer in charge of the Sobieski's escort, but on the plaintiffs' discontinuing their action against Commander Layard, the owners of the Sobieski counterclaimed in negligence against both the plaintiffs and Commander Layard. Commander Layard put in a defence denying negligence and alleging contributory negligence. PILCHER, J., held that both the Esperance and the Sobieski were free from blame for the collision, but this finding was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who found both vessels guilty of negligence, and apportioned the blame as to three-fifths against the Sobieski and two-fifths against the Esperance. PILCHER, J., also found Commander Layard negligent and held him personally liable, as a servant of the Crown, to the owners of the Sobieski for his negligent failure to perform the public duties which he was under a duty to perform. The Court of Appeal, while affirming the decision of PILCHER, J., that Commander Layard owed a duty to the Sobieski which he had negligently failed to perform, held that he was not liable in law on account of the contributory negligence of the Sobieski. The appeal first came before the Court of Appeal on Dec. 13, 1948, and a judgment was delivered on Jan. 31, 1949, but, as no argument had been addressed to the court as to the effect of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, it was ordered that the case should appear in the list again, if the parties so desired, for argument. The case again came before the court on Mar. 7, 1949, when the court heard argument and delivered a further judgment. The facts appear in the headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan 31. BUCKNILL, L.J., read the following judgment. I have been authorised by COHEN, L.J., to say that he has read the judgment I am about to deliver and agrees with it.

These appeals are from a judgment of PILCHER, J., delivered on Nov. 10, 1947, in respect of a collision, at about 1.38 a.m., on Apr. 13, 1945, between the French steamship Esperance and the Polish steamship Sobieski in the English Channel about 6 miles S.S.E. of the Nab Tower. The Esperance is a single-screw steamship of 5,072 tons gross register, 351 feet long, and was bound from Gibraltar to the Solent laden with cotton. The Sobieski is a twin screw motor-vessel of 11,030 tons gross register, 512 feet in length, and was bound from the Solent to Havre with troops. There was a dense fog, with no wind, and the tide was setting to the westward with a force of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ knots.

- A When the owners of the Esperance in due course delivered to the defendants, the owners of the Sobieski, their statement of claim in respect of this collision, the defendants in their defence, besides denying negligence and alleging negligence in the navigation of the Esperance, alleged that the senior officer of the escort to the Sobieski was negligent and thereby caused the collision. Subsequently, the defendants ascertained that the senior officer of the escort
- B was Commander Layard, R.N., D.S.O., and they then, by way of counter-claim, sued him in respect of the damage sustained by them in the collision. Commander Layard delivered a defence denying negligence and also alleging negligence on the part of the Esperance and the Sobieski. After hearing the evidence of the master of the Sobieski, the master of the Esperance, and Commander Layard, the learned judge decided that the collision was solely
- C caused by the negligence of Commander Layard and that neither the Sobieski nor the Esperance were guilty of negligent navigation. All three parties have appealed, the owners of the Esperance and the owners of the Sobieski appealing from that part of the judgment which found the other ship free from blame. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, found both vessels guilty of negligence, apportioned the blame as to three-fifths to the Sobieski and as to two-fifths
- D to the Esperance and continued:] The question whether Commander Layard was guilty of negligence which caused or contributed to the collision relates to the claim by the Sobieski against him. I think that, in the circumstances, he had a duty to those in charge of the Sobieski to exercise reasonable care in the performance of the task which he had undertaken to perform, namely, to inform the master of any unexpected dangers to his ship, which he could
- E detect by his radar, but of which the master remained ignorant in the fog. Commander Layard had knowledge, through his radar, of the position of the Esperance in the fog as a potential danger to the Sobieski some twenty minutes before the collision. To his knowledge that danger continued and increased during the next ten minutes, and, so far as Commander Layard knew, was never terminated. He also knew that the Sobieski was steaming at a speed
- F which was very excessive in the dense fog but for the safety afforded her and other ships by careful use of the radar on the escort vessel, Loch Alvie. The next question, therefore, is whether Commander Layard failed in that duty. I agree on this point with the conclusion reached by PILCHER, J., but, speaking for myself, I think that the more serious negligence of Commander Layard was in his failure to give any warning of the presence of the Esperance
- G to the Sobieski by radio-telephone after the Loch Alvie's radar was put out of action. I think that Commander Layard's failure to warn the Sobieski contributed to the collision, because the Sobieski was navigating without any accurate knowledge of the Esperance's position, and was proceeding in reliance on getting a warning, which she, in fact, never received, but should have received. The burden of having to find Commander Layard to blame is
- H lightened by the fact that both our assessors advise us that good seamanship required him to report the Esperance to the Sobieski as soon as he became aware of the risks created by her presence. Their advice agrees with the opinion expressed by the elder brethren to the learned trial judge.

The position, therefore, as between the owners of the Sobieski and Commander Layard is that their negligence and his negligence caused the collision between the Sobieski and the Esperance. If the claim of the owners of the Sobieski against Commander Layard could be dealt with under the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, it would be possible to make an apportionment of the damage done to the Sobieski, but, subject to argument on the point, I do not think that the Act applies to such a case as this. The Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, came into force on June 15, 1945, and would appear not to apply to this case, in which the damage occurred on Apr. 13, 1945. It, therefore, seems that the common law applies to the claim of the owners of the Sobieski, and that this claim fails on the ground of their contributory negligence. As no argument took place before this court as to the legal consequences of a finding that the Sobieski, the Esperance and Commander Layard were to blame, I think that the case should appear in the list again for argument, if the parties desire it, on which occasion the question of costs of all parties can be considered.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

Mar. 7. Further argument having been addressed to the court,

BUCKNILL, L.J. : We have listened to argument by counsel on behalf of both ships, but the conclusion to which I have come is that the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, does not apply to this case. Counsel for the Sobieski, in support of his argument that the Act did apply, put forward four points. He said that the Loch Alvie was to blame for the collision and that Commander Layard was responsible for the fault of the Loch Alvie. He also argued that the four other vessels in the escort were to blame for the collision, and that Commander Layard was responsible for their fault. So far as the four other vessels were concerned, I can see no evidence to support the contention that they were to blame for the collision, and, therefore, the point that Commander Layard is responsible for their fault goes, but there is something to be said for the first two points, namely, that the Loch Alvie was to blame for the collision and that Commander Layard was responsible for her fault. The point turns on s. 1 (1) and s. 9 (4) of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, and I will read the material parts of those two sections. Section 1 (1) provides :

"Where, by the fault of two or more vessels, damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels, to their cargoes or freight, or to any property on board, the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault."

WARRINGTON, J., pointed out ([1914] P. 34) in The Cairnbahn (3), that :

"... the Maritime Conventions Act personifies the vessel, treating it at one time as the actor, at another as suffering damage or loss, and at another as liable to make good such damage or loss. The truth is, of course, that for the purpose of ascertaining the legal effect, the word in one context connotes those responsible for the navigation of the vessel ; in another those who are interested in her, her cargo or freight ; and in another those who are in law answerable for the conduct of those in charge."

Section 9 (4) provides :

"This Act shall apply to any persons other than the owners responsible for the fault of the vessel as though the expression 'owners' included such persons, and in any case where, by virtue of any charter or demise, or for any other reason, the owners are not responsible for the navigation and management of the vessel, this Act shall be read as though for references to the owners there were substituted references to the charterers or other persons for the time being so responsible."

The first question is : Was there any fault in the navigation of the Loch Alvie ? The evidence was that Commander Layard was the senior officer in charge of the escort. He had undertaken, so far as the Sobieski was concerned, that he would give her warning of any obstruction in the Channel which the radar apparatus of the Loch Alvie detected but which the Sobieski would not know about because of the fog. Commander Layard was not in charge of the navigation of the Loch Alvie in any way. That is quite clear from the fact that when those in charge of the Loch Alvie's azdic picked up some object which might be a hostile submarine, the commander of the Loch Alvie, without consulting Commander Layard, dashed in to drop his depth charges and in so doing put the radar apparatus of the Loch Alvie out of use. It is impossible to suggest that Commander Layard was in charge of the navigation of the ship, or that the ship was in fault because Commander Layard failed to use the radio-telephone which he could have used to warn the Sobieski that the radar apparatus on the Loch Alvie had picked up the Esperance or later on to warn the Sobieski that the radar had ceased to work and that he was no longer able to give the warning to the Sobieski which the radar would have enabled him to give.

There are no reported cases which throw much light on this particular point. The Rockabill (4) is rather a different case, because there the question was whether the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board was partly to blame for giving certain instructions to the Rockabill to leave the dock and go out into the Mersey at a time when there was a risk of collision with the King Orry which was coming down from the Princes Landing Stage. The Court of Appeal in that case agreed with the judgment of BUCKNILL, J., that the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, did not apply to the claim against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board assuming that the Rockabill was partly to blame and the dock authorities were also partly to blame for the navigation of the Rockabill in going out into the river at an improper time and colliding with the King Orry. SCOTT, L.J., in his judgment in the Court of Appeal, said ([1937] P. 109; [1937] 1 All E.R. 195):

"But assuming that [the Dock Board] were guilty of negligence as found by the learned judge, then I agree that under the Maritime Conventions Act there is nothing to alter the old common law position which confers freedom from liability on the defendant in a case of this sort where the accident is contributed to by the negligence of the plaintiff . . ."

We have been referred to The Glaucus and City of Florence (5), a recent decision by PILCHER, J. In that case PILCHER, J., in the course of his judgment, said ([1948] P. 99):

"I think that the contention put forward by the owners of the Glaucus is justified in principle. If, as was very often the case in convoys navigating under war conditions, there had been on board the Glaucus a naval officer acting as commodore of the convoy it is difficult to see how the owners of the Glaucus could have been made responsible for any damage occasioned by a negligent order given by such commodore acting within the scope of his authority as commodore of the convoy and in his capacity as such commodore. No doubt the master of a ship in convoy always remains responsible for the safety of his own ship but, in assuming the office of commodore of this convoy, Captain McCarthy undertook duties and responsibilities quite outside the duties which normally fall on the master of a ship."

For these reasons, in my view, the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, does not apply with reference to the claim of the Sobieski against Commander Layard, and that claim fails by reason of the fact that the common law, and not the Maritime Conventions Act, applies and the fact that the Sobieski was guilty of negligence.

COHEN, L.J. : I agree.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

FREDERICK BERRY, LTD. v. ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), February 18, 24, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Covenant against fixing nameplate without consent—Consent not to be unreasonably withheld—Construction—Reasonableness of refusal.

A lease of the third floor of a building, the property of a bank occupying the ground floor, with the right for the tenants to use the entrance to the building and the stairs leading up to the demised premises, contained the following covenant: "the tenant will not hang out or exhibit any sign-board or other advertisement whether on the demised premises or at the main entrance to the building without first obtaining the approval and consent of the bank such consent not to be unreasonably withheld." A small nameplate with the tenants' name and description was attached to the side of one of several columns at the front of the building near the letter box, and a large plate similarly inscribed was placed in the lobby immediately inside the main door, through which, in business hours, it was plainly visible from the opposite side of the street. The tenants now wished to exhibit a larger nameplate on one of the columns, but the landlords withheld their consent. The tenants contended that the covenant entitled them to affix a nameplate outside the building although the landlords had power to object to a particular notice or its position on reasonable grounds.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the covenant there was no implied undertaking that the landlords would give their consent unless they had a reasonable ground for refusing it.

(ii) it was for the tenants to show that the landlords' refusal was unreasonable.

(iii) in the circumstances, the landlords' refusal was not unreasonable and the tenants were, therefore, not entitled to succeed.

ACTION for a declaration.

By a lease, dated May 28, 1947, the landlords, the Royal Bank of Scotland, demised to the tenants the third floor of a building situate at No. 64, New Bond Street, London, for a term of five years, with liberty for the tenants to use the entrance, lift, stairs and passages of the building for the purpose of passing to and from the demised premises. The lease contained the following covenant:

"... the tenant will not hang out or exhibit any signboard or other advertisement whether on the demised premises or at the main entrance to the building without first obtaining the approval and consent of the bank such consent not to be unreasonably withheld."

The tenants claimed a declaration that, on the true construction of the covenant, they were entitled to affix a nameplate at the main entrance to the building and that the consent of the landlords to their doing so had been unreasonably withheld. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that there was no implied covenant that the landlords would give their consent in the absence of reasonable ground for refusing it, and gave judgment for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 24. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment. By a lease dated May 28, 1947, the landlords demised to the tenants the third floor of premises at No. 64, New Bond Street, for a term of five years from June 24, 1947, at a rent of £250 per annum. The lease also granted to the tenants the right to use the entrance, staircase, and so forth, at the demised premises. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant not to hang out or exhibit any signboard or other advertisement on the said third floor or at the main entrance of the said premises without first obtaining the consent of the landlords, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld.

The tenants had occupied the premises under an earlier lease from the landlords expiring immediately before the lease of May 28 took effect, the only material difference between the two being that in the earlier lease the restrictive covenant with regard to signboards and advertisements did not contain the words "or at the main entrance of the said premises." The tenants are desirous of exhibiting a nameplate on the outside northern pillar of the main entrance so as to indicate to passers-by that they are carrying on business on the premises, the ground floor of which is wholly occupied by one of the landlords' branch banks, and they seek a declaration that the landlords are not entitled to withhold their consent to such a notice being exhibited.

The only questions that I have to decide are whether the tenants are entitled to call upon the landlords to give their consent, and, if so, whether the latter have reasonable grounds for refusing it. If a tenant takes only an upper floor of a building and has no more than a right to use the entrance hall for the purpose of approaching the premises demised, he must stipulate for the right to put a nameplate outside the premises other than on that part demised to him, if he desires this convenience. It is said that on the true construction of the covenant to which I have referred, the tenants have been granted that right though the landlords have reserved to themselves the power to object to a particular notice or its position on reasonable grounds. I cannot so construe the covenant.

The question that falls for decision here has usually arisen in relation to the right to assign or sub-let or to the user of premises. In all those cases, in the absence of a restrictive covenant, a tenant can assign his lease or use the premises as he likes, and where the lease has only contained a restrictive covenant by the tenant it has always been held that the right of the tenant is to apply for permission, and, if refused, to assign or use the premises as he chooses and defend any action that is brought against him by showing that the withholding of consent is unreasonable. A good illustration of this will be found in Treloar v. Bigge (1), a case which has often been cited and I think never disapproved, and the same principle seems to me to underlie Smith v. Harwich Corpn. (2). In neither case would the court imply a covenant by the defendants that they would give consent. No doubt, there have been cases in which there has been an express covenant by the lessor not unreasonably to withhold his consent: for example, Ideal Film Renting Co., Ltd. v. Nielsen (3); and, if there is such a covenant, the lessee can not only disregard an unreasonable refusal, but can also bring an action for damages if it is withheld. In the present case it is conceded that, unless there is at least an implied covenant by the lessors, the tenants could have no right to put up the plate on the outside of the premises. I do not find it necessary to go through the many cases in which positive or negative covenants have been held to be, in the substance, negative or positive respectively. I cannot find there is here an implied covenant that the landlords would give their consent unless they had a reasonable ground for refusing it. The words with regard to the withholding of the consent would operate, and, therefore, a meaning can be given to them if the tenants desired to put up a notice or sign outside the third floor.

That is enough to dispose of the case, but, lest it should go further, I ought to express my opinion on whether the consent was unreasonably withheld if the tenants are in a position to demand it. Let me say, in the first place, that, in my opinion, it is for the tenants to show that the refusal was unreasonable and not for the landlords to prove that it was not. This was distinctly held by the Court of Appeal in Shanly v. Ward (4). I was referred to a dictum of SLESSER, L.J., in Lambert v. Woolworth & Co., Ltd. (5), in which he said ([1938] 2 All E.R. 675):

“ . . . the onus of proving that the withholding is unreasonable is on the tenant, but, if the landlord gives no reason, but merely refuses, that in itself, I think, puts upon him the duty of showing that his action was reasonable.”

The other members of the court did not express any view on this subject, and, in any case, I do not think that the dictum of the Lord Justice means any more than that, if the landlord gives no reason, the court would more readily imply that the withholding was unreasonable.

So far as any evidence was given on the subject by the landlords their refusal was, in the main, based on what was said to be their considered policy not to allow any plates other than their own to be fixed on the outside of their buildings. That a plate would be a convenience to the tenants is, I think, clear, but, though a request may be reasonable, that does not mean that a refusal to grant it is necessarily unreasonable.

The day after the hearing I took the opportunity of seeing the outside of the premises for myself. On my visit, I made careful observation of other shops and business premises in both Old and New Bond Streets, and noticed that, while there is some diversity of practice, by far the larger number of buildings in which separate businesses are carried on above the ground floor have plates or notices in one form or another bearing the names of the persons or firms who are trading above the street level. The question is not what other landlords may or may not do, but whether the landlords are acting reasonably in refusing their consent in this case. I extended my tour of observation so as to include several other banks in the neighbourhood, including Piccadilly and St. James' Street. Though several of these adjoin premises which do bear plates announcing that businesses are carried on above the ground floor, not one of these banks bears any such plates or notices on the outside of their premises, so it seems that the landlords' practice conforms to that of other banks in the West End. Then, looking at the landlords' bank, which, be it noted, is a corner building with several columns on both fronts similar to the one to which the tenants desire to fix their plate, I do think it would mar the symmetry were this permitted, but there is a small plate bearing the tenants' name and description at the side of this column by the letter-box, doubtless mainly for the information of the postmen. Though referred to somewhat disparagingly as a sort of visiting card, it is a good deal larger than an ordinary trade card. It is perfectly legible and it catches the eye at once. In addition, there is a large plate with the tenants' name and description in the lobby immediately inside the door, which remains open in business hours, and into which persons having business with the bank or anyone else in the building, must enter. In daylight, at any rate, the plate is clearly visible from the other side of Bond Street. How the witnesses who were called by the tenants failed to see both, let alone one, of these plates when they found themselves outside No. 64 passes my comprehension. In my opinion, it is not unreasonable for the bank to feel that they have given the tenants all the publicity that they can reasonably require on the ground floor, and, accordingly, their refusal to sanction the additional plate is by no means unreasonable. The action fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Adoption—Grandchild—Illegitimate child of daughter aged sixteen—Adoption of Children Act, 1926 (c. 29), s. 1 (1).

A husband and wife sought to adopt, under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, s. 1 (1), the illegitimate child of their daughter, a girl of sixteen.

HELD: an order authorising the adoption by married persons of an illegitimate grandchild could be made in special circumstances, but only with great caution and never as a matter of course, for normally an adoption presupposed a complete and final separation between the child and its natural parents whereas in the circumstances of the present case the child and its mother must inevitably remain in association to a greater or less degree and it was impossible to exclude the risk of grave psychological strain and emotional disturbance arising therefrom in the future with consequences to them both which might be serious.

SUMMONS asking for an order authorising the applicants, a husband and wife, to adopt the illegitimate child of their daughter under the provisions of the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. The summons was heard in chambers, but VAISEY, J., thought it desirable to give his judgment in open court. He granted the order, but stressed the fact that, in such a case, an adoption order should only be made in special circumstances.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 16. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. An interlocutory application in this matter relating to a point of procedure and the order made thereon by ROXBURGH, J., have already been reported ([1948] 2 All E.R. 727). For that reason and also because proceedings under the Adoption of Infants Act, 1926, are conducted in chambers so that little information about the practice is afforded to the profession and the public, I have thought it desirable that the order which I am about to make in the present case should be made in open court.

The facts, as already disclosed in the report, are briefly as follows. The applicants, husband and wife, wish to adopt, under the provisions of the Act, the illegitimate child, a girl of a few months old, of their own daughter, who at the time of the child's birth was not yet 16 years of age. I have been supplied with particulars of five cases in which the adoption by married persons of an illegitimate grandchild of theirs has, in the special circumstances of each case, been sanctioned by this court. Similar orders have doubtless been made in county courts and courts of summary jurisdiction. I do not for a moment suggest that orders of that description are outside the scope of the Act. I think, however, that they should be regarded as exceptional and made with great caution. Normally, an adoption presupposes a complete and final separation between the child and its natural parents. The child looks thenceforth to the adopters as its parents, and the natural parents, relinquishing all their parental rights and duties, step, as it were, for ever out of the picture of the child's life. In the present case, on the other hand, the child and its natural parent must inevitably remain in association to a greater or less degree, and it is impossible to exclude the risk of grave psychological strain and emotional disturbance arising therefrom in the future, with consequences to them both which might be serious. The ostensible relationship of sisters between those who are, in fact, mother and child is unnatural, and its creation might sow the seeds of grievous unhappiness for them both, and, indeed, for the adopters themselves. Every case must, however, be judged on its own facts, dealt with on its own merits, and decided on a balance of considerations, and it is sufficient for me to say here that in the present case I have resolved to make the order asked for. Various undertakings on the part of the adopters with regard to the future were offered to me, all with the best intentions, but I prefer not to accept them, because my principal reason for making the order is my belief that I can rely with confidence on the good sense and good judgment of the adopters to handle the situation as it develops with wisdom and discretion. Let them never forget that they owe a continuing and inescapable duty to the young mother as well as to the child who will always be hers, however much my order may purport to make it theirs, and let them reconcile the claims on them with anxious care. If difficulties arise, they can always make the child a ward of court, and the mother, too, so long as she is under age. I am accepting the latter's written consent as sufficient, notwithstanding her youth, in preference to dispensing with it as I have power to do.

I would only repeat that I by no means wish to encourage this type of application, and my decision in this case should be read as expressing my opinion that, while such an order as I am now making is authorised in special circumstances, it ought never to be made as a matter of course. The order will be in the usual form, and I will direct that the child be registered in the names selected by the adopters and as born on the date appearing in the certificate of her birth.

Order accordingly.

WARMAN v. SOUTHERN COUNTIES CAR FINANCE CORPORATION, LTD. (W. J. AMERIS CAR SALES, Third Party).

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Finnemore, J.), March 2, 1949.]

Contract—Warranty—Breach—Damages—Hire-purchase agreement—Seller lacking title—Right to set off against damages reasonable hiring charges.

A In September, 1947, the hirer entered into a hire-purchase agreement with the S.C. Corporation in respect of a motor-car, undertaking to pay £155 as an initial payment and a sum of £9 18s. "rent" each month. After paying the requisite number of instalments the hirer was to have the option of purchasing the car for 1s. In January, February, and March, 1948, the hirer received letters from the L.F. Corporation or their solicitors claiming that the car was their property, and in April, on the day on which he made his final payment to the S.C. Corporation, he was served with a writ by the L.F. Corporation. He had ignored all communications from the L.F. Corporation, and did not inform the S.C. Corporation of the claim made against him. The L.F. Corporation were, in fact, the true owners, the S.C. Corporation having received the car in good faith from another firm, who were themselves ignorant of any defect in their title. The hirer handed over the car to the L.F. Corporation, and now claimed damages from the S.C. Corporation.

HELD : (i) although at the time of making his final payment the hirer was aware that there was doubt whether the S.C. Corporation were the owners, he was entitled to rely on their warranty of ownership because the warranty was given and became effective at the date of the agreement and not when the final payment was made.

(ii) the S.C. Corporation, having failed to carry out the term which was the foundation of the agreement—the sale of the car, were liable for breach of warranty, and, the car not having been theirs to deal with, they were not entitled to any reduction of damages by way of set-off or counterclaim in respect of hiring charges for the period during which the hirer had had the use of the car.

F Case referred to :

ACTION for damages for breach of contract.

G The plaintiff was the hirer of a car from the defendants under a hire-purchase agreement. Unknown to the defendants, who had acquired the car in good faith from third parties—themselves ignorant of any defect in their title—the car was the property of another hire-purchase firm to whom it had to be returned. The defendants contended that, in assessing damages for breach of warranty, an allowance should be made for the reasonable charge of hiring the car during the seven months in which the plaintiff had used it. FINNEMORE, J., held that no such allowance could be made. The facts appear in the judgment.

H Mattar for the plaintiff, the hirer.

Stanley Rees for the defendants.

Kenneth Jones for the third party.

FINNEMORE, J. : In this case Mr. Cyril Ernest Warman, the plaintiff, is suing the defendants, the Southern Counties Car Finance Corporation, Ltd., for damages amounting to £294 17s. 3d. The dispute arises out of a hire-purchase agreement in the usual form which was entered into by the parties on Sept. 13, 1947, concerning a Hillman 10 horse-power saloon car. The car came from a firm called W. J. Ameris Car Sales who are brought in as third parties.

Under the agreement a sum of £155 was paid by the hirer, the plaintiff, as an initial payment to the defendants and the plaintiff agreed to take the vehicle on hire and to pay each month the sum of £9 18s., and when he had paid the requisite number of instalments, he was to pay another 1s. and the car then became his property. Clause 11, provided : A

"It is further agreed that if and when the total rent payable under cll. 1 and 2 hereof shall have been paid to the owners, the hirer shall have the option of purchasing the said vehicle and accessories for the sum of one shilling, but no option shall arise in the case of termination of hiring under cll. 8 or 9 hereof." B

The plaintiff paid the £9 18s. a month until April, 1948, and on Apr. 22, according to the booklet recording the payments, he was credited with a final payment of £58 8s., so that the car then ostensibly became his property. It appears, however, that, in fact, the car was not the property at any time of the defendants. Some time previously it had been the property of another hire-purchase company called the London Finance Corporation. They had hired it to another individual who, without paying any money after the initial deposit, passed it on to the third parties, and so it came to the defendants who had no title to it whatever. There is no question of mala fides in this case. The defendants legitimately believed that they were the owners of the car, and, so believing, they entered into the hire-purchase agreement with the plaintiff. All three parties acted perfectly honestly and properly, and, as in so many of these cases, it is a question which of several innocent parties has to pay for the wrong-doing of somebody else. In May, 1948, the car was handed by the plaintiff to the London Finance Corporation, who, it is common ground, were the true owners of it at all material times. That being the case, the plaintiff says : "I am entitled as damages to the money which I have lost through this transaction. I paid the defendants a considerable sum of money for this car, which has been taken from me, and I want my money back." C
What, in law, he is asking for is damages for the breach of the agreement, and, in particular, for damages for breach of the express warranty, as it must be treated, that the defendants were the owners of the car. D E

Counsel for the defendants has taken every point he possibly could. He says, first, that there was no warranty regarding the title on the sale because the sale took place on Apr. 22, 1948, when the final payment was made, and before that time the plaintiff had cause to believe that there was something wrong with the title. He had had a number of letters, including at least one solicitor's letter, and on the very day on which he sent the money order for the final payment (Apr. 20) he received a writ claiming the car from him. F
It is said, therefore, that he could not then have been relying on any warranty given by the defendants that they were the owners of the car because he either knew, or, at least, was put on grave suspicion, that they were not the owners. G
If the final payment alone constituted the sale, there might be a serious point, but the agreement was made between the parties in September, 1947. There was then an agreement to sell subject to the plaintiff's making certain payments, and he ultimately made those payments. I do not think it would matter if, when there was still some payment to be made before the machinery of the contract was complete, the plaintiff had known positively that the car really belonged to another party. I think he would be entitled to say : "That is nothing to do with me. I made a binding agreement with the defendants in which they gave me this warranty that they were the owners. I am paying them the money which is due to them in order to be able to assert my rights, H and I still rely, as against them, on the agreement of September, 1947." It can be put in another way, and that is that, when the agreement was entered into and an option to purchase was given, as from the moment when the hire-purchase agreement had been signed the plaintiff would have been entitled in law to have paid the whole of the balance at once and had the ownership there and then vested in him. The defendants were clearly unable to give him

A the proper title at any moment from the time of the contract up to Apr. 22 when the final payment was made by him and received by the defendants. It is plain that there was a breach of the agreement which continued throughout and that the title for which the plaintiff had contracted was never given to him and could never have been given to him because it was never the defendants' to transfer. Once he had made his agreement, I do not think
B it matters if he did know positively in April that the title in the car was in somebody else, but I do not think the evidence goes that far. It is hardly necessary to say that the mere fact of receiving a claim from another party, or even of a writ having been issued, does not prove that party's claim to be sound, and that is all there was.

C Counsel for the defendants raised a somewhat similar point when he said that the damage here flowed, not from the breach by the defendants, but from the plaintiff's own conduct—in other words, it is argued that when the plaintiff received these letters from the London Finance Corporation and their solicitors in January, February and March, 1948, he ought at once to have asked the defendants for an explanation. Had he done so, it is suggested, they would have been able to arrange with the London Finance Corporation to pay off the D balance on the other hire-purchase agreement and so save the plaintiff's position. Whether that would have happened or not I do not know, because when that situation did arise as between the defendants and the London Finance Corporation and when that suggestion was made by the defendants to them, they flatly rejected it. Even so, there was no duty that I can see for the plaintiff to have gone to the defendants for an explanation. It might have
E been a sensible thing to do, but there was certainly no call, and certainly no legal responsibility of any kind, on him to do so. He did take legal advice and go to the third parties from whom he had got the car and tell them about it. He also consulted the Automobile Association who advised him at all costs to continue making the payments, and he did so. I cannot see any unreasonable conduct on his part, and I do not think it can be said that any of the damage
F flows from his acts. The damage flowed from the fact that the defendants purported to hire and sell to him something which, although they did not know it, was not theirs to hire or to sell.

The last point is more difficult. The defendants contend that, if they are liable in damages to the plaintiff, an allowance should be made against the amount thereof of a sum equal to a reasonable charge for the hire of the car
G by the plaintiff for the period during which he had possession. In his judgment in Karflex, Ltd. v. Poole (1), GODDARD, J., referred to this very problem but expressed no view. He said ([1933] 2 K.B. 265):

H "I am expressing no opinion as to what might be the position if a person who was not in fact the owner, but who honestly believed he was the owner of property let out on hire-purchase, was faced with a counterclaim by a hirer who had enjoyed the use of the property, we will say, for half the time that the hire-purchase agreement was contemplated to run, to recover all the money he had paid without making some allowance for the use of the chattel. It will be time enough to decide that when the question arises."

A hire-purchase agreement such as this is in law an agreement in two parts. It is an agreement that, for a certain length of time, the hirer shall rent the car. If, during the period or at the end of the period the hirer does not wish to buy the car, he is not bound to do so. On the other hand, the essential part of the agreement is that the hirer has the option to purchase it, and it is common knowledge—and I suppose, commonsense—that when people enter into a hire-purchase agreement they enter into it not only for the purpose of hiring, but also for the purpose of purchasing by what are, in effect, deferred payments. If at any stage the option to purchase goes, the whole value of the agreement to the hirer goes with it. If he wanted to make an agreement merely to hire a car he would make it, but he enters into a hire-purchase agreement because he wishes to have the right to purchase the car. That is the whole basis of the agreement. I should have thought that, if the defendants are unable to carry out the contract, they are not entitled to claim on a sort of quantum meruit by saying: “Although we could not carry out the agreement and could not give you the title to this car, you did have the use of it for six or seven months and you must pay us the hiring charges for those months.” Another way of looking at the matter is that since the car was not at any time the property of the defendants, they cannot call on the plaintiff to pay them money for the hire of it. I should have thought it was plain that, if A purports to hire a car to B and delivers to B a car which belongs, not to himself, but to C—a car to which A had no right whatever in law—and B does not pay the hiring charges, A would have no possible claim for them. It is difficult to see how he would ever frame his case. How could he come into court and say: “I claim money from B arising out of my hiring to him C’s car, to which I have no right.” I cannot conceive that any court would direct B to pay A money for the use of somebody else’s car, and I do not see here how the defendants can claim any money from the plaintiff for the use of someone else’s car. That is what their claim comes to.

I, therefore, take the view that it is not open to the defendants to claim, either by way of set-off or counterclaim, money which is expressed in this hire-purchase agreement to be for the hire of the car for the months during which the plaintiff had the use of the car, it not being the defendants’ car at all. I think that there has been a breach of this agreement and the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages, and those damages amount to the sum of £294 17s. 3d. as claimed by him.

[HIS LORDSHIP then held the third party liable to the defendants on similar grounds.]

BROCK AND OTHERS v. WOLLAMS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), March 16, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—"Member of the tenant's family"—Adopted daughter—De facto adoption—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g) (as amended by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 13, and Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935 (c. 13), s. 1).

In 1912 the defendant, then a child of five, went to live with the tenant of a dwelling-house within the scope of the Rent Restrictions Acts. She was never legally adopted by the tenant and his wife, but she lived with them as their adopted daughter until her marriage in 1939, and she returned to the house in 1942 on her becoming a widow and remained with the tenant in the house until his death in February, 1948. In an action by the landlord for possession of the house, the defendant claimed the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts on the ground that she was a "member of the tenant's family" within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 13, and the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935, s. 1).

HELD: the word "family" in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 was used in the ordinary popular sense of the word and included an adopted child, whether or not there had been a legal adoption, and, therefore, if the deceased tenant was a statutory tenant at the time of his death, the defendant was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

APPEAL by the defendant, the de facto adopted daughter of the deceased tenant, from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES, made at Uxbridge County Court, on Sept. 7, 1948, granting to the plaintiffs, the trustees of the deceased landlord, possession of a dwelling-house subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts. The Court of Appeal now held that a child adopted de facto was a "member of the tenant's family" within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g) (as amended), and, therefore, if the deceased tenant was a statutory tenant at the time of his death, the defendant was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. There being insufficient evidence to show whether the deceased was a contractual or a statutory tenant, the case was remitted to the county court judge for a decision on that point. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Sieve for the adopted daughter of the deceased tenant.

Widgery for the trustees of the deceased landlord.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES given on Sept. 7, 1948, in favour of the plaintiffs, the trustees of David Collett (deceased), who was the landlord of certain premises known as 62, Park Lane, Harefield, in the county of Middlesex. The defendant, Edith Emily Wollams, claims the protection of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), and that she is entitled to remain in possession of the house as a member of the tenant's family. Section 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 [as amended by s. 1 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935] provides :

"The expression 'landlord' also includes in relation to any dwelling-house any person, other than the tenant, who is or would but for this Act be entitled to possession of the dwelling-house, and the expressions 'tenant and tenancy' include sub-tenant and sub-tenancy, and the expression 'let' includes sub-let; and the expression 'tenant' includes the widow of a tenant who was residing with him at the time of his death, or, where a tenant leaves no widow or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court."

Section 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 was amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 13, which provides that s. 12 (1) (g) shall not :

"... apply to any such member unless he was residing with the tenant for not less than six months immediately before the death."

In 1912 the defendant went as a child of five or six years of age to live in this house. At that time Mr. Lofty was the tenant. How long Mr. Lofty had been living there before 1912 we do not know. He was a married man, but we do not know when he was married. The defendant continued to live there with Mr. Lofty and his wife, and was adopted by Mr. Lofty. In 1939 she married a man named Wollams who was an invalid and died three years after the marriage. Mr. Lofty died in February, 1948. It is not quite clear what Mrs. Wollams did after her husband had died, but we were informed by counsel, and I think it must be so having regard to s. 13 of the Act of 1933, that she went back to live with Mr. Lofty. She said in evidence that she was always regarded as his daughter. Mr. Lofty's son, Stanley, who was called as a witness, said that he remembered the defendant coming to live with them and that he always looked on her as a sister. There was no legal adoption. On those facts the learned judge found that the defendant was not a member of the deceased tenant's family.

This matter has not been much considered by the superior courts. There is no decision of the House of Lords or Court of Appeal on the point, and the only other reference to "family," so far as I know, in the Rent Restrictions Acts is in the Act of 1933, s. 3, which provides :

"(1) No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order or give such a judgment, and . . . (b) the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order or judgment takes effect. (3) . . . accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable if it consists . . . (b) of premises to be let as a separate dwelling on terms which will, in the opinion of the court, afford to the tenant security of tenure reasonably equivalent to the security afforded by the principal Acts in the case of a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply, and is, in the opinion of the court, reasonably suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family . . ."

I know of no decision which throws any light on the meaning to be given to the word "family" in that sub-section. All one can say is that that section was passed thirteen years after the Act of 1920, and the same word "family" is used.

The first case which throws some light on this matter is Salter v. Lask (1), where the question was whether the husband of a tenant was a member of the tenant's family. SALTER, J., said ([1925] 1 K.B. 587) :

"In this case, at the time she died, Mrs. Lask was living on the premises with her husband and a child nine years old, and the question is whether the husband comes within the words of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, 'such member of the tenant's family.' In my opinion he does. It may have to be determined some day what limit is to be put on these words 'tenant's family,' whether they are equivalent to 'household' or whether they are limited as meaning blood relations, and in either case what members of the class respectively are indicated. But I am quite satisfied that the husband of a deceased statutory tenant is a member of that tenant's family."

The matter was also considered in the judgment of WRIGHT, J., in Price v. Gould (2). The issue there was whether brothers and sisters of a tenant were to be included in the word "family." WRIGHT, J., said (143 L.T. 334) :

"It has been said in a number of equity cases, relating principally to wills or to settlements under powers of appointment, that the word 'family' is a popular, loose, and flexible expression, and not a technical term. It has been laid down that the primary meaning of the word 'family' is children, but that primary meaning is clearly susceptible of wider interpretation, because the cases decide that the exact scope of the word must depend on the context and the other provisions of the will or deed in view of the surrounding circumstances. Thus, in Snow v. Teed (3) it was held that the word 'family' could be extended beyond not merely children but even beyond the statutory next-of-kin."

WRIGHT, J., went on to say (ibid.) that :

"I hold that in the section now under consideration the word 'family' includes brothers and sisters of the deceased living with her at the time of her death. I think that that meaning is required by the ordinary acceptance of the word in this connection, and that the legislature has used the word 'family' to introduce a flexible and wide term."

The primary meaning of the word "family" is "children." If, however, the word "family" is interpreted in a flexible and wide way, as WRIGHT, J., suggested in Price v. Gould (2), it seems to me that in the ordinary, popular sense of the word the defendant would be considered the child of the man with whom she had lived, except for three years of her married life, ever since she was five years of age. That, I think, is all that there is to be said on the matter, except, perhaps, in regard to the question of the policy which underlies s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. If the policy is similar to that which deals with alternative accommodation and is to protect a member of the family who has been residing with the tenant for six months or more before his death, I think that the defendant clearly comes within the meaning to be given to the word "family." In the course of argument I asked what was to be the position of an illegitimate child of the wife or of the husband who had lived all his life with his father or mother. Surely the Act was intended to cover a case of that kind, and, if so, I cannot see why, giving the word "family" its ordinary, popular meaning, an adopted child should not be included. I think that the question what is the meaning of the word "family" is not entirely one of fact, but must be a question largely of law.

There was, however, a preliminary point with which the learned judge should have dealt, and that was whether Mr. Lofty, at the time of his death, was a contractual tenant or a statutory tenant, because, if he was a contractual tenant, under the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thynne v. Salmon (4), s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 does not apply. On the other hand, the sub-section would apply if he was a statutory tenant. There is no reliable evidence on this matter. I am not prepared to deal with that point on the scanty material we have before us, and, therefore, in my view, the case must go back for the county court judge to decide whether or not this is a case in which the section can be applied, having regard to the rule laid down in Thynne v. Salmon (4). This appeal must be allowed and the case remitted to the county court judge on that point.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the landlords submitted that there were only two possible meanings of the word "family" in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920—the first "relations by blood or marriage" and the second "household," including all living on the premises, relatives, servants and lodgers. He excluded, and, I think, rightly, the second sense. I do not think it can have been the intention of the legislature to protect servants and lodgers, but I am not prepared to hold that the two meanings suggested by counsel for the landlords are exhaustive. I think that there is a third meaning. I respectfully agree with what was said by WRIGHT, J., in Price v. Gould (2) in the passage which my Lord has already read. I think the question the learned county court judge should have asked himself was: Would an ordinary man, addressing his mind to the question whether Mrs. Wollams was a member of the family or not, have answered "Yes" or "No"? To that question I think there is only one possible answer, and that is "Yes." To accept the narrow view put forward by counsel for the landlords would mean excluding children legally adopted under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. I do not think that can be so, and I think that the ordinary man would not distinguish between a legally adopted child and a child adopted de facto in 1912 who lived with her adopted parents until her marriage in 1939 and returned to the house, as her home, in 1942, when she was widowed. Counsel for the landlords suggested it was a question of fact, but I can only say that, in my opinion, if the judge had directed his mind to the proper question, there was only one answer to the question before him and there was no evidence to support the conclusion at which he arrived. If, therefore, the late Mr. Lofty was a statutory tenant, the defendant was entitled to succeed, but it was argued in the court below that Mr. Lofty was a contractual tenant. In view of his conclusion on the point with which I have already dealt, the judge did not find it necessary to decide the second question, and we have, therefore, to make up our minds whether we can say that the evidence is so conclusive that we can reach a conclusion, or whether we must send the matter back for decision. I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed and the matter go back, at the plaintiffs' risk, to the court below that the point which the learned judge left undecided may be dealt with.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree. It seems to me that "members of the tenant's family," within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, include not only legitimate children but also step-children, illegitimate children, and adopted children, whether adopted in due form of law or not. If, therefore, at the time of his death, Mr. Lofty was a statutory tenant, his adopted daughter, Mrs. Wollam would be entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. It is said, however, by the landlords that Mr. Lofty was a contractual tenant and not a statutory tenant, and, therefore, according to the decision in Thynne v. Salmon (4), she cannot claim the protection of the Acts. There is no finding

- by the county court judge on that point, and it must go back to him to make a determination on it. It will depend on whether at some time in the distant past the contractual tenancy was determined by a notice to quit. I think it important to say that the decision in Thynne v. Salmon (4) only applies when it is quite clear that there is a contractual tenancy which has not been determined. Any other view would deprive the members of a tenant's family of
- A a protection which Parliament clearly intended them to have. In many of these cases the original tenancy was created many years ago, and it is often impossible for the present landlord and tenant to say whether, in years past, there has been a notice to quit or a notice of increase which is to be deemed to be a notice to quit. It is well known, however, that in a large number of cases the tenants did become statutory tenants, and, in the absence of any
- B express evidence covering the point, a judge may find a sufficient indication simply from the figure which is being paid for rent. Take the present case. The house has been controlled ever since 1915 when the first Rent Restrictions Act came into force. It was let at a very low rent. The same tenant was in occupation from 1912 until his death. The one indication in the case is that the rent being paid before he died was the sum of 7s. 4½d. That is not a sum
- C which is likely to have been arrived at when the parties were bargaining for a contractual tenancy or even bargaining for a contractual increase. The odd figure of 7s. 4½d. makes it probable that at some time there was a statutory increase, and, as no such increase would have been valid unless there had been a statutory notice of increase in due form, it is to be presumed that such a statutory notice of increase was given, and, once that presumption is made,
- D it follows that there was a statutory tenancy because a statutory notice of increase has the same effect as if there had been a valid notice to quit. That is the sort of indication on which judges may have to act when they deal with these cases years after the original tenancy was created. In this case the judge, on finding that the rent is 7s. 4½d., may infer that there was a notice of increase at some time or another, and, if so, that Mr. Lofty was a statutory tenant and
- E his adopted daughter would be protected by the Acts. I agree with the order proposed by my Lord.

F Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the county court judge on the question whether the deceased tenant was, at the time of his death, a statutory tenant. Defendant to have the costs of the appeal up to the time of the granting of the poor person's certificate, and thereafter costs appropriate to a poor person. Costs of the hearing below to be reserved to the trial judge.

R. v. PADDINGTON AND ST. MARYLEBONE RENT TRIBUNAL.
Ex parte BELL LONDON AND PROVINCIAL PROPERTIES, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Birkett, JJ.).
 March 2, 3, 4, 18, 1949.]

Rent Control—Furnished house—References to tribunal by local authority— A Reference of 555 flats by local authority—Validity of reference—Taking into account by tribunal of matters not discussed at hearing—Powers and duties of tribunals—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 2 (1).

The landlords owned a block of 555 flats, the majority of which were let on short tenancies. At the material time 182 were let furnished, 208 were occupied by statutory tenants under the Rent Restrictions Acts, B 124 were let unfurnished at rents controlled under the said Acts, three were let as business premises, one was vacant, and the remaining 37 were let unfurnished and were not subject to the said Acts. The leases were all in the same form, the landlords covenanting to supply gas and electricity. Certain services and articles were specified in the leases as to be supplied by the landlords, but without any covenant to that effect, and other amenities C not mentioned in the leases were, in fact, supplied. On Feb. 27, 1948, the landlords received notification that an application had been made to a rent tribunal by the local authority under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 2, for consideration of the rents of all the flats. The application had been made by the local authority pursuant to their policy that where two or more reductions of rent had been made D by the tribunal in respect of any property, all other contracts of letting to which the Act applied relating to such property should be referred to the tribunal. Reductions had been made in respect of two of the landlords' flats. On Apr. 20, 1948, the tribunal made orders reducing the rents of eight of the furnished flats. The landlords now moved for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the eight orders made and for an order E prohibiting the tribunal from proceeding with the application in respect of the remaining flats.

HELD: the purpose of the Act of 1946 was to protect tenants and to deal with individual cases where hardship existed; the action of the borough council in referring the whole of the flats to the tribunal when they had not received any complaints from the tenants and had made F no enquiry whether or not all the flats were furnished or the tenants entitled to services rendered by the landlords, and no enquiry whether prima facie any one of the rents charged was unfair, was not a genuine exercise of the power conferred on them by the Act; and the reference was, therefore, wholly vitiated.

In giving their decision in the eight cases in which orders were made, G the tribunal stated that one of the factors which they took into account was that the flats were not up to modern standards because in no flat was the ceiling more than eight feet from the floor. Members of the tribunal had ascertained this fact by personal observation on inspection of the premises, and the point was not mentioned during the hearing.

HELD: even if the reference to the tribunal had not been invalid, the H fact that the landlords had been given no opportunity of dealing with the question whether the flats were up to modern standards was sufficient ground for quashing the order.

Board of Education v. Rice ([1911] A.C. 179; 104 L.T. 689), applied.

Per cur.: "If premises are let furnished or if the landlord has contracted in the case of either furnished or unfurnished premises to supply or render services, the tribunal can only consider whether the rent is fair for that which the landlord has contracted to give. If he breaks his contract, that cannot be used as a ground for reducing the rent because the law does not allow a reduction of rent by way of damages. If, however, the landlord lets premises, but does not contract to give or render any services, the tribunal will have jurisdiction only if the premises are let furnished. If they are, the tribunal, in considering what is a fair rent, must take into account the services and amenities which the landlord, in fact, is supplying and the tenant enjoying, and which there is every reason to suppose will be continued, as obviously a tenant would be willing to pay a higher rent with the amenities and services than without them, and it is just that he should. So, too, if the premises are let furnished or unfurnished, but the landlord contracts to supply certain services and does, in fact, supply, though without obligation to do so, other services and amenities. In either of those cases, if the landlord ceases for whatever reason to continue the supply of all or any of what I may call the non-contractual services, the tribunal can reduce the rent to what would be fair with the contractual services plus such non-contractual services as he may continue to render, because, though the landlord commits no breach of contract, the tenant has a less valuable holding, and one for which a lower rent would be appropriate. In short, the rent ought to be fixed rebus sic stantibus."

MOTION for an order of certiorari by landlords to bring up and quash eight orders made by the respondent rent tribunal on May 5, 1948, under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, whereby they ordered that the rent of eight flats owned by the landlords should be reduced. Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 18. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. Counsel moves on behalf of Bell London and Provincial Properties, Ltd., for an order of certiorari to bring up eight orders made by the Rent Tribunal for Paddington and St. Marylebone on May 5, 1948, under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, whereby they ordered the rents of flats Nos. 29, 77, 92, 136, 189, 207, 614 and 623 Park West, W.2, of which the applicants are the landlords, to be reduced. He also moves for an order prohibiting the tribunal from proceeding with references relating to any other flats at Park West made or purporting to be made by the Paddington Borough Council to the tribunal. The questions raised by these motions are of great public interest and importance, especially to the owners of blocks of flats, and it is satisfactory, therefore, that the case has been fully argued for the tribunal and for the borough council who both opposed the motions.

The facts, which, to say the least, are unusual, are fortunately not in dispute. Park West is a large modern building containing 555 flats. Its situation may be described as at the junction of Kendal Street and Edgware Road not far from the Marble Arch. The majority of the flats are let on short tenancies, and, in fact, the eight in respect of which orders have been made are all let for three months only. To a great many of them the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts apply, so that the rents are controlled. At the material time 182 flats were let furnished, and of the rest 208 were occupied by statutory tenants (that is, by persons holding over at controlled rents under the provisions of the Acts), 124 were let unfurnished at rents controlled under the Acts, three were let as business premises, one was vacant, and the remaining 37 were let unfurnished and were not subject to the Acts. All the leases are in the same form and under them the landlords covenant to supply gas and electricity. The leases set out a variety of services and things which the landlords say they will supply, but subject to their right to withdraw them at any time without notice, so there is no covenant to supply them, and there are a variety of services which are, in fact, supplied, such as lifts, refuse collection and a swimming pool which are not mentioned in the leases. In short, the tenants have the advantages and amenities usually found in blocks of high class flats in the West End of London, with every reason to expect that they will continue to enjoy them during the occupancy though the landlords do not bind themselves to supply them. As a matter of business and common sense the landlords will, of course, do their best to give these services, knowing full well that, if they do not, their chance of letting at remunerative rents would be greatly imperilled.

It is worth noticing here that since it has been decided both in this court and the Court of Appeal in R. v. Paddington and St. Marylebone Rent Tribunal, Ex p. Bedrock Investments, Ltd. (1) that these tribunals cannot reduce rents below the standard rents and as vacancies and business premises are not within the Act of 1946, there would seem to be no conceivable purpose or good reason for referring 336 of these flats to the tribunal. However, although in February, 1948, the landlords seem to have been on the best of terms with their tenants' on Feb. 27 they received from the tribunal forms, known as F.R.4, in respect of each flat in the block, notifying them that an application had been made to them by the local authority to consider the rent of flat number so and so, and each notice was accompanied by Form F.R.4A requiring the lessor under severe penalties to give the information specified in the form. At the same time there were served on each of the tenants two forms addressed to them, not by name, but as the occupier of such and such a flat. We need not describe or particularise them, for the tenants for whose assistance and protection these forms were presumably served—and, no doubt, under the regulations they were quite properly served by the tribunal—one and all just ignored them. So 2,220 forms were sent out and the expenditure on paper and postage, to say nothing of the clerical labour involved, must have been quite considerable.

How then did this all come about? It seems that in the summer of the previous year two tenants of flats at Park West had referred their agreements to the tribunal and obtained a reduction of rent. On what grounds the tribunal acted in those cases we were not informed. Those applications seem to have escaped the recollection of the manager of the flats, as he said in his affidavit that no tenant had ever complained of his rent, but of the merits or grounds on which reductions were granted we know nothing. For present purposes they are, doubtless, immaterial, but we now learn from the affidavit of the chairwoman of the public health committee of the borough council, to which the council had delegated their powers under the Act, that on Dec. 3, 1947, and again on Jan. 14, 1948, the committee decided as a matter of policy that in the case of any property in respect of which two or more reductions of rent had been made either before or after Dec. 3, 1947, by the tribunal, all other contracts of letting to which the Act applied (mark those last five words) relating to such property should be referred to the tribunal. Accordingly, they instructed the town clerk to refer by a single reference all the contracts in Park West to which the Act applied. It is only fair to the town clerk to say that we were informed by counsel that he advised that a single reference was bad. He has filed no affidavit and all we know is that on Feb. 3, by a notice known as F.R.1, a reference was made to the tribunal. It is in these terms: "I hereby apply to the tribunal to fix the rent payable for the premises described below." Then the form provides a space for the address of premises, stating whether the premises consist of the whole or only part of a house, and the address given is simply "Park West, W.2." A second space is for the insertion of the name of the person to whom the premises are let. This is filled in as follows:

"All contracts of tenancy within the above-mentioned property to which the F.H. (R.C.) Act, 1946 applies, other than those contracts previously referred to the tribunal (scheduled over-leaf)."

The schedule contains the numbers of two flats, 457 and 359, which are the two that we have already mentioned as having been previously referred. The applicants' name and address is given as that of the person by whom the premises are let, and the fourth space on the form is for the purpose of stating whether the premises are let with (a) use of furniture and (b) services. No answer was given to that requirement.

It was in consequence of that so-called reference that the first 2,220 forms were sent out. We may here state that neither the counsel for the tribunal nor counsel for the borough council contended that that reference was good. Counsel for the tribunal said that he did not attempt to support it because it did not give the names of the lessees as the regulations which prescribed this form required. That is an exceedingly narrow ground, and, as will be found from the judgment of this court, in their opinion, far more serious grounds exist for impugning the validity of that reference. The next thing that happened was that, apparently because the town clerk's opinion prevailed, though here again the matter has not been explained, the borough council proceeded to make individual references of each flat. Form F.R.1 was sent to the tribunal in 302 cases, though whether they were all sent in on the same day we do not know, nor does it matter. On Mar. 22 the tribunal sent to the landlords 46 letters saying: "I am directed by the tribunal to request you to return the enclosed form F.R.4A, duly filled in and completed by Apr. 5, 1948," so 46 more forms, F.R.4A, were sent, and thereafter batches of 86, 84 and 89 were sent in, all dealing with different individual flats, making a total of 305 and as, apparently, two notices were sent to each tenant, something like 1,200 more documents of one sort or another were served either on the landlords or on the tenants. In the references which were sent to the clerk to the tribunal the forms were now filled in so as to give a number to each flat as the address, a lessee's name was filled in, and in the space where the person applying to the tribunal has to state whether the premises are let with use of furniture and/or services, the answer "Yes" is given both as to furniture and as to services. We have not seen, naturally enough, all these forms of reference, but counsel for the borough council told us that they were all in exactly the same form. Where the town clerk got the names of the occupants of the flats we do not know. Except for the affidavit from the chairwoman of the public health committee, which informed the court of the policy adopted by the council to which we have already referred, the council have not thought fit to file any evidence. What does appear, however, is that in many cases the names of the lessees of the flats are wrongly given, in some cases former lessees are mentioned, in others lessees are shown as occupying flats which were at the time, in fact, vacant. All flats are shown as furnished, irrespective of whether they were let with furniture or not, and most were not.

It is, therefore, perfectly clear that no sort of inquiry or investigation could have been made by the borough council before referring all these flats to the tribunal. It is certainly regrettable that documents of this nature, which institute proceedings and must put landlords to great trouble and considerable expense, should be prepared in this way without any real regard to the accuracy of the information sent to the tribunal. It is clear, indeed, that this purported reference of individual flats was in substance nothing more than the block reference made in February, though it might, we suppose, be described as an endeavour to comply with the letter of the Act while letting the spirit take care of itself. It is, however, right to say that, these references having been made, it is difficult to see that the tribunal could have done anything except act on them, though at the risk of serious depletion of their stock of forms. We do not propose to deal in detail with the correspondence which took place between the landlords and the tribunal beyond saying that we think it was regrettable that the tribunal never let them see the block reference in the first place nor do we understand what reason there was for the refusal.

To complete the history, on Apr. 20 the tribunal considered the eight cases in which orders were made, and in each case those flats were furnished. It has been contended before us that there can be no ground for a certiorari in respect of those flats, at least on the ground that there was no proper reference. It is said that there were here flats which clearly came within the Act, and, therefore, that the tribunal had not only jurisdiction, but were, indeed, bound to hear the cases in relation to them. In our opinion, however, if there was no proper reference the proceedings were bad ab initio, and, although it may well be that the tribunal did not know that the proceedings were bad, if they were they had no jurisdiction to adjudicate. The first question we have, therefore, to consider is whether or not there ever was a valid reference in any of these cases.

The material section of the Act is s. 2 (1) and (2). Omitting words which are immaterial for the purpose of this case, sub-s. (1) provides :

"Where a contract has . . . been entered into whereby one person . . . grants to another person . . . the right to occupy as a residence a house or part of a house . . . in consideration of a rent which includes payment for the use of furniture or for services . . . it shall be lawful for either party to the contract or for the local authority to refer the contract to the tribunal for the district, and where any such contract (hereinafter referred to as 'a contract to which this Act applies') is so referred to the tribunal, they may by a notice in writing served on the lessor require him to give to them, within such period . . . as may be specified in the notice, such information as they may reasonably require regarding such of the prescribed particulars relating to the contract as are specified in the notice."

Sub-section (2) provides :

A "Where any contract to which this Act applies is referred to a tribunal . . . the tribunal shall consider it and, after making such inquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party . . . an opportunity of being heard, or, in his option, of submitting representations in writing, shall approve the rent payable under the contract or reduce it to such sum as they may, in all the circumstances, think reasonable, or may, if they think fit in all the circumstances, dismiss the reference, and shall notify the parties and the local authority of their decision in each case."

B Other sections of the Act provide for the local authority keeping a register of the tribunal's decisions, and by s. 4 it is made unlawful to require or receive payment of any sum in excess of the rent entered in the register, and, in addition, it is provided that any excess may be recovered. A person who requires or receives any payment in contravention of the section is liable to
C a fine not exceeding £100 and imprisonment for a period not exceeding six months.

In considering whether there has been a valid reference by the local authority, it is necessary, in our opinion, to consider whether on the facts of this case there has been a valid and bona fide exercise of the powers conferred by Parliament on them. That the court can interfere with the exercise of powers
D by local authorities is not, we think, open to doubt. In Biddulph v. St. George's, Hanover Square (2), TURNER, L.J., said (3 De G. J. & Sm. 502) :

" . . . I am far from thinking that this court has not power to interfere with public bodies in the exercise of powers which are conferred on them by Act of Parliament. I take it that it would be within the power and the duty of this court so to interfere in cases where there is not a E bona fide exercise of the powers given by Parliament ; and I should be very sorry to be supposed to entertain the notion that public bodies, under the general powers given to them by Act of Parliament, can do whatever they think right."

The question also incidentally arose in Dormer v. Newcastle-upon-Tyne Corpn. (3).
F In that case under a local Act the corporation were authorised to place and maintain in any street any posts, rails, or other fence for the protection of passengers and traffic. The Court of Appeal held that there had been a perfectly proper use of the corporation's powers, but, in dealing with an argument which was advanced that, unless some limitation were put on their powers, the corporation could erect a high close-boarded fence in front of G private premises, I said ([1940] 2 All E.R. 527) :

" . . . if, in the exercise, or purported exercise, of that power, the corporation put up a close-boarded fence ten or twelve feet high along the edge of the path, it might very well be that the frontagers . . . could say : 'This is not the sort of thing which Parliament ever intended that you should have the right to do. It is not an exercise of the powers which H have been given to you, because, while you are purporting to exercise that power, in fact you are doing something entirely different '."

Now we approach the consideration of this Act bearing in mind the words of LINDLEY, M.R., in Thomson v. Lord Clanmorris (4) where he said ([1900] 1 Ch. 725) :

" . . . in construing any . . . enactment, regard must be had not only to the words used, but to the history of the Act, and the reasons which led to its being passed. You must look at the mischief which had to be cured as well as at the cure provided."

The object of this Act is well known. It is to protect tenants who, at a time when accommodation was and is exceedingly difficult to obtain, were and are exposed to the risk of being charged exorbitant rents, but it is an Act designed for the protection of the tenants and not for the penalising of landlords. It was passed at a time when the housing position was such that there was often no real freedom of contract between landlord and tenant and the latter had to pay what was demanded. No doubt, it was for this reason that Parliament did not confine the Act only to lettings below a certain rent. At the same time it does not follow that all landlords are rapacious, or that all rents are, at a time when demand exceeds supply, necessarily unreasonable. No doubt, the reason why it was provided that cases might be referred by a local authority was because it was recognised that there might be tenants who would hesitate themselves to refer the case for fear of the consequences that might befall them, but it could never have been intended that local authorities could refer cases respecting which they had neither received complaint from the tenant nor had made any inquiry whether there was a prima facie case or anything to indicate that there was any unfairness in the rent charged. The borough council in question have decided as a matter of policy that in the case of any property in respect of which two or more reductions in rent had been made, all the contracts of letting to which the Act applied relating to such property should be referred to the tribunal. This may be a perfectly proper course to take in respect of certain cases, as, for instance, one or two houses in the same ownership all of which are let out in separate tenements to poor or working class persons, but to apply this policy to 555 flats without any inquiry, or, indeed, knowledge, whether the Act applies or not is an entirely different matter. If any such wholesale reference could be regarded as a legitimate exercise of their powers, it follows that the borough council could refer the whole of the tenancies in the borough of Paddington to the tribunal, and that whether there had been any previous reduction or not.

It was never intended that this Act should provide for general rent fixing throughout a district. The purpose is to deal with individual cases where hardship exists or may be reasonably supposed to exist. The result of the action of the borough council in this case is that a great number of tenancies have been referred regardless of whether the premises are furnished or unfurnished and without making any inquiry whether they are or not, regardless of whether any relief could be obtained by reason of the application of the Rent Restrictions Acts to the flats, regardless of whether the premises are occupied as dwelling-houses or business premises, and regardless also of the wishes of the tenants which surely ought, at least, to be taken into account. It is one thing for a local authority to act for the protection of tenants who may be unable to take care of themselves, but it is quite another thing for them to act in the case of those who may be presumed to be capable and competent to act in their own interest and who may have the greatest dislike for any interference with their contract of tenancy. It is worth noticing in this connection that the result of a reduction is that it would not only be a criminal offence for the landlord to receive rent at the unreduced figure, but it would equally be an offence for the tenant to pay it as he would thereby be aiding and abetting an offence, and, if he offered it, he would be guilty of inciting the landlord to commit an offence, and yet there must be many tenants who, having found a flat that suits them and having agreed to pay what they regard as a reasonable rent, would resent being told that they were no longer entitled honourably to carry out obligations into which they have deliberately entered and which they have neither the desire nor the intention of evading.

In our opinion, the action of the borough council in referring the whole of these flats in the manner they have done is not a genuine exercise of the powers conferred on them by the Act, and we cannot refrain from saying that it is regrettable that in the form of reference information purports to be given to the tribunal which is quite inaccurate and has been given without the slightest attempt to see that it was accurate. We refer more particularly to the statement on all the forms that the flats were furnished when it now appears that the great majority were not, and we call particular attention to the fact that no evidence has been filed by the borough council to offer any explanation of this. In our opinion, these considerations vitiate the whole reference, and the fact that the tribunal picked out eight flats which do happen to have been furnished does not turn an invalid reference into one which is valid. No more attempt had been made by the council to consider whether there was any ground for referring those cases than in any other. The proceedings at the hearing were truly remarkable. The council called no evidence. They did not put forward a single argument. Their representative merely informed the tribunal that, as there had been two previous references by tenants, the council had commenced referring the remainder of the contracts of tenancy to the tribunal. When witnesses were called by the landlords not a single question in cross-examination was addressed to them. We have not been informed of any facts relating to the two previous cases in which reference was made or the grounds on which the tribunal granted a reduction. It may very well be that they acted on the same view of the Act as that on which they acted in the cases now before the court and which, in the opinion of this court, is erroneous. However that may be, we cannot agree that in the circumstances of this case the mere fact that two tenants had of their own motion complained and obtained some relief is any justification for this wholesale reference by the council.

That is really enough to dispose of this case, but there are other grounds on which it is said that certiorari should be granted. It appears that before the tribunal entered on the hearing there was an inspection of the flats by the members. In giving their decision the tribunal said :

" In fixing the rents of the various flats it is not out of place to point out that these flats are not up to modern standards. In no single flat is the ceiling more than eight feet from the floor. This is less than is required by present day standards."

It appears from the affidavit of the chairman of the tribunal that during the course of the inspection they had some conversation with a Mr. Marshall, described as the manager of Park West, and another member of the staff, and that one or other of them, it is not clear which, agreed that the height of the ceiling, which was measured, was less than that required by present day standards. It is no part of the duty of this court to review a finding of fact by the tribunal, though it is certainly remarkable that it should be found that flats of this description, erected, as we were informed, very shortly before the late war, the plans of which must have been passed and approved by the London County Council, do not conform to present day standards when it is notorious that the building of this class of flats has not been allowed since the war, but not a word was said by anybody during the hearing, or at any time before the decision was given, as to this being a ground for reduction of rent. In fact, it took the advisers of the landlords entirely by surprise, and surely in common fairness, if this was to be considered by the tribunal, they ought to have given the applicants some opportunity of dealing with it. That this could ever have been in the minds of the borough council in referring these matters it is impossible to suppose and, as we have already said, not a single word was said by the representative of the borough council as to any of the grounds on which the tribunal was invited to act. In our opinion, to take into account a matter of this kind, of which no sort of intimation had been given to the landlords, brings this case exactly within the decision of the House of Lords in Board of Education v. Rice (5), the judgments in which are so well known that we need not set them out. On that ground alone we think that the eight determinations in this case, even if the references were unobjectionable, would have to be quashed.

Other grounds were put forward by counsel for the applicants, among them that, as the tribunal had given a reasoned decision, he could attack the orders on the ground that they were bad on their face. We do not think it necessary to give any decision on this point, which would involve the consideration of a large number of cases, and any opinion we might express on it might, in view of the matters with which we have already dealt, be said to be obiter, though, of course, if this case should go higher the point will remain open and can be taken in another court. A B

In giving the decision of the tribunal, the chairman said that before recent judgments of this court it had been their practice to take into account in their calculations the value of the services actually provided by the landlord. After quoting passages from my judgment in R. v. Hampstead and St. Pancras Furnished Houses Rent Tribunal, Ex p. Ascot Lodge, Ltd. (6) and from the judgments of myself and ATKINSON, J., in R. v. Paddington and St. Marylebone Rent Tribunal, Ex p. Bedrock Investments, Ltd. (2), he said that, in consequence of those judgments, they were unable to allow for the other services as they would wish to do. With all respect we think the tribunal has misunderstood what was said. I thought I had made myself clear and can only be sorry if I did not. In the first place, it must be remembered that both those cases were dealing with what was necessary to give the tribunals jurisdiction to hear the cases, and, in my opinion, the dictum of ATKINSON, J., in the Bedrock case (1), on which reliance was placed, dealt only with this matter. It was laid down that an unfurnished flat did not come within the jurisdiction of the tribunal by reason of the landlord rendering services in fact unless the lease contracted or covenanted to give them. When I went on to express an opinion for the guidance of the tribunal, I pointed out that, if a landlord had contracted to give certain services and had broken his agreement, the tribunal could not reduce the rent on that account because the tenant's remedy was then to obtain damages and the law does not permit a reduction of rent by way of damages. I repeated this in the Bedrock case (1) and said further that the tribunal could not reduce the rent, and, of course, I meant one that was otherwise fair, because the lease did not provide for something that in the negotiations the landlord had said he intended to provide. In other words, the tribunal could not act as a court of rectification. D E F

As counsel for the tribunal invited us to express an opinion as to the true interpretation of the Act for the guidance of tribunals, let me again endeavour, with the concurrence of the other members of the court, to make this matter clear. In our opinion, if premises are let furnished or if the landlord has contracted in the case of either furnished or unfurnished premises to supply or render services, the tribunal can only consider whether the rent is fair for that which the landlord has contracted to give. If he breaks his contract, that cannot be used as a ground for reducing the rent because the law does not allow a reduction of rent by way of damages. If, however, the landlord lets premises, but does not contract to give or render any services, the tribunal will have jurisdiction only if the premises are let furnished. If they are, the tribunal, in considering what is a fair rent, must take into account the services and amenities which the landlord, in fact, is supplying and the tenant enjoying and which there is every reason to suppose will be continued, as obviously a tenant would be willing to pay a higher rent with the amenities and services than without them, and it is just that he should. So, too, if the premises are G H let furnished or unfurnished, but the landlord contracts to supply certain services and does, in fact, supply, though without obligation to do so, other services and amenities. In either of those cases, if the landlord ceases for whatever reason to continue the supply of all or any of what I may call the non-contractual services, the tribunal can reduce the rent to what would be fair with the contractual services plus such non-contractual services as he may continue to render, because, though the landlord commits no breach of contract, the tenant has a less valuable holding, and one for which a lower rent would be appropriate. In short, the rent ought to be fixed rebus sic stantibus.

The result is that an order of certiorari will issue to bring up and quash the determination of the tribunal in respect of the eight flats above mentioned, and an order will issue prohibiting the tribunal from proceeding to inquire into the remainder of the 302 flats at Park West referred to them by the borough council. The borough council will pay the costs of these proceedings.

Order accordingly.

D SEBEL PRODUCTS, LTD. v. COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 9, 16, 1949.]

Purchase Tax—Money paid under mistake of law—Payment while liability subsists.

In an action in the Chancery Division the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that one of the products of their manufacture was exempt from purchase tax, but on May 11, 1948, while the action was pending, they paid to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise the amount of tax which would be due if they were held liable. On July 2, 1948, VAISEY, J., decided the claim in the plaintiffs' favour and they were given liberty to apply for an account of the tax paid by them. In an application made under the liberty to apply the plaintiffs asked for an account of tax paid by them and the refund of the amount found due, but the commissioners resisted the application on the ground that the sums paid by the plaintiffs had been paid voluntarily under a mistake of law, and, were, therefore, irrecoverable.

HELD: (i) in view of the provisions of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 21 (1), the commissioners in an appropriate case were entitled to refuse to refund money paid to them voluntarily under a mistake of law, but

(ii) on the facts of the present case, the intention of the plaintiffs when paying the money and of the commissioners when receiving it was that it should be refunded if the plaintiffs were successful in the pending action, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to repayment.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the defendants, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, who had received payment of money as purchase tax at a time when the taxpayers' liability to pay the tax was sub judice, they subsequently being held not chargeable to the tax, were entitled to retain the money as having been paid voluntarily under a mistake of law. VAISEY, J., held that the defendants were not so entitled and ordered them to repay the money. The facts appear in the judgment.

Mar. 16. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that one of the products of their manufacture, known as a "Mobo Rocker Swing," was not liable to purchase tax on the ground that it was a "swing" within the meaning of that word as used in the exempting provision of the Finance Act, 1947, sched. V. The defendants, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, disputed the claim, and contended that the tax was leviable. The claim was decided by me on July 2, 1948, and by an order of that date I made the appropriate declaration in the plaintiffs' favour, ordered the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs their costs, and gave liberty to the plaintiffs to apply for an account of the purchase tax already paid by them or otherwise as they might be advised. The plaintiffs, by a summons dated Nov. 12, 1948, now ask, under the liberty to apply, for an account of the purchase tax which they have paid, although they were not liable to pay it, to the defendants in respect of their Mobo Rocker Swings; for payment or repayment of the amount found due; and for the costs of the application. The defendants seek to resist these claims on the ground that the amount of the tax was paid by the plaintiffs voluntarily under a mistake of law, and is, therefore, according to well settled principles, irrecoverable.

When the question of the liability of these articles to purchase tax was, in and after December, 1947, under friendly discussion between the respective representatives of the parties, it was at first suggested that the matter should be tested by the plaintiffs withholding the tax and the defendants suing them for the recovery of it. A second proposal was that one sale should be made without charging or accounting for the tax, and that proceedings should be brought in respect of that one sale. There were obvious objections to both these courses, and the present action was instituted, and it followed the course and resulted in the conclusion already described. On May 11, 1948, incautiously, and to some extent inexplicably, the plaintiffs paid to the defendants the amount of the purchase tax which would (if the plaintiffs' claim in the action had failed) have been owing to the defendants in respect of the purchase tax on a number of Mobo Rocker Swings, the exact amount so paid being £1,919 5s. 5d. Some of those Rocker Swings had been sold at prices which included the tax to members of the public who cannot be traced, and the plaintiffs now claim to recover only so much of the £1,919 5s. 5d. as is attributable to the rest of the Rocker Swings, which either have been or will be sold at prices exclusive of purchase tax. The figure has been agreed, so that, if the plaintiffs are entitled to relief on this application there need be no account, but only an order for the payment or repayment of the agreed sum.

The chairman of the plaintiffs' board of directors has sworn an affidavit that his own clear understanding was that the money paid (on a date after the action had been set down for trial) would be refunded or accounted for by the defendants in the event (which happened) of the decision in the action being in the plaintiffs' favour, and of his own belief, first, that the defendants' representative, a Mr. Barnett, shared that understanding, and also, secondly, that Mr. Barnett was entitled to agree to such an arrangement so as to bind the defendants. Mr. Barnett is on the staff of the solicitor for the defendants, and the extent of his authority in the matter is unknown to me and may be somewhat difficult to define. He also has sworn an affidavit disclaiming the understanding attributed to him and denying that, so far as he himself is concerned, any agreement for the repayment of the money was ever made.

It is not as a rule easy to find the person who in a government department is he whose authority enables him to bind that department as party to an agreement or to waive on behalf of that department any of its legal rights.

In the present case I cannot find that there was here any express agreement in the matter, even assuming that Mr. Barnett had power to make one. The question here must, in my judgment, be put from a somewhat different angle, and I ask myself, first, with what intention the plaintiffs paid the money, and, secondly, with what intention the defendants received it? If the intention was the same on both sides, the result, in my judgment, was that an agreement was made between the parties by implication. The intention of the plaintiffs was, to my mind, clear. They expected to recover the money if they won their action. What was the intention of the defendants? It is irrelevant to speculate on what, if anything, was in the mind of the clerk or other subordinate officer who actually received the money or in the mind of the officer who paid it into the bank to the defendants' credit, and I must assume the existence of some person in the defendants' employment who accepted and appropriated the money with a full knowledge of all the facts, particularly the discussion which had preceded the institution of the action and the pending of the action itself, who knew and realised that the right of the defendants to receive the money was at the moment sub judice, and, indeed, on the point of coming before this court for decision. What would that hypothetical person have thought about it? In my judgment, he would inevitably have come to the conclusion, as a matter of necessary inference, that the plaintiffs were paying and the defendants accepting the money subject to repayment if the action resulted in the plaintiffs' favour. If, however, he had entertained any doubt on the matter, I feel sure that he would as a matter of courtesy have refused to accept the money until the position had been made clear to him. What is, to my mind, incredible, is that he could ever have supposed that the money was being either paid by the plaintiffs or received by the defendants on the footing that the defendants were to keep it in any event. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the intentions of the plaintiffs and the defendants were identical. In other words, I find that there was an agreement.

An alternative short answer to the problem might be that the plaintiffs cannot possibly be said to have been under a mistake as to the law at a time when they were in the very act of asking the court to tell them what the law was. I need not, however, enlarge on this point.

By the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 21 (1), the defendants are placed in the same position as the ordinary subjects of the Crown and I see no reason why they should not in appropriate cases refuse to refund money paid to them voluntarily under a mistake of law as the revenue authorities were held to be entitled to do in the case of William Whiteley, Ltd. v. R. (1) and National Pari-Mutuel Asscn., Ltd. v. R. (2). At the same time I cannot help feeling that the defence is one which ought to be used with great discretion, and that for two reasons. First, because the defendants, being an emanation of the Crown, which is the source and fountain of justice, are, in my opinion, bound to maintain the highest standards of probity and fair dealing comparable with those which the courts, which derive their authority from the same source and fountain, impose on the officers under their control: see Re Tyler (3). Secondly, because the taxpayer, who is too often tempted to evade his liability and to keep in his own pocket money which he ought to have paid to the revenue, will find too ready an excuse in the plea that the revenue authorities will, if they can, keep in their coffers, if they can get it there, money which the taxpayer was under no obligation to pay to them and they had no right to demand. Although such an excuse would have no validity in either a court of law or in the forum of the taxpayer's own conscience, I think that, in the public interest, grounds for proffering it should, so far as possible, be avoided. While the defendants' resistance to the plaintiffs' claim in the present case has obliged me to make these general observations, I do not forget or overlook the policy of courteous consideration adopted, as a rule, by government departments in their dealings with members of the public, so that any deviation or apparent deviation from it is rightly regarded as exceptional. I order the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the agreed sum without interest, and also their costs of this application.

Order accordingly.

Will—"Children"—Inclusion of adopted children—Adoptive mother incapable of bearing children—Adoption of Children Act, 1926 (c. 29), s. 5 (2).

On Oct. 31, 1939, a testator made a will in American form disposing of his assets in the United States of America and directing his American trustee after the death of M. to pay over the whole of his trust estate to his "daughter H. if living and if not then in equal shares to her child P. and any other child or children of my said daughter her surviving who would be entitled to share in her estate had she died intestate a resident of the State of New York and possessed of personal property." On June 8, 1942, the testator made a will in English form by which he devised and bequeathed his residuary English estate to his trustee on trust for his daughter H. "absolutely if she be living at my death but if she be then dead then and in that event for all and every the children or child (if only one) of my said daughter living at my death who being sons or a son have attained or shall attain the age of 21 years or being daughters or a daughter have attained or shall attain that age or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common." By cl. 5 of the English will he declared that his will should "be read in conjunction with and not as in any way overriding or revoking (except and in so far as may be necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the directions concerning the disposition of my English will as herein contained) the will already executed by me to deal with my estate and assets in the United States of America . . ." H., who was domiciled in the United States, was living at the date of the English will, but she predeceased the testator. At all material times she was incapable of bearing a child, a fact known to the testator, but in June, 1938, she had adopted the boy, P., and in March, 1942, she had adopted a girl, I. On the question whether P. and I. were "children" of H. for the purposes of the distribution of the testator's estate:—

HELD : it was proper to apply the principles applicable in the case of illegitimate children ; the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, s. 5 (2) (which provides that, unless the contrary intention appears, the words " child " and " children," where used in any disposition, shall not apply to an adopted child) did not operate to exclude in the present case evidence which would be admissible in the case of an illegitimate child ; it was impossible in the circumstances, which were fully known to the testator, that any legitimate children could take under the bequest ; and, therefore, P. and I. were entitled.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a bequest to the children of the testator's daughter included adopted children. At all material times there was, to the knowledge of the testator, no possibility of the daughter bearing a child. ROXBURGH, J., held that adopted children were included. The facts appear in the judgment.

Maurice Berkeley for the fifth defendant, a daughter of the testator.

ROXBURGH, J. : The testator, Peter Fletcher, died on Mar. 17, 1943, and it is uncertain whether his domicile at the date of his death was English, American or Scots. He made two wills, one in American form on Oct. 31, 1939, and an English will with a codicil, the will bearing date Jan. 8, 1942, and the codicil bearing date June 8, 1942. An unusual difficulty occurs in the case because of the uncertainty regarding domicile, but, for reasons which will emerge in due course, I think that it may be possible to surmount those difficulties without determining what would be a difficult question, involving expensive evidence, namely, what was the domicile of the testator.

By his English will he devised and bequeathed his residuary English estate unto the plaintiff bank on trust to make certain payments thereout and, subject thereto, to stand possessed of his residuary English estate in trust for his daughter, Harriet Fletcher Ewing, of 615, Palisade Avenue, Yonkers, New York, America :

" . . . absolutely if she be living at my death but if she be then dead then and in that event for all and every the children or child (if only one) of my said daughter living at my death who being sons or a son have attained or shall attain the age of 21 years or being daughters or a daughter have attained or shall attain that age or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares as tenants in common."

The daughter was living at the date of the English will, but predeceased the testator. By cl. 5 the testator declared that his will should :

" . . . be read in conjunction with and not as in any way overriding or revoking (except and in so far as may be necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the directions concerning the disposition of my English will as herein contained) the will already executed by me to deal with my estate and assets in the United States of America as hereinbefore mentioned."

As the testator has declared that his will should be read in conjunction with the American will, I am bound to look at that will, which has been admitted to probate here as incorporated by reference into the English will, but I must pay careful attention to the wording of the exception which I have read. The American will contains a direction to the American trustee, after the death of Marion Ryan Fletcher, to pay over the whole of the capital of the trust estate as it may then exist to the testator's

"... daughter Harriet Fletcher Ewing if living and if not then in equal shares to her child Peter Fletcher Ewing and any other child or children of my said daughter her surviving who would be entitled to share in her estate had she died intestate a resident of the State of New York and possessed of personal property."

Harriet Fletcher Ewing was domiciled in the State of New York at all material times. She was married, but there is evidence which shows plainly that she was at all material times incapable of bearing a child and that she and her husband and the testator knew that. The evidence of the testator's frame of mind relates mainly to a period prior to 1939, when he left the United States for England, and counsel for the fifth defendant has submitted that, though the testator well knew in 1939 that Mrs. Ewing was incapable of bearing a child, he may have thought differently between then and the date of his English will, Jan. 8, 1942. That is a most improbable state of affairs, because nothing had happened in the meanwhile which could possibly have improved Mrs. Ewing's prospects of bearing a child. I go further and hold that the correspondence which passed between the testator and his family during the period when he was in England and up to and past the date of the will, and has been exhibited, while containing no passage which could be said to show in terms that he has not changed his mind about the capacity of his daughter, appears plainly to be written on the implied hypothesis that the state of affairs relating to the incapacity of his daughter was constant, unchanged and unchangeable.

So clearly had Mrs. Ewing realised her own incapacity, after much medical treatment, that she adopted two children. The order of adoption in the case of the boy, Peter, was dated June 28, 1938, and the order in the case of the girl, Irene, was dated Mar. 14, 1942. It will be observed that the adoption of the boy took place before the date of the American will, and, therefore, a fortiori before the date of the English will. The adoption of the girl was subsequent to both the American and the English wills, but she had been de facto adopted before the date of the English will. Both children were de facto adopted some time before the formal orders for adoption were made. These orders were made by the competent court having jurisdiction according to the law of Mrs. Ewing's domicile. Throughout the correspondence the testator refers to Peter as the child of Mrs. Ewing, to Irene as the sister of Peter and as a child of Mrs. Ewing, and to himself as grandfather of the two children. In a letter of Nov. 15, 1940, he writes to Mr. Ewing, the daughter's husband, in these terms:

"Now regarding the disposition of the 700 dollars. I remember that when little Peter arrived on the scene I opened a bank account for him in the sum of 1,000 dollars. I do not remember, however, whether I did the same thing for little Irene when she turned up. If I did not open a bank account for her upon her arrival, then I would like you to take these 700 dollars, add another 300 dollars, making a sum of 1,000 dollars, and open a bank account for the little girl, you and Kiltie [his daughter] taking the joint responsibility of the sum until she comes of age."

In those circumstances and in the present state of the evidence I have to construe this English will on the footing that the testator was domiciled in England. I will give my reasons later why I think that it is sufficient for present purposes to construe it only on this footing. There is no doubt (and I start with this as a fundamental proposition) that "children" in an English will prima facie means legitimate children and does not include either illegitimate or adopted children. That being so, counsel for the two adopted children, has adumbrated three arguments. The first was that the relationship of parent and child is one of status; that the status of the adopted children, according to the law of the State of New York, was the same for all purposes as that of a legitimate child; that I ought to apply the law of the domicile in a matter of status; and that, accordingly, there should be no question but that I should treat these children as though they were lawful children. I have not called on counsel to develop that argument, because it became unnecessary to do so and I only mention it to show that it is still open to him if he requires to make use of it elsewhere. His second and third points counsel argued fully. His second point was that I must read the English will in conjunction with the American will. Certainly I must, because I am directed so to do. There is no doubt that, if I do that, I should be bound to say that this testator provided his own dictionary and that he clearly uses the word "child" to include an adopted child, but counsel for the fifth defendant has forcibly contended that, if I apply that process, I am violating the directions given to me by cl. 5 because I shall be altering the directions concerning the disposition of the testator's English estate by diverting in favour of adopted children property which would otherwise have gone to legitimate children only, and, in default of legitimate children, as on an intestacy. There is a good deal of force in that submission, so much so that I prefer to leave that point undecided and decide the case on the last ground which was submitted by counsel for the adopted children.

To do that, although this case concerns, not illegitimate but adopted, children, I must refer to the case of illegitimate children because, while several decisions have been given with regard to illegitimate children, there has been none, so far as I am aware, with regard to adopted children.

As regards illegitimate children the law was authoritatively laid down by LORD CAIRNS in Hill v. Crook (1) and it has been applied quite recently by JENKINS, J., in Re Wohlgemuth (2). In Hill v. Crook (1), LORD CAIRNS said (L.R. 6 H.L. 282):

"And what appears to me to be the principle which may fairly be extracted from the cases upon this subject is this—the term 'children' in a will prima facie means legitimate children, and if there is nothing more in the will, the circumstance that the person whose children are referred to has illegitimate children will not entitle those illegitimate children to take. But there are two classes of cases in which that prima facie interpretation is departed from. One class of cases is where it is impossible from the circumstances of the parties that any legitimate children could take under the bequest. A familiar example of that might be given in this way: Suppose there is a bequest 'to the children of my daughter Jane,' Jane being dead, and having left illegitimate children, but having left no legitimate children. There, inasmuch as the testator must be taken to have known the state of his family, and must be taken to have intended to benefit some children of his daughter Jane, and inasmuch as she had no children who could be benefited except illegitimate children, rather than that the bequest should fail altogether the courts will hold that those illegitimate children are intended, and they will take under the term 'children'."

Counsel for the fifth defendant has submitted that I ought not to apply to an adopted child the principles which are applicable to an illegitimate child because an illegitimate child is at least a natural child of the person named whereas an adopted child has no status as a child, except such as is conferred on it by the adoption order. I am disinclined to draw such a distinction. It seems to me that the question in every case is: In what sense has the testator used the word "children"? Prima facie he has used it in its natural sense as meaning lawful children, but, if once the court comes to the conclusion that he has not used it in its natural sense of lawful children, it seems to me that it must be legitimate for the court to inquire into the sense in which he has used the word and that it makes no difference in principle whether the court finds that he has used it in the sense of illegitimate children or in the sense of adopted children. It is common for people to speak of both illegitimate children and adopted children as "children" simpliciter. A

A further argument against applying to adopted children the principles applicable to illegitimate children was founded by counsel on the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, s. 5 (2), which reads as follows:

"An adoption order shall not deprive the adopted child of any right to or interest in property to which, but for the order, the child would have been entitled under any intestacy or disposition, whether occurring or made before or after the making of the adoption order, or confer on the adopted child any right to or interest in property as a child of the adopter, and the expressions 'child,' 'children' and 'issue' where used in any disposition whether made before or after the making of an adoption order, shall not, unless the contrary intention appears, include an adopted child or children or the issue of an adopted child." B C

Counsel has submitted that I ought to construe the words "unless the contrary intention appears" in such a manner as to exclude some of the evidence which would be admissible in the case of an illegitimate child. I am not prepared so to construe it. It appears to me unthinkable that Parliament intended to place an adopted child in a worse position than an illegitimate child. Suppose the case of an illegitimate child born in such circumstances that it could not be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of its natural parents and that the natural parents marry, and, being unable to legitimate their natural child, adopt it (a course of procedure which is not uncommon), then the adopted child would be in a worse position than it would have been in if it had not been adopted, if counsel's submission is correct, unless I accept his solution, which is that in such a case the court would look behind the adoption order to the anterior illegitimacy which it is one of the purposes of the adoption order to hide. I do not feel able to accept counsel's solution of this problem. I feel bound to hold that s. 5 (2) does not exclude in the case of a child adopted under the Act of 1926 any evidence which would have been admissible in the case of an illegitimate child. There seems, therefore, in my judgment, to be no reason to be found in the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, which ought to lead the court to apply different principles to illegitimate children and adopted children. If that be right, the case is clear. It was impossible from the circumstances of the parties, which were fully known to the testator, that any legitimate children could take under the bequest. D E F

Counsel for the fifth defendant put forward one further conceivable hypothesis. This is, of course, admittedly an hypothesis and, I may add, a most improbable hypothesis. It is that Mrs. Ewing, before her marriage and before the advent of her incapacity, might have had an illegitimate child, that she might then have married Mr. Ewing, that her marriage to Mr. Ewing might have come to an end before the death of the testator, and that then she might have married the man by whom she had the hypothetical illegitimate child before her marriage to Mr. Ewing, and thereupon such child might have become legitimated. I repeat what LORD CAIRNS says in Hill v. Crook (1) (L.R. 6 H.L. 282): G H

"... inasmuch as the testator must be taken to have known the state of his family, and must be taken to have intended to benefit some children of his daughter Jane, and inasmuch as she had no children who could be benefited except illegitimate children, rather than that the bequest should fail altogether the courts will hold that those illegitimate children are intended, and they will take under the term 'children'."

In applying that reasoning I decline altogether to embark on a hypothesis which is in itself most remote and which such evidence as there is in this case, though none of it was expressly directed to any such hypothesis, shows to be wholly lacking foundation. I cannot believe for one moment that the testator
A ever contemplated some such hypothetical illegitimate child as counsel has suggested. Accordingly, it seems to me clear that this case falls directly within the principle stated by LORD CAIRNS and the adopted children succeed.

[HIS LORDSHIP then referred to the question of domicile and said that counsel for the next of kin had elected to argue the case on the basis that the testator was domiciled in England. It was possible that the testator was domiciled
B in the United States of America or Scotland, but it appeared that the class of persons who would be entitled on an intestacy in those countries was the same as in England. HIS LORDSHIP considered evidence of the law of the United States and of Scotland relating to the meaning of "children," and came to the conclusion that counsel had adopted the wisest course in electing to argue on the basis of an English domicile. The trustees would, therefore, be authorised
C to administer and distribute the estate on that basis.]

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), March 14, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Meeting of creditors—Voting—"Unliquidated debt"—Stated sum claimed as damages for misfeasance and breach of trust—High Court action pending—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), sched. I, para. 9.

A receiving order having been made against the debtor, a company of which he had been a director lodged a proof before the first meeting of creditors alleging that he was indebted to it "in the sum of £21,960 17s. 5d., being, as to £19,900, damages for misfeasance and breach of trust as a director" of the company "in the circumstances set forth in the statement of claim" in an action in the High Court by the company against the debtor and two other defendants. The remaining £2,060 17s. 5d. was interest on the sum claimed. The statement of claim in the action in the High Court alleged misfeasance and breach of trust by the debtor acting in conspiracy with the other defendants. It was alleged that cheques for varying sums totalling 9,550,000 francs were fraudulently drawn on the banking account of a French subsidiary of the company and applied as working capital for a syndicate formed by the defendants to purchase in Paris investments which had not been registered or declared as required by French law, bring those investments to London, and register them as British securities. In the action the company claimed (a) against the debtor (i) damages for misfeasance and breach of trust as a director of the company, (ii) a declaration that he was liable to account to the company for any profit made by him by reason of the transactions, and
H

(iii) an account of profits made by him in breach of trust, and (b) against the debtor and the other defendants (iv) the sum of £19,900, being the sterling equivalent of 9,550,000 francs, with interest thereon, and consequential relief. Judgment had not yet been given in the action, but, for the purpose of the bankruptcy proceedings, the allegations in the statement of claim were to be accepted as substantially true, no evidence having been filed contesting the facts alleged. The official receiver held that the debt sworn in the proof was an unliquidated debt, and, therefore, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, sched. I, para. 9, the company was not entitled to vote at the meeting, and, under sched. I, para. 14, he rejected the proof for the purpose of voting. It was contended by the company that, although the three claims against the debtor alone were in the nature of unliquidated damages, the fourth claim (i.e., that against all the defendants in the action) was a claim for liquidated damages.

HELD: the company's claim against the debtor was, as it was described in the proof, a claim for damages for misfeasance and must be judged on that footing; the damages asked for in the statement of claim in the action were in the nature of an unliquidated claim, even though a figure was set on them for the purposes of one part of the claim, and, in view of the speculative nature of the fraudulent transactions and the fact that there were three defendants in the action, it would be impossible to say until judgment was given what was the amount of the debt due from the debtor to the company by reason of the alleged misfeasance; and, therefore, the claim was an unliquidated claim and the official receiver had rightly rejected the proof as an unliquidated debt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, sched. I, para. 9.

Per curiam: If there had been a liquidated debt in francs, the question of conversion from francs into sterling would not have prevented the debt from being a liquidated debt, as the appropriate date for ascertaining the rate of exchange for the conversion of the debt into sterling would have been the date at which each of the sums making up the total of 9,550,000 francs was withdrawn from the French subsidiary's banking account.

MOTION by the creditors against a decision of the official receiver under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, sched. I, para. 14, rejecting a proof for the purpose of voting on the ground that it was an unliquidated debt within the meaning of sched. I, para. 9. The proof stated that the debtor was indebted to the creditors in a certain sum as "damages for misfeasance and breach of trust" in circumstances set out in the statement of claim in an action in the High Court by the creditors against the debtor and two other defendants.

The allegations in the statement of claim had not been contested, but judgment had not been given in the action. JENKINS, J., held that the debt was an unliquidated debt within the meaning of para. 9, and dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment.

Salmon, K.C., and Share for the creditors.

V. R. Aronson for the Official Receiver.

A JENKINS, J. : This is an appeal from a decision of the official receiver, as chairman of the first meeting of creditors, disallowing a proof by the appellants for the purpose of voting. The relevant provisions about voting are contained in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, sched. I. Paragraph 8 of sched. I provides :

B “A person shall not be entitled to vote as a creditor at the first or any other meeting of creditors unless he has duly proved a debt provable in bankruptcy to be due to him from the debtor, and the proof has been duly lodged before the time appointed for the meeting.”

By para. 9 :

C “A creditor shall not vote at any such meeting in respect of any unliquidated or contingent debt, or any debt the value of which is not ascertained.”

The present appeal is brought under para. 14 of sched. I, which is in these terms :

D “The chairman of a meeting shall have power to admit or reject a proof for the purpose of voting, but his decision shall be subject to appeal to the court. If he is in doubt whether the proof of a creditor should be admitted or rejected he shall mark the proof as objected to and shall allow the creditor to vote, subject to the vote being declared invalid in the event of the objection being sustained.”

E In this instance the proof was rejected and the appeal is from that rejection as opposed to the other possibility under the paragraph, which is admission of the proof with a note of the objection and a possible appeal against that. The proof in question is in these terms. It asseverates that the debtor was

F “. . . at the date of the receiving order [i.e., Nov. 11, 1948] and still is justly and truly indebted to Insecticide Activated Products, Ltd. in the sum of £21,960 17s. 5d., being, as to £19,900, damages for misfeasance and breach of trust as a director of Insecticide Activated Products, Ltd. in the circumstances set forth in the statement of claim in the action in the High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division, Insecticide Activated Products, Ltd. v. Rickett and Others . . . hereto annexed and marked ‘A,’ the statements wherein are to the best of my knowledge true, and, as to £2,060 17s. 5d., interest on the said sum at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from Apr. 10, 1946. The said Francis William Rickett is also liable to account to the said Insecticide Activated Products, Ltd., for any profit made by him by reason of the transactions referred to in the said statement of claim, and the said company also claim payment of such sum when ascertained.”

H There follows the usual declaration that nothing in the way of satisfaction or security has been received in respect of the debt the subject of the proof.

The official receiver had to consider that proof, and he rejected it in reliance on para. 9 of sched. I to the Act of 1914. The issue before me is simply whether the official receiver was right in rejecting the proof under that paragraph, or, to narrow it down still further, whether he was right in the view he took that the debt sworn to in the proof was an unliquidated debt.

It is to be remembered that the proof incorporates by reference the statement of claim in the action between the creditors as plaintiffs and the debtor and others as defendants. That statement of claim sets out a complicated story, but, in brief, its character is this. The plaintiff company carries on the business of buying and selling, manufacturing, preparing, and dealing in insecticides. The debtor was at all material times the chairman of the directors of the company. It is alleged that the debtor and the second defendant, Mr. William Peel Fletcher, and one Prince Jean de Bourbon, were operating a syndicate for the purchase in Paris of stocks and shares which had not been registered or declared as required by French law. These stocks and shares were to be brought to London, and arrangements were to be made with the assistance of the three defendants and a concern called the London and Eastern Trade Bank, Ltd., to procure the registration of the stocks and shares as British-held securities. The effect of that transaction would be to circumvent the difficulties created by the control of exchange between England and France. The materiality of the alleged purpose of this syndicate carrying on the activities of the kind I have described is that it afforded an outlet for any money that the debtor was able to lay his hands on. The substantive allegations are to the effect that in March, 1946, the plaintiff company sold to certain French promoters certain formulae relating to germicides so far as their use in France was concerned. The ultimate purchaser of the property so sold was to be a new French company which was to be incorporated for the purpose and was to acquire the assets in question. The consideration the plaintiff company was to receive was to consist of 3,000 fully paid shares of 100 francs each in this new French company, plus £20,000, or its equivalent of 9,600,000 French francs in cash. The French company was duly formed and the sale was duly completed. To receive the purchase consideration the plaintiff company incorporated a second French company which was to receive and hold on behalf of the plaintiff company the sum of 9,600,000 French francs receivable in cash and 3,000 shares of 100 francs each in the first mentioned French company. The debtor was appointed by the plaintiff company as their English representative in the holding company, i.e., the second French company. De Bourbon was appointed "gerant," i.e., manager, of the second French company, and as such he had power to draw cheques on behalf of the second French company, provided such cheques were countersigned by the debtor as representing the plaintiff company. It is alleged that in March and April, 1946, the debtor "unlawfully and fraudulently conspired with de Bourbon" to obtain from the second French company the whole or part of the 9,600,000 francs. That was done by drawing cheques on the second French company's banking account, the cheques being drawn by de Bourbon and countersigned by the debtor. Particulars are set out of the cheques which were drawn between Mar. 26, 1946, and Apr. 10, 1946, inclusive for varying sums totalling 9,550,000 francs. The proceeds of those cheques were received and used, it is alleged, with the knowledge and approval of the debtor who is alleged throughout to have been a party to all these transactions. The sum realised in this way was applied, if I may use that expression, as working capital for the syndicate to which I have referred and was invested in the purchase of undeclared stocks, shares and securities in Paris, and the investments so purchased, it is alleged, were delivered to the debtor in Paris. It is further alleged that the stocks, shares and securities were subsequently taken to London and were delivered to the defendants, or some or one of them, and were registered by the third defendant as British-held securities.

Founded on those allegations the relevant claims are : as against the first defendant (the debtor), (i) damages for misfeasance and breach of trust as a director of the plaintiff company ; (ii) a declaration that the first defendant is liable to account to the plaintiff company for any profit made by him by reason of the transactions aforesaid ; and (iii) an account of profits made or received by the first defendant as a result of the transactions aforesaid and taken on the footing of such account. Those three claims are made against the debtor alone. Then, as against all the defendants, (iv) the sum of £19,900, being the sterling equivalent of 9,550,000 francs, with interest thereon; (v) damages; (vi) a declaration that the plaintiff company is entitled to follow the said sum of 9,550,000 francs into the hands of anyone other than a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the plaintiff company's claim and is now entitled to transfer or delivery up of the said stocks, shares or securities, or, alternatively, to a lien thereon.

It is agreed for the purposes of this appeal that the allegations contained in the statement of claim must be accepted as substantially true because no evidence has been filed contesting those facts. The sole question argued has been whether the creditors can show that they had a liquidated debt, or a debt which is not disqualified for voting purposes as being an unliquidated debt within the meaning of para. 9 of sched. I to the Act of 1914. Counsel for the creditors has argued most persuasively that the claim here is a liquidated debt. He admits that the first three items of claim against the debtor alone are clearly in the nature of unliquidated damages, but he says that the fourth claim, i.e., the first of the three made against all the defendants, is a claim for liquidated damages, and by being stated in the statement of claim and verified in the proof constitutes a debt in the nature of a liquidated debt. On the other hand, counsel for the official receiver says that, however it is put, this is essentially a claim for damages for misfeasance, as, indeed, it was described in the proof itself, and, being a claim for damages for misfeasance, it can only be quantified by the court at the trial. Secondly, he says that there is here no liquidated debt on which a right to vote might be founded, and an essentially unliquidated demand cannot be converted into a liquidated debt merely by laying the damages at a specific sum in pounds.

I was referred in the course of the argument to two authorities bearing on this topic. The first was Ex parte Ruffle. Re Dummelow (1). In that case the debtor was indebted to a creditor for a certain sum recovered by a verdict at law and costs which had not been taxed. The creditor attended the first meeting of creditors and stated in his affidavit that the debtor was indebted to him in £357 on the verdict and an amount of costs which he estimated at £200 and claimed to vote in respect of the aggregate amount. It was held that the estimated amount of untaxed costs was an unliquidated debt within the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 16 (3), and that he could not vote in respect thereof, but that the proper course for him to pursue was either to apply for leave to sign judgment and tax his costs or else to swear to such a sum as the costs, when taxed, would at the least amount to. MELLISH, L.J., said (8 Ch. App. 1001):

"The question really is, what is meant by an 'unliquidated debt' in sub-s. (3). The fair construction of the clause seems to me this: 'a contingent debt' refers to a case where there is a doubt if there will be any debt at all; 'a debt, the value of which is not ascertained,' means a debt the amount of which cannot be estimated until the happening of some future event; and 'an unliquidated debt' includes not only all cases of damages to be ascertained by a jury, but beyond that, extends to any debt where the creditor fairly admits that he cannot state the amount. In that case there must be some further inquiry before he can vote. In the present case there is really no injustice done to the creditor; he might have applied for leave to sign judgment and tax his costs, and asked for the meeting to be adjourned till that was done. But it was said that the debtor was only able to pay a shilling in the pound, and it would not have been worth while to incur the costs of taxation. In that case he must be content to prove for such an amount as he can safely swear the costs would at least amount to. The appeal must be dismissed with costs."

That case seems to show, first, that, provided there is a liquidated minimum which can be sworn to, it matters not that the amount recoverable might ultimately prove to be more, and, secondly, that prima facie all cases of damages to be ascertained by a jury, as the learned Lord Justice calls them, are in the nature of unliquidated debts.

In Ex parte Pearce. Re Grieves (2) a debtor who filed a liquidation petition had, by a separation deed between himself and his wife, covenanted to pay to a trustee an annuity, during the joint lives of himself and his wife, for the maintenance of the wife and a child of the marriage. The annuity was to cease in case the husband and wife should cohabit again. It was held that, the value of the annuity not having been ascertained, the trustee was not entitled to vote in respect of it at a meeting of creditors under the petition. I think that case is of no assistance to me, except that it is an example of a debt the value of which had not been ascertained and was of a kind which made it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain its value. As JAMES, L.J., put it (13 Ch.D. 265):

“The appellant was not in a position to have any sum fixed in respect of which he could vote at the meeting . . .”

Counsel for the creditors put their case here as if it were simply a case of money had and received by the debtor to the use of the creditors. They seek to equate the fourth claim in the action simply to a claim for the payment of money had and received, thus removing it from the category of claims for damages and converting it into a quasi-contractual claim for a liquidated sum, and, further, into a liquidated debt for the purpose of para. 9 of sched. 1 to the Act of 1914. In my judgment, that argument, attractive as it is, is really fallacious. This really is not a claim for money had and received. It is, as described in the proof, a claim for damages for misfeasance, and I think it must be judged on that footing. If one analyses the facts, the legal entity from which the money was taken was the holding company which I have referred to as the second French company. The plaintiff company is concerned as claiming as the beneficial owner of the money on the ground that the defendant, in dealing with the money in the hands of the second French company in the way he did, committed misfeasance and breach of trust and that the other defendants are liable, jointly and severally, with him for their complicity in the fraudulent conspiracy which is alleged. Essentially, I think, damages of that kind are in the nature of an unliquidated claim, and, in my view, they cannot be any the less unliquidated because a figure is set on the damages for the purposes of one part of the claim. I do not think this can fairly be compared to a case where a liquidated sum is, in any event, recoverable and a larger sum may be recoverable. One must regard all these claims as a whole. When one looks at them as a whole and bears in mind that there are three defendants and also that, according to the allegations in the statement of claim, this sum of francs was used in the speculative purchase of investments which may or may not have realised a profit, I think it will be impossible to say until judgment has been given in the action what is the amount of the debt due from the debtor to the creditors by reason of the various improper transactions alleged against him. It might be greater than £19,900 and interest, and it might be less. The probability on the facts as alleged in the statement of claim is that it will not amount in any event to less than £19,900, but I do not think that that probability, strong though it may be, is sufficient to convert the character of this claim from what I take to be its true nature, namely, a claim for unliquidated damages, or, in other words, damages to be assessed for misfeasance and breach of trust, into something in the nature of a claim for a liquidated sum now due and payable and ascertained beyond a peradventure.

In the course of the argument the point was raised that the amount of

A damages which is relied on by counsel for the creditors as representing a liquidated sum was, in truth, not a sum in sterling at all, but a sum of French francs, and it was suggested that that might be an added reason for regarding this debt as an unliquidated debt, inasmuch as the problems regarding the date of conversion into sterling would have to be considered, having regard to those authorities which have laid down that a contract for the payment of francs or other foreign currency is no more than a contract for the delivery of a chattel, for breach of which damages have to be assessed in sterling. I was, however, referred to S.S. Celia v. S.S. Volturmo (3) and Di Ferdinando v. Simon, Smits & Co. (4). From those two cases I think it is plain that, supposing there was here a liquidated debt in francs, the date for its conversion into sterling would have to be the date at which each of the sums in question, making up 9,550,000 francs, was withdrawn from the second French company's banking account. That, at all events, would be the appropriate date for ascertaining the exchange, although, if there had been an increase in the value of the franc subsequent to the withdrawal, it might be that, in addition, the debtor, as, in effect, a defaulting trustee, might have been chargeable with the excess. Therefore, I do not think that that question of conversion from francs into sterling would have been enough to prevent me from holding this to be a liquidated debt, if, in other respects, I thought it fairly answered that description. For the general reasons which I have endeavoured to state, however, this, in my view, is not a liquidated debt, but is an unliquidated one within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, sched. I, para. 9, with the result that this proof, in my opinion, was rightly rejected by the official receiver for the purpose of voting.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

EDWARDS v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

F [COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), March 9, 10, 11, 21, 1949.]

Mine—Coal mine—Statutory duty—Breach—“Reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent breach”—Test—Coal Mines Act, 1911 (c. 50), ss. 49, 102 (8).

G By s. 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911: “The roof and sides of every travelling road and working place shall be made secure . . .” and by s. 102 (8): “The owner of a mine shall not be liable to an action for damages as for breach of statutory duty in respect of any contravention of or non-compliance with any of the provisions of this Act if it is shown that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent the breach.”

H While going to his work along a travelling road in a coal mine owned by the defendants, a colliery timberman was killed by a fall of material from the side of the road, caused by a latent defect in the side of the road. Although some propping and lining of the road had been carried out at places where weaknesses appeared, the point at which the accident occurred had no form of artificial support. In a claim by the plaintiff, widow of the deceased man, for damages under s. 49, the defendants contended that they were protected by s. 102 (8) in that it was not reasonably practicable for them to have avoided or prevented the insecurity of the road at the point in question, there being nothing to indicate the existence of the defect, and to require them to support all roads in the mine would be to impose on them an impossible burden.

HELD : (i) in considering whether or not it was "reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent" a breach of the statute within s. 102 (8) the mineowner must, before the occurrence of an accident, make a computation in which the quantum of risk run by the worker was placed in one scale and the sacrifice of the mineowner involved in the measures necessary to avert the risk (whether in money, time, or trouble) was placed in the other, and, if there were a gross disproportion between them—the risk being insignificant in relation to the sacrifice—the mineowner discharged the onus which was on him.

(ii) in the present case there had been a clear breach of statutory duty and the defendants had failed to discharge the onus which was on them under s. 102 (8).

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of HALLETT, J., at Monmouth Assizes dated Nov. 10, 1948.

The plaintiff, the widow of a colliery timberman, claimed damages against the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, based on a breach of duty at common law and under s. 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, in respect of the death of her husband caused by a fall which occurred from the side of a travelling road at Marine Colliery, South Wales. The learned judge decided both issues in favour of the defendants, but provisionally assessed damages at £984. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and entered judgment for the sum as assessed. The facts appear in the judgments of TUCKER and SINGLETON, L.JJ.

Havers, K.C., and E. Ryder Richardson for the plaintiff.

Gardiner, K.C., and R. G. Micklethwait for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 21. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : On Nov. 6, 1947, Joseph Edwards, a colliery timberman, was killed as a result of a fall which occurred from the side of a travelling road called Pitts' Level in No. 2 Pit, Marine Colliery, South Wales, owned and occupied by the defendants. The plaintiff, his widow, brought this action claiming damages against the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, based on breach of duty at common law and under s. 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. The trial took place before HALLETT, J., at Monmouth Assizes. The learned judge decided both issues in favour of the defendants, but assessed the damages provisionally at £984. He found that the accident was due to a latent defect, known as a glassy slant, in the side of the roadway. This is the name given to material in the strata which is hard, shiny, and slippery, and, therefore, does not bind properly with the adjacent material but is likely to slide off if pressure is put on it. The slant in this case was a fossilised tree. He held on the evidence that the presence of this glassy slant could not have been detected by examination, nor was its existence to be expected. He rejected the evidence tendered on behalf of the plaintiff that the fall was due or contributed to by subsidence or shot firing which had been taking place 125 feet below and 300 yards to the side of the scene of the accident. He, accordingly, acquitted the defendants of negligence at common law, and I accept these findings and the conclusion that follows therefrom.

The claim based on breach of statutory duty depends on the proper interpretation of ss. 49 and 102 (8) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, read together, and the application thereof to the facts proved and evidence given in the court below. Section 49 of the Act reads as follows :

“The roof and sides of every travelling road and working place shall be made secure, and a person shall not, unless appointed for the purpose of exploring or repairing, travel on or work in any travelling road or working place which is not so made secure.”

Section 102 (8) of the Act provides :

“The owner of a mine shall not be liable to an action for damages as for breach of statutory duty in respect of any contravention of or non-compliance with any of the provisions of this Act if it is shown that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent the breach.”

HALLETT, J., dealt thus with the issue raised by these last words :

“I get back to the broad question which throughout this case I have felt to be the difficult one, whether, if there is no reason to suppose that the particular place requires propping or lining—and I think lining would be necessary for complete security, though propping might produce security—it can be said that it is reasonably practicable for the National Coal Board to prop or line everywhere in their pits, regardless of whether there is any particular reason for propping or lining at that particular place. It is not a point on which I confess I feel certain, but on the whole I feel that I have been satisfied by the defendants that it is not reasonably practicable for them to prop or line every place in their pits irrespective of whether there is any reason to suppose that propping or lining is necessary at that particular point. I want to make it quite plain. It might be a technical matter, but, as I understand it, a travelling road, as far as falls are concerned, will be made more secure if it is propped and lined. There may be other reasons possibly against it, but, so far as falls are concerned, I think it is plain even to a layman that it will be made more secure, and that in a case where there is some abnormality present which may cause a fall, that fall may be prevented by propping and lining, and it does not seem that it is reasonably practicable for the National Coal Board to deal with eventualities by propping and lining throughout, and I am not at all satisfied on the evidence here that there was any special reason why they should prop or line at that particular point.”

There is no dispute that the joint effect of ss. 49 and 102 (8) is to impose on the mineowner the absolute duty to make the roof and sides of every travelling road secure, and that he can only escape civil liability for breach of this duty if he can prove—the onus is on him—that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent the breach. It is also conceded that the deceased man's death was caused by the insecurity of the travelling road in which he was working. Consequently, the defendants can only escape liability by proof that it was not reasonably practicable for them to avoid or prevent this insecurity. It is contended by the defendants that it was not reasonably practicable for them to do so because there was nothing to indicate the existence of this latent defect, and that to expect them to prop and/or line every road in every mine would be to impose on them an altogether impossible burden. They concede that, if any travelling road is known to be insecure or if there is reasonable ground to fear insecurity, they cannot escape the consequences of failure to make it secure, save possibly in very exceptional circumstances. In short, it is not reasonably practicable to prop or line every roadway including those which are, in fact, perfectly safe in case somewhere there may be some unknown and unascertainable defects. On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiff argues that nothing short of some external interference by some unauthorised third person, or some occurrence which could not reasonably be anticipated, can excuse the breach of the absolute duty. He says matters which are within the control of the mineowner, such as cost, inconvenience and loss of profit are irrelevant. Alternatively, he submits that, if such matters as cost, labour and materials can be considered, the court can only look at the particular roadway in which the accident happened, and that the defendants gave no evidence on this point sufficient to discharge the onus that lay on them.

I cannot accept the submissions of either side in their entirety. The defendants' contention appears to me to leave the miner no better off than he was at common law. In effect, it makes the taking of reasonable care the sole test. On the other hand, though, no doubt, it is necessary to look primarily at the particular part of the particular mine with which the court is concerned, it is, in my opinion, necessary and proper to view it in relation to the totality of obligations resting on the mineowner. For example, vesting day having been Jan. 1, 1947, and an accident taking place the following November due to the insecurity of the sides or roof of a travelling road, it would, I think, be permissible for the defendants to lead evidence that there had been a scheme or plan for rendering all such roads secure, that certain areas had priority, and that it was not reasonably practicable for them to have carried out the remedial work at the particular pit by the time of the accident. Again, they might prove that in some areas, no propping or lining was necessary for some particular reason or that different methods were required. Dealing with the particular latent defect which caused this accident—a glassy slant—it might have been possible to show that such a thing is more common in some formations and areas than it is in others or that it is non-existent in some places, but this is the kind of evidence which, in my opinion, would have been relevant. I do not hold the view that cost must necessarily always be excluded as an element to be weighed in the balance. In Coltness Iron Co., Ltd. v. Sharp (1), LORD ATKIN said ([1937] 3 All E.R. 593):

“The time of non-protection is so short, and the time, trouble and expense of any other form of protection is so disproportionate, that I think the defence is proved.”

This shows that in every case it is the risk that has to be weighed against the measures necessary to eliminate the risk. The greater the risk, no doubt, the less will be the weight to be given to the factor of cost.

I turn to consider how the defendants in the present case, sought to discharge the onus of proof that lay on them. It was, I think, a heavy burden. They occupied a position between that of an absolute insurer and the ordinary occupier of property, but they start as insurers and have by evidence to divest themselves of this status. They called no witness qualified to assist the court to visualise the situation from the viewpoint of the monopoly owner. We are, therefore, left in ignorance of the practicability or otherwise of the measures which, in the opinion expressed by the inspector of mines appointed by the National Union of Mineworkers, after twelve years' experience of the investigation of fatal accidents, constitutes the only way to ensure security, viz., artificially to support all roads in mines. According to his evidence, which stood uncontradicted, more than half of the existing roads are already artificially supported. It is obvious that to give artificial support to the remainder would be a very considerable and expensive operation which could not be carried out all at once, but whether it is reasonably practicable as a long term plan, or should already have been begun, I know not, nor can I understand how any court can judge of these matters without evidence. I do not, therefore, think the defendants got any distance towards proving that security was not reasonably practicable from the viewpoint of the totality of the defendants' obligations. So far as the situation falls to be considered solely from the local angle, the evidence of the defendants' officials on the spot shows that they had never even applied their minds to the point until questioned in court. Mr. Wakeley, the under-manager, said: "I have never gone into the matter." He then proceeded to express the view that the labour involved would make it impracticable to carry out this work, but neither he nor the manager gave the court any figures as to cost or labour necessary to prop and/or line this particular travelling road which was only 400 yards long and had, in fact, been timbered for about half its length and up to within 15 to 30 yards of the spot where this accident occurred.

Although the learned judge has found that the fall was not due to subsidence or shot firing, it is the fact that weaknesses had appeared at places from time to time in the sides of this road and they had been timbered up as they appeared. Furthermore, there was undisputed evidence that glassy slants had been seen in this roadway, though they were rare. The road had only been in existence for some seven years. In truth, the defendants' officials never applied their minds to their absolute obligation under s. 49. They were content to rely on the system of inspections and on the observance of the ordinary and usual precautions. That was their whole case as presented in argument, and it was said that that was the true measure of reasonable practicability under s. 102 (8). In my view, the evidence in the present case falls short of what is required to discharge the burden that lies on a defendant under s. 102 (8) in a case where there has been a clear breach of statutory duty under s. 49. I would allow this appeal and enter judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £984, the provisional assessment of damages.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. The onus was on the defendants to establish that it was not reasonably practicable for them to have prevented a breach of s. 49. The construction placed by LORD ATKIN on the words "reasonably practicable" in the Coltress case (1) seems to me, with respect, right. "Reasonably practicable" is a narrower term than "physically possible" and seems to me to imply that a computation must be made by the owner in which the quantum of risk is placed on one scale and the sacrifice involved in the measures necessary for averting the risk (whether in money, time or trouble) is placed in the other, and that, if it be shown that there is a gross disproportion between them—the risk being insignificant in relation to the sacrifice—the defendants discharge the onus on them. Moreover, this computation falls to be made by the owner at a point of time anterior to the accident. The questions he has to answer are : (a) What measures are necessary and sufficient to prevent any breach of s. 49 ? (b) Are these measures reasonably practicable ?

In the particular type of accident caused by a "glassy slant" it is admittedly impossible before the event to foresee at what place or in what roadway or in what mine such an accident is likely to occur. The argument that the owners could and should have made secure the particular roadway in which, as things fell out, the glassy slant declared its presence without having to make secure every other roadway in which it might have done so assumes that by some process of divination they could have predicted that the accident was likely to occur in the roadway in which it did, rather than elsewhere. An owner, however, who is not gifted with second sight can make no such prediction. Without it, security against this peril can only be secured by extending similar security measures to all roadways. Only so can he prevent breaches of s. 49 due to glassy slants. So far, I am inclined to agree with the learned judge, but, like my Lord, I do not think any, or any sufficient, evidence was adduced as to the relative quantum of risk and sacrifice involved on the basis either that the mines as a whole (or that this particular roadway) should be taken as the unit—a necessary prerequisite to any decision that the defendants have proved the necessary measures impracticable. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

SINGLETON, L.J. [after stating the facts]: The defendants' submission was that if the defective side of this travelling road had to be supported or made secure along the whole of its length, it followed that every roof and every other side of every travelling road in every mine to which the Act of 1911 applies must be similarly supported so as to render it secure, and that that was not reasonably practicable. HALLETT, J., accepted this submission and held that the defendants were not liable to an action for damages by reason of s. 102 (8). With all respect, I do not think that this is the right test. The sides of this travelling road had not been made secure and Edwards was killed. It was for the defendants to show that it was not reasonably practicable to make secure the side of the road, a portion of which fell, and, in my judgment, they failed to do that. It can be no answer to an action in which damages are claimed, to say: "We did not do anything at such and such a place because we considered that point secure." Nor can it be an answer to say: "If we do something at this place we shall have to do something in many other places and in many other mines." Nor, again, can it be an answer to say: "We did not expect a fault of this kind, nor a fall, at this place." There is a breach in every case in which the roof and sides of a travelling road have not been made secure. The owners can escape paying damages in a civil action if they bring themselves within the terms of s. 102 (8). It is true to say that, if the defendants have to make secure the roofs and sides of every travelling road, a heavy burden will be placed on them. HALLETT, J., said it would be a stupendous undertaking. I do not think the court is concerned with that. It seems to have been the practice in some cases in which it has been considered that roof and sides are safe to take the risk of a civil action.

Part II of the Act contains many provisions as to safety. Section 49 places an absolute obligation on the owners. That can only be altered by Parliament. In some sections of that Part of the Act the Secretary of State is empowered to grant relief from certain provisions, and this raises a question whether cost and expense can be used to establish that it is not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent a breach. Prima facie, I should have thought that the words, when applied to the absolute obligation imposed by s. 49, were intended to cover a case in which everything reasonably possible had been done to make roof and sides secure, but, through a fault or the like, something happened and an accident took place. In such a case the defendants might well be able to establish that it was not reasonably practicable to comply with the provisions of s. 49. Though it is by no means clear how far expense was considered as an element in Coltness Iron Co., Ltd. v. Sharp (1), I think the words of LORD ATKIN form a most useful guide when he said ([1937] 3 All E.R. 593):

" . . . I am unable to take the view that it was reasonably practicable by any means to avoid or prevent the breach of s. 55. The time of non-protection is so short, and the time, trouble and expense of any other form of protection is so disproportionate, that I think the defence is proved."

In the present case, the time, trouble and expense involved must be examined in relation to the road on which the fall took place. The owners had taken steps to secure the sides along one half of its length approximately. I see no reason why the whole length could not have been similarly secured as and when the road was being made. There is no evidence to show that it would not have been reasonably practicable to do this, nor is there any evidence to show that it would not have been reasonably practicable to do it a month before the accident. If the defence now raised had been put forward by a private owner before the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, I do not think that it would have held water for a moment, and I am not satisfied that the defendants can claim to be in a better position than a private owner would have been in regard to the safety provisions of the Act of 1911. Some evidence was given to show the magnitude of the task if the roof and sides of every travelling road everywhere had to be made secure, but no evidence was directed to show what it would mean, or would have meant, in regard to this particular road. The mining engineer who was called on behalf of the defendants, was not asked any question on this subject. He did not visit the colliery until Oct. 8, 1948.

In the course of his judgment, HALLETT, J., said :

“ Upon the whole I feel myself that I am satisfied by the defendants that it is not reasonably practicable for them to prop or line every place in their pits, irrespective of whether there is any reason to suppose the propping or lining is necessary at that particular point.”

It seems to me that that approach fails to give effect to the statutory duty imposed by s. 49. The owners had done what they thought necessary to secure (or to make secure) the sides of this road in some parts. They failed to show that it was not reasonably practicable for them to do so in other parts, and, in particular, at the point at which the fall took place. In those circumstances they do not come within the terms of s. 102 (8). I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), March 15, 1949.]

Statute—Construction—Decision of the Divisional Court interpreting provision—Repeal and re-enactment of provision—Extent to which Court of Appeal bound by earlier interpretation.

Rent Restriction—Premises let “in consequence of employment”—Knowledge of tenant—Materiality—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. 1 (g).

Section 5 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, provided that no order or judgment for the recovery of possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts applied should be made unless, inter alia, alternative accommodation was available for the tenant. The section further provided that the existence of alternative accommodation should not be a condition of an order or judgment “(i) where the tenant was in the employment of the landlord or a former landlord and the dwelling-house was let to him in consequence of that employment and he has ceased to be in that employment.” In 1925 it was decided by the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division in Braby (Frederick) & Co., Ltd. v. Bedwell ([1926] 1 K.B. 456 ; 134 L.T. 320) that for a landlord to obtain the benefit of para. (i) of s. 5 (1) it was necessary for him to show that both he and the tenant knew that the letting was in consequence of the tenant's employment. In 1933 s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1920 was repealed, para. (i) of that sub-section being re-enacted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I (g). In 1946 the Court of Appeal in Braithwaite & Co., Ltd. v. Elliott ([1946] 2 All E.R. 537 ; [1947] K.B. 177 ; 176 L.T. 62), in interpreting the words "in consequence of that employment" in sched. 1 (g), purported to overrule the decision of the Divisional Court in 1925 on the meaning of the same words in the earlier Act of 1920 by holding that the vital matter was the intention of the landlord when letting the house and that it was immaterial whether or not the tenant knew that the dwelling-house was let to him in consequence of the employment.

HELD: the fact that in 1925 the Divisional Court placed a certain interpretation on the words of s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1920 did not preclude the Court of Appeal in 1946 placing a different construction on the words when re-enacted in sched. I (g) to the Act of 1933; there was no rule of law which prevented the Court of Appeal in 1946 from overruling Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (supra); and Braithwaite & Co., Ltd. v. Elliott (supra) was rightly decided.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. There is a rule of construction that when the words of an old statute are incorporated in a new statute this is understood to be done with the object of adopting any legal interpretation which has been put on the words of the old statute by the courts, but this rule does not prevent the Court of Appeal from overruling a previous decision which is not binding on it.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order made by His Honour JUDGE WILLES at Derby County Court on Sept. 7, 1948, whereby he granted possession of a dwelling-house to the landlords.

The county court judge considered himself bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Braithwaite & Co., Ltd. v. Elliott (1), and to succeed in his appeal the tenant had to show that the present court was not bound by that decision. This contention was not accepted by the court and the appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

W. R. Handforth for the tenant.

Scott Henderson, K.C., and N. F. M. Robinson for the landlords.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE WILLES in favour of the landlords, the Royal Crown Derby Porcelain Co., Ltd., who claimed possession of a certain dwelling-house which was occupied by the tenant, Raymond Russell.

A The tenant entered the landlords' employment in 1926. At that time he was living in a house which did not belong to the landlords. In 1940 he went into possession of the cottage in question which did belong to the landlords. In April, 1941, the tenant's service with the landlords ended, but he stayed on in the cottage with his wife. In November, 1941, he entered the army in
B which he stayed until April, 1946, and during the whole of that time his wife remained in the cottage. In April, 1946, he returned to the employment of the landlords, but in May, 1948, he left that employment and the landlords then gave him notice to quit. The learned judge, in a very careful reserved judgment, has said that he considered himself bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Braithwaite & Co., Ltd. v. Elliott (1), and the only question
C that we have to decide is whether or not, in the circumstances, we are bound to follow that case.

The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 5, as re-enacted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4, enacted that :

D “(1) No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom, shall be made or given unless . . . (d) the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord for occupation as a residence for himself . . . or for any person bona fide residing with him, or for some person engaged in his whole time employment or in the whole time
E employment of some tenant from him . . . and (except as otherwise provided by this sub-section) the court is satisfied that alternative accommodation is available . . .”

The sub-section went on to provide :

F “The existence of alternative accommodation shall not be a condition of an order or judgment on any of the grounds specified in para. (d) of this sub-section—(i) where the tenant was in the employment of the landlord or a former landlord, and the dwelling-house was let to him in consequence of that employment and he has ceased to be in that employment.”

G In 1925 Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2) was decided by the Divisional Court. There the plaintiffs wished to regain possession of a house under s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1920, and SHEARMAN, J., who was a member of the court decided, to quote from his judgment ([1926] 1 K.B. 459) that :

H “The words ‘in consequence of’ imply causation, and mean that the tenancy was created in consequence of the employment. The court must be satisfied not only that the landlords let the premises to the defendant in consequence of his being in their employment, but also that the defendant took the premises in consequence of his being in their employment. The judge finds that the defendant did not know that his tenancy was conditional on his remaining in the employment of the plaintiffs ; he had never heard of it and knew nothing about it. There is no direct authority on this point, but there is a dictum of LUSH, J., in Queen's Club Gardens Estates, Ltd. v. Bignell (3) which is to that effect. He says : ‘In my view they mean, not that the landlord only knows, but that both the landlord and the tenant know, that the premises were let to the tenant in consequence of his employment'."

SANKEY, J., agreed, and, in his judgment, said :

"I think the words do not have a unilateral but a bilateral construction, and really mean that the landlord lets and the tenant takes the premises in consequence of the employment."

In 1933 the law as contained in s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1920 was, in substance, re-enacted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933. A

When Braithwaite & Co., Ltd. v. Elliott (1) was decided in the Court of Appeal in 1946, MORTON, L.J., who was presiding, dealt with the question which was decided in Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2), and said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 539) : B

"The principal reason which led the county court judge to arrive at that conclusion appears in the following passage in his judgment : 'When the cottage was let to the defendant in November, 1937, the tenant [i.e., the defendant] was in the employment of the landlords and the landlords would not have let the cottage to the defendant had he not been in their employ, but I do not find that the tenant knew of that fact or that he knew the cottage was let to him in consequence of his employment by them. There is nothing to show that the defendant knew that his tenancy was conditional on his remaining in the plaintiff's employment. On these facts it appears to me, on the authority of Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2) and Queen's Club Gardens Estates, Ltd. v. Bignell (3), that the letting in November, 1937, was not in consequence of the defendant's employment.' In my view, at this stage the county court judge has misconstrued the section, and I think it is unlikely that he would have arrived at that conclusion if his attention had been directed to Benninga (Mitcham), Ltd. v. Bijstra (4). In my view, the material question is : What was the reason which actuated the landlord in letting the cottage to the defendant. The wording of the Act is : ' . . . and the dwelling-house was let to him in consequence of that employment.' When there is an agreement of letting, the landlord agrees to let and the tenant agrees to take, and, in my view, under the section one has to inquire only : What was in the mind of the person who let ? Was the house let to the defendant in consequence of his employment, or was it let to him for some other reason ? That matter is, in my view, concluded against the defendant in the present case by Benninga's case (4). If I may further quote from my judgment ([1945] 2 All E.R. 437) : 'As to question (iv) [i.e., the question now under consideration] it was stated by this court in Read v. Gordon (5) that the crucial time at which this question must be decided is the date of the notice to quit. In my view the question which has to be decided, as at that time, may be accurately stated as follows : Was the tenancy, which was determined by the notice to quit, a tenancy which had been granted to the tenant in consequence of his employment by the landlord ?' It seems to me that the judge has answered that question in favour of the present plaintiffs. He has said : 'The landlords would not have let the cottage to the defendant had he not been in their employ.' That, to my mind, is a finding of fact which concludes this point against the defendant. The judge goes on to discuss certain other questions which are, in my view, irrelevant. He says : 'I do not find that the tenant knew the fact'—to my mind, whether he knew it or not is irrelevant—'or that he knew the cottage was let to him in consequence of his employment by them'—that again, in my view, is irrelevant. 'There is nothing to show that the defendant knew that his tenancy was conditional on his remaining in the plaintiffs' employment.' I cannot find in the section the slightest trace of any of these matters being relevant to the consideration of the matter before the court. Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2) and Queen's Club Gardens Estates, Ltd. v. Bignell (3) were not cited to this court in Benninga's case (4), but I feel bound to say that, in my view, Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2) was wrongly decided."

A The argument put before us shortly is that it was not open to the Court of Appeal in Braithwaite's case (1) to come to that decision, having regard to the decision of the Divisional Court in 1925 in Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2), and having regard to the rule of interpretation of statutes which has been enunciated in several cases, the latest being Barras v. Aberdeen Steam Trawling & Fishing Co., Ltd. (6), where LORD BUCKMASTER, when dealing with the meaning of the word "wreck" in the Merchant Shipping Acts, said ([1933] A.C. 411) :

C "The respondents here have based the main part of their case, as explained in the reasons they have given, upon the ground that The Olympic (7) was wrongly decided, and that the limited and relative meaning there attributed to the word 'wreck' is not the true interpretation of the phrase. I do not think that the consideration of that question is open to this House. It has long been a well established principle to be applied in the consideration of Acts of Parliament that where a word of doubtful meaning has received a clear judicial interpretation, the subsequent statute which incorporates the same word or the same phrase in a similar context, must be construed so that the word or phrase is interpreted according to the meaning that has previously been assigned to it. JAMES, L.J., in the case of Ex parte Campbell (8) expresses this rule in the following terms : 'Where once certain words in an Act of Parliament have received a judicial construction in one of the superior courts, and the legislature has repeated them without alteration in a subsequent statute, I conceive that the legislature must be taken to have used them according to the meaning which a court of competent jurisdiction has given to them.' And this opinion was expressed in a case where the learned Lord Justice himself said it was difficult to bring the interpretation within the words of the Act. The same opinion was expressed by LORD HALSBURY in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the case of Webb v. Outram (9), and I know of no authority that has in any way weakened the effect of this pronouncement. It is in my opinion a salutary rule and one necessary to confer upon Acts of Parliament that certainty which, though it is often lacking, is always to be desired."

G Counsel for the tenant contends that, the Divisional Court having given a judicial interpretation in Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2) of the words "in consequence of" in the Act of 1920, the Court of Appeal was wrong in saying, in effect, in Braithwaite's case (1) that the Act of 1933 meant something inconsistent with the decision in Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2), since Parliament, in using in 1933 the words of the Act of 1920 which had been interpreted by the Divisional Court in Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2), must have intended the words of the Act of 1933 to have the meaning assigned to them by the Divisional Court. That being so, counsel says that this court is not bound to follow Braithwaite's case (1), in accordance with the principles laid down by the Court of Appeal in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (10) where LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 300) :

"Where the court has construed a statute or a rule having the force of a statute, its decision stands on the same footing as any other decision on a question of law. But where the court is satisfied that an earlier decision was given in ignorance of the terms of a statute or a rule having the force of a statute the position is very different. It cannot, in our opinion, be right to say that in such a case the court is entitled to disregard the statutory provision and is bound to follow a decision of its own given when that provision was not present to its mind. Cases of this description are examples of decisions given per incuriam."

I am not prepared to say that in Braithwaite's case (1) the Court of Appeal was ignorant of the fact that the terms of the Act of 1933 were practically the same as those of the Act of 1920, nor am I prepared to say that, having that knowledge, they were bound to interpret the words in the same way as the Divisional Court had interpreted them. I do not think that when LORD BUCKMASTER enunciated this rule in relation to the comparatively simple question what was the meaning of the word "wreck," he had in his mind anything like the present case where the words of the Act of 1920 are re-enacted in the Act of 1933 and numberless decisions have been given on the meaning of words in these complicated and difficult Acts. It seems to me that it would be wrong to assume that Parliament, when enacting an Act such as the Act of 1933, bore in mind every decision in the High Court on the meaning of the words in the earlier statute. Some of the decisions are conflicting, and, in my view, it would be wrong to say that in 1946 the Court of Appeal was precluded from giving its own interpretation to these words by reason of a decision given by the Divisional Court in 1925 on a different statute. If it is permissible in a case of this kind to consider public policy, it seems to me very undesirable that one division of the Court of Appeal should give a decision which is inconsistent with a decision given by another division of the court. So far as one can, one should keep the law certain, and to disturb the judgment in Braithwaite's case (1) by reason of this somewhat technical, though interesting, argument, would, to my mind, be contrary to public policy, and I should be most unwilling to do it unless I was so bound. I do not feel so bound in the present case, and, therefore, I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. We have had the advantage of an ingenious argument from counsel for the tenant directed to establish (i) that this court decided Braithwaite's case (1) per incuriam in that their attention had not been directed to the fundamental principle of construction to be found in the passage of LORD BUCKMASTER's judgment in Barras' case (6), which my Lord has already read ; and (ii) that, therefore, in accordance with principles laid down by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (10), we ought not to treat Braithwaite's case (1) as correct but must place on the words under consideration, as they appear in the Act of 1933, the construction which was placed on them in 1925 when the Divisional Court were considering, in Braby's case (2), the meaning of s. 5 (1) of the 1920 Act.

The question we have to decide is whether the present case is within the principles laid down by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (10). I doubt whether a rule of construction is on a par with "a statute or rule having the force of a statute" which is the language used by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in Young's case (10), but, assuming that "principles of construction" is within the per incuriam principle as laid down by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, can we attribute to this court ignorance, when they were considering Braithwaite's case (1), of the rule of construction which is to be found in Barras' case (6) and a number of earlier cases in which the same point arose ? I find it impossible to attribute to the court any such ignorance. It is plain from the report that their attention was expressly directed to the decision of the Divisional Court in Braby's case (2). It necessarily follows that their attention was directed to the terms of s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1920, and they must have known that that sub-section was indistinguishable in substance from the words used in the schedule to the Act of 1933. It seems to me that we must assume that in Braithwaite's case (1) this court, after a consideration of all the relevant factors including the rule of construction in question, came to the conclusion that it was open to them to find as they did—that the words “in consequence of” in the schedule to the 1933 Act related only to what was in the mind of the landlord and that what was in the mind of the tenant was irrelevant.

A I only desire to add, though it is, perhaps, irrelevant to the decision, that had the matter arisen for consideration before us free from any authority so that we were entitled to construe the matter on our own, I should myself have reached the same conclusion as that which was expressed by MORTON, L.J., in Braithwaite's case (1). For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

B DENNING, L.J.: I agree. In 1946 in Braithwaite's case (1) this court put an interpretation on the Act of 1933, and, in so doing, overruled Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2), a decision of the Divisional Court which had stood since 1925. It is said that this court ought not to have overruled Braby's case (2) because that case had previously been rendered authoritative by Parliament when it passed the Act of 1933. I do not agree with that

C suggestion. I do not believe that whenever Parliament re-enacts a provision of a statute it thereby gives statutory authority to every erroneous interpretation which has been put on it. The true view is that the court will be slow to overrule a previous decision on the interpretation of a statute when it has long been acted on, and it will be more than usually slow to do so when Parliament has, since the decision, re-enacted the statute in the same terms,

D but if a decision is, in fact, shown to be erroneous, there is no rule of law which prevents it being overruled. There was, therefore, in my opinion, no rule of law which prevented this court in 1946 from overruling Braby (Frederick) & Co. v. Bedwell (2), and I do not agree with the contention that Braithwaite's case (1) was wrongly decided. For those reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

WHITESIDE v. WHITESIDE AND OTHERS.

G [CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), March 11, 1949.]

Deed—Rectification—No relief required as between the parties—Rectification to secure reduction of tax payable by party to deed—Failure of parties to appreciate legal consequences of words used.

H In October, 1940, the parties were divorced, and, after discussion as to the maintenance of the wife, their solicitors agreed, subject to confirmation by the wife, who resided in Canada, that the wife should be paid £1,000 a year free of tax up to 7s. 6d. in the £. After confirmation by the wife a deed was drafted by her solicitors in which the husband was expressed to covenant to pay “such a sum after deduction of income tax at the rate of not more than 7s. 6d. in the £ as shall represent £1,000 per annum . . .” The husband’s solicitors altered the draft so that the covenant provided that the husband should pay “£1,000 per annum free of British income tax up to but not exceeding 7s. 6d. in the £.” In that form the deed was executed, and the husband thereafter paid on the basis of freedom from tax at 7s. 6d. in the £ until the Inland Revenue refused to allow deductions against his sur-tax, their contention being that that was not his legal liability, and that, having regard to r. 23 (3) of the General Rules in the Income Tax Act, 1918, he had no right to make the payments without deducting the tax. On Mar. 30, 1948, the husband executed a supplemental deed whereby he agreed that the original deed should be treated as rectified by the substitution in his covenant of the words "such an annual sum as after deduction of British income tax at a rate up to but not exceeding 7s. 6d. in the £ will leave the sum of £1,000 per annum" for the words already quoted. He now sought rectification of the original deed by the insertion therein of the words substituted by the supplementary deed, his object being to place himself in a position in which he would be entitled to claim deductions from sur-tax as against the Inland Revenue.

HELD : (i) no relief being required as between the parties, the court would not exercise its discretionary remedy of rectification.

Dicta of EVERSLED, J., in Van der Linde v. Van der Linde ([1947] Ch. 310, 311 ; 176 L.T. 298), applied.

(ii) The parties in negotiation had rejected the very words it was now sought to insert in the deed. They did not appreciate the legal consequences of the wording which they had adopted. That was not a legitimate ground for rectification.

ACTION for rectification of a deed on the ground that it did not represent the true intention of the parties. HARMAN, J., dismissed the action. The facts appear in the judgment.

Honeyman for the plaintiff, the husband, the covenantor.

Newsom for the first defendant, the wife, the covenantee.

Colinvaux for the second and third defendants, the trustees.

HARMAN, J. : This is a case of some difficulty. The plaintiff sues his former wife and the trustees of a deed of covenant dated Apr. 16, 1941, for rectification of that deed. When the matter came before me both the wife and the trustees had put in defences admitting all the allegations in the statement of claim. By my direction the trustees have withdrawn their defence and have substituted for it a defence that, while admitting the execution of the deed, they do not admit the other allegations in the statement of claim, but submit to act as the court directs.

The parties were married in 1919, and there were two children, born in 1920 and 1922. On Apr. 3, 1940, a decree nisi for divorce was pronounced and it was made absolute on Oct. 14, 1940. Before the hearing of the divorce proceedings, which were brought by the wife against her husband, there was considerable discussion between the solicitors of the parties, first, as to alimony pendente lite, and then as to maintenance both for the wife and for the children up to the time when they should reach a certain age. The plaintiff was a substantial man of business and there were considerable disputes about what his assets were. Those discussions go back to 1939 and the first matter I need mention is a letter from the husband's solicitors on Oct. 17, 1939, in which they make this statement: "Our client is paying to your client £600 a year free of tax and to the daughter £120 a year free of tax," and they suggest that those payments should be continued pendente lite; those terms were not accepted. There was no agreement of any sort when the decree was made absolute in October, 1940, and after that event the solicitors returned to the question of maintenance and in a letter of Feb. 4, 1941, the wife's solicitors set out the terms with which she would be content. There had evidently been an interview between the parties' solicitors in November, 1940, because that is referred to in the letter as "our interview with you in November last." The interview took place between Mr. Kusel, a solicitor, then practising in partnership with another under the firm name of Litchfield & Kusel, representing the husband, and Mr. Day, a managing clerk in the firm of Joynson-Hicks & Co., who were the solicitors in England for the wife, she being resident in Canada and having also Canadian agents acting for her. The letter contains the following passages:

"In substance the proposals you made are accepted, but we set out the terms according to our instructions in the following way: . . . (iii) Payment to Mrs. Whiteside of £1,000 per annum free of tax up to the rate of tax in the £ payable as at the date of the deed of covenant to be entered into between the parties for the permanent maintenance of Mrs. Whiteside and her two children and this during her lifetime . . . (iv) The terms when agreed to be wholly incorporated in a deed of covenant the provisions thereof to be secured both as to maintenance and otherwise by deposit of a sufficient block of shares."

Those were the terms which the wife's advisers put forward, but they were not assented to by the husband or his advisers as appears from a letter which he wrote to his solicitors on Feb. 11, 1941, in which he says:

"My offer of £1,000 annuity free of tax up to 7s. 6d. in the £ stands. I am not interested in their suggestion 'free of tax up to the rate as at the date of the covenant'."

There was a further meeting between Mr. Kusel and Mr. Day, between Feb. 12 and 19, of which there is a record in a letter of Feb. 19, 1941, written by Mr. Kusel to his client in which he says:

"I have now had an interview with Joynson-Hicks & Co. Although they have to get formal instructions from Canada I do not think that there will now be any difficulty in arriving at a final agreement."

At this interview Mr. Day, for the wife, had no authority to come to an agreement. All he could do was to say he would refer the terms to his client in Canada. Mr. Kusel had authority to agree to a demand of £1,000 a year, free of tax, up to 7s. 6d. in the £. Mr. Kusel before me said: "We agreed terms subject to confirmation in Canada that Mrs. Whiteside should be paid £1,000 a year free of tax up to 7s. 6d. in the pound." Mr. Day said very much the same thing: "We came to an agreement that Mrs. Whiteside should be paid £1,000 a year clear of tax up to 7s. 6d."

As a result of that interview and after obtaining authority from Canada Mr. Day drew the deed of covenant contemplated between the parties. It was expressed to be made between the husband, of the first part, the former wife, of the second part, and the two trustees, of the third part, and recital (5) is in these terms :

"It has been agreed between the parties hereto that the husband and his personal representatives shall pay to the wife during her life for the maintenance of herself and the said children such a sum as after deduction of tax at the rate of not more than 7s. 6d. in the £ shall amount to £1,000 per annum."

By cl. 1 (1) in the operative part of the draft, the husband was expressed to covenant that he would :

"... during the life of the wife pay to the wife such a sum after deduction of income tax at the rate of not more than 7s. 6d. in the £ as shall represent £1,000 per annum payable in advance . . ."

Mr. Day sent the draft in that form to Mr. Kusel, who altered it into the form in which the deed was finally executed. Recital (5) now reads :

"The husband and his personal representatives shall pay to the wife during her life for the maintenance of herself and the said children the sum of £1,000 per annum free of British income tax up to but not exceeding 7s. 6d. in the £."

By cl. 1 (1) of the operative part the husband now covenants :

"... during the life of the wife . . . to pay to the wife for her maintenance the sum of £1,000 per annum free of British income tax up to but not exceeding 7s. 6d. in the £ payable in advance . . ."

The altered draft was accepted by Mr. Day who told me he was under the impression that the alterations had not in any way changed the rights of his client under the deed. Mr. Kusel said that he altered the draft because, it being a divorce matter, he thought it right to follow the form so far as he could of orders in the Divorce Court to pay annuities free of tax. In pursuance of that covenant the husband paid his wife on a basis of freedom from income tax at 7s. 6d. in the £. During the first two years he obtained from the Crown deductions for the purposes of his assessment to sur-tax on the footing that that was his legal liability. It then appears to have been observed by someone that that was not so. When the Crown took the point (as in the interests of other taxpayers it was bound to) it appeared that, having regard to s. 23 (2) of the General Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, there was no right to pay the annuity without deduction. The husband thereupon started this action. When he started it the wife and the trustees may have had some interest in the case. The deed contains certain provisions whereby recourse may be had to shares in the hands of the trustees by way of collateral security, and, therefore, it might be said that they had some interest in seeing the deed rectified. However, on Mar. 30, 1948, after action brought the husband executed a supplemental deed whereby he agreed that the deed should be treated as rectified and as always having contained the terms in which rectification is now asked. From that moment the wife and the trustees had not the slightest interest in the action. Its only object is to obtain for the husband a weapon with which he can defend himself against the claims of the Revenue or make claims against it. The prayer to the statement of claim is in these terms :

"Rectification of the said deed of covenant by substituting in the fifth recital thereof and in cl. 1 (1) thereof the words 'such an annual sum as after deduction of British income tax at a rate up to but not exceeding 7s. 6d. in the £ will leave the sum of £1,000 per annum' for the words 'the sum of £1,000 per annum free of British income tax up to but not exceeding 7s. 6d. in the £'."

It was appreciated that the objection might be taken that the Crown was the only person concerned beyond the plaintiff. Therefore, the Crown was asked whether it wished to be joined as a party, and it intimated that it did not wish to be so joined.

Similar circumstances existed in Van der Linde v. Van der Linde (1) where there was a voluntary deed of covenant by a settlor in favour of his sister, which, it was said, was intended to make a tax-free provision for her. The settlor had always paid her tax-free and continued to do so, but to better his position vis-a-vis the Revenue he brought the action. According to the headnote it was held that, as the proposed rectification was not one which would benefit the parties inter se, the court would not exercise its jurisdiction to rectify the deed. In that case the Crown appeared as amicus curiae in opposition to the claim. I take leave to doubt whether the case justifies the headnote. That is not what EVERSHED, J., decided. In fact, the judge decided that he was not satisfied on the evidence that there was any common mistake or that rectification could be had and, therefore, the action failed on the facts. The learned judge did, however, make some observations which are extremely pertinent to what I have here to decide. He said ([1947] Ch. 310) :

"It is a deed of covenant inter partes, executed, however, only by the plaintiff. Having regard to the form of the deed, it is plain that it disentitled, as between himself and the taxing authority, the plaintiff from claiming relief, or deduction from liability, on the footing of an obligation to pay, with income tax at 10s. in the pound, a gross sum of £800. From the time that that circumstance was discovered, it was, of course, a simple matter to remedy the defect by means of some amendment of the original deed, or the execution of a new one, assuming always that there was no objection raised on the part of the covenantee."

Of the beneficiary he says (ibid.) :

"Certainly she was in no way affected as regards the benefaction she received on its coming into existence and therefore could throw no light whatever on the matter which has been litigated. But the execution of the amendment, or deed of rectification, has, of course, not had the effect of making the amendments retrospective so as to entitle the plaintiff, from the date of the execution of the original deed, Oct. 8, 1942, to the tax relief which he sought. On those facts it is said on behalf of the plaintiff that what he intended to effect has been proved . . . It is said on behalf of the Crown that there is no desire to take advantage of a mistake, though it must also be borne in mind that, since the question is one of the tax obligation of one subject, anything like unregulated benevolence towards him would be at the expense of other subjects. The Crown also points out that, whether or not the discretion should in any case be exercised, it is quite plain that the rectification of documents is a remedy which these courts grant only on most careful consideration of the circumstances sought to justify the claim."

He considered a question about voluntary deeds to which I need not refer and continued (ibid., 311) :

"Further it is said on the Crown's behalf that, where on the facts it is shown that there never was any obstacle as between the two parties to the deed to put right any mistake, it would not be a case in which on any view the court should exercise its discretion, more particularly where the object is on the plaintiff's part to obtain, so to speak, by a side wind an advantage which he could have obtained and which he only lost through the error which was made. On the view that I take of it, it is not necessary, and I do not think, therefore, probably desirable, that I should express any concluded view on those propositions . . . But in the case of such a deed, and all the more particularly when the object is to obtain by a side wind some advantage to the settlor without any regard to the apparent intention on the face of the deed and to the fact that the covenantee has never suffered any damage from what is said to have gone wrong, I am satisfied that the reminders one finds in the text books to approach matters with caution are to be particularly borne in mind."

With every word of that I agree, and it seems to me that this is a case in which I ought not to grant the plaintiff rectification. The action is not to put right anything which needs putting right. That has been done already. The covenantee has already received, on any view, all that she is entitled to. The covenantor has not, in any way, failed to pay it. There is no relief that the parties require. What is sought is a side wind to help the plaintiff against the Revenue. I do not think in those circumstances the court ought to exercise its discretionary remedy of rectification and on that ground alone I should be disposed to dismiss this case, but it may be thought elsewhere that that is a wrong view to take so I think it is incumbent on me to consider whether, apart from that, the plaintiff makes out his case. A B

This is a very striking case in that the very words which I am now asked to put into the deed by way of rectification were considered by the parties when the matter was in negotiation and deliberately and with set purpose rejected. The amended draft shews that the parties deliberately intended to contract in the very words which they used. The prior agreement, so to call it (although a prior agreement in a binding sense is not necessary for rectification), was that Mrs. Whiteside should be paid maintenance of £1,000 a year free of tax up to 7s. 6d., and those are the very words in the deed. When it appears that in the interim between the agreement and the execution of the deed one side has suggested that another form of words should be used which have in law a different effect and those words have been deliberately rejected by the consent of the parties, then it seems to me, if there is to be rectification, it must be on a principle different from any of which I have heard in connection with that remedy. I take the law to be correctly stated in KERR ON FRAUD AND MISTAKE, 6th ed., p. 620 : C D E

"Though the court will rectify an instrument which fails through some mistake of the draughtsman in point of law to carry out the real agreement between the parties, it is not sufficient in order to create an equity for rectification that there has been a mistake as to the legal construction or the legal consequences of an instrument."

The parties here meant to make the very contract which they have made, but they say they did not appreciate what the legal consequences would be, and they, therefore, ask the court to rectify their mistake of law. I do not take the view that that is a legitimate ground for rectification. F

The question, or something like it, has been considered in a number of cases. One finds a statement by that great authority, TURNER, L.J., in Stone v. Godfrey (2) (5 De G.M. & G. 90) : G

"... this court has power ... to relieve against mistakes in law as well as against mistakes in fact."

The mistake in law there, however, was a different matter. The plaintiff was advised that he was not entitled to an estate by the courtesy, and, acting on that advice, obtained the estate for his daughter. He came to the court and said he had been wrongly advised and wanted rectification. Even if he had got it, that would not be the kind of mistake there is here. It was argued that the present deed could be rectified because of two decisions. The first is that of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., in Burroughes v. Abbott (3) where the Divorce Court made an order that the wife was to have a sum of money free of income tax. When the conveyancer to the court came to translate that into a deed he put it in a H form which offended against r. 23, and rectification was asked to make the deed conform with the order. P. O. LAWRENCE, J., was confronted with the objection that a mistake of law could not be rectified and he said ([1922] 1 Ch. 95) :

“ . . . then it is said that the mistake made by the parties was a mistake in law and that the court has no power to relieve against the consequences of mistakes in law. In my judgment the general proposition that the court has no such power is unsound : see e.g., Stone v. Godfrey (2), but, be that as it may, the proposition in my opinion has no application to the facts of this case.”

I do not disagree with any part of that. What he was doing was to make the document conform with the Divorce Court order. Significantly, during the course of the case the only hesitation was whether the Divorce Court should make the rectification or the Chancery Division.

In Jervis v. Howle & Talke Colliery Co., Ltd. (4), before CLAUSON, J., there was an oral agreement between the parties that the defendant should take a lease of the plaintiff's coal mine at a royalty of 3d. a ton free of tax. A memorandum of that agreement contained the words “free of tax,” and a lease translated those words literally into a covenant to pay royalty free of tax. The plaintiff claimed rectification by substituting for the payment of royalty “free of tax” a provision for the “payment of royalty of such amount as after deduction of income tax of the standard rate from time to time should leave threepence.” The difference between that case and this may not be very wide. It is, I think, significant that CLAUSON, J., said that Burroughes v. Abbott (3) was precisely in point. I am very diffident about differing from that learned judge, but it does not seem to me that that is right. The memorandum in the case before him was a consensual document whereas the order of the Divorce Court in Burroughes v. Abbott (3) was an order in invitum, and that seems to be a matter which the judge overlooked. However that may be, the learned judge had not before him the extraordinary feature I have here—that the parties have rejected the very words they now seek that I should supply. I do not think that that case compels me to say that in every case where the words “free of tax” are used rectification may be granted on proof of mistake, and in that connection the observations of BENNETT, J., in Fredensen v. Rothschild (5) are significant. In that case a lady brought an action for rectification of a deed of covenant on the ground that the terms had been that she was to have £550 free of tax and that meant such a sum after deduction of tax should leave her £550. She did not satisfy the learned judge about her recollection of the matter whether or not the word ‘tax’ was ever used. BENNETT, J., said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 435) :

“However, supposing that that conclusion of fact which has been reached is not the right one, and that the word ‘tax’ was used. The high watermark of the case of counsel for the plaintiff is that I ought to find it proved as a fact that Lord Rothschild said to her ‘You are to have £550 free of tax.’ Take those words ‘£550 free of tax.’ What do they mean? Do they mean that there is agreement as to the words which are to be used to give effect to the bargain they have made? Counsel for the plaintiff agrees that, if those words had been put into a deed, they would not have had the effect of freeing the plaintiff from liability to income tax and of throwing the burden of the income tax upon the shoulders of Rothschild. He says, however, that it has been settled by two authorities. One was a decision of CLAUSON, J., in Jervis v. Howle & Talke Colliery Co., Ltd. (4) and the other, Burroughes v. Abbott (3). These cases decided that, if parties have agreed that a sum shall be paid free of tax, they do not mean what they have said, but they mean payment of such a sum as, after deduction of tax, will produce the specified sum . . . I am troubled about it very largely because I have had the pleasure and advantage of reading a most delightful and entertaining lecture by MACKINNON, L.J., which he calls 'Accurate and clear expression.' At the conclusion he says: 'You may sometimes hear people who have made, or think they have made, an agreement, talk about "getting it put into legal form." Rightly understanding, they ought to mean "getting it expressed in perfectly clear language." And if their own amateur effort is in truth a real agreement, no further process is necessary. What usually is necessary is to help them to make, not merely to express, an agreement'."

BENNETT, J., then points out that he has great doubt what exactly the words "free of tax" do mean. I am visited by the same trouble as BENNETT, J., was on that score.

My view of the impropriety of rectifying in these circumstances is supported by an Irish case, Jackson v. Stopford (6). That was a case about a lease and it arose out of an Irish statute which prohibited payment by landlords of certain poor rates assessed on occupiers. It was held:

"By the High Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal in Southern Ireland and the judgment of GORDON, J., that the court cannot rectify or cancel a deed or agreement because its terms operate differently from what the parties intended owing to their mistake as to the general law applicable to the transaction."

C

The decision is by the Supreme Court then representing both North and South Ireland and is one of considerable weight though, of course, not binding on me. The point made was that if the actual agreement made was translated into the deed the effect would not be produced which the parties said ought to have been produced. There was no doubt what they had agreed. They had only made a mistake regarding the legal effect of their agreement. I do not think I need refer to the case in detail, but it supports the proposition I have advanced.

D

I do not think this is a case in which, even if I were otherwise disposed, which I am not, I can assist the plaintiff. He has not satisfied the necessary conditions. All he proves is that an agreement was made which both parties intended. It has turned out to have a different legal effect from that which was anticipated, but that is no ground for rectification, and I, therefore, dismiss the action.

E

Action dismissed on the plaintiff's undertaking to pay his own costs and those of the trustees as between solicitor and client, and the first defendant's undertaking to pay her own costs. No order was made as to costs.

Re CITY OF LONDON REAL PROPERTY CO., LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 2, 3, 17, 1949.]

War Damage—Value payment—Value after damage—Basis of valuation—Hypothetical sale—Restrictions affecting property—“Any restriction imposed . . . under an enactment . . . to which the hereditament was subject at the time immediately after the occurrence of the war damage”—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 10 (1), (2); sched. II, para. 1 (1) (c) (iii).

The appellants were the owners of a warehouse in London which was so seriously damaged by enemy action on May 10, 1941, that it became a total loss within the meaning of the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 7 (2), and the appellants were entitled to a value payment under that section. By s. 10 (1) of the Act the amount of a value payment is the difference in the value of the property before damage and its value after damage, the basis of valuation, in each case, being, by s. 10 (2), a hypothetical sale of the property on Mar. 31, 1939, on the terms specified in sched. II, paras. 1 and 2, to the Act. Under these provisions, the hypothetical sale is a sale of the fee simple in the property, and, by para. 1 (1) (c) of sched. II, it is to be a sale made “subject to (i) any restrictive covenant, easement, quasi-easement, or other right inuring for the benefit of other land, (ii) any public right of way . . . or other right inuring for the benefit of the public or of any section thereof, and (iii) any restriction imposed by or under an enactment passed before the War Damage Act, 1941, to which the hereditament was subject at the time immediately after the occurrence of the war damage. . .” It was contended by the appellants that in estimating the value of the property after damage the provisions of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, regs. 50 and 51 (giving the competent authority power to forbid or do work on, or to requisition, land), and the restrictions on building operations imposed by reg. 56A (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1678, as amended by S.R. & O., 1941, No. 437) should be taken into consideration, as reducing the price which a purchaser would be likely to offer for the property.

Held: the restrictions referred to under head (iii) of sched. II, para. 1 (1) (c), to the Act of 1943 were (like those specified in heads (i) and (ii)) confined to restrictions which were peculiar to the property itself, and did not include the disabilities to which the property or its owner was subject in common with all other properties and owners of properties, and of which no express disclosure need have been made to an intending purchaser; no order had been made specifically with regard to the property under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 50 or reg. 51, and reg. 56A, and so these regulations, which applied to all property and not merely to the property in question, did not constitute restrictions imposed by or under an enactment passed before the War Damage Act, 1941, within the meaning of para. 1 (1) (c) (iii) of sched. II, so as to affect the value of the property after damage; and, therefore, the appellants failed.

[FOR THE WAR DAMAGE ACT, 1943, ss. 7 and 10, and sched. II, paras. 1 and 2, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 36, pp. 344, 348 and 434.]

H Case referred to:

APPEAL by way of Special Case from a determination of the War Damage Commission.

The appellants were entitled under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 7, to a value payment in respect of certain property which was a total loss within the meaning of that section. The War Damage Commission held that the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, regs. 50, 51 and 56A, did not constitute restrictions imposed by or under an enactment passed before the War Damage Act, 1941, within the meaning of sched. II, para. 1 (1) (c) (iii), to the Act of 1943, for the purpose of estimating the value of the property after damage. The appellants contended that the property should be valued subject to the provisions and restrictions of these regulations. VAISEY, J., held that a restriction within the meaning of sched. II, para. 1 (1) (c) (iii), was one which was peculiar to the particular property and not merely a disability to which all properties were subject, and he dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 17. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal by the City of London Real Property Co., Ltd., against a determination of the War Damage Commission with regard to a property known as Nos. 14 and 16, Norwich Street in the city of London. The appellants are the successors (in title and interest) to another company called Fenchurch Street Properties, Ltd., to whom, at all material times and for all material purposes, the property in question belonged. The facts are not in dispute. The property was a warehouse, erected in 1904, substantially constructed, and used for the purposes of a printers' business until May 10, 1941, when it was so seriously damaged by enemy action that it became a total loss within the meaning of the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 7. The before-damage value of the property is agreed by the War Damage Commission and the appellants to be £12,500. The dispute between them is as to its after-damage value. Their respective contentions, as set out in the Special Case which defines the issues arising on this appeal, may be summarised as follows. Both parties agree that the value of the property in the state in which it was immediately after the occurrence of the war damage is the amount which it might have been expected to realise on such a sale as is specified in sched. II, para. 2, to the Act, but the War Damage Commission say that such sale must be assumed to have been effected under the conditions (social, economic and political) existing on Mar. 31, 1939, and they say further that in estimating such value the provisions of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, regs. 50 and 51, and the restrictions imposed by reg. 56A of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1678, as amended by para. 4 of S.R. & O., 1941, No. 437, made under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Acts, 1939 and 1940), as in force on May 10, 1941, did not constitute restrictions imposed by or under an enactment passed before the War Damage Act, 1941, within the meaning of sched. II, para. 1 (1) (c) (iii) to the Act of 1943, and, again, that, in arriving at such value, it has to be assumed that all other land and buildings were, on Mar. 31, 1939, in their then actual physical condition, that is to say, unaffected by war damage. On their part the appellants say that the after-damage value of the property (ascertained by reference to prices current on Mar. 31, 1939) is to be taken to be the amount which the property in its damaged state might have been expected to realise on that date on such a sale as is specified in sched. II, para. 2, to the Act of 1943, if the building had been demolished by enemy action during a war and at a time when the physical condition of all other land and buildings was in the actual condition in which they were on May 10, 1941, and when (as was, undoubtedly, the case on that date) labour and materials for re-building were not readily available. They further in particular say that the property should be valued subject to the provisions of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, regs. 50 and 51 and the restrictions imposed by reg. 56A which had the effect of prohibiting building operations (with certain immaterial exceptions) and of exposing any possible purchaser of the property to the risk of requisition, thereby reducing the price which any purchaser would be likely to offer for the property.

The result of these alternative views appears to be that on the former view (that of the War Damage Commission) the £12,500 is divisible thus: £3,700 as after-damage value, and £8,800 as the appropriate value payment; whereas, on the appellants' view, £2,275 would be the after-damage value and £10,225 the value payment. The appellants' figures are not accepted by the War Damage Commission as correct, and, if the appellants' contentions are correct, their figures must be referred for further consideration by the appropriate tribunal. The dispute, therefore, involves a comparatively small sum of money, but I understand that the action is regarded as being to some extent a test case.

The question which I have to decide may be thus stated. How much of the conditions of the year 1941 are to be written back, as it were, into the conditions of 1939? The answer to that question, as it arises in the present case, appears to turn principally, if not exclusively, on the interpretation of a few words in sched. II to the Act of 1943. I must, in the first place, refer to s. 10 of the Act, which provides as follows:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, the amount of a value payment shall be an amount equal to the amount of the depreciation in the value of the hereditament caused by the war damage, that is to say, the amount by which the value of the hereditament in the state in which it was immediately after the occurrence of the damage is less than its value in the state in which it was immediately before the occurrence of the damage. (2) For the purpose of computing the amount of a value payment, the value of a hereditament in any state shall be ascertained by reference to prices current at Mar. 31, 1939, and shall be taken to be the amount which, if the hereditament had been on that day in that state, it might have been expected to realise on such a sale as is specified in para. 2 of sched. II to this Act made on that day . . ."

"Any state," in sub-s. (2), must mean, I think, "in either state." I now turn to sched. II. Paragraph 2 is:

"(1) For the purposes of s. 10 (2) of this Act, the sale by reference to which the value of a hereditament, whether in its state immediately before the occurrence of war damage or in the state by reference to which, as regards its state after damage, the depreciation in the value of the hereditament is to be determined, shall be a sale of the fee simple in the hereditament made as specified in para. 1 of this schedule, so however that the time to be referred to for the purposes of heads (c) and (d) of sub-para. (1) thereof shall be (a) as regards the valuation of the hereditament in its former state, the time immediately before the occurrence of the war damage; and (b) as regards the valuation of the hereditament in its latter state, the time immediately after the occurrence of the war damage. (2) For the said purpose the amount that the hereditament in its latter state might have been expected to realise on the said sale shall be ascertained on the assumption that it would have been possible to foresee, immediately after the taking of the action or measures from which the war damage resulted, all the war damage which is known at the time when valuation is made to have resulted therefrom."

Paragraph 1 (1) of sched. II is:

"For the purposes of s. 7 (2) of this Act, the sale by reference to which there is to be ascertained the amount which the fee simple in a developed hereditament might have been expected to realise on a sale thereof in the state in which it would be after the execution of works, or as a site, shall be a sale made (a) in the open market; (b) with vacant possession;

(c) subject to (i) any restrictive covenant, easement, quasi-easement, or other right inuring for the benefit of other land, (ii) any public right of way, right of common, or other right inuring for the benefit of the public or of any section thereof, and (iii) any restriction imposed by or under an enactment passed before the War Damage Act, 1941, to which the hereditament was subject at the time immediately after the occurrence of the war damage or, in the case of an ascertainment for the purposes of s. 16 (1) of this Act in the case of a hereditament which has sustained war damage on more than one occasion, immediately after the subsequent occasion mentioned in that sub-section; (d) free from any other incumbrance, and without regard to any liability of the hereditament to become subject after the said time to any restriction by virtue of any enactment."

I regard as vital in the present case the words of para. 1 (1) (c) (iii). The alternative words at the end of para. 1 (1) (c) (iii) do not apply in the present case. Paragraph 1 (2) deals with the application of the paragraph, with certain modifications, to Scotland.

Reading ss. 7 and 10 of the Act and paras. 1 (1) and 2 of sched. II to the Act together, it appears to me that the hypothetical sale of the property in question in its state after damage must be considered to have been a sale effected on Mar. 31, 1939, of such property in the condition in which it was at the moment of time immediately following the occurrence of the war damage (say on the morning of the next day, which here was May 11, 1941) subject (inter alia) to any restriction affecting the property at that moment of time, or that morning, imposed by or under any enactment passed before the War Damage Act, 1941, i.e., before Mar. 26, 1941, that being the day on which that Act received the Royal Assent. The point which I have to decide may, in my view, be further formulated thus. Are the restrictions referred to in para. 1 (1) (c) (iii) of sched. II confined to those which affected the property itself in particular, or specially, and were ejusdem generis with the matters specified under heads (i) and (ii) of para. 1 (1) (c) (which, be it remembered, are restrictive covenants, etc., and public rights of way, etc.), which I understand to be the contention of the War Damage Commission—or do they include (as the appellants would say) such restrictions as affected all other similar property in general, without special application to this property in particular and whether or not they were ejusdem generis with the matters specified under the preceding heads (i) and (ii)?

It is, in my judgment, important to bear in mind that it is not strictly accurate to speak of restrictions affecting or imposed on property. It is the owner of the hereditament who is restricted—restricted, that is, in his freedom to use it as he likes. Some of the restrictions on him are of a perfectly general character. For instance, the owner of a house may not use it for an immoral purpose, nor so as to create a public or private nuisance. He may not contravene local bye-laws in regard to building operations. He may not use it for harbouring the king's enemies or fugitive criminals. That is the first class of restrictions, and no vendor need call a purchaser's attention to their existence. The other class of restrictions consists of particular restrictions. This class includes the matters enumerated under heads (i) and (ii) of para. 1 (1) (c) of sched. II, to which I have already referred. It also, in my judgment, would include a prescribed building line, a requisitioning order, and similar statutory or departmental restrictions directed against the property itself or the owner of it in particular. Do the words under head (iii) of para. 1 (1) (c) include the first class or do they include only the second? The risk of requisition is a useful example by which to test the matter. No doubt, the existence of the risk was, to some extent, depreciatory, but on May 11, 1941, it was a risk to which all property, or, at any rate, every warehouse, was subject. So, too, with regard to the prohibition or limitation of building operations which, undoubtedly, on that date would have been a consideration tending to reduce the value to a purchaser of any one of those bombed sites with which we have become so familiar during the last few years. The consideration, however, was not of special application to this particular property, Nos. 14 and 16, Norwich Street, but applied with equal force to every comparable warehouse or vacant site in the city of London, or, indeed, elsewhere.

- A In my judgment, the contention of the War Damage Commission on this point is well-founded. Looking again at para. 1 (1) (c) of sched. II to the Act, I find that the hypothetical sale is to be subject under head (i) to restrictive covenants, etc., and under head (ii) to rights of way, etc., which are obviously incidents of the tenure of the particular property, peculiar to itself as distinguished from other properties. It seems to me to follow that the restrictions under head (iii) must likewise be such as are peculiar to the property itself and not the disabilities to which it, or the owner of it, was subject in common with all other properties and owners of property and of which no express disclosure ought to or need have been made to an intending purchaser. If the property had, in fact, been requisitioned under an order or notice which was operative on May 11, 1941, or if the use of the site had been expressly controlled by some effective direction of a competent authority (such order, C notice or direction being made or given under an enactment passed before Mar. 26, 1941), then, in my judgment, a restriction within the meaning of head (iii) would have existed, but nothing of the kind is alleged in the circumstances of the present case. The artificial and conjectural hypotheses which I have to formulate under this and other comparable legislation involve considerations which are not easy to grasp—or, perhaps, I should say that D I, at least, do not find them so.

- I have dealt with what I think was the appellants' main point. I need not refer to the alleged "restrictions" in detail. The Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 50, enabled certain authorities to carry out works on lands in private ownership, reg. 51 was the requisitioning provision, reg. 56A limited E the amount of money which it was permissible to lay out on property—i.e., on any property, and not this property in particular. I propose to confine this judgment to the facts of this particular case. The property is not one which is or was at any material time affected by such enactments as the Roads Improvement Act, 1925 (see s. 5 as to the prescription of building lines), the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, the Restriction of Ribbon Development Act, 1935, and the Rent Restrictions Acts, but, if it were so affected, F directly and immediately, and not merely in some remote though imaginable contingency, it may be that such enactments would be held to impose restrictions within the meaning of the head (iii) to which I have in this judgment so often referred. I leave that question open to be decided when, if ever, it arises, but I may in passing refer to Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract (1).

- G I will deal very briefly indeed with the contention that the sale on Mar. 31, 1939, must be considered as a sale of the property with its surroundings not in the condition in which they were on that date but in the condition in which they were on May 11, 1941. I will merely say that I am unable to accept that contention. In the result, I think that the findings of the War Damage Commission are based on a proper interpretation of the law, and this appeal H must be dismissed with costs.

CLARKE v. GRANT AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ.), March 22, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Notice to quit—Waiver—Acceptance of rent in respect of period after termination of tenancy.

A
A yearly tenant of a dwelling-house at a rent payable monthly in advance, received a valid notice to quit expiring on Apr. 30, 1948. Early in May, 1948, the tenant paid one month's rent in respect of the month of May, 1948, to the landlord's agent, who accepted it in the belief that it was rent payable in arrear for the month of April, 1948. In an action by the landlord for possession,

B
HELD: the acceptance by the landlord of rent in respect of a period after the termination of the tenancy by the notice to quit did not operate as a waiver of the notice, and the landlord was entitled to possession.

F
APPEAL by a landlord from an order of His Honour DEPUTY JUDGE SMYLIE, sitting at Birkenhead County Court on Sept. 23, 1948, whereby he refused an order for possession of a dwelling-house on the ground that the notice to quit served by the landlord had been waived by the acceptance of rent in respect of a period after the date of its expiry. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, holding that there was no evidence on which the learned judge could find an intention to create a new tenancy. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

C. J. I. Cunningham for the landlord.

J. Robertson Crichton for the tenants.

H
LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The plaintiff (the landlord) brought an action to recover possession of a dwelling-house which the defendants (the tenants) were occupying on a yearly tenancy at a rent of £75 a year. There had been a previous lease, and the defendants had been holding over as yearly tenants. On Mar. 26, 1947, the tenants received from the landlord a notice to quit on Apr. 30, 1948. No one disputes that that was a good notice, but early in May one of the tenants went to the landlord's agent and paid to him a sum of money which was equivalent to one month's rent. The agent, whose evidence does not appear to have been challenged, said that he received that rent in the belief that it was rent in arrear in respect of the previous month. In fact, the rent had always been paid in advance, and, therefore, there was a mistake in the agent's mind, he accepting the rent as rent paid for the month that had expired whereas the tenant was paying it as rent in advance. The learned deputy judge held that the notice to quit had been waived. If one may say so with respect to the learned deputy judge, he fell into the error of confusing an acceptance of rent after a notice to quit with an acceptance of rent after notice that an act of forfeiture has been committed. If a landlord seeks to recover possession of property on the ground that breach of covenant has entitled him to a forfeiture, it has always been held that acceptance of rent after notice waives the forfeiture, the reason being that in the case of a forfeiture the landlord has the option of saying whether or not he will treat the breach of covenant as a forfeiture. The lease is voidable, not void, and if the landlord accepts rent after notice of a forfeiture it has always been held that he thereby acknowledges or recognises that the lease is continuing. With regard to the payment of rent after a notice to quit, however, that result has never followed. If a proper notice to quit has been given in respect of a periodic tenancy, such as a yearly tenancy, the effect of the notice is to bring the tenancy to an end just as effectually as if there has been a term which has expired. Therefore, the tenancy having been brought to an end by a notice to quit, a payment of rent after the termination of the tenancy would only operate in favour of the tenant if it could be shown that the parties intended that there should be a new tenancy.

That has been the law ever since it was laid down by the Court of King's Bench in Doe d. Cheney v. Batten (1) where LORD MANSFIELD said (1 Cowp. 245) :

"The question therefore is, quo animo the rent was received, and what the real intention of both parties was ?"

It is impossible to say that the parties in this case intended that there should be a new tenancy. The landlord always desired to get possession of the premises. That is why he gave his notice to quit. The mere mistake of his agent in accepting the money as rent which had accrued is no evidence that the landlord was agreeing to a new tenancy.

The importance of the present case is that it gives this court an opportunity of overruling once and for all the decision of the Divisional Court in Hartell v. Blackler (2). That case, unfortunately, was argued on one side only, and the court, if one may say so with all respect, fell into exactly the same error as the learned deputy judge has fallen into in this case of confusing the effect of an acceptance of rent after a notice of forfeiture and the effect of acceptance of rent after the expiration of a notice to quit. They applied the doctrine that always has applied in regard to the acceptance of rent after a notice of forfeiture—indeed, they based their judgment on the well-known case of Croft v. Lumley (3)—and held that where a landlord had accepted rent after a notice to quit had been given he had given up all the benefit under the notice to quit.

Hartell v. Blackler (2) was expressly dissented from by another Divisional Court in Davies v. Bristow (4). Previously Hunt v. Bliss (5) had been decided, but it had not been brought to the notice of the court which decided Hartell's case (2). The Divisional Court in Davies v. Bristow (4), therefore, were confronted with two conflicting decisions and LUSH, J., in a most convincing judgment, explained why he preferred Hunt v. Bliss (5) to Hartell v. Blackler (2).

In the opinion of this court, without any hesitation, Hartell v. Blackler (2) was wrongly decided and must be taken to be overruled. The deputy judge did not apply his mind to whether there was a new agreement come to by the parties because he relied on the acceptance of rent as conclusive of a waiver, but we can reverse his judgment because, in our opinion, there is no evidence on which a new agreement could be inferred. This appeal must be allowed.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

PHILLIPS v. LAMDIN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Croom-Johnson, J.), March 7, 1949.]

Lease—Assignment—Delay in completion—Award of damages after completion—Removal of fixture after contract—Order to replace.

On Feb. 20, 1947, the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to purchase from the defendant the lease of a house held by him, and Mar. 28, 1947, was fixed as the date for completion. On Mar. 25, the plaintiff's solicitors sent the draft assignment to the defendant's solicitors, emphasising in a covering letter that the plaintiff was "most anxious to complete if possible on the date fixed . . . She will be put to considerable trouble and inconvenience if she is forced to cancel arrangements she has already made for moving in on the 29th instant . . . The completion date was fixed after considerable discussion and your client has been fully aware that these premises were and still are required for our client's personal occupation." The draft was approved, but the defendant informed the plaintiff that he was unable to arrange for possession on Mar. 28 owing to unforeseen difficulties which had arisen in respect of the house into which he himself proposed to move. On Mar. 27, the defendant's solicitors wrote stating that it would be impossible to give possession for another six weeks. The plaintiff's solicitors replied emphasising that it was a matter of the greatest urgency that the defendant should be given possession of the house, that a staff had been engaged, and that a delay of a month would ruin the plaintiff's practice as a naturopath. The plaintiff's solicitors did not send to the defendant's solicitors the engrossment of the assignment until Apr. 9. On Apr. 15, a writ for specific performance was issued by the plaintiff, and in endeavouring to serve it on May 9 her solicitors discovered that the house was empty. On June 5 the purchase was completed. In an action by the plaintiff for damages in respect of the delay in completing the contract, it was agreed that time was not of the essence of the contract.

HELD : except where delay was due to a defect in the title or a conveyancing difficulty, damages were recoverable for delay in the performance of a contract for the sale of an interest in land ; the plaintiff had proved damage resulting from the defendant's delay ; and, therefore, she was entitled to succeed.

When viewing the house prior to the contract to purchase, the plaintiff observed an ornate door matching a mantel-piece which was attributed to the design of one of the brothers Adams. On taking possession she found that the door had been removed, and replaced by one of plain white wood.

HELD : so far from observing his duty to use reasonable care to preserve the property, the defendant had himself despoiled it, and an order would be made that he should, at his own cost, replace the door.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract.

The parties contracted, subject to the National Conditions of Sale, for the plaintiff to purchase the lease of a house held by the defendant. Completion was delayed owing to the default of the defendant, and, after the assignment of the lease, the plaintiff claimed damages. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., found that damage had been proved, and made an award accordingly. The relevant facts are set out in the headnote.

T. G. Roche for the plaintiff.

H. G. Garland for the defendant.

C

CROOM-JOHNSON, J., stated the facts, and, dealing first with the removal of the door, continued: According to Clarke v. Ramuz (1) in the Court of Appeal, where a vendor remains in possession pending completion he owes a duty to take reasonable care to preserve the property. It is sometimes said that he is a trustee of the property, but, if he is, he is not an ordinary trustee. There are, however, as was stated by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Clarke v. Ramuz (1) ([1891] 2 Q.B. 459) certain duties imposed on him by law

"... one of which is to use reasonable care to preserve the property in a reasonable state of preservation, and, so far as may be, as it was when the contract was made."

So that, even if somebody else had removed this door, the defendant might have been responsible, but in the present case the defendant, in the teeth of his contract, has removed something which is not a mere trifle. I entertain no doubt that he is liable to replace the door. You cannot make a new Adams door. In these times you cannot re-fashion a door or make a copy. It seems to me that it is proper to order the defendant to return the door to where it belongs and to pay the expenses of so doing. I do not see how damages can be an adequate remedy, and I do not mean, if I can avoid it, to give the defendant the opportunity of paying damages in lieu. The plaintiff must give up the existing door.

[His LORDSHIP, having held that as from Apr. 9 there had been wilful delay and default on the defendant's part, proceeded:] With regard to the rest of the case, it is said: "This is mere delay. You cannot recover damages for mere delay for non-completion of a contract for the sale of land or an interest in land." Counsel for the defendant has argued that, if time is not of the essence of the contract here—and everybody agrees it is not—time might be made of the essence by giving an appropriate notice during the progress of the negotiations towards completion, and that when time had been made of the essence it would be possible for the plaintiff to rescind the contract because of delay. He cites as an example Webb v. Hughes (2). It is true that that is one thing the purchaser can do if he is so minded, but the plaintiff does not want to rescind.

G

No doubt, in an ordinary contract for the sale of goods, if there is no time limit fixed or no time limit which is of the essence of the contract, it is possible to give express notice to the other party to complete within a certain time, and, if completion is not made within that time, to rescind the contract and claim re-payment of any money paid and damages, but that is not the end of the matter. I have never heard it suggested that, in an ordinary contract for the sale of goods, when a reasonable time has elapsed and the goods have not been delivered, the only thing that can be done is to give notice and then seek to rescind and recover damages. Damages for breach of contract for delay, even after the sale of the goods has been completed, are always recoverable if the plaintiff can prove damage. There is no distinction to be drawn in general, so far as I am able to ascertain from passages in DART ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER, 8th ed., vol. 2, and WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER, 4th ed., vol. 2, between a contract for the sale of land and any other contract, except that where the contract is not completed owing to some conveyancing difficulty or some difficulty with regard to title and the matter goes on, a court of equity will not give damages for loss of the bargain, the reason, apparently, being that the uncertainty of title in this country is thought to make an exception to the general rule. This exception is known as the rule in Bain v. Fothergill (3).

That being so, I cannot see that the argument of counsel for the defendant can be accepted. In Jones v. Gardiner (4) BYRNE, J., had to deal with this problem, and also with another argument advanced by counsel for the defendant in this case, that, where the contract provides for payment of interest when there is delay in completion, no claim for damages for delay can arise. BYRNE, J., decided that where the delay has been caused by default of the vendor, not in consequence of want of or defect in title or conveyancing difficulties, but by reason of the vendor not having used reasonable diligence to perform his contract, damages could be recovered. He said ([1902] 1 Ch. 195):

"There is no question in the present case of want of good faith, as evinced by any desire to repudiate the contract, or of fraud; but, having carefully considered all the proceedings and the correspondence and the evidence, I am of opinion that a very considerable part of the delay which has occurred in carrying out the contract (after making full allowance for the time which may fairly be considered to have been due to difficulties in making out title, and to a controversy as to the form of the conveyance) has arisen entirely from the default of the vendor—default, that is, in doing what he could reasonably and fairly have done had he been duly careful to fulfil his contract. So far as the materials before me enable me to judge, the contract might certainly have been carried out, making a liberal allowance for delay in consequence of the difficulties and discussions I have referred to, three months earlier than the actual date of completion."

In the case now before me—except that, by some oversight after they had been told that completion would not be made on the proper date, the engrossment of the assignment was not forwarded until Apr. 9—no part of the delay can be attributed to the actions of the plaintiff's solicitors. BYRNE, J., then goes on to deal with Bain v. Fothergill (3) and he says that Engell v. Fitch (5)

"... which was considered in Bain v. Fothergill (3), so far as it determines that where the breach of contract arises, not from inability to make a good title, but from refusal to take necessary steps to give the purchaser possession pursuant to the contract, further damages may be recovered, appears to remain good law. Jaques v. Miller (6) is a distinct authority for giving damages against a vendor, in addition to specific performance, in respect of delay caused by wilful refusal to carry out a contract, and for the measure to be applied in ascertaining the damages, namely, such damages as may reasonably be said to have naturally arisen from the delay, or which may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as likely to arise from the partial breach of contract. This case was followed in Royal Bristol Permanent Building Society v. Bomash (7)."

The learned judge in that case acquitted the defendant of any ulterior motive. I do not find it necessary to go as far as that in this case, but it seems to me that the plaintiff has made out her case for damages, and the only question in my mind is whether I can give her damages from Mar. 28 down to June 5 or whether I should give her damages only from Apr. 9. I think that, on the whole, it is safer to say that, as there was a breach by the plaintiff's solicitors in not sending the engrossment of the assignment at once, although I do not think it made any difference to anybody, damages should start from Apr. 9.

His Lordship assessed the damages at £194 17s. 6d. and gave judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Birkett, JJ.), March 25, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Receiving—Summing-up—Explanation by prisoner of possession raising doubt in minds of jury.

On the trial of the applicant for receiving, the deputy recorder directed the jury that, if the applicant gave an explanation of his possession of the stolen goods "which, although you do not think it to be true, you think might possibly be true, then he is entitled to be acquitted".

HELD: this direction was unduly favourable to the applicant as any explanation "might possibly be true." A proper direction would be that possession of property recently stolen, where no explanation is given by the prisoner, is evidence which can go to the jury that the prisoner received the property knowing it to have been stolen, but, bearing in mind that the onus of proof is always on the prosecution, if the prisoner gives an explanation which raises a doubt in the minds of the jury whether or not he knew that the property has been stolen, the ordinary rule applies, the case has not been proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and the prisoner is entitled to be acquitted.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against a conviction of receiving.

The applicant was convicted at Leeds City Quarter Sessions and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. The Court of Criminal Appeal now dismissed the appeal, but LORD GODDARD, C.J., indicated a proper form of summing-up to be adopted in receiving cases.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered this judgment of the court. The applicant was convicted at the Leeds City Quarter Sessions of receiving 64½ yards of cloth which had been stolen from a stationary car in Leeds between 3.30 p.m. and 6 p.m. in the afternoon, and was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. About 6 p.m. on the same day the applicant was seen with another man carrying this roll of cloth and depositing it in some place nearby. He was properly convicted of receiving, and the only point in the case is that the learned deputy recorder, in summing up, stated the law far too favourably to the applicant. Having dealt with Abramovitch's case (1), which seems so often to cause difficulty, the learned deputy recorder stated the law in this way :

"Anyway, the prosecution have to prove guilty knowledge, and, in the absence of any explanation by the accused man, you are entitled to convict him of receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen—if he fails to give an explanation which you can possibly believe. If, on the other hand, he gives an explanation, and that is one which, although you do not think it to be true, you think might possibly be true, then he is entitled to be acquitted."

B

That, as I have said, is stating the law far too favourably because any explanation may possibly be true, and that is not what Abramovitch's case (1) lays down. I have more than once endeavoured to say what Abramovitch's case (1) does lay down, and it is this. Possession of property recently stolen where no explanation is given is evidence which can go to the jury that the prisoner received the property knowing it to have been stolen, but, bearing in mind that the onus is always on the prosecution, if the prisoner gives an explanation which raises a doubt in the minds of the jury whether or not he knew the property was stolen, the ordinary rule applies, the case has not been proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and he is entitled to be acquitted. A proper direction to the jury would be : "If the prisoner's account raises a doubt in your minds, then, of course, you ought not to say that the case has been proved to your satisfaction." If that simple fact were borne in mind, a good deal of the confusion which often arises by an attempt to lay down the law in accordance with Abramovitch's case (1) will be avoided.

WALSHAM v. WALSHAM.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), February 8, 1949.]

Cruelty—Injury to health—Partial intercourse—Coitus interruptus.

G

A husband, from the early days of married life and despite repeated protests by the wife, formed the habit of partial intercourse by coitus interruptus. For varying periods he would abstain from intercourse and would follow such periods with numbers of occasions when he had partial intercourse. This practice, to the husband's knowledge, was having an increasingly injurious effect on the bodily and mental health of the wife.

H

HELD : the husband's conduct amounted to cruelty.

Per WALLINGTON, J. : "Mere abstention by the husband from intercourse could not amount to cruelty or give the wife any remedy even though it might injure her health."

[AS TO CRUELTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 649-654, paras. 954-962 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 281-293, Nos. 2513-2694.]

PETITION by the wife for divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty.

WALLINGTON, J., held that the husband, by his deliberate practice of having only partial intercourse with his wife, to the detriment of her health, both bodily and mental, was guilty of cruelty and granted the wife a decree nisi.

F. H. Lawton for the wife.

Stephen Murray for the husband.

A WALLINGTON, J. : The petitioning wife asks for a decree of divorce on the ground of cruelty alleged by her to have been inflicted on her by her husband in the course of the married life. The cruelty relied on has been limited before me to failure on the part of the husband (failure consistent only with determination on his part) properly to give the wife those sexual rights to which she was entitled, with the result that her health deteriorated and, at one time at all events, was in a serious condition.

B On July 14, 1948, FINNEMORE, J., had before him a petition by the wife asking for a decree of nullity on the ground of the husband's sexual incompetence. At the hearing the learned judge allowed an amendment of the petition by adding an alternative prayer for a decree of nullity on the ground of wilful refusal by the husband to consummate the marriage, and the trial of the petition proceeded on that basis. The judge decided against the wife on the ground C that the evidence adduced did not satisfy him that the marriage had not been consummated. The present petition was signed on Oct. 4, 1948, and filed on Nov. 9 in that year.

D Almost from the outset of the married life the husband formed the habit of partial intercourse by means of coitus interruptus despite the repeated protests of the wife and regardless of the fact that he knew that his conduct was increasingly injurious to her bodily and mental health. Mere abstention by the husband from intercourse could not, in my view, amount to cruelty or give to the wife any remedy, even though it might injure her health, but the husband in the present case did much more than abstain. He abstained for varying periods and followed such periods with numbers of occasions when he had partial intercourse. On each of these occasions the wife genuinely hoped and believed E that the intercourse would be complete and that it would be made possible for her to bear children, and on each occasion she was frustrated, disappointed and depressed, and her nervous system was disturbed with the result that her health, bodily and mental, increasingly suffered, for she was very desirous of raising a family, a desire that she was justified in believing that her husband shared. I do not doubt that the conduct of the husband, if continued, would F have produced a serious and dangerous deterioration in her health. Nor do I entertain any doubt that the husband must have understood the wrong and injury that he was doing to his wife. I am not supposing, for a moment, that the wife's whole well-being depended on sexual intercourse or that she thought it did. Some women may be so constituted that their health is not affected by G repeated partial intercourse, such as coitus interruptus, while other women enter into the marriage state hoping to fulfil one of the most important functions of matrimony, viz., the bearing of children. When the latter class of women are denied the normal means of child bearing and their sexual functions are abused by frequent coitus interruptus, especially when it follows substantial periods of complete denial of intercourse, their health (both bodily and mental) H is likely to be affected. In my opinion, the present case falls within the latter category. The husband, therefore, has been guilty of cruelty within the accepted definition of that expression as applied in these courts, and I grant a decree.

Decree nisi.

HELMAN v. HORSHAM AND WORTHING ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Evershed and Denning, L.JJ.), February 7, 8, March 17, 1949.]

Rates—Assessment—Building occupied in parts—Occupation by lodger or tenant—Owner occupying rest of house—Control by owner—Assessment of parts separately—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (c. 90), s. 23 (1).

The owner of a house, who himself occupied three rooms and a kitchen-scully on the ground floor and one room on the first floor, let to one M. two rooms and a kitchen-scully on the first floor, with the right to use, in common with himself, the combined bathroom and w.c. on that floor, the upper landings, the entrance hall, the front and back doors and the yard and outside w.c., to get to which there was a right to go through the downstairs rooms. The rent included payment for the use of a carpet on the stairs and in the hall and of linoleum in the rooms let, and the owner kept the hall and landings clean. In the current valuation list the whole house was assessed as one hereditament, but, on a proposal by the rating authority for an amendment of the valuation list, the assessment committee determined that the house should be assessed in two parts. Their decision that there was a separate rateable occupation of the rooms occupied by M. was confirmed by quarter sessions, but there was no finding of fact by quarter sessions whether M. was a tenant or a lodger.

HELD : as the owner continued to live in the house there was no rateable occupation by M. unless there was clear evidence of an intention of the owner to abandon control of the rooms occupied by M. ; the question of the amount of control retained by the owner was one of fact ; and, as the Case stated by quarter sessions did not set out any clear evidence of such an intention, the conclusion that M. had a separate rateable occupation was wrong.

Smith v. St. Michael, Cambridge, Overseers (1860) (3 E. & E. 383 ; 3 L.T. 687), and dicta of COLLINS, M.R., in Kent v. Fittall ([1906] 1 K.B. 70 ; 94 L.T. 81), and of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in Westminster Corpn. v. Southern Ry. Co. ([1936] 2 All E.R. 326 ; [1936] A.C. 529 ; 155 L.T. 35), applied.

Per EVERSHEDE, L.J. : I cannot see any reason in logic or in law why the net annual value of a house as a whole should vary in accordance with the answer to the question : Have certain of the rooms been " let " to a tenant on a demise or to one who is a mere lodger in them ? . . . I must not, therefore, be taken to be assenting in any way to the view that if, because the " inmate " of certain rooms is held to be a tenant rather than a lodger, separate assessments may be made of two separate and independent " hereditaments," the arithmetical result is to increase the net annual value of the house as a whole.

Decision of Divisional Court ([1948] 2 All E.R. 588 ; [1949] 1 K.B. 62), affirmed.

APPEAL by the assessment committee from an order of the Divisional Court (LORD GODDARD, C.J., SINGLETON and SLADE, JJ.), dated July 23, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 588, allowing the appeal of the ratepayer (the present respondent), George Helman, the owner of a house, from a decision of West Sussex Quarter Sessions confirming a determination of the Horsham and Worthing Area Assessment Committee that the house should be assessed in two parts.

The house in question was originally designed as a single dwelling, the accommodation being three living rooms, a kitchen-scullery and a combined bathroom and w.c. on the first floor, and three living rooms, a kitchen-scullery and an outside w.c. on the ground floor. In the current valuation list the whole house was assessed as one hereditament at a rateable value of £54. Paragraph 5, sub-paras. (d) to (g), of the Case stated by quarter sessions were as follows :

" 5 (d) For some time immediately prior to Mar. 8, 1947, [Helman] let to one Tyler the same part of the said house as was let by him to one Miles as hereinafter mentioned. (e) On Mar. 8, 1947, [Helman] entered into a verbal tenancy agreement with the said Miles the material terms of which were :—(i) The said Miles was to have the sole use and occupation of two living rooms and the kitchen-scullery on the first floor, [Helman] remaining in occupation of the rooms on the ground floor and the other room on the first floor. (ii) The said Miles was to have a right in common with [Helman] to use the bathroom and both w.c.'s. (iii) The said Miles was to have a right of passage through the entrance hall and over two upper landings and a right of passage through the rooms on the ground floor as and when he required for the purpose of using the outside w.c. . . . and also for gaining access to the yard at the rear to the use of which he has a right in common with [Helman]. (iv) The front and the back doors were to be used in common, there being no separate entrance to the first floor of the said house.

(v) The said Miles was to pay the sum of 37s. 6d. per week (the rent fixed for the said accommodation by the tribunal appointed under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946) which sum was to include the use of carpets, the property of [Helman], on the stairs and in the hall, and of linoleum laid in the rooms occupied by the said Miles. (vi) The hall and landings were to be kept clean by [Helman]. (f) In the cupboard under the stairs on the ground floor there were two electric meters, one for supplying the part of the house let to the said Miles and the other for supplying the part of the house occupied by [Helman], and, further, there was a shilling-in-the-slot meter on the first floor for the supply to the said Miles. (g) Pursuant to and under the terms of the said agreement the said Miles, on Mar. 8, 1947, took possession of the said rooms let to him where he has resided ever since on the same terms."

In para. 7 of the Case it was stated that "after hearing the evidence and the arguments on either side" quarter sessions "came to the conclusion that there was a separate rateable occupation of the rooms occupied by the said Miles and, accordingly, dismissed [Helman's] appeal." The Court of Appeal now held that there was no evidence of an intention by Helman to abandon his control over the rooms occupied by Miles, and, therefore, Miles was not in rateable occupation, and they dismissed the assessment committee's appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 17. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the Horsham and Worthing Area Assessment Committee from a judgment of the Divisional Court reversing the order of quarter sessions that the assessment by the rating authority of a house, 78, Brighton Road, Worthing, owned by George Helman, be confirmed. By that assessment three rooms on the first floor of the house were assessed at a rateable value of £22, and the rooms on the ground floor and the other room on the first floor were assessed at £44 rateable value. In the current valuation list the whole house was assessed as one hereditament at a rateable value of £54. Helman's appeal came before the rating committee of quarter sessions. They heard him in person and counsel for the assessment committee, viewed the premises in the presence of Helman and counsel for the assessment committee, and then dismissed the appeal, and, on the application of Helman, stated a Case for the opinion of the Divisional Court. After setting out the statement of facts and the finding of quarter sessions thereon, the Case states:

"The question upon which the opinion of the court is desired is whether the said committee of quarter sessions upon the above statement of facts came to a correct decision in point of law in deciding that there was a separate rateable occupation of the rooms on the first floor by the said Miles, and that there should be a separate assessment in respect thereof."

The following is a summary of the statement of facts set out in the Special Case. On the first floor of the house there are three living rooms, together with a kitchen-scullery, and a combined bathroom and w.c. On the ground floor there are three living rooms and a kitchen-scullery. There is also an outside w.c. At some time before Mar. 8, 1947, Helman as owner, let to one Tyler two living rooms and the kitchen-scullery on the first floor. On Mar. 8, 1947, Helman entered into a verbal tenancy agreement with Miles. The agreement contained the following terms: (i) Miles was to have the sole use and occupation of the two living rooms and the kitchen-scullery on the first floor. (ii) Miles was to have a right to use the bathroom and both w.c.'s, in common with Helman, who remained in occupation of the rest of the house. (iii) Miles was to have a right of passage through the entrance hall and over two upper landings and a right of passage through the rooms on the ground floor as and when required for using the outside w.c. and also for gaining access to the yard at the rear, to the use of which he was to have a right in common with Helman. (iv) The front and back doors were to be used in common, there being no separate entrance to the first floor. (v) Miles was to pay 37s. 6d. per week (the rent fixed for the accommodation by the tribunal appointed under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946). This sum was to include the use of Helman's carpets on the stairs and in the hall, and of linoleum in the rooms occupied by Miles. (vi) Helman was to keep the hall and landings clean. On these facts the committee came to the conclusion that there was a separate rateable occupation of the rooms occupied by Miles, but propounded the question to the Divisional

A Court whether, in doing so, they came to a correct decision in point of law.

B I understand that the question of law propounded by the committee was whether, from the facts set out in the Special Case, they were entitled as a matter of law to draw the inference that Miles had a separate rateable occupation of the two rooms and the scullery on the first floor. I find this question, which seems to be mainly one of fact, difficult to answer. It is an important question, because it must affect indirectly innumerable cases. In these times, when there

C is a great shortage of houses, and the cost of living presses hard on householders, there is a constant tendency for them to arrange with relatives or friends, or even strangers, to share their houses with them, but sharing is difficult, especially in the kitchen, and, therefore, arrangements are often made whereby the "in-comer," to use a neutral word, is granted housing accommodation more or less like a self-contained flat in the house. How much control the landlord intends to give, and how much control the landlord intends to retain, is a question of fact in each case. Naturally, the landlord, if he remains in occupation, retains control over the whole house. He started with that control, and it is reasonable that he should not be held to have parted with it unless there is clear evidence to that effect. If, for instance, he puts up a separate front door opening on to the "tenant's" rooms, installs in them a kitchen-scullery, bathroom and w.c., and gives a key of the main front door to the tenant, this would be cogent evidence of an intention by the landlord to give up his right of control over the rooms.

E There is, however, no cogent evidence of this kind in the present case. No case was cited to us in which a person occupying rooms in a house of this kind in which his landlord continued to live has been separately rated in respect of those rooms, but several cases were cited in which the landlord was held to remain in occupation of the whole house for the purpose of rateability, although he had granted to another a right to occupy some of the rooms in his house. Thus, in Smith v. St. Michael, Cambridge, Overseers (1), Smith, the lessee of a house, agreed with the surveyor of taxes and the collector of Inland Revenue to let off five of the principal rooms in the house to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for an annual rent to include all expenses such as rates, taxes, gas, wood, coals, also providing a person to reside on the premises to keep them clean, light fires and to attend to them. Another room was occupied by Smith as an office, and he himself lived in another house. The rest of the house, viz., two kitchens and a cellar in the basement, and two bedrooms and a sitting room on the second floor, were occupied by a servant of Smith who cleaned the rooms and lighted the fires. Smith was rated for the whole house, and the question was raised whether, in the circumstances set out, he was liable to be rated in respect of the house or only part thereof. The case was heard by HILL, J., and BLACKBURN, J. In the course of a considered judgment of the court HILL, J., said (3 E. & E. 390) :

"There is no doubt that exclusive possession of a part only of a house may be given, so as in effect to make the two parts of the house separate tenements: the question in the present case was, whether such possession had been given; and we are of opinion that it had not . . . We think that we must look not so much at the words as the substance of the agreement; and, taking the whole together, we think it must be construed, not as a demise of the five rooms, but as an agreement by which the appellant, retaining possession of those rooms and keeping his servant there, bound himself to supply the other party with fire and gas and attendance. It is true that the exclusive enjoyment of the rooms is to be given; but that is the case where a guest in an inn or a lodger in a house has a separate apartment, or where a passenger in a ship has a separate cabin; in which case it is clear that the possession remains in the innkeeper, lodging-house keeper, or shipowner. We think, therefore, that the appellant was occupier of the whole of the rated premises."

Many authorities were cited to us confirming the statement in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 590), in the present case that:

" . . . the fact that the landlord is living on the premises does seem to me to raise the presumption . . . that he intends to retain control of the whole of the premises . . . that, I think, prima facie at least negatives the fact that the person who is occupying rooms in the other part of the house than that in which the landlord lives is a tenant in the true sense and not a lodger."

In Kent v. Fittall (2) the question was raised whether a person resident in part of a house was an "inhabitant occupier" or a "lodger" within the meaning of those words as used in the Representation of the People Act, 1867. In the course of his judgment COLLINS, M.R., said ([1906] 1 K.B. 70):

"It is not disputed that in dealing with the occupation of part of a dwelling-house, if the landlord is living in the house, that fact creates a presumption that the occupation of the other part is that of a lodger rather than that of an inhabitant occupier. But while that is the inference that may be drawn, it is not a necessary inference of law, and there is no authority that it is to be treated as conclusive."

COLLINS, M.R., cited with approval (ibid., 72) the following passage from the judgment of PORTER, M.R. (20 L.R.Ir. 349), in Hogan v. Sterrett (3) in the Court of Appeal in Ireland:

"I do not mean to decide that in every case where the landlord resides under the same roof the persons occupying the other portions of the structure may not be entitled otherwise than as lodgers. I think they may be entitled; but the evidence of separate occupation must be very clear—such as in the case of "flats": for there the landlord would live in a separate "house" within the meaning of the Act, and there would be several "dwelling-houses" all under the same roof."

Can it be said in the present case that the "evidence of separate occupation" is "very clear"? Apart from the use of the words "sole use and occupation" in the verbal agreement, there does not seem to me any evidence which may not be said to be neutral, i.e., applicable either to a tenancy or to a lodging. The words, "sole use and occupation," are not, I think conclusive of the matter, because a man may have the exclusive use of the rooms and yet be a lodger, as appears from the judgments of BLACKBURN, J., in Allan v. Liverpool, Inman v. Kirkdale (4), and JESSEL, M.R., in Bradley v. Baylis (5). I think that the rating committee in this case must have had some doubt whether the sole occupation by Miles of these three rooms was in law a rateable occupation. Otherwise, I do not understand why they stated a Case for the opinion of the Divisional Court. In my opinion, the proper answer to their question is that, unless there was clear evidence of the intention of the landlord to abandon control of the rooms in question, there was not a rateable occupation by Miles ; that the question of the amount of control retained by the landlord is a question of fact ; and that the statement of facts in the Special Case does not set out any clear evidence of an abandonment by the ratepayer of his control over the rooms occupied by Miles. Therefore, the conclusion that Miles had a separate rateable occupation of the rooms in question was wrong. For these reasons, I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

EVERSHED, L.J. : On a question such as that raised in the present appeal I take as the foundation on which a conclusion should be built the observations of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in Westminster Corpn. v. Southern Ry. Co. (6), and I shall, I hope, be forgiven for quoting from the noble Lord's speech at some length. LORD RUSSELL said ([1936] 2 All E.R. 326) :

B

" In the next place I would make a few general observations upon rateable occupation. Subject to special enactments, people are rated as occupiers of land, land being understood as including not only the surface of the earth but all strata above or below. The occupier, not the land, is rateable ; but, the occupier is rateable in respect of the land which he occupies.

C

Occupation, however, is not synonymous with legal possession : the owner of an empty house has the legal possession, but he is not in rateable occupation. Rateable occupation, however, must include actual possession, and it must have some degree of permanence : a mere temporary holding of land will not constitute rateable occupation. Where there is no rival claimant to the occupancy, no difficulty can arise ; but in certain cases there may be a rival occupancy in some person who, to some extent, may have occupancy rights over the premises. The question in every such case must be one of fact, viz., whose position in relation to occupation is paramount, and whose position in relation to occupation is subordinate ; but, in my opinion, the question must be considered and answered in regard to the position and rights of the parties in respect of the premises in question, and in regard to the purpose of the occupation of those premises. In other words, in the present case, the question must be, not who is in paramount occupation of the station, within whose confines the premises in question are situate ; but who is in paramount occupation of the particular premises in question. A familiar instance of this competing occupancy is the case of the lodger. It has long been settled on the one hand that, in the case of lodgers in a lodging house, the lodgers are not rateable in respect of their occupancy of their rooms, but that the landlord is the person who is rateable in respect of his occupancy of the entire house. In view of the frequently fleeting nature of the occupancy of a lodger, the convenience of this view, indeed the necessity for it, is obvious ; but it purports to be based upon the paramountcy of the landlord's occupation, arising from his control of the front door and his general control over and right of access to the lodgers' rooms for the proper conduct of the lodging house. And the same view as to rateability has prevailed in the case of the business lodger. On the other hand the occupation of a person residing in a flat is such that he is (generally speaking) rateable, although as a matter of practice, the owner of the block of flats usually pays the rates charging the tenant an inclusive rent. My Lords, I cannot but feel that the position of the lodger in relation to rateability is an exceptional one, and is largely the product of practical considerations. But it can I think be justified and explained when we remember that the landlord, who is the person held to be rateable, is occupying the whole premises for the purpose of his business of letting lodgings, that for the purpose of that business he has a continual right of access to the lodger's rooms, and that he, in fact, retains the control of ingress and egress to and from the lodging house, notwithstanding that the power of ingress and egress at all hours is essential to the lodger.

G

The general principle applicable to the cases where persons occupy parts of a larger hereditament seems to be that if the owner of the hereditament (being also in occupation by himself or his servants) retains to himself general control over the occupied parts, the owner will be treated as being in rateable occupation; if he retains to himself no control, the occupiers of the various parts will be treated as in rateable occupation of those parts."

If this statement of the law to be applied is correct (as it must, I think, be taken to be), then it appears to follow that though, in general, legal title is not the test of rateability, nevertheless, in the special case of one who occupies rooms in the house of another, in effect it is. As LORD RUSSELL observed, the case is anomalous, but its justification can be found in convenience—including, I think, the convenience of having a criterion both simple and certain.

I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which is about to be delivered by DENNING, L.J., in which he expresses the view that, although, as between them, the relationship of Helman and Miles may be in law that of lessor and lessee, nevertheless (in the absence, at any rate, of structural severance of the "tenement" of Miles from the rest of the house) so long as Helman continues to reside himself in the house, for rating purposes, and, indeed, for all purposes other than those affecting the legal rights and obligations inter se of Helman and Miles, Miles will be regarded as a lodger and Helman will be regarded as retaining the "paramount occupation" of the whole premises, and DENNING, L.J., has referred to a number of the older decisions of the courts both civil and criminal. On such a question I should not differ from DENNING, L.J., save with the greatest diffidence, and, on the view at which I have arrived, it is not strictly necessary for me to express a concluded opinion.

I feel, however, bound to say that, as at present advised, I am not satisfied that the test for rating liability in such cases as the present is that which DENNING, L.J., has stated, and I should certainly wish to hear argument on the authorities to which he has referred. For, as it seems to me at present, R. v. Rogers (7), Lee v. Gansel (8), and Monks v. Dykes (9) all turned on a finding that the person whose rooms were alleged to have been broken into was, in fact, a lodger and had no such estate or interest therein as would be conferred by a contract of letting. I think the ratio decidendi was the same in the franchise cases. Phillips v. Henson (10) turned, in my judgment, on the effect of the Lodgers' Goods Protection Act, 1871. In the rating case of R. v. St. Mary the Less, Durham (Inhabitants) (11) the question was whether the householder who used his house for the purposes of his hobby (without ever residing in it) and allowed some poor people to live in the kitchen was an occupier of the house. There was no question of the poor occupants of the kitchen being his tenants. In Smith v. St. Michael, Cambridge, Overseers (1) the finding of the court was that, notwithstanding the language used in the agreement there in question, there was, in fact, no demise. Finally, such a test appears to me prima facie inconsistent with the decision of the court in the earlier case of Kent v. Fittall (2) (to which I shall refer again in reference to the "presumption" on which the Divisional Court relied) where the claimant to the franchise was held entitled to the vote though his tenement was not structurally severed from the rest of the house and the landlord himself resided in the premises: see also the final sentences of the judgment of MATHEW, L.J. ([1906] 1 K.B. 78). I am also disposed to think that some regard should now be had to the changed social and economic circumstances of the time. In the more spacious days of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries householders were not disposed to "sublet" parts of their houses to the extent to which they are compelled or encouraged today by financial needs and the shortages of housing accommodation and staff. Complete structural sub-division is by no means always possible. Is it right that the intended relationship between householder and "inmate" depends on structural severance or that the extent of structural severance should necessarily determine what that relationship should be taken to be? Is a sharing of the front door and staircase or (in addition) of a garden or a downstairs cloakroom decisive of the character of the relationship for some, and what, purposes? Therein is a prospect of almost endless controversy and litigation and no clear standard for decision.

- A I agree that the test, not only for rating purposes but, as I think, also for other purposes, is what has been referred to as "control" or "paramount occupation," but that test is to be applied, as observed by LORD RUSSELL in Westminster Corpn. v. Southern Ry. Co. (6), as regards the particular rooms in question in the litigation rather than in reference to the house as a whole. If in the present case Miles, when going away for a week-end, is entitled to lock his doors and say to Helman: "I do not want either you or anyone else to go into my rooms while I am away," then he has, prima facie, such exclusive occupation of his rooms as would be consistent with a tenancy, but inconsistent with the position of a lodger. If this view is the right one, the result may be inconvenient for rating authorities, since, when there is a tenancy, they would (as I follow it) be bound to rate separately the tenant in respect of the rooms covered by the demise, but, if that is the result in the case of a self-contained flat, I cannot see anything illogical in similarity of effect in the case of chambers or rooms in fact sub-let though not structurally severed from the rest of the house.

- Whether or not the view to which I incline is the correct one, the first question in the present case is: What did the rating committee of quarter sessions decide and intend to decide? It is on this question that I have found the greatest difficulty. BUCKNILL, L.J., has summarised the material paragraphs of the Case and I will not take time by making further reference to them. On a fair reading of the Case, and, particularly, para. 5 (d) to (g) inclusive, and 7, the problem is: Did the rating committee find and intend to find that, in fact, Miles was tenant of the rooms of which he was given the exclusive use
- E (together with certain privileges), or did they find and intend to find only that there was an agreement between Helman and Miles in the terms set out in para. 5 (e) plus the fact that Miles was in "possession" of his rooms under that agreement? It has been much stressed on Helman's behalf that there is no finding in terms on the vital matter of "control," and that, in the absence of such a finding or of any indication that that essential matter was present
- F at all to the minds of the rating committee, the Special Case cannot be read in the sense of the former of the above alternatives, or, if it is, then that the finding cannot stand by reason of the absence of the facts essential to support it. I should not, for my part, be prepared to say that the rating committee could not have validly and properly found as a fact that Miles was a tenant and not a lodger without any express finding in regard to control or paramount occupation.
- G Nevertheless, the absence of any such reference is significant. True it is that Helman (who conducted his case in person before quarter sessions) did not appreciate the point and appears to have used language consistent with the view that he conceived Miles to be his tenant rather than his lodger, but it was for the rating authority to make good their case, and (having regard to the existence of the presumption presently referred to) I do not think they
- H can properly rely on Helman's failure to put his case in the best way.

I have, therefore, on the whole, come to the conclusion that the view taken by BUCKNILL, L.J., ought to prevail, and that the Case Stated cannot be read as containing, and intended to contain, a finding of fact that Miles was Helman's tenant and not his lodger. If this view is right, how does the matter stand? I cannot for myself derive assistance from the fact (which I assume) that Helman is entitled to go into Miles' rooms for the purpose of fulfilling his obligation to do repairs. Such a right is commonly enough found in what are indubitaably leases, and its presence seems to me to have but little bearing on the matter of paramount occupation. Nor do I attach importance to the sharing of the bathroom and w.c. It is not suggested on any view that the bathroom was included in the alleged demise, and, if it be the fact (on which I express no opinion) that the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, applies to rooms "let" to lodgers, still in its context I regard the reference to the Act [in the Case] as inclining more towards the existence of a demise. On the other hand, it is clear that the use of words—"let", "rent," even "tenancy"—strictly appropriate to a demise—is by no means conclusive. The cases referred to by BUCKNILL, L.J., amply illustrate the point. In the case of lodgers (properly so called) I take it that the words "let" and "rent" are commonly, if not normally, used.

There then remains the effect of the "presumption" on which LORD GODDARD, C.J., substantially relied ([1948] 2 All E.R. 590). The existence of "presumptions," whether of law or fact, must, in my judgment, be accepted with some caution. BUCKNILL, L.J., has already referred to the judgment of COLLINS, M.R., in the earlier case of Kent v. Fittall (2). It is, however, to be noted that the decision in that case was in favour of the existence of a tenancy and that neither ROMER, L.J., nor MATHEW, L.J., referred to the "presumption," and, although in the later Kent v. Fittall case (12) the decision of the Divisional Court was affirmed, it was affirmed on special grounds which did not involve the acceptance of the dictum of PICKFORD, J. ([1911] 2 K.B. 1110), quoted by LORD GODDARD, C.J. It is, I think, clear that, if in any case it appears that some rooms in a man's house where he himself lives are occupied by another who pays for that privilege, the inference proper to be drawn from those facts of themselves—whether for purposes of rating liability, franchise or any other purpose—is that the latter is the former's lodger, but it does not seem to me that, where, in addition to the facts of occupation, there is further evidence of the nature of the relationship between the occupants, there is anything in the authorities which fetters the right of the court to reach conclusions which naturally flow from the evidence given.

These observations, however, still leave unsolved the problem in the present case where, ex hypothesi, the rating committee has not found as a fact, one way or the other, whether Miles is a tenant or a lodger. I have felt much sympathy for the view expressed by SINGLETON, J., in the Divisional Court, that the case should be referred back to the quarter sessions, but, as pointed out by the learned judge, there was no request for such a direction, and it is now, I think, manifestly too late. It became the duty of the Divisional Court, and is now the duty of this court, to do the best it can on the facts which alone (as I construe the Special Case) were found, i.e., that both Miles and Helman occupied the premises, the occupancy of Miles being governed by the terms of the agreement set out in para. 5 (e) of the Case. On these facts I have come to the conclusion that it is sufficient to say (in the light of the judgment of COLLINS, M.R., in Kent v. Fittall (2), and the cases cited by him to which BUCKNILL, L.J., has referred) that the rating authority has not established a tenancy, and, therefore, a rateable occupation on the part of Miles. In the result, in my opinion, the appeal must fail.

I add only this. In the present case the figures have not been disputed. It has, therefore, been conceded or assumed that the net annual value of the house as a whole is greater on the footing that Miles is a tenant of Helman of certain of the rooms than it would be if Miles were not a tenant but a mere lodger. In so stating I may do an injustice to the assessment committee. In any case, however, I cannot as at present advised see any reason in logic or in law why the net annual value of the house as a whole should vary in accordance with the answer to the question: Have certain of the rooms been "let" to a tenant on a demise or to one who is a mere lodger in them?

Financially, the result to the landlord appears to be the same. Indeed, having regard to the Rent Restrictions Acts, it may be better for the landlord if the inmate is a lodger and not a tenant. I must not, therefore, be taken to be assenting in any way to the view that if, because the "inmate" of certain rooms is held to be a tenant rather than a lodger, separate assessments may be made of two separate and independent "hereditaments," the arithmetical result is to increase the net annual value of the house as a whole.

DENNING, L.J. : It is no new thing for a house to be occupied by several families. If each family occupies a part of the house which is structurally separate from the other parts, as in the case of chambers or flats, then the law has always treated each part as a separate house for all purposes, but it continually happens that a house which is built for one family is occupied by more than one family without there being any structural severance at all. A householder simply lets some or all of the rooms. The tenants may have the exclusive use of their own rooms, but they share other parts of the house such as the passages, stairs and lavatories in common with the other occupiers. When that happens, the rights of the householder and occupier, as between one another, are, of course, governed by the contract between them and much may turn, for them, on whether it is in law a demise or a licence, but other people are not concerned with that sometimes nice distinction. Whenever a question arises with the outside world the principal distinction that has been taken by the law depends on whether the householder is still living in the house himself or not. So long as he is living there himself, he is, prima facie, regarded as being in paramount occupation of the whole and the tenants are regarded as lodgers, but when he leaves the house and lets out all the rooms, then the individual tenants are occupiers. This distinction has been drawn, ever since the days of LORD HOLT, by some of the greatest names in the law. If, for instance, a resident owner lets out rooms to a tenant and a burglar should break into the rooms that are let, the indictment charges him, not with breaking into the tenant's rooms, but with breaking into the owner's house, because the owner is in paramount occupation of the whole : see the opinion of HOLT, C.J., in 1701, quoted in a note to R. v. Rogers (7) (1 Leach 90, note (a)). Again, if a sheriff comes with a lawful warrant to levy execution on the tenant's goods, he is not entitled to force the outer door of the owner's house, but, if he finds it open, he is entitled to go in and force open the doors of the rooms that are let, because the owner is in paramount occupation of the whole and, while the law will protect his outer door, it will not protect the inner doors : see Lee v. Gansel (8), per LORD MANSFIELD (1 Cowp. 8), in 1774. So, also, if there is a disturbance in the tenant's rooms, it is the owner, and not the tenant, who has the right to eject the disturber from the house and to sue in trespass quare clausum fregit : see Monks v. Dykes (9), per PARKE, B. (4 M. & W. 569). Furthermore, when the goods of a lodger were protected by statute from distress, a person to whom the resident owner let rooms under a demise was regarded as a lodger : see Phillips v. Henson (10), per LINDLEY, J. (3 C.P.D. 32) ; and in the days when there was one vote for householders, i.e., occupiers, and no vote at all for lodgers—or a different kind of vote—the resident owner was always regarded as the occupier of the house and the tenants of the rooms were regarded as lodgers : see Wansey v. Perkins, Hill's Case (13), Morfee v. Novis (5), and Kent v. Fittall (12). If one examines those three franchise cases, one will find that in each of them there was a demise and not a licence, but, nevertheless, the tenant of the rooms was regarded as a lodger : and if one examines the judgments in the leading case of Bradley v. Baylis (5) one finds that four lords justices expressly contemplate that a tenant in the ordinary acceptance of the word may yet be a lodger for franchise purposes (8 Q.B.D. 224, 235, 240, 245). The principal distinction taken was whether the owner was living in the house himself or not, though, of course, it was not conclusive. Kent v. Fittall (2) shows that circumstances may arise in which the owner, although living in the house, is in no sense in control of it, in which case the tenants are not lodgers for franchise purposes. These franchise cases have, as I think rightly, always been regarded as authority in rating cases because the Franchise Acts applied the test of rateability: Bradley v. Baylis (5) (8 Q.B.D. 217, 218). Although I have not actually found an instance in a rating case of rooms let on a demise, nevertheless I find the same principal distinction being drawn in them.

If the owner or his servant is living in the house, he has always been regarded, prima facie, as being in rateable occupation of the whole: see R. v. St. Mary the Less, Durham (Inhabitants) (11), and Smith v. St. Michael, Cambridge Overseers (1). If, however, the householder leaves and lets off all the rooms, then the individual tenants are the occupiers: see Allchurch v. Hendon Union Assessment Committee (14). This distinction is in full accord with the settled rule that rateability depends on occupation, not on title. Where there are rival occupancies, it depends on whose occupation is paramount: see Westminster Corpn. v. Southern Ry. Co. (6), per LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN ([1936] 2 All E.R. 328, 329), and per LORD WRIGHT, M.R. (ibid., 349, 350). The upshot of the whole discussion is that, where there is a resident owner who lets out rooms, he is regarded as in paramount occupation unless the facts negative that inference. That is the rule which LORD GODDARD, C.J., as I understand it, stated in this case ([1948] 2 All E.R. 590), and I entirely agree with his statement of it. Of course, if substantial structural alterations are made by which the one house is turned into two houses, then the two parts are separately rateable even though the owner lives in one of the parts himself. That was laid down by HOLT, C.J., in Tracy v. Talbot (15), and by LORD GODDARD, C.J., ([1948] 2 All E.R. 590) in the present case. Such cases depend on the degree of structural severance—a matter which the rating authority are called on to consider in other cases, as under the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 23. But I am only concerned here with cases where there is no structural severance.

I would point out, however, that, where a house is shared by tenants of an absent landlord, rating authorities have obtained by statute special permission to be able to treat the landlord, not the tenant, as the person rateable: see the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 23, but, as LORD GODDARD, C.J., points out, that section does not apply to a resident landlord sharing the house with a tenant because the landlord always has been rateable for the whole house. If the contention of the rating authority in this case were right, it would mean that a resident owner could only be rated for his own part and not for the rooms occupied by his tenant. That would, I fancy, be very inconvenient for the rating authorities.

One final word. In holding that Mr. Miles is to be regarded as a lodger for rating purposes, I do not wish it to be supposed that I think he is to be regarded as a lodger for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts. He plainly is not. On the facts stated, it seems to me that he is a tenant protected by those Acts and not a mere licensee: see Cole v. Harris (16). The fitting of a separate meter and cooker was not a sufficient structural alteration to make the single house lose its identity: see Monk v. Murphy (17)* which we decided a few days ago. It is for this reason that I think it important to say that, in my opinion, in this branch of rating law, as in others, the distinction between a demise and

* MONK v. MURPHY. MONK v. BROCK.

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Apportionment—Loss of identity of original dwelling-house—Substantial structural alterations—Alterations made to enable house to be let as two separate units—Separate gas and electricity meters fitted—Sink installed—Gas cooker substituted for gas fire—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (3) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 17 (2)).

a licence is not the test of rateable occupation : see the words of LORD WRIGHT, M.R., ([1936] 2 All E.R. 349 351), in Westminster Corpn. v. Southern Ry. Co. (6). If it is not the test, then paramount occupation is the test. Applying that test, I agree with LORD GODDARD, C.J., that there was only one conclusion to which quarter sessions could come on these facts, namely, that the premises should be rated as one hereditament and not two. For these reasons, I agree

R. v. BROOK.

Criminal Law—Larceny—Sentence—Direction that defendant to remain in custody until payment—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 14 (1) (2).

The Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 14, provides : “ (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where a fine is imposed by . . . a court of assize or quarter sessions, an order may be made in accordance with the provisions of this section : (a) allowing time for payment of the amount of the fine . . . (b) directing payment of the said amount by instalments of such amounts and on such dates respectively as may be specified in the order ; (c) fixing a term of imprisonment which the person liable to make the payment is to undergo if any sum which he is liable to pay is not duly paid or recovered . . . ”

On Sept. 1, 1939, the whole of a two-storied house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied was let to one tenant. In September, 1940, the house was damaged by enemy action and the tenant gave up possession of the premises which remained unoccupied until 1943. The house consisted originally of three living rooms, a kitchen, scullery, pantry and an outside lavatory on the ground floor, and six bedrooms and a bathroom and lavatory on the upper floor. In 1943, when the damage was being repaired, the following alterations were made so as to enable the house to be let as two separate units : (a) separate gas and electric meters were fitted on the two floors, (b) a gas cooker was substituted for a gas fire in one of the rooms on the upper floor, and (c) a sink was fitted into that room so that it could be used as a kitchen. The two floors were then let separately. It was contended by the landlord that the original dwelling-house had lost its identity as a result of the alterations, that each of the two floors had become a new dwelling-house subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts, and that the standard rents were fixed by the rents at which they were first let as separate dwelling-houses, and not by apportionment of the standard rent attributable to the whole house.

THE COURT OF APPEAL held that the alterations made in 1943 did not constitute substantial structural alterations and, therefore, the original dwelling-house had not lost its identity, and the tenants of the two separate units were entitled to apportionment of the standard rent of the whole house under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (3) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 17 (2)).

The defendant pleaded Guilty at quarter sessions to larceny, and the recorder ordered him to pay a fine of £25 and £10 costs, directing that he should remain in custody until the fine was paid. The defendant was unable to pay the fine forthwith and remained in custody for 25 days.

HELD : Section 14 (1) had effected a change in the law so that it was no longer possible to order a prisoner to remain in custody until a fine was paid, and so, in imposing the fine, the recorder had power to make an order or orders under paras. (a), (b) or (c) of the sub-section, but he had no power to make an order not provided for by those paragraphs.

Observations on the effect of s. 14 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.

APPEAL against an order of the Recorder of Grimsby whereby the appellant was ordered to be kept in custody until payment of a fine imposed for larceny. The Court of Criminal Appeal held that the recorder had no power to make the order, having regard to the alteration in the law effected by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 14 (1), and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

T. H. K. Berry for the defendant.

Elborne for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the judgment of the court : The appellant pleaded Guilty before the Recorder of Grimsby to a charge of the theft of some ship's stores. Having heard evidence of the appellant's character, the recorder said that he was not going to send him to prison. He added :

"I am going to impose a fine on you, as I am entitled to do, of £25.

You will pay £10 towards the costs of the prosecution, and you will remain in custody till it is paid."

If the learned recorder thought he had any power to keep the appellant in custody until the payment of the costs, he was wrong, and so the clerk of the peace seemed to think because he drew up the conviction in the form that the appellant was to be kept in prison till the fine was paid, but not until the costs were paid. The learned recorder adjourned the quarter sessions sine die, and on Feb. 3, the appellant, having been in custody by that time for 25 days, wrote to the learned recorder, who assumed the power—what power he had got, I do not know—of directing the governor of the gaol to release the prisoner on his entering into a recognisance to appear at the next quarter sessions.

Under the practice before 1948, there was no power to impose a fine for felony, with the exception of manslaughter, but for misdemeanour the court could always fine. When a fine was imposed the court constantly ordered the prisoner to remain in custody until the fine was paid. I think the reason was that it was the duty of the prisoner, who was already in custody, to pay the fine if he could, and, if he could not, he was in the position of a debtor to the Crown and would have to petition the Crown to let him out of prison and forego the penalty. Cases where the prisoner was in custody for non-payment of a fine were reviewed from time to time, and instructions would be given either by the Home Office or other appropriate authority to release the prisoner when it was thought he had been in prison long enough.

Under s. 2 of the Levy of Fines Act, 1822—and under the Queen's Remembrancer Act, 1859, in respect of assizes—the clerk of the peace could allow the prisoner to depart, and then, if he did not pay, the roll together with a writ of distringas and capias, was sent to the sheriff who would take the body of the prisoner and imprison him as a debtor to the Crown. The prisoner was released when the Crown saw fit.

In the present case, the learned recorder imposed a fine of £25 on the appellant and ordered him to remain in custody till it was paid. We have to consider what is the proper practice to be followed, and the course, as we think, laid down by statute. Under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, the court, as I have already said, for the first time has power to fine for felony, so it is all the more necessary to see that the procedure of the Act is properly followed. Section 14 (1) of the Act provides :

“ Subject to the provisions of this section, where a fine is imposed by, or a recognisance is forfeited before, a court of assize or quarter sessions, an order may be made in accordance with the provisions of this section.”

A This clearly refers to all fines, whether for felony or misdemeanour. The provisions referred to are :

“(a) Allowing time for the payment of the amount of the fine or the amount due under the recognisance ; (b) directing payment of the said amount by instalments of such amounts and on such dates respectively as may be specified in the order ; (c) fixing a term of imprisonment which the person liable to make the payment is to undergo if any sum which he is liable to pay is not duly paid or recovered ; (d) in the case of a recognisance, discharging the recognisance or reducing the amount due thereunder : Provided that any term of imprisonment fixed under this sub-section in default of payment of a fine shall not exceed twelve months.”

C It is true that the words of the section are “ an order may be made,” but it seems to the court that the section is inconsistent with the law that existed with regard to the payment or recovery of fines before the Act was passed, and, therefore, in accordance with the well-known principles of construction, we construe it as altering the law and laying down a new procedure. It is desirable that the attention of quarter sessions should be called to this so that they may know what is the proper course to pursue in the future and that when they are imposing a fine in lieu of sending a man to prison they should make one or more of the three orders which they can make under paras. (a), (b) or (c) of that section. They can say : “ We fine you so much, and you may have a month to pay it.” They can say : “ We fine you so much, and it is to be paid by three instalments.” Then they can go on and say : “ You will be imprisoned for such-and-such a time, not exceeding twelve months, if any sum you are liable to pay is not duly paid ”, so that, if the amount is not paid in accordance with the order made under paras. (a) or (b), proceedings can be taken and the person fined will have to undergo the sentence. Where the court does not think it appropriate to give time or to allow the fine to be paid by instalments, they can pass a simple sentence—a fine of so much, and, in default, so many months’ imprisonment. In that case, as neither time nor instalments are allowed, the sentence will begin to run forthwith, but the prisoner can obtain his discharge at any time by paying the fine as provided by s. 15 (5) (b).

E F

Section 14 (2) provides :

G “ Any order under this section may be made by the court by which the fine is imposed or before which the recognisance is forfeited ; and (subject as hereinafter provided) an order under this section providing for any such matters as are mentioned in para. (a) or para. (b) of the foregoing sub-section may be made (a) where the fine was imposed or the recognisance forfeited by or before the Central Criminal Court, by a judge of that court upon application made in writing to the clerk of the court ; (b) where the fine was imposed or the recognisance forfeited by or before any other court of assize, by a judge of the High Court upon application made in writing to the clerk of assize ; (c) where the fine was imposed or the recognisance forfeited by or before a court of quarter sessions, by the chairman or any deputy chairman of that court, or by the recorder or any deputy recorder, as the case may be, upon application made in writing to the clerk of the peace ; and may amend any previous order made under this section so far as it provides for those matters.”

H

That sub-section, in the opinion of the court, provides for a case in which the court has made an order in the first instance, and the defendant asks the court in its discretion to vary the order. For instance, the court may have imposed a substantial fine to be paid in two instalments. The prisoner finds that he can pay the first, but not the second, instalment. He will then run the risk of being imprisoned in default, but under this sub-section he can apply to the court to vary the order and give him more time, or, instead of paying the second instalment in one sum, pay it in two or three sums. Then s. 14 (2) expressly provides :

" . . . no application shall be made under paras. (a) to (c) of this sub-section after the refusal of a previous application made thereunder."

So that the person can only apply once, and, if the court refuses the application, he will have to undergo the sentence of imprisonment passed in default. Section 15 deals with the enrolment of fines or recognisances under s. 32 of the Queen's Remembrancer Act, 1859, that is, fines at assizes, or under s. 2 of the Levy of Fines Act, 1822, which deals with fines imposed by quarter sessions. I do not think it is necessary to refer to that section any further because that is really a machinery section dealing with making up what is commonly called the estreat roll.

We have come to the conclusion that the sentence imposed by the learned recorder was wrong. After the coming into force of the Act of 1948, he had no power to pass any such sentence. Although, if a sentence which cannot stand in law has been passed, this court has power in its place to pass a sentence which could be lawfully passed, we think in this case the appellant has been sufficiently punished for what he did. We, therefore, quash the sentence, set aside the recognisance into which he has entered to appear before the learned recorder, and he, therefore, goes free from today.

Order accordingly.

JACOBS AND ANOTHER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), March 23, 24, 1949.]

Negligence—Liability of landlord—Defective paving of forecourt of shop—Forecourt in occupation of landlord—Shop let to tenant—Injury to customer—Invitee or licensee.

Nuisance—Defective paving of forecourt adjoining highway—Need to cross forecourt to reach shop—Injury to customer leaving highway to visit shop—Liability of occupier of forecourt.

The landlords of a housing estate had laid out a forecourt between the pavement of the highway and the entrance to some shops which they had let. Anyone going to one of the shops from the highway had to cross the forecourt which remained in the occupation of the landlords. While on her way to make a purchase at one of the shops, the plaintiff stepped from the pavement of the highway on to the forecourt and caught her foot in the cover of a stop-cock which projected about an inch and a quarter above the surrounding surface of the forecourt, at a distance of about 2½ ft. from the highway. The landlords were not aware of this danger, and the plaintiff was not aware of the fact that she was leaving the highway when she stepped on to the forecourt. In an action by the plaintiff against the landlords claiming damages for negligence or nuisance,

HELD, by the Court of Appeal: (i) although the occupier of the shop was a tenant of the landlords, the landlords had not a sufficient interest in the visit of the plaintiff to the shop to render her their invitee while she was crossing the forecourt; she was merely a licensee while so doing; and, therefore, the landlords were not under a duty to make the forecourt safe for her use and she was not entitled to damages.

Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society ([1923] A.C. 74; 128 L.T. 386), followed.

(ii) the plaintiff was not a user of the highway when she met with the accident, as she had left the highway to reach a place that was off it, and, therefore, the landlords were not liable to her as for a nuisance on land belonging to them and adjoining the highway.

APPEAL by the defendants, the London County Council, from an order of His Honour JUDGE HUNTER, K.C., made at Ilford County Court on Oct. 6, 1948, awarding damages to the plaintiffs, Mrs. Jacob and her husband, in respect of injuries suffered by Mrs. Jacobs through the defective condition of the forecourt of a block of buildings on a housing estate belonging to the defendants. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

H. E. Francis for the defendants.

Monier-Williams for the plaintiffs.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE HUNTER, K.C., whereby he awarded the sum of £100 damages to the plaintiff, Mrs. Jacobs, and £37 10s. to her husband in respect of injuries suffered by Mrs. Jacobs and caused by the defective condition of a stop-cock which was situate in the forecourt of a block of buildings which belonged to the defendants, the London County Council, and formed part of an estate which they had laid out in Bennett's Castle Lane, Dagenham. Adjoining this highway there were three shops, numbered 238, 240, and 242, which had been let by the defendants. Alongside Bennett's Castle Lane there was an ordinary pavement of about 7ft. in width, and adjoining the pavement, and between the pavement and the shops, there was this forecourt, which had been laid out by the defendants, and which consisted partly of cement and partly of cast-stone paving-stones. To get to any one of the shops from the pavement, persons would have to cross the forecourt. The premises, No. 240 (i.e., the shop with which we are concerned in this case) were let to Smith, Gard & Co. by lease, the terms of which gave them permission to use the premises for the purpose of a chemist's shop and one other specified purpose. The case has proceeded on the basis that the defendants were at all material times the persons in occupation of the forecourt.

In the forecourt, some 2ft. 6ins. from the pavement, there was a stop-cock. The surrounding cement and paving-stones had sunk so that the stop-cock projected an inch and a quarter from the surface of the forecourt. The plaintiff, Mrs. Jacob, was on the way to make a purchase at Smith, Gard & Co., the chemists, and for this purpose left the pavement and proceeded on to the forecourt. When she reached the stop-cock—having, of course, only just stepped off the pavement—she caught her foot in the raised stop-cock cover and suffered the injuries for which she brought this action. The first question which had to be determined was whether, in the position in which she was when she fell, she was an invitee of the defendants or merely a licensee on the forecourt. The learned judge has found that the defendants ought to have known of this unusual danger and that they failed to know of it owing to their lack of reasonable care in the matter of inspection. They were not, in fact, aware of the existence of the danger. So we have a clear-cut case in which it is essential to decide whether or not the plaintiff was an invitee or a licensee, because, on the learned judge's finding of fact, if she was an invitee, she was clearly entitled to recover. On the other hand, if she was a licensee it is equally clear that her claim must fail. When that issue is disposed of, it may be necessary to consider the second part of her claim, which is put in the alternative, namely, on the ground that the defendants had created, or allowed to come into existence, and had failed to remedy, that which was a nuisance adjoining the highway, and she (the plaintiff) suffered damage from that nuisance as a user of the highway. With regard to the plaintiff's status, the learned judge has held that she was an invitee within the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (1), but he has not given any reasons showing the exact means by which he arrived at that decision.

This case appears to me to raise in an acute form the problem which has troubled the courts from time to time in cases of this sort. First, it may be just as well to go back to the fountain-head of Indermaur v. Dames (1). In the course of his judgment WILLES, J., said (L.R. 1 C.P. 288) :

“The class to which the customer belongs includes persons who go not as mere volunteers, or licensees, or guests, or servants, or persons whose employment is such that danger may be considered as bargained for, but who go upon business which concerns the occupier, and upon his invitation, express or implied. And, with respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law, that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know . . .”

- A There have been a number of cases similar to the present which involved claims, sometimes by tenants and sometimes by their guests or visitors, against landlords who had retained a staircase or other portions of property in respect of injuries suffered on such staircases by guests and tenants. After a number of those cases had been through the courts, Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (2) reached the House of Lords in 1923, and that is now the governing authority covering this branch of the law.
- B In that case the plaintiff, who was a lodger of one of the tenants of a flat in a block of flats, met with an injury owing to the state of the stairs, and she brought her action against the landlords who retained control of the stairs. One of the issues in the case was : What was the status of the plaintiff ? Was she a licensee or was she an invitee ? I should have thought that, logically that was the first issue, because, until
- C that was determined, it was not possible to measure or ascertain the nature of the duty or the relevant facts. In dealing with that case LORD ATKINSON, LORD SUMNER and LORD WRENBURY all expressed the view in very clear language that the plaintiff was a licensee and not an invitee. LORD ATKINSON, having set out the facts, said ([1923] A.C. 85) :

- “ When the owner of a flat lets it to a tenant for the purpose of its
- D being resided in by the tenant and his family the landlord must, I think, be taken to have given permission for whatever is reasonably necessary for the reasonable use and enjoyment of the flat for that purpose. This would necessarily include permission to the tenant and his family, his servant, the messengers of the tradesmen with whom he dealt, his visitors and guests and suchlike persons, to have access to his flat in order
- E to enable him and his family to live in it with the customary amenities. It may be doubted whether lodgers were included in the list of privileged persons, since, apparently, it was not contemplated by either landlord or tenant when the letting was made that the tenant should take in lodgers. Whether that be so or not, however, I think it might be held in this case, upon the principle upon which Lowery v. Walker (3) was decided, that from
- F the user of the stairs for such a length of time as the lady has, to the knowledge of the landlord’s caretaker, in fact used them it was to be inferred that she had the landlord’s permission to use them.”

So the learned Lord was putting the plaintiff into the category of the other persons to whom he had referred, namely, the family of the tenant, servants, messengers, tradesmen, visitors, guests, and suchlike persons. Having put her into that

G category, he said (ibid.) :

- “ She was undoubtedly, when using the stairs, using them as the invitee of the tenant, though not of the landlord. Quoad the landlord she was, I think, when using them at most merely his licensee. There is nothing in the case to support the suggestion that the tenant was authorised by the landlord to act as the latter’s agent to invite her. The landlord gave
- H her no invitation, it would appear to me, either direct or indirect, to use these stairs.”

Then LORD SUMNER said (ibid., 92) :

“ My Lords, I think that the plaintiff was the defendants’ licensee not their invitee. Somebody builds the stairs, and the defendants open the door, but the tenant gives the invitation. It was not about the landlord’s business that the plaintiff used the stairs, though it may well be that, as a lodger to whom the tenant was seemingly entitled to sub-let a room, she had such a right to go in and out as to make her licence irrevocable, so long as she remained a lodger. In this particular case, however, it makes no difference to the liability whether she was the defendants' licensee or their invitee."

LORD WRENBURY said (ibid., 95) :

"It is well to define at the outset what, in my judgment, is the relation between the plaintiff and the landlord in respect of which she can sue. There was no contractual relation. She was a person who, as between herself and the landlord, was entitled to use the landlord's staircase, because she was there rightly for the purpose of gaining access to premises which he had demised to a tenant with an implied right of use by the tenant and all persons lawfully resorting to the tenant's premises. She was, I think, the invitee of the tenant, and, in consequence, the licensee of the landlord."

In the course of their speeches the Lords (especially LORD SUMNER) dealt, at some length, with Miller v. Hancock (4) which they overruled. The importance of that is that in Miller v. Hancock (4) the plaintiff who suffered injury was visiting premises which consisted partly of business offices and was going there for business purposes. The facts in Miller v. Hancock (4) were set out by LORD BUCKMASTER ([1923] A.C. 79) in Fairman's case (2) :

"The defendant Hancock owned a building in the city, the different floors of which were let separately as chambers or offices. The staircase by which access to and from the street was obtained remained in his possession and control. The plaintiff, who, in the course of business with one of the tenants, was attending one of these sets of offices on the second floor, fell on the stairs owing to their worn and defective state and suffered injuries . . ."

It was much discussed whether the true basis of the decision in Miller v. Hancock (4) rested on some alleged contractual duty or whether it was based in tort, but, having examined the case, LORD SUMNER said (ibid., 94) :

"If then Miller v. Hancock (4) is not a case of a trap, but decides that an owner of property is liable contractually to others than parties or privies, or non-contractually is under a duty to repair, even though the want of repair is patent, it is inconsistent with the authorities cited, to which, except to name Cavalier v. Pope (5), it is not necessary for me to refer."

In 1941 this court had occasion to consider Fairman's case (2) in Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (6) in which the plaintiff had suffered injury owing to the defective condition of a lift in a block of flats. In that case the plaintiff was a solicitor's clerk visiting one of the tenants in the block of flats on the solicitor's business, but the tenant was the tenant of a residential flat. The court decided that the plaintiff, whether he was a licensee or an invitee, could not succeed against the landlords because the landlords had fully fulfilled their duty in either event, i.e., they had done everything which was reasonable with regard to the repair of the lift by putting it in the hands of competent engineers to repair and inspect, and so forth. None the less, both SCOTT, L.J., and GODDARD, L.J., considered with great care and in some detail whether or not the plaintiff was a licensee or an invitee. SCOTT, L.J., came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was an invitee, and found himself able to arrive at that conclusion, notwithstanding the decision in Fairman's case (2), on the ground that he thought the statements of the Law Lords in Fairman's case (2) were obiter dicta, because in that case, also, it was clear on the facts that the House of Lords were satisfied that in either event the plaintiff would not have been able to succeed. Feeling himself free to express his own view, SCOTT, L.J., said ([1941] 3 All E.R. 164) :

" . . . it is my duty to express my view. My view is that, in the ordinary case, the landlord of a block of flats, who retains possession, occupation and control of the means of access which he provides for the use of his tenants and their visitors, has an interest of his own in facilitating access to the flats not only of his tenants and their households, but also of their visitors, and, therefore, that, when a visitor avails himself of the proffered access, he does so on the implied invitation of the landlord. If so, the plaintiff was the landlord's invitee, to use a horrid, non-English word made common, if not invented, by our judges . . ."

CLAUSON, L.J., did not deal with this matter, but he said (ibid., 174) :

" I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which GODDARD, L.J., is about to deliver. For the sake of brevity, I desire to adopt as my own his statement of the facts, and also the conclusions which he reaches as regards the failure of the plaintiff to establish a case for damages against the defendant Daw. I agree with GODDARD, L.J., that it becomes unnecessary to determine whether the plaintiff was a licensee or an invitee."

It is true that GODDARD, L.J., stated (ibid., 181) :

" . . . even assuming that the plaintiff is to be regarded as an invitee, I think that his claim . . . must fail."

Before making that statement, however, he had considered, at some length, the question whether or not the plaintiff was an invitee, and he had come to the conclusion that he was bound by Fairman's case (2) to hold that the plaintiff was only a licensee. First he referred to Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (7), which is relied on by counsel for the defendants in the present case, and then he said (ibid., 179) :

" This brings us at once to the question of what duty was owed by Daw to a person who came to the flats and used the lift for the purpose of visiting a tenant, and not on the business of the landlord. I confess that, were it not for authority which binds me, I should be strongly tempted to hold that, in the case of flats and offices, having regard to modern conditions of life and business, the plaintiff ought to be regarded as an invitee. LORD SUMNER puts the matter tersely in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (7) ([1923] A.C. 272) : ' The leading distinction between an invitee and a licensee is that, in the case of the former, invitor and invitee have a common interest, while, in the latter, licensor and licensee have none '."

LORD SUMNER was a member of the House that decided Fairman's case (2), and also a member of the House that decided Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (7). GODDARD, L.J., then said ([1941] 3 All E.R. 180) :

" In the case of blocks of offices in the city, everyone knows that lifts are running all day, not only for the use of the tenants, but also for the use of their clients and customers. The landlord must provide facilities and conveniences to enable his tenants to carry on their business if he wants to let the offices and keep his tenants. Surely he would prejudice his prospects of letting on favourable terms a second or third floor office to a stockbroker, solicitor or merchant were he to say : ' The lift is for you only. I do not undertake to allow your clients, or even your clerks, to use it. I may do so as a matter of grace, but that is all.' The more convenient and attractive he can make his property for persons resorting thereto on business, the better the rent he can obtain. This applies equally to the case of residential flats, where tenants expect and require facilities for their visitors, whether on business or social calls."

GODDARD, L.J., then referred to Fairman's case (2) and mentioned that in it the court had overruled Miller v. Hancock (4). He then said (ibid.) :

"For this purpose I can see no distinction between a staircase and a lift. They are merely alternative methods of access. Both LORD SUMNER ([1923] A.C. 92) and LORD WRENBURY ([1923] A.C. 95), say in terms that the plaintiff was a licensee, and not an invitee, of the landlords', and, although they said that in that particular case it made no difference whether the plaintiff was the one or the other, I cannot regard their views on this matter as being merely obiter. If they were, I think it is for the House of Lords, and not for this court, to say so."

With respect, I find myself in precisely the same position as GODDARD, L.J. Whether or not what he said and what SCOTT, L.J., said in Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (6) were dicta, I think myself bound by Fairman's case (2), and I find it impossible to distinguish a case in which an injured person is visiting a shop or a professional office from one in which he is visiting a residential flat. It seems to me that the language in Fairman's case (2) covers all this class of case, and the decision shows that in this kind of matter the landlord has not a sufficient interest in the visit of the injured person to confer on the latter a right to damages. That he has some kind of remote interest is obvious from the examples given by GODDARD, L.J., and from the fact that, if customers were not allowed to reach the demised shop, the tenant might, and probably would, be unable to pay his rent, but the cases seem to show—with the authority of the House of Lords—that that is not a sufficient interest to make a visitor to the shop or office or flat anything other than a licensee when he is using the staircase, the forecourt, or other part of the premises which is in the occupation of the landlord and has got into a state of disorder. Therefore, I think that the learned county court judge was wrong in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff was an invitee. I think she was merely a licensee and that, if the law in this class of case requires revision, it must be for the House of Lords to revise it.

That brings me to the second branch of the claim, namely, nuisance. In regard to that the learned judge said :

"I also find that the stop-cock and surrounding stones constituted a nuisance. The cases of nuisance on land adjoining a highway are not in point, for the female plaintiff did not stray on to the forecourt by accident. She went there deliberately. But she was there lawfully and not as a trespasser. She was injured by reason of a nuisance on land of the London County Council, on which land she was present lawfully, and on this ground the county council are also liable. I think that the principles laid down in Wringe v. Cohen (8) are applicable, and that it is immaterial whether the county council knew of the nuisance or not."

With regard to that, counsel for the plaintiffs does not seek to uphold the reasoning by which the learned county court judge held the defendants liable in nuisance. He concedes that Wringe v. Cohen (8) is not an authority which is helpful in the present case. In Wringe v. Cohen (8) a landlord, who had reserved to himself the right to enter on premises which he had let, had allowed the premises to get into a condition constituting a nuisance, and the case dealt with the duty of the landlord to the owner of adjoining property. That case is of no assistance with regard to the duty owed to persons using the highway, and counsel for the plaintiffs concedes that, to succeed in the present case, the plaintiff, Mrs. Jacobs, must show that this accident happened to her in the course of her user of the highway. He says, with regard to that, that the learned judge was wrong in saying :

"The cases of nuisance on land adjoining a highway are not in point, for the female plaintiff did not stray on to the forecourt by accident. She went there deliberately."

Counsel for the plaintiffs says that that finding is not supported by the evidence, and that on the true view of the case the plaintiff should be regarded as having still been using the highway at all material times. He says that the forecourt, with the stop-cock in this dangerous condition only 2ft. 6ins. from the pavement, should be regarded as in exactly the same category as a dangerous fence, such as there was in Harrold v. Watney (9), and that it is immaterial whether the plaintiff knew she was on the highway all the time or not. He submits that, despite the fact that she had left the highway to go to the chemist's shop, she did not know whether or not she was on the highway, and, therefore, she must be treated as still using the highway at the material time. He says that this dangerous stop-cock was so near the highway that the plaintiff would have to deviate hardly more than a few inches. It is conceded that, on the authorities, if she had left the highway momentarily because of some obstruction on the highway and, in so doing, had met with precisely the same accident as that which befell her, she would have been able to recover. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that it seems curious that, if that is the case, she should not be able to recover because she was on the way to the chemist's shop. One does get remarkable consequences when one has to draw the line in particular cases, but I think the authorities are clear that in a case of this kind the plaintiff can only recover if at the material time she was, in fact, using the highway. If she was no longer on the highway, but had left it deliberately and intentionally—and by “deliberately and intentionally” I do not mean “knowing that she had left the highway,” but “pursuant to her deliberate purpose of reaching some place that was off the highway”—then, in my view, she cannot be said to have suffered the injury in the process of using the highway. Where a person has to step off the highway because of some momentary obstruction, although she is thereby physically off the highway, I think on the authorities she is regarded as still using the highway, having, so to speak, been forced off it.

To deal with the more modern cases, Bromley v. Mercer (10) is an authority for the proposition that a person who was not using the highway when the accident occurred is not entitled to recover damages. The headnote in that case is :

“The defendants were the owners of a house and yard abutting on a highway, and separated therefrom by a wall which was in such a defective state of repair as to constitute a public nuisance in the highway. The plaintiff, a child of nine years of age, who was visiting the tenant of the premises, while playing in the yard was injured by a heavy stone which fell from the wall upon her. In an action against the owners for damages for the injuries so sustained : Held, that as the plaintiff was not using the highway when the accident occurred she was not entitled to recover damages from the defendants.”

It is true that in that case, as is stated in the judgment of LORD STERNDALE, M.R. ([1922] 2 K.B. 129), there was no evidence to show that the child was ever on the highway. It is clear there was not that distinction in that case, but the legal position is stated very clearly in the judgments of LORD STERNDALE, M.R., and SCRUTTON, L.J. LORD STERNDALE, M.R., after describing the facts, said (ibid.) :

“The learned commissioner said in his judgment : ‘The point is a very fine one. The plaintiff was not in fact on the highway, she was in the yard. The wall, as I find, was a public nuisance abutting on a highway. Does the plaintiff lose her remedy as one of the public injured by the nuisance, because, in fact, she was not on the highway but was in the yard as the licensee or invitee of the tenant ?’ That, I think, involves a fallacy. He seems to think that where there is a nuisance to the highway every one who comes in proximity to it has a right of action which he can carry about with him on to private premises.”

SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1922] 2 K.B. 130) :

"It is true that the defendants, the landlords, are under covenant to keep the wall in repair, and have not done so, but the commissioner has rightly held that the plaintiff cannot sue them for negligence either in contract or in tort because they are not in occupation of the premises. The authorities justify that. But the commissioner has gone on to find that the wall is in so dangerous a condition as to constitute a public nuisance to the adjoining highway. On that finding he has held that the plaintiff, who has been injured in consequence of the condition of the wall, is entitled to recover. But the only person who can successfully sue for damages is one who is injured in using the highway. There is no authority for the extension of the law which the learned commissioner has made, and in my opinion it is erroneous. He seems to have relied upon Harrold v. Watney (9). But there the plaintiff was using the highway, and that case cannot be extended to a case where the person injured was on the other side of a boundary fence and not using the highway at all."

In Howard v. Walker and Lake (Trustees) and Crisp (11) the plaintiff received injuries on a forecourt before reaching the highway after leaving a shop, and LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 199) :

"In this case Mrs. Howard was a visitor or invitee of the tenant. Her counsel sought to put the case on the ground that she was a user of the highway, that she was about to get on it, and that the accident happened while she was so doing, and he endeavoured to support his case by reference to the well-known series of authorities which decide that, if a person creates a danger, whether by excavation or otherwise on land immediately adjoining the highway, he is liable to a person who inadvertently steps off the highway and is injured. This seems to me really to amount to the same argument as was unsuccessful in Bromley v. Mercer (10). There the defendants were the owners of a house and yard abutting on a highway and separated therefrom by a wall which was in such a defective state of repair as to constitute a public nuisance to the highway. The defendants were liable to maintain and keep the outside of the premises in good repair and condition. The plaintiff, who was visiting the tenant of the premises, was in the yard and was injured by a heavy stone falling on her from the wall. It was held that she had no cause of action against the landlords . . . It may well be that had Mrs. Howard been walking along the pavement and inadvertently or to avoid some obstruction stepped on the forecourt and had fallen owing to its defective state, she might have been able to recover as did the plaintiff in Owens v. Scott & Sons (Bakers), Ltd. and Wastall (12), but she met with the accident while she was still the invitee of the tenant whose premises she was leaving. If she were entitled to recover against the landlords, I can see no reason why a person leaving a house abutting on a highway who was injured by the defective condition of the step should not also have an action, and yet that would be entirely contrary to the line of authority of which the cases I have cited are instances. It may be that the law is not entirely satisfactory on this point."

I cannot see that it makes any difference whether the accident happened to the plaintiff when she had left the highway on the way to the shop or when she had left the shop on the way to the highway. Nor can I see that it makes any difference whether the defective stop-cock is 2ft. 6ins. or 22ft. 6ins. from the highway. On the authorities I think it is clear that the plaintiff did not meet with this accident in the course of the user of the highway. She had left the highway for the purpose of reaching some place off the highway. For these reasons, I think this appeal succeeds.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. At times during the argument I had serious doubts whether the plaintiff might not have been an invitee. It might be argued that she and the landlords had a common interest in her crossing the forecourt of the shop, her interest being that of a customer, and the council's being that which the lessor of a shop has in attracting custom and providing security for the payment of his rent. There is nothing parallel to this consideration in the effect of Fairman's case (2), which proceeded expressly on the footing that the defendant had no interest whatever in the presence of the plaintiff on the common stairs or elsewhere on the premises. I have also felt doubts whether Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (6) binds us to any particular view of the status of the plaintiff in the present case, seeing that in Haseldine's case (6) the result would have been the same whether the plaintiff was a licensee or an invitee. Though I still feel this is a difficult question, I have not sufficient confidence in the grounds of my own scepticism to press them to the point of dissent. I, accordingly, agree with my Lord.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I also am of the opinion that this appeal should be allowed, and I have reached that conclusion with very considerable regret that the law which has been discussed in this court remains so obscure that it is still difficult in so many cases to determine what the precise position of the plaintiff is and what is the nature of the duty owed to the plaintiff.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued :] It is said that, if the London County Council were the occupiers of that forecourt, then the plaintiff was, at the most, a licensee when she was on it. The duty towards a licensee is different from that towards an invitee. The occupier of the premises is under no obligation to a licensee to make them safe for use by him. A mere licensee must be content to take the premises as they are. So it is said that when the plaintiff went across that forecourt and tripped on a water stop-cock which was projecting above the footway, she had to take the premises as she found them and the defendants are not responsible to her. That is right. If she had been an invitee—and she would have been an invitee if she had got into the shop, because she would have been giving business to the shopkeeper—a different measure of duty arises, so that one finds the plaintiff placed in these different categories, all within a very short space of time.

This question whether a person is an invitee or a licensee has been discussed for years. In the same volume of the LAW REPORTS ([1923] A.C.) are Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (2) and Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (7) where the difference between the two are set out in full, and they have been referred to by my Lord. Other cases have been cited to us. I find it difficult to distinguish between the dock cases, Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. (13) and Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Procter (7), on the one hand, and the present case, on the other. The defendants, the London County Council, had developed the housing estate. They had an interest in the people on the estate, and, though they had no direct business interest in the shop to which the plaintiff was going, they had retained the forecourt, on which she was when she met with the accident, and on that forecourt was a stop-cock for the purposes of a water supply to a flat, or flats, above the shop.

The whole position is full of difficulty and doubt. I must refer to the judgment of GODDARD, L.J., in Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (6), where he said ([1941] 3 All E.R. 179) :

“ This brings us at once to the question of what duty was owed by Daw to a person who came to the flats and used the lift for the purpose of visiting a tenant, and not on the business of the landlord. I confess that, were it not for authority which binds me, I should be strongly tempted to hold that, in the case of flats and offices, having regard to modern conditions of life and business, the plaintiff ought to be regarded as an invitee.”

That, in view of all the circumstances, is the view I should take of the plaintiff's position here, did I not feel bound by authority to come to an opposite conclusion. At one time I wondered whether the view formed by the learned county court judge that she was an invitee was not decisive in that it might be said, in all the circumstances, that there was some evidence that she was in that category and that the learned judge had found that on evidence, but, having regard to all the authorities which have been cited to us, and, in particular, to the decision in Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd. (6), I do not feel able so to hold. A

The other part of the case, the ground of nuisance, presents just as many difficulties and the law on the subject is just as complicated. It is not disputed by counsel for the defendants that, if the plaintiff, Mrs. Jacobs, had been walking along the footway proper and had stepped to one side because someone got in her way or because the footway was not clear at that point and had then caught her foot on the stop-cock, the stop-cock would have constituted a nuisance and she would have been entitled to recover on the ground that there was a public nuisance and that she had suffered damage thereby. The stop-cock, in fact, was only about 2 ft. 6 ins. or 3 ft. from the footway and, so far as anyone could see, the paving was just the same. She thought that that part of the forecourt was part of the footway, without a doubt, but she had turned to her left to go to the shop and, so it was said, she had left the highway (although she did not know that she had), and thereby she cannot recover. I suppose some people would call this a distinction without a difference. It is extraordinarily difficult to see why in the circumstances she should not recover, and yet the decisions bind me to say that she cannot. B

My Lord referred to the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in 1947, in Howard v. Walker and Lake (Trustees) and Crisp (11). In that case the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE ended his judgment in this way ([1947] 2 All E.R. 199): C

"It may be that the law is not entirely satisfactory on this point. No doubt, it is difficult for a layman to understand why, if he is walking along the road and slips into an excavation at the side of it, he should be entitled to recover, whereas if he slips into the excavation as he is endeavouring to get on to the road he is not, but I must take the law as I find it, and I have come to the conclusion that it is not possible for me to hold that Mr. and Mrs. Howard have a cause of action against the landlords. Accordingly, Mr. and Mrs. Howard will have judgment against Mr. Crisp for £455 13s. 6d. . . . and there will be judgment for the landlords . . ." D

I too do not think that the law is satisfactory. It would be better, I think, if the London County Council have a piece of ground of this kind that it should be thrown into the highway so that someone may have responsibility for it and that they should have some means of inspecting it, but, as it stands, if a person who goes on that land is a mere licensee, he must take the premises as he finds them. Mrs. Jacobs was injured by no fault of her own. That is found by the learned county court judge. She was injured because of a projection on a place which looked just like the highway, but was not, in fact, part of the highway, and those who were the occupiers of this piece of land did not, apparently, know that they were. I think it is most unfortunate for her, and I have great sympathy with her and with her advisers, who have found it so difficult to know what her rights are, or even if she has any. I am afraid that, on the law as it stands, the appeal must be allowed, but I cannot help wishing that the law was otherwise. E

Appeal allowed with costs.

McCARTHY AND ANOTHER v. DAILY MIRROR NEWSPAPERS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.J.J.), March 31, 1949.]

Factory—Accommodation for clothing—“Suitable accommodation”—Consideration of risk of theft—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 43 (1).

A Section 43 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, provides: “There shall be provided and maintained for the use of employed persons adequate and suitable accommodation for clothing not worn during working hours . . .”

B The plaintiffs were printers’ assistants employed by the defendants on premises which were admitted to be a factory for the purposes of the Factories Act, 1937. It was the plaintiffs’ practice to change into overalls in which to work, and, although lockers with keys were available for many of the employees in which to deposit their outdoor clothes, the plaintiffs were only provided with pegs. In April, 1948, the plaintiffs’ clothing was stolen from the pegs. In an action by the plaintiffs for damages for, inter alia, a breach of s. 43 (1),

C HELD: the risk of theft was an element which must be taken into consideration in deciding whether the accommodation was “suitable.”

Observations by TUCKER, L.J., regarding matters proper to be taken into account in deciding this question.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decision of His Honour JUDGE EARENGEY, at Clerkenwell County Court, on Nov. 18, 1948.

E The plaintiffs claimed damages for the loss of clothing, stolen from pegs provided by the defendants for the use of their employees while at work. The county court judge held that the defendants were not liable for the loss and gave judgment in their favour. The Court of Appeal remitted the case to the county court judge to consider the effect in the circumstances of the risk of theft when deciding whether the accommodation in question was “adequate and suitable” within the meaning of s. 43 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937.

Paull, K.C., and J. G. K. Sheldon for the defendants.

G TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE EARENGEY in favour of the defendants, Daily Mirror Newspapers, Ltd., in an action in which the plaintiffs, two of the defendants’ employees, claimed damages in respect of the loss of certain clothing belonging to them which was stolen on Apr. 7, 1948, from the defendants’ premises while the plaintiffs were at work. The plaintiffs were printers’ assistants employed at the defendants’ premises, which are admittedly “a factory” within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937.

H The facts, as found by the learned judge, are that:

“ . . . it is a well-known practice of all printers employed in the machine rooms of newspaper companies to change the whole of their outdoor dress and to work in overalls. The defendants provided some 130 to 150 lockers with keys in which the outdoor dress of the printers employed by them could be deposited. But after the last war the employees increased considerably above that number, and, to accommodate those who could not have lockers, pegs were provided. At first these pegs were placed in the machine room, but there was so much oil about that they were removed, some to a passage-way adjoining the shop (where other pegs had for some time been fixed) and others elsewhere on the premises for different workers. The workmen not accommodated with lockers (including the plaintiffs) complained about having to use pegs which exposed their clothing to the risk of being stolen, and the defendants' representative agreed that this was inconvenient and exposed it to the said risk. The defendants ordered additional lockers, but, owing to shortage of material, delivery was long delayed."

Accordingly, the plaintiffs continued using the pegs, and on Apr. 7, 1948, their clothing was stolen. The learned judge has found that the value of Mr. McCarthy's clothes which were stolen was £35, and that of Mr. Nodan, the other plaintiff, £26.

The plaintiffs put their case before the county court judge in three ways. First, they claimed that it was an implied term of the plaintiffs' employment that the defendants would provide reasonable and adequate lockers and/or other accommodation in which the plaintiffs and each of them would be able during the said working hours with safety to deposit their said discarded clothing. Secondly, they said that during working hours the defendants were bailees of the clothing and they had not taken reasonable care of it. Thirdly, they claimed under s. 43 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. The claim against the defendants as bailees was abandoned at the hearing before the county court judge. The claim based on an implied term in the contract was decided in favour of the defendants by the county court judge, and I think it is clear that that was right. He founded himself principally on Deyong v. Shenburn (1) which, I think, is indistinguishable from the present case on that issue. The county court judge pointed out that that case had decided that the defendant was not liable because he was under no duty to protect the clothing from theft, and he referred to a passage ([1946] 1 All E.R. 230) in the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., that "failure to provide against theft of the servant's goods is not a breach of any general obligation," nor did any contractual liability exist. He also referred to Stansbie v. Troman (2) which deals with a different matter. In any event, apart altogether from Deyong v. Shenburn (1), I think it would be impossible, in order to give the contract business efficacy, to say that there must be implied as a necessary term in it the term set out in the particulars of claim which I have just read. The claim based on that ground clearly fails.

The difficulty arises with regard to the alternative claim under s. 43 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, which provides :

"There shall be provided and maintained for the use of employed persons adequate and suitable accommodation for clothing not worn during working hours."

The first question is : What is the meaning of the words "adequate and suitable" ? Does consideration of what is "suitable" involve consideration of the risk of theft of the clothes or is the risk of theft an element which is quite irrelevant to that question ? Referring to s. 43 (1) the learned judge said :

"... Deyong's case (1) shows that at common law the present defendants would not be liable for theft of their servants' goods and there appears to me to be no sufficient reason why I should regard the risk of theft as being imposed indirectly by the words 'adequate and suitable.' I think they should be regarded as meaning 'adequate in point of quantity and strength, and suitable for the purpose of hanging clothing,' which I find to be the case here. In my judgment, therefore, the defendants' committed no breach of their obligation under s. 43."

It is clear that the learned judge regarded the risk of theft by fellow employees as a matter quite outside the purview of s. 43 (1), a risk to which it was not necessary for him to apply his mind at all. That is the basis of his decision in the defendants' favour under s. 43, and, having dealt with the matter in that way, he never returns to consider or weigh the risk or state his views with regard to the nature of the risk or the suitability of the accommodation having regard to the risk.

A In my view, risk of theft is an element which should be taken into consideration in deciding whether the accommodation provided for clothing is suitable within s. 43 (1). Counsel for the defendants has said that this is a matter of great importance to factory owners and employers of labour, and he asks: "How far are they to go? Are they to provide lockers for all their employees? If so, are they to provide Yale keys?" My answer to that is that it is unsatisfactory, and, indeed, impossible, ever to attempt to lay down any ruling on a matter of that kind. This is essentially a question of fact to be dealt with by the tribunal of fact in a common sense way, taking a broad view of all the circumstances. It must differ, I think, in every case. In some cases there may be a risk of theft by an outsider, in others there may be a risk of theft by persons inside the factory. What is suitable may depend on the number of employees or the access which some employees from other departments have to different departments in the building. All kinds of circumstances may differ in every case, but I think that the element of risk of theft must be weighed in coming to a decision on this matter.

B It is said by counsel for the defendants that in the present case there is no evidence on which the learned judge could come to the conclusion, even taking into consideration the matter of risk from theft, that this accommodation was not suitable. I do not agree, but, in sending the case back to the learned county court judge, I desire to leave the matter entirely at large for him to deal with, and in referring to certain matters I am not indicating a view with regard to them. There was evidence that the risk, such as it was, was brought to the notice of the defendants, and the defendants' representative appeared, according to the learned judge's finding, to have agreed that the provision of pegs instead of lockers did expose the clothing to some risk. Clearly it had been the practice of the employers to provide lockers for these employees, and the evidence was that they would have provided lockers for all their employees if it had not been for the difficulty of obtaining material during war-time. Those are all matters proper to be taken into consideration by the learned judge in coming to the conclusion whether, taking into account the degree of risk which existed, he thinks that the plaintiffs have established, the onus being on them that the accommodation was not suitable. On that issue I think the case should go back to the county court judge, and in the circumstances I think it should go back to the same county court judge who has already given this matter very careful consideration.

G ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree. No one contends that s. 43 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, places an absolute obligation on the employers to keep the clothing of the workpeople safe, but counsel for the defendants admitted at one stage that the risk of theft may come into the matter. If the learned county court judge had considered that, there would have been no purpose served by remitting the case to him. Apparently he did not. It is for him to consider the case again bearing in mind all the facts. The matter is one for him alone.

Case remitted to county court judge. Plaintiffs to have costs of appeal (not including costs of shorthand note). Costs of trial in discretion of county court judge.

not res judicata KOENIGSBERG (deceased). PUBLIC TRUSTEE
v. KOENIGSBERG AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ., and Wynn-Parry, J.),
March 16, 18, 1949.)

Res Judicata—Point belonging to subject of litigation, though not falling for decision—Decision of Court of Appeal—Question on administration based on that decision—Decision of Court of Appeal overruled by House of Lords —Reliance by beneficiaries under will on decision of House of Lords. A

By his will, made in 1936, a testator, who died on Apr. 26, 1941, having appointed the Public Trustee to be his executor and trustee, bequeathed three annuities free of income tax. Investments were directed to be appropriated to meet the annuities, and capital was to be resorted to if the income proved insufficient. In 1942, in Re Waring ([1942] 2 All E.R. 250), the Court of Appeal held that for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1941, s. 25 (1), a provision for a payment free of income tax was made when the will in which the provision was contained was executed. In 1943 the Public Trustee took out an originating summons asking inter alia "whether the Public Trustee ought to appropriate by way of provision for each of the said annuities payable to the defendants . . . respectively investments yielding at the date of appropriation an income sufficient to meet the said annuity and the Public Trustee's income fee in respect thereof unless commuted and ought to pay to the annuitant the amount of such annuity clear of such income fee." An affidavit in support was filed indicating that the income from the testator's estate would be just sufficient to pay the three annuities together with the income fee thereon. The figures given were based on the decision in Re Waring, it being assumed in consequence of that case that the amounts payable to the annuitants must be calculated in accordance with s. 25 (1). BENNETT, J., ordered that "the Public Trustee ought to appropriate by way of provision for each of the annuities payable to the defendants . . . respectively investments yielding at the date of appropriation an income sufficient to meet the said annuity and the Public Trustee's income fee in respect thereof and ought to pay to the annuitant the amount of such annuity clear of such income fee." In 1946 the House of Lords held in Berkeley v. Berkeley ([1946] 2 All E.R. 154) that Re Waring was wrongly decided and that the date of the provision by will for the purposes of s. 25 (1) was the date of the testator's death. The Public Trustee now asked whether, in view of the decision in Berkeley v. Berkeley, he ought to treat the annuities as not subject to s. 25 (1) of the Act of 1941 (as modified by s. 20 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945). The parties to the present summons were the same as those to the summons in 1943 except that one of the annuitants had died since that date. The personal representatives of the deceased annuitant were parties to the present proceedings. B C D E F G

HELD: the question for decision in 1943 was not whether the Public Trustee could appropriate to meet the annuities, but simply whether he ought to appropriate further to meet his income fee; to answer that question it had not been necessary either to decide the present issue nor was a finding on the present issue necessarily involved; and, therefore, the matter was not res judicata and the principle in Berkeley v. Berkeley applied. H

APPEAL by annuitants under the will of a testator from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 16, 1948, whereby it was declared that they (the annuitants) were estopped by an order of BENNETT, J., dated Dec. 1, 1943, from alleging that the Finance Act, 1941, s. 25 (1), was inapplicable to their respective annuities. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Russell, K.C., and Michael Browne for the surviving annuitants and the representatives of the deceased annuitant.

Wigglesworth for the Public Trustee.

Michael Albery, for Charing Cross Hospital.

J. A. Reid for St. Bartholomew's and Guy's Hospitals.

Dunbar for Westminster Hospital.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : The testator made his will in 1936 and died in April, 1941. He made the Public Trustee (the plaintiff in the present proceedings) sole executor and trustee, and after certain specific bequests he bequeathed three annuities to be paid free of income tax. There was a direction for the appropriation of investments sufficient at the date of such appropriation to meet each annuity. Capital was to be resorted to if the income turned out later to be insufficient, the residuary estate being, after such appropriation, free from further liability in respect of the annuities. There was also a provision that the balance (if any) of the income of each appropriated fund not required in any year for answering the annuity was to go to the residuary estate. There were some specific monetary legacies, and then the residuary estate was divided into 206 parts, and numbers of these parts, varying from twenty down to one, were given to various charitable objects or institutions. The Finance Act, 1941, s. 25 (1), provides that any provision for the payment of a stated amount free of income tax which is contained in any will and was made before Sept. 3, 1939, shall, as respects payment falling to be made during any year of assessment the standard rate of income tax for which is 10s. 0d. in the pound, have effect as if for the stated amount there was substituted an amount equal to twenty twenty-ninths thereof. When the standard rate was reduced to 9s. 0d. in the pound, the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, altered the fraction, the effect of which, I think, is that the annuitant bears income tax over and above 5s. 6d. in the pound.

The only question in this appeal is whether the issue as to the application of s. 25 (1) to this will is to be decided as the House of Lords now have decided is correct in law, or whether the matter must be dealt with on the basis that it is res judicata, in a sense other than that laid down by the House of Lords, by reason of proceedings which took place in reference to this will in 1943. On May 24, 1943, when a summons was taken out by the Public Trustee in respect of certain matters to which I will refer more in detail in a moment, there had been a decision of this court that, in construing the words in the statute, the relevant date was the date when the will was executed—in this case, 1936. On that basis the section applied to these annuitants, and, instead of getting the sums named in the will free of income tax altogether, they had to bear a proportion of the income tax exigible in respect of the annuities. By the summons taken out in 1943 the Public Trustee asked various questions. The main debate here arises on the second question, which I will read in full :

" Whether the Public Trustee ought to appropriate by way of provision for each of the said annuities payable to the defendants . . . respectively investments yielding at the date of appropriation an income sufficient to meet the said annuity and the Public Trustee's income fee in respect thereof unless commuted and ought to pay to the annuitant the amount of such annuity clear of such income fee."

In my opinion, that raises only the question how the income fee is to be dealt with. Is the Public Trustee, in addition to the investments necessary to produce the annuity amount, to appropriate a further amount to cover the income fee, or is the annuitant, in effect, to suffer that fee as a reduction from his annuity ?

An affidavit was filed by Mr. Shuckburgh, of the Public Trustee Office. He sets out the will, and then states :

" 5. The estimated gross amounts of the annuities bequeathed by cl. 3 of the said will as modified by the provisions of s. 25 of the Finance Act, 1941, is as follows " [then the amounts of the three annuities as so modified are set out, and they add up to £772 8s. 3d.]. 6. The income fee payable to the Public Trustee in respect of the three annuities last above mentioned will be approximately £15 10s. 0d. per annum. 7. The assets of the testator's estate are just sufficient to enable funds to be appropriated as provision for the weekly sum payable to the defendant Minnie Koenigsberg under the said order and for the three said annuities together with the income fee thereon. The said appropriation will virtually exhaust the assets and there will be no margin for the immediate payment of the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by cl. 4 of the said will. The fund appropriated to provide the said weekly sum is however available for this purpose subject to the life interest therein of the said Minnie Koenigsberg."

Those figures were on the basis of the decision of this court in Re Waring, No. 1 (1) and that this will was within the section. If, as the House of Lords later decided, the date of the testator's death was the date for the purposes of the section, that being April, 1941, the section did not apply and the annuitants were entitled to whatever were the additional sums over the sums set out. If, on the reduced basis, the assets were just sufficient to enable funds to be appropriated, obviously, if substantially larger sums had to be paid, the assets would have been insufficient to enable funds to be appropriated. There is no dispute about that. BENNETT, J., made an order, and it is said that he made that order on the footing that, since the testator's will was made before Sept. 3, 1939, although he died after that date, the amounts of the annuities bequeathed by cl. 3 of the said will were subject to modification under s. 25 of the Finance Act, 1941. In respect of the second question raised by the summons he ordered " . . . that the Public Trustee ought to appropriate by way of provision for each of the annuities payable to the defendants . . . respectively investments yielding at the date of appropriation an income sufficient to meet the said annuity and the Public Trustee's income fee in respect thereof and ought to pay to the annuitant the amount of such annuity clear of such income fee."

I agree with the submission of counsel for the annuitants that that order, read, as one is, I think, entitled to read it, with the question and with regard to the surrounding circumstances, does not order the trustee to appropriate. He was ordered to do that under the will. What he was asking was, if and when he appropriated, ought he to appropriate an amount to cover the income fee or not ?

Since the date when that order was made two things have happened. First, one of the annuitants has died, and her estate is represented before us, and, secondly, the House of Lords, in Berkeley v. Berkeley (2), decided that Re Waring, No. 1 (1) was wrong and that the date for the purposes of s. 25 in relation to a will is the date when the testator died. In those circumstances the Public Trustee has taken out the present summons, and the first question that he asks is :

“Whether having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Berkeley v. Berkeley (2) the Public Trustee ought to treat the amount of the annuities payable to the defendants . . . under cl. 3 of the will of the testator as not being subject to modification in accordance with s. 25 of the Finance Act, 1941, and s. 20 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945.”

If he is to have regard to the decision in Berkeley v. Berkeley (2) other questions arise.

It was argued on behalf of those interested subject to the annuities that on the issue whether the provision for the annuities was made before or after Sept. 3, 1939, for the purpose of s. 25 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, BENNETT, J.'s order constitutes the matter res judicata by implication. It was argued by counsel for the annuitants that that is not so and that they are entitled to have the will construed according to the law as it is now known to be, and, therefore, to get the benefit of having the sums named in the will paid free of tax. The question is whether, as between the parties to that summons and order—and those parties are here or are represented here—the court has decided that the law is as it was laid down in Re Waring, No. 1 (1). I would like at the outset to point out the distinction between this case and the case which came before JENKINS, J., Re Waring, No. 2 (3). That was a sequel to Re Waring, No. 1 (1). In Re Waring, No. 1 (1) the question of the construction of s. 25 in its application to a will was directly raised, and it was on that issue that the Court of Appeal decided that the material date was the date when the will was executed. There followed the decision in Berkeley v. Berkeley (2), and the issue arose whether there was an estoppel by res judicata so that the trusts had to be carried out on the basis of what the Court of Appeal had decided in Re Waring, No. 1 (1) or on the basis of what the House of Lords had said to be the law. There were two annuitants. One was a party to the earlier proceedings and the other was not, and JENKINS, J., decided that the one who was a party to the previous proceedings could not re-open the matter because it had been decided in the earlier proceedings as between the same parties, but that the annuitant who had not been a party to those proceedings was not so bound.

In the present case one thing is clear, and that is that in the originating summons taken out in 1943 the question of the construction of s. 25 in its application to a will was not directly raised. In spite of that, however, ROXBURGH, J., decided that the matter with which we are now concerned was res judicata. I have already stated my construction of question 2 of the earlier summons. That is the only question the answer to which it could be suggested had decided this point. It does not raise that issue on the face of it, but the answer may impliedly decide it. What happens to the income fee when you appropriate investments to satisfy an annuity is a question which might arise under any estate in regard to which the Re Waring, No. 1 (1) problem never could arise, but what is said here is that the Public Trustee, in his affidavit in relation to the earlier summons, states expressly : “I regard s. 25 as applying. On the basis that it applies these are the figures. These figures practically exhaust the funds." It is said that, if the Berkeley v. Berkeley (2) principle is applied, quite different questions arise, and the trustee could not have appropriated in accordance with the directions in the will because there would not have been sufficient investments to go round and other matters would have arisen as to how he should carry out his duties. The court, therefore, it is argued, answered the question on the basis that s. 25 applied.

The learned judge below relied, in particular, on Hoystead v. Taxation Comr. (4) which is the main authority on which those who support the submission that this matter is res judicata rely. It is important to see how the issue arose. In 1919 there was an assessment to land tax on trustees, and the trustees objected and made a claim to a deduction under s. 38 (7) of the Australian Land Tax Assessment Act, 1910-1916. I will read the first part of s. 38 (7) :

"Where, under a settlement made before July 1, 1910, or under the will of a testator who died before that day, the beneficial interest in any land or in the income therefrom is for the time being shared among a number of persons, all of whom are relatives of the settlor or testator by blood, marriage, or adoption, in such a way that they are taxable as joint owners under this Act, then, for the purpose of their joint assessment as such joint owners, there may be deducted from the unimproved value of the land . . . the aggregate of the following sums namely : In respect of each of the joint owners who hold an original share in the land under the settlement or will (a) the sum of £5,000."

The trustees claimed that they were entitled to deduct six sums of £5,000 in respect of six beneficiaries. It will be seen that to succeed on that issue they had to establish that the testator died before July 1, 1910, that the beneficiaries were relatives of the testator, that they were taxable as joint owners, and that they held an original share, and all those matters were set out expressly in the objection which the trustees took to the original assessment. The objection was disallowed by the revenue authorities, and the matter went to the High Court where the first question was :

"Whether the shares of the joint owners or of any and which of them in the land were original shares within s. 38 ; and (2) How many deductions of £5,000 the respondent should make."

It is clear that the Commissioner of Taxation could have taken, but did not take, the point that the beneficiaries were not taxable as joint owners—the point was there on the face of the section and in the objection, but he did not take it any more than he took the point that they were not relatives. The court decided that they had original shares and that they were entitled to six deductions. That was a decision that the sub-section applied. In the subsequent year the Commissioner of Taxation sought to re-open the matter and to argue that there should be no deduction because these beneficiaries were not taxable as joint owners and the question was whether that issue had already been decided. No point seems to have been taken, as was taken in Whelan v. Henning (5), that in regard to income tax a question relating to a subsequent year is not the same question as that relating to a previous year although all the relevant facts may be the same. No point of that kind seems to have been taken, but the Judicial Committee decided that the Commissioner of Taxation was estopped because what he was seeking to do in the subsequent year was to say : "As you are not taxable as joint owners s. 38 (7) does not avail you and there should be only one deduction of £5,000 instead of six," and so to obtain an order which was on the face of it and in form in direct conflict with the order which had been made previously. He was saying : "Whereas the previous order said six deductions, I want you to bring that down to one deduction," and also that s. 38 (7) did not apply, whereas the court had decided that it did. The case is a good example of what happens when a party could take a point, but fails to do so. It decides that in those circumstances he cannot in subsequent litigation get the matter (in that case, the applicability of s. 38 (7)) re-litigated by taking a point which he could have taken when the matter was previously before the courts. That decision does not cover the present case at all. ROXBURGH, J., read a passage from the judgment in that case of which I will read the latter part because a good deal of the argument here was based on its wording. LORD SHAW, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, said ([1926] A.C. 166):

“Thirdly, the same principle—namely, that of setting to rest rights of litigants, applies to the case where a point, fundamental to the decision, taken or assumed by the plaintiff and traversable by the defendant, has not been traversed. In that case also a defendant is bound by the judgment, although it may be true enough that subsequent light or ingenuity might suggest some traverse which had not been taken. The same principle of setting parties’ rights to rest applies and estoppel occurs.”

We were referred to a number of other authorities. There is a very famous passage from WIGRAM, V.-C., in Henderson v. Henderson (6), cited in Hoystead v. Taxation Comr. (4), which has often been quoted with approval. We were also referred to R. v. Hartington Middle Quarter (Inhabitants) (7), in which in the earlier proceedings (which were between the same parties) the question was where two unemancipated children were settled. That question could only be decided by deciding where their parents were settled, and it was, therefore, held in a later proceeding that the question where their parents were settled was res judicata. We have, however, as it seems to me, been referred to no case which covers the present one. The argument in the present case is not that the Re Waring, No. 1 (1) point was necessary for the decision of any of the points decided by BENNETT, J., in 1943. The argument is that the relevant questions would not have arisen except on the footing that the rights of the annuitants were on the basis that Re Waring, No. 1 (1) was right and that s. 25 applied.

If an order made by the court necessarily involves a finding (whether there was argument or not) on the point which is later sought to be litigated, the authorities lay down that that point cannot be raised, but, in my opinion, that principle does not cover the present case. The question is whether the words of LORD SHAW which have been quoted from Hoystead’s case (4)—they must, of course, be read in their context—justify us in extending this principle to the present case. I have come to the conclusion, differing from the learned judge, that res judicata by implication cannot be established here. Counsel for St. Bartholomew’s Hospital argued that in the case of administration proceedings of this kind the principles are rather wider than they would be in an action with pleadings. That may be so. I agree that each case must be considered on its own facts and that in proceedings by originating summons somewhat different questions may arise from those which arise in an action with pleadings, but I cannot hold that this order of BENNETT J.’s must be regarded as deciding this issue. The question whether an income fee is to fall on the annuitant or on the rest of the estate has nothing whatever to do with the question which arises under s. 25. That has to be conceded, but then it is said that the annuitants, faced with what is set out in the paragraphs which I have read, ought to have taken the point that the figures put forward were wrong, and that Re Waring, No. 1 (1) was wrongly decided. I cannot see that they were under any duty to take that point. The statements in Mr. Shuckburgh’s affidavit filed in 1943 do not seem to me to be within the phrase “a matter traversable by the defendant.” I agree that the word “traversable” contemplates pleadings rather than an originating summons, but when a party takes out an originating summons he can make quite clear to those whom he has to bring before the court what point or points he wants decided, and it is for the defendants to raise matters and file evidence which deal with the points which in the originating summons are put before the court for decision. I do not think they are called on to raise or deal with other and quite different points. As it seems to me, the point as to the effect of s. 25 (1) was plainly not put before the court for decision in the originating summons in 1943, and I cannot think that the defendants were under a duty to raise it in the sense that, if they did not do so, they would not be allowed in the future to assert their rights under the law as it was subsequently held to be. We have had an interesting argument, and I agree with what is said in Mr. SPENCER BOWER's book on RES JUDICATA that questions of some nicety can arise, and I think that is particularly true of procedure by way of originating summons. Once one has got the general picture of what happened in 1943 and the principles laid down in the cases, one has to decide whether this matter falls within those principles or not. For the reasons I have given I think that the learned judge was wrong, that the matter is not res judicata, and that the law as it has been laid down in Berkeley v. Berkeley (2) applies to the annuities under this will.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I agree. We have had the advantage of very full and careful arguments on the difficult question of the application of the so-called doctrine of estoppel per rem judicatam by implication. That is to say, the argument on behalf of the respondents is that, by virtue of that doctrine, the annuitants are estopped from asserting or claiming that the interests given to them under the will are those given according to the law as laid down by Berkeley v. Berkeley (2). In approaching the problem it may be not unimportant to bear in mind that this so-called doctrine of estoppel per rem judicatam is said to be justified on the theory that it is in the public interest that there should be no multiplicity of suits in the determination of disputes and the ascertainment of individual rights. In a case in which it is alleged that beneficiaries under a will are estopped from putting forward their real claims though the estate is not distributed, I feel that the court should be satisfied with reasonable certainty that the doctrine does, in truth, apply.

As the argument has developed it has seemed to me that two points (somewhat distinct) have been raised. The first is that which one may identify with the Hoystead case (4), the question being, to use the language in the Hoystead case (4) which SOMERVELL, L.J., has already read, whether a point fundamental to the decision of BENNETT, J., in 1943, taken or assumed by the plaintiff, has not been traversed, and is, therefore, to be treated as having been decided. The words or adjectives "fundamental," "assumed," and so forth, have to be examined in the light of the context in which they are used. It is plain that in 1943 not only the plaintiff, but all the parties and the court assumed that the law was as the Court of Appeal had said it was in Re Waring, No. 1 (1). They could, indeed, do no other, unless they were going to dispute in the House of Lords the validity of that decision. It is also true that the affidavit on behalf of the Public Trustee stated in paras. 5, 6 and 7 the financial position relevant to the question of the annuitants and also to the position of the testator's widow, who was then alive, on the basis that s. 25 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, would affect the amounts. Counsel for the annuitants argued, I venture to think with some force, that para. 7 of the Public Trustee's affidavit, which stated that there was only a sufficiency of assets to provide by appropriation for the annuities and no more, was particularly directed, not to the question of the income fee and the annuities, but to the question whether the reversion to the son set aside to provide the widow's £2 10s. 0d. per week should then be sold, but assuming that that paragraph applied also, and would be read as applying also, to the annuitants and their position, is it, nevertheless, within the terms of the Hoystead (4) decision true to say that the assumption (which I agree was universally accepted) of the application of the Act of 1941 was fundamental to the decision at which the learned judge, BENNETT, J., arrived ?

A ROXBURGH, J., was of the opinion that if the annuitants had challenged the application (namely, the financial statement about the annuitants and the estate and the assertion in reference to the Act of 1941), the order could not have been made without deciding whether the application of the Act of 1941 was good or not. With all respect, I think that is putting it too high.

B The question as counsel for the annuitants formulated it, I venture to think rightly, was whether, in making the appropriation which the will directed should be made, the sum was to be arrived at so that the annuitants bore the Public Trustee's income fee or not, and I am not satisfied that whatever the financial state of the estate was, or whatever was the view about the Act of 1941, that question could not properly have been determined without reference to the answers to these problems. During the course of the argument, WYNN-PARRY, J., adapting the phraseology from another case, asked whether, supposing that the three paragraphs of the affidavit had been struck out, there would have been no ground for BENNETT, J.'s decision ? I think that, so formulated, the answer to that question is in the negative. It could not be said that there would be no ground.

C I say no more on that aspect of the case save that, as was also put in argument, the matter should be tested, I think, by assuming for the moment that there had been no decision of the court in reference to s. 25 (1) of the Act of 1941, but that the view which the trustee was then adopting was that which he stated in his affidavit. If afterwards the court decides what the rights of the annuitants in the circumstances of these annuitants were under the Act of 1941, would the decision on the point about the income fee have necessarily involved a determination in advance, so to speak, of the question of construction of the Act of 1941 ? I do not wish to add anything further on that point to what has fallen from SOMERVELL, L.J., because, in my judgment, the answer to that question is in the negative, but there did remain the second point, which is founded on these observations of WIGRAM, V.-C., in Henderson v. Henderson (6) (3 Hare 115) :

E "The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time."

F It was said (and this point was particularly argued by counsel for St. Bartholomew's Hospital that in a proceeding such as that before BENNETT, J., in 1943, which was in the nature of an administration action by procedure of originating summons, it is the duty of parties to raise all points which appear to emerge on an examination of the application made and the evidence filed in support of it. Again, I think that puts the duty too high. The observation of WIGRAM, V.-C., it is to be noted, makes reference to multiplicity of litigation, referring to one of the basic theories on which estoppel by res judicata rests. I think, for my part, it may well be that, where multiplicity would otherwise be likely, there is a duty to raise points so as to prevent it, and I can see also, in reference to the point put by counsel for Charing Cross Hospital, that, if the summons raised in effect questions relevant to and in advance of an immediate distribution, then the parties to the summons should plainly raise all points which might affect the actual form of distribution and which it would in many cases, or might be, too late to raise after the distribution had been effected. But that is not the case here. There was no distribution immediately contemplated in 1943, and as it seems to me, if counsel for St. Bartholomew's Hospital were right (and I think he has conceded as much) it would have been necessary for the parties seeking to raise the point to raise it in the form of some new question. I think that, in such circumstances, it is going too far to say that the observations of the VICE-CHANCELLOR which I have read apply so as to enable the parties to invoke against the annuitants the doctrine of res judicata.

I have added these observations of my own because we are differing from the learned judge, but I also associate myself with what has already fallen from SOMERVELL, L.J. I only add one other observation in conclusion. Counsel for Westminster Hospital has a particular interest because following the order of 1943 there was an appropriation and one of the annuitants has since died and counsel represents the party who is entitled under the will to the sum which represents the appropriation made to answer the annuity. He argues that it is right to say that, whatever now is the position, in view of the decision of this court he must or should be entitled to raise and argue the point that the appropriations made in fact should not, so to speak, be unscrambled, but that he remains the only person entitled to the sum put aside to answer the annuity of the deceased annuitant. I express no view whether that is right or wrong. Certainly nothing I have said has been intended to pre-judge that question, and, therefore, I say that, so far as that is concerned, I express no opinion whatever. For these reasons, I agree that this appeal succeeds.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : I agree. So far as the annuitants are concerned, the lis in the 1943 proceedings was confined to question 2 of the originating summons. The fair construction of that question is whether the appropriation, when made, should be of a sum sufficient to meet the annuity alone or also to meet the annuity and the Public Trustee's fee payable in respect thereof. The object of the question is made clear by the last words which are, "and ought to pay to the annuitant the amount of such annuity clear of such income fee." If that be the correct way of viewing question 2, then prima facie it was unnecessary, for the purpose of answering it, to consider whether or not s. 25 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, applied. It is true that the evidence in support of the originating summons taken out in 1943 in the affidavit of Mr. Shuckburgh contained the statements which appear in paras. 5, 6 and 7. In para. 7 it is said :

"The assets of the testator's estate are just sufficient to enable funds to be appropriated as provision for the weekly sum payable to the defendant Minnie Koenigsberg [the widow] under the said order and for the three said annuities together with the income fee thereon. The said appropriation will virtually exhaust the assets and there will be no margin for the immediate payment of the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by cl. 4 of the said will. The fund appropriated to provide the said weekly sum is however available for this purpose subject to the life interest therein of the said Minnie Koenigsberg."

That statement was necessary because of the form of question 5 in that originating summons, which was :

"Whether the Public Trustee ought to sell the reversionary interest in the sum appropriated to provide for the said weekly sum payable to the defendant Minnie Koenigsberg or retain the said sum until her death."

The latter part of para. 7, which I have read, makes clear that this was the object of the statement, but it is said that, in view of the statements in those three paragraphs, the parties and the court must have proceeded on the basis that Re Waring, No. 1 (1) applied because otherwise there would not have been sufficient to provide for the full amount of the annuities. Therefore, it is said that it follows as a matter of necessary implication that, as between the annuitants and the parties with contrary interests, the court decided that the annuitants were only entitled to be paid the annuities calculated on the basis of the principle enunciated in Re Waring, No. 1 (1). I cannot accept this. The parties came to the court to ask for an answer to a simple question of construction relating to appropriation. It must be borne in mind that the obligation to appropriate arises under the will. The Public Trustee did not ask whether he should appropriate or not. In answer to that question the court declared that when the Public Trustee appropriated he should do so on a particular basis, i.e., making provision for his income fee. They made A no order on him to appropriate, and here I think that the learned judge was wrong when he said ([1948] Ch. 734) that "accordingly the estate was sufficient to justify the court in ordering the appropriations as specified."

In those circumstances, the decision in 1943 appears to me to be independent of any question of the application, or otherwise, of Re Waring, No. 1 (1).
 B In R. v. Hartington Middle Quarter (Inhabitants) (7), COLERIDGE, J., in the course of his judgment, said (4 E. & B. 794) :

"Strike either of these facts out, and there is no ground for the decision : these facts therefore were necessarily and directly matter of inquiry."

If one strikes out paras. 5, 6 and 7 of Mr. Shuckburgh's affidavit, it cannot be said that there was no ground for answering question 2 of the summons of
 C 1943. Those facts, therefore, were not necessarily and directly matter of inquiry in 1943. It follows, therefore, that on question 1 of the present originating summons the annuitants cannot be met by the plea of res judicata. I desire to add nothing to what has fallen from the other members of the court as regards the special point which was taken by counsel for the Westminster Hospital. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

TRIAL on a charge of bigamy.

The accused person, William Dolman, was charged on an indictment with bigamy, contrary to the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 57, the particulars being that on April 23, 1940, at Maymyo (in Burma) he married Florence Fitzgerald and on July 1, 1948, in her lifetime and while he was so married to her, at Don Valley Register Office he unlawfully married Grethe Jensen. The evidence for the defence was that in 1945, when the accused was serving in the Army in the Middle East and was living away from his wife, as a result of certain rumours he had heard he wrote to her and said that he was not going back to her because he had information that she was already married. He received no reply to that letter. In 1946 he met her in Karachi and asked her if it was true that she had been previously married to one Private Gray of the Royal East Kent Regiment. She admitted it and produced what appeared to be a genuine marriage certificate showing that she had married Private Gray in the Methodist Church, Rangoon, in 1928. Later, she showed the accused a photograph in which she appeared as a bride and told him it was a photograph of the wedding group at her wedding in 1928. In 1947, when the accused was in Cyprus, he consulted the Army Legal Aid Department and was there advised by the Chief Chaplain that he had ascertained that a Private Gray of the Royal East Kent Regiment existed and had married Miss Fitzgerald. The accused had made a statement to the police giving details of the matters he alleged in his defence. Mrs. Dolman, in her evidence for the Crown, denied that she had previously been through, or told the accused she had been through, a form of marriage with Private Gray or with anyone else, nor had she shown him the marriage certificate or the photograph as he alleged. Other witnesses were called by the Crown tending to disprove the existence of Private Gray and the alleged photograph of the wedding group.

G. H. Hartley for the Crown.

Russell Gurney for the defence.

STREATFEILD, J., in directing the jury, recited the facts and continued : The crime of bigamy is the creation of statute, the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. By s. 57 of that Act an offence is committed by any person, who, being married, shall marry any other person during the lifetime of the former husband or wife. If the prosecution prove that the party accused was married to one person and then went through a form of marriage with another person, that constitutes the crime of bigamy, but it has been held that bigamy, like many other offences, requires that there shall be what is known as guilty knowledge. There must be an appreciation that a crime is being committed. In many cases the law requires that in addition to an unlawful act there shall be a specific intention to do something or other. That does not apply here, but the person accused must have a culpable, guilty knowledge that he is doing something unlawful. Accordingly, it has been held now for many years that, even although there is a subsisting marriage, it is open to an accused person to defend himself on a charge of bigamy by showing that he had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that his real wife was dead. If he believed that she was dead, although she was not in fact dead, it would follow that when he afterwards went through a form of marriage, he believed he was entering into a lawful marriage with the second woman, and, therefore, there would not be that guilty knowledge and appreciation of wrong-doing which is necessary to constitute this offence. Therefore, although the statute itself does not say that a man shall not "knowingly" or "unlawfully" go through a form of marriage, it has for many years been held that a man does not commit the criminal offence of bigamy unless he realises that he is committing that offence. Therefore, it is open to a man to say: "I had reasonable cause to believe, and I did believe, that my wife was dead."

- What is suggested here is that just as it would afford a defence to the accused if he could prove that he had reasonable cause to believe that his real wife was dead, so it is a defence if he can satisfy the jury that he had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that what he thought at the time to be a legal and subsisting first marriage had turned out not to be a legal and subsisting first marriage—that he honestly believed, although it was not a fact, and had reasonable cause for believing that his first marriage was void and so he was free to enter into the marriage which is alleged to be bigamous. It would, of course, be a defence if the accused could show that his first marriage was, in fact, null and void—for instance, if his wife was already married—for then he would not be a person who, when already married, had gone through a form of marriage with another person. It is suggested, not that it is proved that Mrs. Dolman was, in fact, married before, but that the accused had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe honestly, that she had been married to a man called Gray before he married her, and, therefore, that his marriage to her was void. If you think that that is proved to your satisfaction, then it has been held before, and I so direct you now, that that affords him a good defence.

- The question you have to answer is whether when the accused went through that form of marriage with Miss Jensen, he honestly believed on reasonable grounds that his first marriage to Mrs. Dolman was void because she was already married to Private Gray? If you think he did believe that on reasonable grounds, then, you will find him "Not Guilty." If, on the other hand, you do not think that he had any reasonable grounds to believe, and did not believe, that his first marriage was void, the offence of bigamy will be made out.

Verdict: Guilty.

LEWISHAM BOROUGH COUNCIL AND ANOTHER v. ROBERTS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.J.J., and Jenkins, J.), February 24, 25, March 21, 1949.]

- G Requisition—House—Delegation of powers—Letter of authority from official of Ministry of Health to town clerk—Right of local authority to sue for possession—Requisition "necessary or expedient"—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927), reg. 51 (1), (2) (a), (5)—(as amended)—Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939 (c. 62), s. 7.*

- The Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51, (1), authorises the Minister of Health, if it appears to him to be necessary or expedient so to do, to take possession of any land, and, by para. (2) (a), the Minister "may do, or authorise persons using the land . . . to do, in relation to the land, anything which any person having an interest in the land would be entitled to do by virtue of that interest." By para. (5) the Minister may "to such extent and subject to such restrictions as [he] thinks proper, delegate all or any of [his] functions under paras. (1) to (3) of [this] regulation to any specified person or class of persons." By the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 7 "Every document purporting to be an instrument made or issued by any Minister . . . in pursuance of any provision contained in, or having effect under, Defence Regulations, and to be signed by or on behalf of the said Minister . . . shall be received in evidence, and shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to be an instrument made or issued by that Minister . . ."

In 1941 the plaintiff council requisitioned a house, which had been left vacant by the defendant, for persons rendered homeless by enemy action. In 1944 the defendant wished to resume possession, and it was agreed between him and the town clerk that the ground floor should be released from requisition so that he could occupy it, the upper part (to which access could be obtained only through the ground floor) being retained under requisition. Accordingly, in June, 1946, the town clerk, acting under powers delegated to him by the Minister of Health, gave notice to the defendant that he had given up possession of the ground floor of the house, but he omitted to include a provision, which the Ministry had instructed him to include, that the release would not affect access to the upper part which was still under requisition. The defendant went into occupation of the ground floor, changed the lock of the front door, and refused to allow access to the upper part. On Nov. 7, 1946, the town clerk applied to the Ministry for authority again to requisition the whole premises with the object of granting a licence to the defendant to occupy the ground floor, with the necessary safeguards for access to the upper part. On Nov. 12, 1946, an official of the Ministry of Health replied to the town clerk that he was directed by the Minister of Health "to say that in the circumstances he hereby delegates to you, as town clerk, his functions under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, for the purpose of requisitioning the whole of the above-mentioned premises for re-housing purposes, and consent is hereby given to such requisitioning." No precise instructions had ever been given to the official by the Minister personally as to the extent of his powers in general or in relation to the requisitioning of property in particular, and the Minister personally had not authorised the letter of Nov. 12. On Nov. 22, the town clerk issued a requisitioning notice in respect of the whole of the premises, but the defendant continued to deny access to the upper part, and the council and the town clerk began proceedings for possession.

HELD: (i) the letter of Nov. 12 was a document purporting to be an instrument issued by the Minister within the meaning of s. 7 of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and, until the defendant had proved the contrary, it was to be received in evidence and to be deemed to be an instrument made or issued by the Minister; the defendant had failed to prove the contrary; and, therefore, the letter must be deemed to constitute a valid delegation by the Minister to the town clerk of his functions under reg. 51 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939.

Dictum of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Carltona, Ltd. v. Works Comrs. ([1943] 2 All E.R. 563), applied.

(ii) the plaintiffs were competent to sue the defendant for possession, they having been validly authorised to do so by the Minister under reg. 51 (2) (a).

Lewisham Borough Council v. Maloney ([1947] 2 All E.R. 36; [1948] 1 K.B. 50; 177 L.T. 175), applied.

(iii) the delegation by the Minister to the town clerk was a purely administrative act which could be performed by any authorised official of the department without the specific consent or direction of the Minister.

Carltona, Ltd. v. Works Comrs. ([1943] 2 All E.R. 563), applied.

(iv) the principle delegatus non potest delegare did not apply to the delegation by the official since such an act done by a departmental official was equally the act of the Minister as if he had done it personally.

Per DENNING, L.J. (dissenting on this point): in the circumstances of the case it could not have appeared to the Minister to be necessary or expedient to take possession of the ground floor of the defendant's house since the intention was not to take possession of that floor but to leave the defendant in possession as a licensee, and, therefore, the Minister had no power to requisition the house again in November, 1946.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE COLLINGWOOD sitting at Lambeth County Court, dated Aug. 5, 1948, whereby he granted possession of a house, the property of the defendant, to the Lewisham Borough Council as the result of a requisitioning order made by the town clerk under authority purported to have been delegated to him by the Minister of Health. The Court of Appeal (DENNING, L.J., dissenting) dismissed the defendant's appeal, holding that a valid delegation of authority must be presumed to have taken place. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

H. L. Parker and Colin Pearson for the plaintiffs.

Croom-Johnson for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE COLLINGWOOD whereby he decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover possession of the house, 24, Boveney Road, Forest Hill, in the county of London, against the defendant.

The defendant, Joseph Roberts, was at all material times the owner of 24, Boveney Road. He lived there until 1941. Then, owing to the war, he, for business reasons, had to live in Leicester, and he and his wife took the furniture out of No. 24 and left it empty. Shortly afterwards the town clerk of Lewisham validly requisitioned the house and took possession of it under powers delegated to him by the Minister of Health under reg. 51 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, for the accommodation of persons rendered homeless through enemy action. In 1944 the defendant wished to return to his house for urgent business reasons, and on Sept. 16, 1944, he wrote to the council asking how soon the house could be released from requisition. The town clerk replied that the borough had suffered very severely during the flying bomb attacks, that there was an acute housing shortage, and that he was unable to say when the house would be released. The defendant then wrote to the Ministry of Health, saying that, in his view, he was not being treated very fairly in the matter, and asking for the Ministry's special attention to his case. The senior regional officer of the Ministry wrote in reply that he was directed by the Minister of Health to repeat that the house could not at present be released from requisition owing to the acute housing shortage. On Feb. 21, 1946, the Ministry wrote the following letter to the defendant :

"I am directed by the Minister of Health to refer to your letter of Jan. 2, and to inform you that your case has been investigated, and it has been ascertained that the above-mentioned property is at present occupied by families rendered homeless by enemy action for whom other accommodation is not available. In these circumstances and in view of the acute housing shortage in the area, it is regretted that it is not possible at the present date to authorise the release of the property. The responsibility of allocating housing accommodation rests with local authorities who must necessarily decide on priority of release having regard to the relative needs of the various cases before them. I am to add, however, that the local authority are prepared to offer you alternative accommodation as soon as possible and you are advised to communicate with them in the matter."

An offer of alternative accommodation was made to the defendant, but it was not satisfactory, and on May 24 the defendant and the town clerk agreed provisionally that the council should fix up cooking apparatus in the back room on the ground floor, and that that floor could be released for occupation by the defendant. On June 20, the town clerk wrote to the secretary to the Ministry of Health saying that the lower flat of No. 24 was becoming vacant shortly, and asking for the Minister's consent to release it from requisition as the defendant wished to return there, and received the following reply, signed by Mr. J. O'Gara :

"I am directed by the Minister of Health to refer to your letter of the 20th, and to say that he consents to the proposal therein to release from requisitioning the lower flat of the above mentioned premises. The Minister's consent is given on the understanding that the release will not affect access to the remainder of the premises still under requisition and that there will be no question of the occupants therein being regarded as trespassers. This department should be notified in due course of the actual date of release."

I presume that Mr. J. O'Gara was directed by the secretary to the Ministry to answer the letter sent to the secretary by the town clerk. Meantime, on June 24, the town clerk had issued a notice to the defendant that he, acting on behalf of the Minister, had given up possession of the lower flat of the house. The position, therefore, was that from June 24 the requisitioning of the lower flat had ceased entirely, but the upper part of the house remained requisitioned by the council. On July 8 the defendant went into occupation of the lower flat. The upper part was unoccupied by this time, and the defendant put some of his surplus furniture in it. He also changed the lock on the front door of the house to prevent prospective occupiers of the upper floor from coming into the house in his absence. The obvious inconvenience of having another family living in the upper part of the house prompted the defendant's solicitors to write to the town clerk on Oct. 15, 1946, a letter in the following terms :

" We have your letter of the 24th instant upon which we have again seen our client. We note that you agree that a ' house of this type of property to accommodate two families is not ideal,' but we would go much further in emphasising that, in our opinion, the property is not at all suitable and was never intended for the accommodation of two families.

We note from the notice served upon our client, dated June 24, 1946, that the lower flat has been released from the requisitioning notice under which the council originally entered into possession of the whole of the property. This, in our opinion, deprives an occupier of the upper part from the user of the hall and garden or any access thereto, through the ground floor premises. We would also point out that, if the original requisitioning notice stands so far as the upper part of the premises are concerned, the occupants of the lower portion are deprived of the use of the only lavatory and bathroom in the house. We understand from our client that the hot water system in the bathroom is served by a boiler in the kitchen of the lower portion, the fuel for which is, of course, provided by our client. You will, therefore, appreciate that, if the council insists upon the upper part being occupied for the purpose of accommodating another family, our client has no sanitary arrangements whatsoever, and, in addition, he will be supplying hot water to the occupier of the upper part at his own expense.

In these circumstances, we have advised our client that the upper portion cannot be used by another family without a trespass being committed over the de-requisitioned portion of the house in his occupation, and that he is legally entitled to take steps to prevent any such trespass being committed on his premises. Therefore, we would suggest that you advise the family to whom you have allocated the upper portion that our client does not intend to permit trespass to be committed over his property, and, accordingly, that the council should take immediate steps to de-requisition the remainder of the property as being totally unsuitable for the accommodation of two families."

The town clerk, in face of the uncompromising attitude of the defendant who had obtained the release of the ground floor by agreeing to live there as a separate flat, then decided to apply to the Ministry of Health for a special consent to requisition the whole of the property again. He informed the defendant's solicitors of this intention by letter on Nov. 7, and on the same date he wrote to the secretary to the Ministry of Health the following letter :

" I would refer to your letter of June 28, and would inform you that, although it was definitely established by correspondence and interviews with the owner that only the lower portion of the above property would be released from requisitioning and that the council would instal their licensees in the upper portion and that the bathroom and lavatory would be shared and that right of access was reserved, these restrictions were not included in the formal release. Difficulty has been experienced culminating in a letter from the owner's solicitors dated Oct. 15, as per copy enclosed herewith. I, therefore, formally apply for the Ministry's special authority to re-requisition the whole of the above premises so that the owner may be permitted to occupy the lower portion as licensee and the proper precautions taken to reserve right of access to the upper portion and garden for the occupants of the upper portion and the necessary provision made for the sharing of the bathroom and lavatory. I shall also be pleased to have the department's advice regarding the payment of compensation for the upper portion for such period as access to it has been denied. I would add that by changing the lock of the front door the owner has debarred the council access to this portion."

The reply of the Ministry was dated Nov. 12, and was as follows :

"I am directed by the Minister of Health to refer to your letter of the 7th instant and to say that in the circumstances he hereby delegates to you, as town clerk, his functions under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, for the purposes of requisitioning the whole of the above-mentioned premises for re-housing purposes, and consent is hereby given to such requisitioning. With regard to the point raised in the penultimate paragraph of your letter, I am to say that the Minister is of opinion that compensation should be withheld for the period during which access was denied to the upper portion of the premises. I am Sir, Your obedient Servant, J. O'Gara."

It may be noted that Mr. J. O'Gara again answered the letter addressed by the town clerk to the secretary to the Ministry. The town clerk then issued the following notice :

"Take notice that in the exercise of the powers delegated to me by the Minister of Health under and by virtue of reg. 51 of the Defence Regulations, 1939, I have this day taken possession of the premises known as 24, Boveney Road, S.E.23. Signed Alan Milner Smith, Town Clerk. Dated Nov. 22, 1946. To the owner, occupier, and whom it may concern."

This notice was served by fixing a copy of it in the porch of the front door of the house, in the presence of the defendant's wife. The defendant, however, still refused to allow access to the upper portion of the house, and on Feb. 15, 1947, the town clerk wrote to the secretary to the Ministry a letter asking for the Minister's instructions. The reply was to the effect that the only suggestion which the department could make was that the council might bring pressure to bear on the owner by threatening to deprive him of his licence to occupy the lower part of the house. On June 28, 1947, the town clerk wrote to the defendant's solicitors warning them that, if the defendant continued to refuse to allow the council access to the upper part of the house, he would have no alternative but to take steps to recover possession of the lower part. He also enclosed the usual form of licence to occupy the lower part for signature by the defendant and his wife. They did not sign this, and the town clerk on Oct. 16, 1947, wrote to the Secretary, Ministry of Health, pointing out that the defendant's attitude put the council in a position in which they were faced with two alternatives, either to de-requisition the house, leaving the defendant and his wife in victorious possession of the whole of it, or else to terminate the licence and to sue for possession. The reply was that the Minister agreed that the council should terminate the licence, and, if necessary, sue for possession. Accordingly, on Dec. 4, 1947, the town clerk wrote :

"I would refer to your letter of June 30, 1947, and as I do not appear to have heard further from you in reply to my letter of June 28, and in view of your client's continued obstruction to the council allocating the upper portion of the above mentioned property and to the fact that he has not returned the licence enclosed with my letter of June 28, duly completed and signed, I have no alternative but to terminate such licence forthwith and to require him to give possession of the premises within fourteen days of today's date. Failure to comply with this request will leave me no alternative but to institute proceedings without further notice with a view to recovery of possession of the above mentioned premises."

A On Feb. 17, 1948, the town clerk delivered particulars of the plaintiffs' claim in the Lambeth County Court in which they asked for possession of the house and mesne profits. The case was heard on June 21, 1948, and on Aug. 5 the judge delivered a written judgment ordering the defendant to give possession of the house on Sept. 5 and to pay £25 7s. 0d. as rent and mesne profits.

B The main point argued on behalf of the defendant on this appeal and before the trial judge was that Mr. O'Gara had no authority to act on behalf of the Minister. Mr. O'Gara was called as a witness at the trial and it was contended on behalf of the defendant that the evidence given by Mr. O'Gara showed that there had been no actual delegation of authority to him, that he had, in fact, been acting without authority in the matter, and that the purported delegation of Nov. 12 by the Minister of Health to the town clerk was, therefore, bad in law. The learned judge, when dealing with this point, said that it was clear
C that no precise instructions were ever given to Mr. O'Gara as to the scope of his powers in general or in relation to the requisitioning of property in particular. After quoting from the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Carltona, Ltd. v. Works Comrs. (1) the learned county court judge continued:

"... applying these considerations to the present case, I am unable to say that the evidence shows that Mr. O'Gara in purporting to sanction
D on behalf of the Minister the requisitioning of property, and in particular in issuing the document of Nov. 12, 1946, was acting without authority to do so. On the contrary, the presumption being that ministerial acts will be performed, not by the Minister in person, but by responsible officials in his department, I think that where such acts of an official nature, all of them involving the knowledge and some of them requiring and receiving the concurrence of other officials, have, as here, continued over a long
E period, this of itself affords cogent evidence that the person in fact acting in such an official capacity was duly authorised to act."

If Mr. O'Gara had not been called as a witness by the plaintiffs they could have relied on the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 7, which is in the following terms:

"Every document purporting to be an instrument made or issued by any Minister or other authority or person in pursuance of any provision contained in . . . Defence Regulations, and to be signed by or on behalf of the said Minister, authority or person, shall be received in evidence, and shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to be an instrument
G made or issued by that Minister, authority or person; and prima facie evidence of any such instrument as aforesaid may, in any legal proceedings (including arbitrations), be given by the production of a document purporting to be certified to be a true copy of the instrument by, or on behalf of, the Minister or other authority or person having power to make or issue the instrument."

H The plaintiffs could have successfully contended that that section relieved them of the burden of proving that the Minister of Health personally decided that the ground floor of No. 24 should be requisitioned again. This appears from Carlsh v. East Ham Corpn. (2).

In Carltona, Ltd. v. Works Comrs. (1) a notice signed on behalf of the Commissioners of Works was sent to the owners of a factory, stating that the commissioners were taking possession of the premises under reg. 51 (1) of the Defence Regulations. The notice was signed by a Mr. Morse for and on behalf of the commissioners, and was written on the headed letter paper of the Ministry of Works and Planning, and was in the following terms :

" I have to inform you that the department have come to the conclusion that it is essential, in the national interest, to take possession of the above premises . . . "

The owners of the factory argued before the Court of Appeal that the requisition was bad because the persons constituting the requisitioning authority never brought their minds to bear on the question. LORD GREENE, M.R., in the course of his judgment, said that, in his opinion, there was no substance in the argument that the First Commissioner did not personally direct his mind to the matter. He said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 563) :

" In the administration of government in this country the functions which are given to ministers (and constitutionally properly given to ministers because they are constitutionally responsible) are functions so multifarious that no minister could ever personally attend to them. To take the example of the present case no doubt there have been thousands of requisitions in this country by individual ministries. It cannot be supposed that this regulation meant that, in each case, the minister in person should direct his mind to the matter. The duties imposed upon ministers and the powers given to ministers are normally exercised under the authority of the ministers by responsible officials of the department. Public business could not be carried on if that were not the case. Constitutionally, the decision of such an official is, of course, the decision of the minister. The minister is responsible. It is he who must answer before Parliament for anything that his officials have done under his authority, and, if for an important matter he selected an official of such junior standing that he could not be expected competently to perform the work, the minister would have to answer for that in Parliament. The whole system of departmental organisation and administration is based on the view that ministers, being responsible to Parliament, will see that important duties are committed to experienced officials. If they do not do that, Parliament is the place where complaint must be made against them. In the present case the assistant secretary, a high official of the ministry, was the person entrusted with the work of looking after this particular matter and the question, therefore, is, relating those facts to the argument with which I am dealing, did he direct his mind to the matters to which he was bound to direct it in order to act properly under the regulation ? "

In my opinion, the finding of His Honour JUDGE COLLINGWOOD on this point is a finding of fact which may properly be drawn from the evidence placed before him at the trial. Mr. O'Gara was a public official in the employment of the Crown and was the man in the Ministry of Health who had the task given to him by the responsible authority of examining questions of ad hoc requisitions of property in a particular district, and of making decisions thereon. It is true that there is no evidence that the Minister of Health personally told O'Gara to act on his behalf in matters of this kind. Such a suggestion seems to be unreasonable. The question of appointment ultimately rests with the Minister, as also does the question of dismissal, subject in each case to the intervention of Parliament, but in practice the appointment of the responsible official is made by the Minister through the Secretarial Department of the Ministry. The question whether in this case the Minister, acting through O'Gara, lawfully delegated his powers of requisitioning the ground floor of this house to the town clerk must be considered in the light of the particular circumstances of this case. In this case no discretion was left to the town clerk whether he should again requisition the ground floor or not. All the facts were placed before the Minister, and in the special circumstances he delegated his powers to requisition the property to the town clerk. If the Minister decided to requisition the property himself, I do not think that he would have been doing anything unconstitutional or high-handed by authorising the town clerk to act on his behalf, and I cannot myself see any material difference between such a course and the course which was actually taken of delegating to the town clerk the power of requisition which the Minister undoubtedly had.

A It was argued that the delegation by the Minister of this power to the town clerk was a legislative act, and that such delegation could only be performed by the Minister himself. I understand this to mean that, if the Minister had expressed his personal approval of the letter written by O'Gara, that would have made it a valid delegation, but the absence of any such ministerial approval made the delegation unlawful. I do not agree with this proposition, which does not seem to have any clear legal authority. So to hold would seem to make B unreasonable difficulties in the administration of a very urgent problem, the requisition of houses owing to the scarcity of housing accommodation caused by war damage. It seems to me to draw an artificial distinction between the procedure to be followed in the case of the requisition of a house by the Minister, which, I think, it must be conceded could be done by O'Gara under the general departmental practice, such as is described by LORD GREENE, M.R., and, on C the other hand, a delegation of the Minister's powers to the local authority for the same purpose, which he can also lawfully do under reg. 51 (5) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. Counsel for the defendant also took the point that the power to requisition was not effectively exercised by the town clerk because he did not actually enter the house, but merely affixed the notice in the porch. Counsel conceded that this court is bound by the decision, D adverse to his contention, of the Court of Appeal in James Macara, Ltd. v. Barclay (3), and I, therefore, need say no more on that point. His last point was that the proper plaintiff in the action should have been the Minister of Health and not the town clerk or the council. This point is, I think, covered by the terms of reg. 51 (2) (a) which authorises the competent authority to :

E " . . . do, or authorise persons using the land . . . to do, in relation to the land, anything which any person having an interest in the land would be entitled to do by virtue of that interest."

The Minister delegated his powers, which included those under this sub-paragraph, to the town clerk, and the town clerk or the council on his behalf had, F in my view, authority to bring the action. The point is covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lewisham Borough Council v. Maloney (4). For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

Since writing this judgment I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments of DENNING, L.J., and JENKINS, J., on the point on which DENNING, L.J., considers that the appeal should be allowed. I agree with the judgment of the G trial judge on the point. I am unable to see that the Ministry mistook their powers. The procedure adopted by the town clerk on the authority of the Ministry seems to me to have been reasonable in the circumstances. In my opinion, it is the defendant who has behaved unreasonably because he has deliberately prevented the local authority from exercising those powers to which he had consented as a condition of his regaining possession of the ground floor H of his house. The action which the Ministry took seems to me to have been the only effective and reasonable way of solving the problem created by the defendant's attitude about this house.

DENNING, L.J. : The town clerk of Lewisham claims possession of a house from the defendant, who is the freeholder, and is living there himself with his wife. The town clerk bases his claim on a regulation, which was brought into force at the beginning of the war, empowering the executive to requisition property for the efficient prosecution of the war. Since the war, however, the regulation has been continued for the purpose of maintaining, controlling and regulating the supply of housing accommodation. This case raises the important question : How far does this regulation in the post-war period enable the executive to turn a man out of his home ?

Before I deal with this question I must refer to a number of points raised on behalf of the defendant contending that the procedure was out of order. The right to requisition is, of course, not a right which belongs to any private individual, or even to any local authority. It is a power which Parliament has conferred on the Crown, that is to say, on the executive acting by the government departments. Whenever anyone requisitions property he must be duly authorised to act on behalf of His Majesty : see s. 1 (2) (b) (i) of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and s. 1 (1) (a) of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939 ; Minister of Health v. Bellotti (5) ; Progress Building v. Westminster City Corpn. (6). The first point taken here was that the town clerk was not authorised to requisition this house because his only authority was derived from a letter from an official in the Ministry of Health who could point to no authority from the Minister himself. I take it to be quite plain that when a Minister is entrusted with administrative, as distinct from legislative, functions he is entitled to act by any authorised official of his department. The Minister is not bound to give his mind to the matter personally. That is implicit in the modern machinery of government : see the Carltona case (1), and an article by PROFESSOR WILLIS in 21 CANADIAN BAR REVIEW, p. 257. When, therefore, a government department requisitions property itself under reg. 51 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, it is not necessary for the Minister himself to consider the matter. It is sufficient if one of the officials of that department brings his mind to bear on the propriety of it. When the government department delegates its functions to a town clerk under reg. 51 (5) it is only putting someone in its place to do the acts which it is authorised to do. The town clerk is, so to speak, an agent of the department and a sub-agent of the Crown. The delegation to the town clerk is simply administrative machinery so as to enable the administrative functions of requisitioning to operate smoothly and efficiently, and, like all administrative functions, the act of delegating can be exercised by any authorised official of the government department. The delegation, whether general or specific, is not a legislative act, but an administrative one : see the principles stated in R. v. Burah (7) (3 App. Cas. 905-6), Hampton v. United States (8), (276 U.S. 407), King-Emperor v. Benoari Lal Sarma (9) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 213) ; and it does not divest the government department of its powers : see Huth v. Clarke (10), Gordon, Dadds & Co. v. Morris (11) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 621). Having regard to those authorities, I cannot agree with the observations of SCOTT, L.J., to the contrary in Blackpool Corpn. v. Locker (12) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 90-92, 96). They were, I think, unnecessary for the decision, which turned on the fact that the town clerk there acted outside his actual authority and his action could not be ratified. The first point taken on behalf of the defendant, therefore, fails.

The second point was that the only power given by reg. 51 (1) was to take possession, and that, as that had not been done here, the town clerk had no title to sue. In order to consider this point it is necessary to consider the nature of the power to requisition land. It is only a power to take possession of land. It is not a power to acquire any estate or interest in any land : see s. 1 (2) (b) (i) of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and ss. 1 and 2 of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939. Once possession is taken the Crown can exercise all the powers incident to possession, such as to licence other people to use the premises : see Southgate Borough Council v. Watson (13), but it cannot grant a lease or create any legal interest in the land in favour of any other person because it has itself no estate in the land out of which to carve any interest. Once possession is taken, the Crown, of course, has all the rights incident to possession, and may, by itself or its agents or sub-agents, exercise all the possessory remedies. A government department, or a town clerk, or a local authority, who is in possession on behalf of the Crown may, therefore, like a bailiff, bring an action of trespass against anyone who disturbs that possession: see Erith Corpn. v. Holder (14); and the fact of being in possession is good as against purchasers without being registered on the Land Charges Register: see Lewisham Borough Council v. Maloney (4). None of this, however, confers a legal estate or even an equitable interest on the Crown. The basis of it all is possession. It has sometimes been assumed that, when the Crown or its agent or sub-agent posts up a notice of requisition on a house saying that "I have this day taken possession," that notice in itself without actual entry operates to transfer possession to the Crown. That may be so in the case of an empty house, because it may be evidence of sufficient control, coupled with the necessary intent, to constitute possession, but where a house is occupied, then, at any rate since reg. 85 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, was amended in February, 1946, by S.R. & O., 1946, No. 161, the Crown does not take possession merely by posting a notice of requisition in that form on the door. It has no right to enter unless it serves on the occupier 24 hours' notice of the intended entry, and it has no right to turn out the occupier unless he has disobeyed its direction to give up possession: see reg. 51 (1A) and (6). The Crown cannot by any possibility be said to be in possession of a building which is occupied by another and which it has no right to enter. I agree, therefore, with the second point to this extent, that in this case neither the Crown nor any of its agents took possession. Even so, however, the Crown may be able to bring an action for possession, for it has been held that a notice of requisition is not a nullity, even though actual possession had not been taken. Once it is posted on the door it operates as a direction to the occupier to give up possession. He is bound to comply with that direction, and, if he does not do so, he is liable to be turned out by force: see reg. 51 (1) (1A) (6). He cannot, therefore, give vacant possession to another, Macara, Ltd. v. Barclay (3), and the court will, if necessary, order him to go.

What is the nature of the action for this purpose, and who can bring it? Can the town clerk bring it in his own name? Trespass does not lie because it is based on actual possession. Nor does ejectment, because that only lies in favour of a plaintiff who can prove a legal title in himself, which the town clerk cannot do, and indeed the Crown itself cannot do. It has a statutory power to take possession, but a power and a right are very different things: see SALMOND ON JURISPRUDENCE, 9th ed., p. 302. The action is, therefore, neither trespass nor ejectment, but an action in aid of the statutory power to take possession and, as such, it can be brought in the name of any agent or sub-agent who has been authorised to take possession on behalf of the Crown: see Lewisham Borough Council v. Maloney (4). It can be brought, therefore, by the town clerk at any time after a notice of requisition has been served. It is not necessary to serve a notice of intended entry under reg. 85 because that only applies to entry without the process of the courts. The second point taken on behalf of the defendant, therefore, also fails.

I agree with my brothers, therefore, that the procedural points taken on behalf of the defendant cannot prevail, and I turn to the substantial point in the case, which is whether the requisition was within the powers conferred on the executive by Parliament. The power to requisition is only given in respect of supplies and services which are essential to the well-being of the community: see reg. 51 (1) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, and s. 1 (1) of the Supplies and Services (Transitional Powers) Act, 1945. Housing accommodation is, no doubt, an essential supply, and the power can be exercised if it appears to the competent authority to be necessary or expedient to take possession for the purpose of so maintaining the supply of housing accommodation as to secure a sufficiency of it. In order to be valid, the requisition must come within that authority or it will be bad : see Clanricarde (Marquess) v. Congested Districts Board for Ireland (15), Sydney Municipal Council v. Campbell (16), the Carltona case (1). On the true interpretation of reg. 51 (1), I think it is plain that there are three requisites which must be satisfied before a competent authority can requisition a house. (1) The competent authority must decide that it is necessary or expedient to take possession. (2) Its purpose in taking possession must be to secure sufficient housing accommodation. (3) It must act in good faith. A There is no doubt here that requisites (2) and (3) were satisfied. The decision was made in good faith for securing sufficient housing accommodation, but the question is whether requisite (1) was satisfied. Did it appear to the competent authority to be necessary or expedient to "take possession of" the ground floor in which the defendant was living ? On this point the material facts are these. (i) At the time of the requisition the defendant was lawfully in occupation of the ground floor of his own house. He was not there as a licensee, B but as freeholder in as full a right as if the house had never been requisitioned. (ii) The upper floor was still requisitioned and the town clerk had of necessity an implied right of access to it. The defendant had no legal justification for refusing access to it. (iii) The competent authority had power to gain full access to the upper floor by giving "directions" under reg. 51 (1) or "authority" C under reg. 85 (1) (c) and then prosecuting the defendant, if necessary, under regs. 83 and 92, or, indeed, by requisitioning the entrance passage and staircase of the house. (iv) At the time of the requisition the competent authority had no intention of taking actual possession of the ground floor rooms. They did not contemplate that anyone should occupy these rooms except the defendant and his wife. No direction was given to him at that time to give up possession. D Nor was any notice of intended entry served on him. (v) The purpose of the competent authority was to acquire a legal right to possession of the whole house and to treat the defendant as their licensee of the ground floor, thus bringing the whole house within their control without actually turning the defendant out. (vi) When the defendant still refused to give access to the upper floor, the competent authority, "in order to bring pressure to bear" on him, threatened E to deprive him of the licence which they assumed to exist. Subsequently, they did, in fact, purport to terminate the supposed licence and brought this action for possession. On those facts, it is clear, to my mind, that on Nov. 22, 1946, the competent authority did not deem it necessary or expedient to take possession of the ground floor. If that had been their intention, it could only have been effected by directing the defendant forthwith to give up possession and, if he F refused to comply, turning him out. If they had realised that a requisition would have that effect, they would, I expect, have hesitated before it appeared to them to be "necessary or expedient" to do it. They would, no doubt, have considered the alternative of getting an order from the court to ensure access to the upper floor, but those questions did not arise—the letters at the time show that—for the simple and intelligible reason that it was not their G intention to take possession at all. Their intention was to get a legal right to possession and to treat the defendant as a licensee without taking possession themselves. A legal right of that kind is nothing more nor less than a legal estate in the land. Their intention was, therefore, in effect to acquire a legal estate such as would for the time being over-ride the freehold. But Parliament H has been very careful not to give the executive any power to acquire any estate in land but only to take possession of it. They were attempting, therefore, to acquire a legal right or title which they had no power to requisition : see China Mutual Steam Navigation Co. v. MacLay (17).

My conclusion is that, although the officials acted in good faith, they mistook their powers. They had ample powers to compel the defendant to give access to the upper floor, and they should have exercised those powers. In that way justice would have been done. Instead of doing that, they have treated themselves as if they were owners of the house and the defendant as their licensee, a thing, which in my opinion, they have no power to do. They have sought to bring pressure to bear on him by threatening to turn him out of his house, and have now carried out the threat and brought these proceedings to eject him. This is a very great power which they claim—to turn a man out of his own house long after the war has ended—and I am not disposed to give effect to it unless I am satisfied, in LORD GREENE'S words in the Carltona case (1) ([1943] 2 All E.R. 564), that it "falls within the four corners of the powers given by the legislature". I do not think it does, and I would allow the appeal.

JENKINS, J. : This case concerns the validity of a requisitioning, or purported requisitioning, of the defendant's house, No. 24, Boveney Road, Forest Hill, effected, or claimed to have been effected, by the plaintiff, Alan Milner Smith, town clerk of the plaintiff council, in exercise, or purported exercise, of the functions of the Minister of Health under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, delegated, or purporting to have been delegated, to the plaintiff town clerk by a letter from the Ministry of Health dated Nov. 12, 1946, for the purpose (as expressed in the letter) of requisitioning "the whole" of No. 24, Boveney Road "for re-housing purposes."

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:—] It is common ground that under para. (1) of reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, the Minister of Health (as a "competent authority" within the meaning of the regulation: see reg. 49 (1)), had power to take possession of No. 24, Boveney Road (even if occupied) for re-housing purposes. It is further common ground that the Minister of Health had express power under para. (5) of reg. 51 to delegate all or any of his functions under para. (1) of that regulation "to such extent and subject to such restrictions" as he thought proper "to any specified persons or class of persons." If, therefore, the delegation purporting to have been effected by the Ministry's letter of Nov. 12, 1946, is to be regarded as a delegation by the Minister of Health, it would seem to follow that the delegation in question was a valid delegation and that the requisition notice founded on it was a valid notice. I have not overlooked the fact that in the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, the delegation was expressed to be with respect to "the whole" of No. 24, Boveney Road, whereas actually the upper part was still subject to the original requisition. No point was made of this for the defendant, and I am satisfied that, if the delegation was otherwise valid, it operated as an effective delegation as to the part of No. 24, Boveney Road not then subject to requisition.

In considering the question whether the delegation purporting to have been effected by the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, is to be regarded as a delegation effected by the Minister of Health, regard must be had to s. 7 of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, which (so far as material) provides that:

"Every document purporting to be an instrument made or issued by any Minister . . . in pursuance of any provision contained in, or having effect under, Defence Regulations, and to be signed by or on behalf of the said Minister . . . shall be received in evidence, and shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to be an instrument made or issued by that Minister . . ."

The letter of Nov. 12, 1946, is headed: "Ministry of Health," with the address of the Regional Offices. It is signed by one J. O'Gara, and it is expressed on its face to comprise a communication which he is directed by the Minister to make. It seems, therefore, clearly to be a document purporting to be an instrument made or issued by the Minister of Health and to be signed by J. O'Gara on behalf of the Minister of Health within the meaning of s. 7, with the result that until the contrary is proved it must be deemed by virtue of the section to be made or issued by the Minister of Health. I think it follows from this that, unless the defendant has succeeded in "proving the contrary," the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, must be deemed to constitute a delegation by the Minister no less than if it had been signed by the Minister himself personally, with the result that as the Minister's power to effect the requisition in question, and his power to delegate that function to the town clerk, are not in dispute, the defendant's main ground of attack on the validity of the requisition notice of Nov. 22, 1946, must fail. This accords with the view taken by LORD A GODDARD, C.J., with regard to the effect of s. 7 in relation to a substantially similar letter purporting to delegate the Minister of Health's requisitioning powers with respect to specified premises in Carlish v. East Ham Corpn. (2). Mr. J. O'Gara, the signatory of the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, who is a general B inspector at the Ministry of Health and was at the material time in charge of requisitioning in the London Region, gave evidence before the learned county court judge, and it was sought on behalf of the defendant to "prove the contrary" out of his own mouth by showing that on his own evidence he had, in fact, no authority to sign the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, on behalf of the Minister. It is, perhaps, surprising that Mr. O'Gara could not be more precise as to the manner in which his authority was conferred and defined and was unable to point to any specific document or instructions on the subject, but it is clear that, according C to the internal organisation and practice of the department, his duties as the official in charge of requisitioning included the writing of letters of ad hoc delegation such as the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, in the present case, and that he was, in fact, at the material time writing as many as ten of such letters per week. Whatever might be said of his evidence, if the onus had lain on the plaintiffs to adduce strict proof of his authority, I think it fell very far short of proof D that he had no authority, and it is clear that under s. 7 the onus lay on the defendant to prove that he had none. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the learned county court judge rightly rejected the defendant's contention that Mr. O'Gara, in fact, had no authority to sign the letter of Nov. 12, 1946.

The validity of the delegation which Mr. O'Gara purported by this letter to effect on behalf of the Minister was further attacked on the ground that, even E if he was, in fact, authorised by the Minister to effect such delegations in the sense that the duties entrusted to him in terms extended to the making of such delegations, he could only be so authorised as a delegate of the Minister's powers with the result that as a matter of law he could not himself validly effect any further delegations, in view of the well-known principle of delegatus non potest delegare. I think this contention is based on a misconception of the F relationship between a Minister and the officials in his department. A Minister must perforce, from the necessity of the case, act through his departmental officials, and where, as in the Defence Regulations now under consideration, functions are expressed to be committed to a Minister, those functions must, as a matter of necessary implication, be exercisable by the Minister either G personally or through his departmental officials, and acts done in exercise of those functions are equally acts of the Minister whether they are done by him personally, or through his departmental officials, as in practice except in matters of the very first importance they almost invariably would be done. No question of agency or delegation as between the Minister and Mr. O'Gara seems to me to arise at all. I think this view is borne out by the observations of LORD H GREENE, M.R., in Carltona, Ltd. v. Commissioners of Works (1). The delegation effected by the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, must, therefore, in my view, be regarded as a delegation by the Minister acting through one of his departmental officials in the person of Mr. O'Gara, and not as a purported delegation by Mr. O'Gara of functions delegated to him by the Minister. I am, accordingly, of opinion that this ground of objection also fails.

It was further argued that, though it might be proper for the Minister to perform his functions under reg. 51 through his departmental officials so far as

- purely executive acts were concerned, the delegation purporting to have been effected by the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, was a legislative act, and as such could only be validly done by the Minister personally. Assuming for the moment that the delegation in question can properly be described as a legislative act, I do not see why it should follow on that account that the Minister could not do it in the way which his functions under reg. 51 are normally and necessarily performed, i.e., through the appropriate departmental official. Regulation 51
- A (5) confers on the Minister express power to delegate all or any of his functions under para. (1) and makes no special provision as to the manner in which such power of delegation is to be exercised. I see no sufficient justification for implying a special provision to the effect that it is only to be exercised by the Minister himself in person. I do not, however, agree that the delegation here in question was a legislative act. It related simply and solely to the requisitioning of one
- B particular house and delegated nothing more than the power required for that specific purpose. There is, so far as I can see, nothing in the nature of legislation in that. Reference was made to Blackpool Corpn. v. Locker (12), but the court had there to consider the effect of a general delegation to local authorities of the Minister's power of requisitioning effected by circulars which laid down what amounted to a code of regulations and restrictions governing the exercise of
- C the delegated powers. I do not think it follows from that case that every delegation of power to requisition, however specific, and, in particular, that even a delegation of power to requisition one particular house, is a legislative act. Still less does it follow that the power of delegation conferred by para. (5) of reg. 51 can only be exercised by the the Minister himself personally, the mode in which the power should be exercised (i.e., whether by the Minister personally
- D or through his departmental officials) being an aspect of the matter with which the case of Blackpool Corpn. v. Locker (12) was not, as I understand it, concerned. It would certainly cause great embarrassment in the administration of reg. 51 if a specific delegation such as is here in question, directed simply and solely to the requisitioning of one particular house, could only be effected by the Minister himself in person, and I see no sufficient reason for so holding. Accord-
- E ingly, in my opinion, this ground of appeal also fails.
- It remains to consider a number of points of a more or less subsidiary character which were raised on behalf of the defendant. The requisitioning was attacked on the ground that the power of requisitioning was delegated for the purposes set out in the town clerk's letter of Nov. 7, 1946, i.e., "so that the owner may be permitted to occupy the lower portion as licensee and the proper precautions taken
- F to reserve the right of access to the upper portion and garden for the occupants of the upper portion and the necessary provision made for the sharing of the bathroom and lavatory." In my view, there is no substance in this contention. The short answer is that, whatever the town clerk may have asked for, what he, in fact, received was a plain delegation of power to requisition the premises for re-housing purposes. Moreover, I do not think the town clerk's letter can
- G fairly be regarded as doing anything more than stating the reasons why the power asked for was necessary, and the way in which the re-requisitioning, in the event of his being given power to effect it, would enable him to get over the difficulties which were being made by the defendant. Finally, the plaintiffs were perfectly willing to carry out the terms of the letter of Nov. 7, 1946, but were unable to do so because the defendant would not agree. Then it was said
- H that the premises were requisitioned with the ulterior object of putting pressure on the defendant. That is in a sense true, but I see nothing improper in it. The position was that unless control of the whole house could be obtained the upper part was entirely useless for re-housing purposes owing to the defendant's denial of access. Accordingly, the requisitioning cannot on this account be said to have been effected otherwise than bona fide for the purposes of re-housing. The point was formally taken that the requisitioning was invalid because actual physical possession was not obtained, but it was conceded that, so far as this court is concerned, that ground of objection is concluded adversely to the defendant by the decision in James Macara, Ltd. v. Barclay (3). Finally, a question was raised as to the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue, but I understood counsel for the defendant to concede, in effect, that, if the delegation effected by the letter of Nov. 12, 1946, was valid, the town clerk, on requisitioning the property in exercise of the delegated power, would have a sufficient interest in, and right to, possession of the property to enable him to maintain an action for possession.

For all these reasons I am of opinion that the learned county court judge came to a right conclusion in this case and I agree with my Lord that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re CROSBY'S CONTRACT. CROSBY v. HOUGHTON.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), March 30, 1949.]

Option—Option to purchase freehold—Implication that vacant possession be given on exercise of option—Proviso that tenant should "accept without objection the title of the landlord"—Whether reference to title at date of lease or on exercise of option.

By a lease, dated Nov. 8, 1945, the landlord demised the ground floor of premises known as No. 52, Connaught Avenue, Frinton-on-Sea, to the tenant for a term of 21 years from Dec. 25, 1945, at a yearly rental. Clause 3 (iii) of the lease provided: "That if the tenant shall desire to purchase the fee simple of No. 52 Connaught Avenue Frinton-on-Sea of which the demised premises form part and shall within seven years from the commencement of the term hereby created give to the landlord three months' notice in writing of such desire then the landlord will upon the expiration of such notice and on payment of the sum of £2,000 together with all arrears of rent up to the expiration of the notice and of interest on the said sum of £2,000 at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the expiration of the notice until payment thereof convey the said property to the tenant in fee simple. The tenant shall accept without objection the title of the landlord but shall have delivered to him at his own expense such abstract of title as he shall require and the landlord shall be able to furnish." The landlord, Mrs. C., and her husband occupied the upper part of the premises as a residence. On Jan. 29, 1948, the tenant purported to give a notice in exercise of the option to purchase, but subsequently agreed that the notice was bad. On Mar. 1, 1948, the landlord granted to her husband a lease of that part of the premises occupied by them for a term of 21 years at a full rack rent. On June 21, 1948, the tenant served a further notice on the landlord exercising the option to purchase the premises.

Held: the words "the tenant shall accept without objection the title of the landlord" referred to the landlord's title as at the date when the lease was granted, and was not intended to enable the landlord subsequently to introduce a defect in his title, and, therefore, in those words there was nothing to exclude the implication in the preceding part of cl. 3 (iii), that the landlord would, on the exercise of the option, convey the premises with vacant possession.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for a declaration that a tenant to whom an option to purchase a freehold had been granted by the landlord was bound to accept the conveyance of the freehold subject to a lease of part of the property granted after the date of the option, and also a declaration that the tenant was not B entitled to vacant possession of the whole property on completion of the sale and purchase effected pursuant to the exercise by the tenant of the option. ROMER, J., in answer to the first question, declared that the tenant was not so bound, and, in answer to the second question, that the tenant was so entitled. The facts appear in the judgment.

J. F. Bowyer for the landlord.

C M. Berkeley for the tenant.

ROMER, J. : This is a summons for the determination of a difference which has arisen under an option which was contained in a lease made on Nov. 8, 1945, between the applicant, the landlord, Mrs. Emily Sarah Crosby, of the one part, and the respondent, the tenant, Herbert Charles Houghton, D of the other part. That lease related to premises known as No. 52, Connaught Avenue, Frinton-on-Sea, and demised to the tenant the ground floor of the premises consisting of a lock-up shop, an office, and a workroom, and the use of the outside lavatory "to hold the same unto the tenant from Dec. 25, 1945, for the term of 21 years," determinable as thereafter provided, at the yearly rent therein mentioned. Clause 3 of the lease contains covenants by the landlord, one of which is to be found in sub-cl. (iii) which provides :

"That if the tenant shall desire to purchase the fee simple of No. 52 Connaught Avenue Frinton-on-Sea of which the demised premises form part and shall within seven years from the commencement of the term hereby created give to the landlord three months' notice in writing of such desire then the landlord will upon the expiration of such notice and on payment of the sum of £2,000 together with all arrears of rent up to the expiration of the notice and of interest on the said sum of £2,000 at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the expiration of the notice until payment thereof convey the said property to the tenant in fee simple. The tenant shall accept without objection the title of the landlord but shall have delivered to him at his own expense such abstract of title as G he shall require and the landlord shall be able to furnish."

The relevant facts of the case are sufficiently stated in a joint and several affidavit sworn by the landlord and her husband and filed in support of the summons. She says that the lease comprised only the ground floor of the premises, which she describes and thereafter calls "The shop." Then : "The remainder of the said premises which was not included in the said lease consisted of the upper storey and entrance and staircase at the side of the said shop leading to the said upper storey together with the garage at the rear of the said premises and the rear entrance to the said upper storey (hereinafter called 'the flat') which were at the date of the said lease and had always previously been used as residential quarters." Then she says that the tenant registered the option to purchase given in the lease as a land charge on Nov. 12, 1945. On Jan. 29, 1948, the tenant purported to give a notice to the landlord to the effect that he elected and agreed to purchase from her the reversion H in fee simple of 52, Connaught Avenue, Frinton-on-Sea, at the price of £2,000 and on the other terms and conditions in the lease mentioned. The affidavit goes on to say that at the date of the notice the landlord and her husband were, and still are, most anxious not to have to turn out of the flat and they decided to ask the tenant to waive or abandon his right to purchase the property, or else to permit them to remain in occupation of the flat. The notice which the tenant gave on Jan. 29, 1948, and which purported to indicate his determination to purchase the reversion in the fee simple of 52, Connaught Avenue, was regarded by the landlord as ineffectual because of the reference to the reversion. Eventually, I understand, the tenant accepted the view that that notice was not an effectual document. On Mar. 1, 1948, the landlord granted to her husband a lease of the flat for a term of 21 years from Mar. 1, 1948, at a rent of £72 a year, and in the affidavit to which I have referred she states that that rent was and is, in the view of the landlord and her husband, a full rack rent for the property comprised therein. On June 21, 1948, the tenant's solicitors served a further notice on the landlord duly exercising the option to purchase contained in the lease of Nov. 8, 1945, and I understand that it was not until correspondence passed on the question of title that the landlord disclosed that she had granted the lease of Mar. 1 to her husband. When that fact became known to the tenant, relations between the parties became somewhat strained. Ultimately, the tenant issued a writ against the landlord, but the landlord took the view that the question between them, namely, whether in the events which have happened the tenant is entitled to a conveyance of the premises, 52, Connaught Avenue, with vacant possession and without regard to the lease of Mar. 1, 1948, could properly and sufficiently be dealt with by originating summons, and, as this view was eventually accepted also by the tenant, the present summons was issued. By it the landlord asks for a declaration that the tenant is bound to accept the conveyance of this property subject to a lease dated Mar. 1, 1948, and made between the landlord, of the one part, and William Crosby, of the other part, and affecting part of the property, and a declaration that the tenant is not entitled to enter that part of the property on completion of the sale and purchase in accordance with the contract. Counsel for the landlord says that where no reference to vacant possession is expressly made in a contract for the sale of land, it is a question on the terms in which the contract is couched, read in the light of the surrounding circumstances, whether an implied term should be read in entitling the purchaser to vacant possession on completion.

I was referred to two text books and to certain authorities as showing what the position with regard to vacant possession in contracts for the sale of land has been held to be by the courts. I need not refer to them all because it is clear to my mind, and was, I think, conceded by counsel for the landlord, that if one takes cl. 3 (iii) of the lease, paying no regard for the moment to the concluding part of that sub-clause, there would be ground for implying that, on the exercise of the option, the donee of the option would be entitled contractually to a conveyance in fee simple with vacant possession. That view arises from the general law applicable to the matter. I propose only to refer to an extract from WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER, 4th ed., vol. 1, p. 201, where the learned author expresses himself thus :

"So also, where land is expressly or impliedly sold with vacant possession, a good title is not shown if it is subject to any tenancy for years or less, which will not expire before the day fixed or the proper time for completion."

In a footnote to that passage it is stated :

"It is apprehended that, where land is sold under a contract expressly or impliedly promising to convey the fee simple, free from incumbrances, it is prima facie a term of the contract that the purchaser shall on completion be put into actual (and not constructive) possession of the property. . . . But it is a question of the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the terms of the contract, whether the land is sold with vacant possession on the completion of the purchase or subject to the terms of some tenancy or occupation."

A Reference is made to Lake v. Dean (1) and North v. Loomes (2).

I desire also to refer to the more recent judgment of SIMONDS, J., in Cook v. Taylor (3). The headnote is as follows ([1942] 2 All E.R. 85) :

B "The contract for sale of certain freehold property incorporated the Law Society's conditions of sale. In the definition clause of those conditions a contract is defined as meaning any contract incorporating those conditions including the particulars, if any, used in connection with the contract. The particulars in this case included the statement : ' . . . vacant possession on completion of the purchase,' and made no reference to tenancies. Completion date was fixed as on or before Feb. 25, 1941 ; and on Feb. 19 the property was requisitioned by the local authority under the Defence (General) Regulations, reg. 51. The keys of the property were handed over to the requisitioning authority on that day, and actual possession was taken on Mar. 1 and Mar. 8 following. The defendant repudiated the contract on the ground that the property was sold with vacant possession which the vendor could no longer give. The plaintiff claimed specific performance and damages, or rescission ; and the defendant counterclaimed for a declaration that he was discharged from the contract and for a return of the deposit. Held, (i) the particulars issued in connection with the sale was a document on which the defendant could rely as implying that vacant possession would be given. (ii) where property is vacant when inspected by the purchaser and no mention is made in the particulars of any tenancies, the purchaser is entitled to assume that the property is sold with vacant possession on completion."

E SIMONDS, J., said on the subject of the second holding (ibid., 87) :

F "The second point, which is a much larger one, is this. Apart altogether from that particular document, is there, according to the general law, here to be implied a contract of sale with vacant possession ? As I pointed out in the course of reading the documents, there is no reference to vacant possession, but equally there is no reference to any tenancy to which the property is subject, and I think that in that regard it is material to observe that that property was in fact vacant when inspected by the defendant, the intending purchaser, and it must have been known to the plaintiff that it would be found to be vacant by the intending purchaser. Therefore we have this property which is in fact vacant and which is contracted G to be sold without any reference to any tenancy. Is there in such a case an implication that it is sold with vacant possession ? I think the answer to that is in the affirmative."

He refers to the passage from WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER which I have read and continues :

H "In reference to that statement he [the learned author] cites in note (e) a number of cases which appear to me to support the view that where a contract is silent as to vacant possession, but also silent as to anything to which the property is subject, there is impliedly a contract that vacant possession will be given upon completion. I may fairly add that that appears to me to be plainly the common sense of the matter, for it would be strange if, the vendor saying nothing about the matter which lay within his knowledge and not within the knowledge of the purchaser, the purchaser were to find himself purchasing a property subject to a tenancy of which he could know nothing. Therefore I hold as a matter of law upon a contract of this character that there is the implied term that vacant possession shall be given upon completion."

With the guidance of that statement of the general law, it appears to me to be reasonably plain that the conveyance which the landlord here was to give the tenant on the tenant's exercising his option would, by implication, be a conveyance of the property with vacant possession if cl. 3 (iii) stopped short before the final passage which starts: "The tenant shall accept without objection . . .", because, at the date of the lease, the owner of the property, namely, the landlord who granted the lease, was herself in occupation and possession of the flat which was not the subject-matter of the demise. Accordingly, by contracting, if she did contract, to grant an option on the whole of the premises, it appears to me that she conferred an option the exercise of which would give the right to vacant possession of that part of the premises which at the date of the lease was occupied by the landlord herself. Counsel for the landlord, however, rightly says that, in construing the sub-clause, one cannot exclude the final part and the sub-clause must be taken as a whole for the purpose of considering whether there is room for the implication which I am invited by the tenant to make. The sheet anchor in his case, as he frankly concedes, is that, having regard to the concluding part of sub-cl. (iii), there is no room for the implication which, but for that concluding part, the law would assume, because, by that concluding part the donee of the option bound himself to accept without objection the title of the landlord and so contracted to purchase this property in the state in which he found it at the time that he exercised the option. That means, it is argued, that he would be precluded from objecting to any defect in the title, and an example of a defect in the title would be a lease granted by the landlord at any time prior to the exercise by the donee of his option. Therefore, says counsel, to imply the right to vacant possession would run counter to that unqualified obligation accepted by the tenant. He says that if a lease had already been granted of the flat to some person before Nov. 8, 1945, that would, undoubtedly, have been a defect in the landlord's title which the donee of the option would be bound to accept. Similarly, he was bound to accept the defect which arises from the fact that the landlord granted this lease of Mar. 1, 1948. He points out that the tenant was not bound to exercise his option if anything had happened, whether by reason of something inherent in the property itself or by reason of some action taken by the landlord, whereby the property became diminished in value, but, if he did exercise the option, he would have to buy the land in the state of title in which he found it. I understood that that argument was subject to the qualification that the landlord would not be able at any time after granting this option to do something which fraudulently or deliberately reduced the value of the property and thereby substantially altered the substrata of the option, but, provided that the landlord acted fairly, and granted, as it is said she did grant, a bona fide lease at a rack rent, then the tenant was getting the value in property which he contracted to buy for £2,000 and he could not complain.

As against that view of the matter counsel for the tenant argued that the effect of the latter part of cl. 3 (iii) was that the lessee was bound to accept the title of the landlord at the date of the lease, but that the landlord was not entitled to introduce a defect of title after the granting of the lease. He argued that the clause in question is not an enabling clause, but merely one restrictive of the tenant's right, if he exercised the option, to requisition on title. Commenting on the description of the rights which, according to counsel for the landlord, the landlord could exercise with regard to the property, he said that it might be a difficult matter to draw the line between what was a fair rental or an unfair rental reserved by a lease which the landlord at some time subsequently to Nov. 8, 1945, should think proper to grant. He then drew attention to an argument of counsel for the landlord that, if the tenant is right, in effect the landlord would be more or less sterilised in relation to her rights to deal with the property and dispose of it for what might be a period of seven years. Counsel for the landlord said that that was an indication that his view of the matter was right and that the landlord was to be allowed to do what she thought proper with the property provided that she acted fairly and reasonably and did not deliberately do anything to diminish the value of the property. Counsel for the tenant, however, said that the landlord could grant a lease of this flat giving the tenant the same security of tenure as she herself enjoyed and that there would be no difficulty in finding a tenant on a weekly or a monthly basis, having regard, in particular, to the shortage of accommodation which is such a well known feature of English life at the present moment. Counsel suggested that an option of this sort is something more than a mere offer, that it creates some interest in the land over which it is intended to operate, as is demonstrated by the fact that it can be, as, indeed, this one was, registered as an estate contract, and he said that, after the granting of the lease the landlords were in a sense trustees for the donee of the subject-matter of the option.

In my judgment, the view which counsel for the tenant has put forward is the right one. I think that, taking this lease as a whole and reading it in the light of the circumstances which existed when it was granted, there is room for implying in this option the term that, if the option were to be exercised, the landlords should convey the property to the tenant in fee simple with vacant possession. It appears to me that the concluding part of sub-cl. (iii) of cl. 3 is truly directed to the landlord's title as at the date when this lease was granted, that the tenant was bound to accept that freehold title which was then vested in the landlord, and that it was not intended to enable or entitle the landlord to introduce at any subsequent time a defect in the title which did not exist at the date when the lease was granted. In my view, to accept the landlord's view of the matter would be to attribute to this more or less common form clause an effect which it does not fairly bear. It is true, although I use the phrase "common form," that counsel for the landlord referred me to KEY AND ELPHINSTONE, PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING, 14th ed., vol. 1, p. 960, where a form is given of a power to a lessee to purchase the freehold. After setting forth the option, there is a proviso as to title in these terms :

"Provided also that the title of the lessor to the premises having been already investigated and approved of by the lessee shall be deemed to be accepted by him up to the date of these presents."

The alternative form is :

"Provided also that the title of the lessor to the premises shall not be investigated prior to but shall be deemed to be approved of by the lessee up to the date of these presents."

Counsel for the landlord emphasised, with reference to the phrase "the date of these presents", that that phrase does not appear in the lease which is before me. That is true, but I think the language in this clause has the same effect, and I am not prepared to put on it a construction which would result in the landlord being able at any time after granting this option to bring into being tenancies of the flat which would constitute a defect of title to which the tenant was unable to object.

In my view, the tenant was bound, by reason of the concluding part of sub-cl. (iii), to accept the state of the title as it was when the lease was granted, and would have been unable to object to any lease or tenancy which at that time had subsisted, but that is far removed from compelling him to take the property subject to any other defect which the landlord might at any time think right to bring into being and would have the effect of preventing the tenant from getting possession of the property. I see great difficulties in the way of carrying the views of counsel for the landlord into effect because, as counsel for the tenant pointed out, it might be, if the landlord were right, that a landlord, at any time after the lease was granted, could mortgage the property and then say to the tenant: "Well, this mortgage is on the property and you have got to buy the property subject to the mortgage." Or again, if a lease were granted, questions of difficulty might arise whether the rent reserved was a fair rent or an unfair rent. I do not know where the line can fairly be drawn between what counsel for the landlord contends that the landlord can do and what he concedes that he cannot do, and, in the absence of any authority on the point, I am not prepared to hold that he could, on the true construction of this particular clause, bring into being anything which could be regarded as a defect in title which was not in being at the date when the lease was granted. For these reasons I have arrived at the conclusion that the lease which the landlord granted to her husband, Mr. Crosby, on Mar. 1, 1948, was not a lease which is binding on the donee of the option, and that the landlord does not make a good title to the property so long as that lease remains on foot.

Declaration accordingly. Landlord to pay the costs.

RAILWAY EXECUTIVE v. YORKSHIRE (WEST RIDING) COUNTY COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ., and Wynn-Parry, J.), March 24, 25, 1949.]

Railway—Level crossing—Railway constructed under statutory authority above level of road—Inclined approaches to level of railway—Subsidence of railway and road—Railway restored to original level—Liability of railway authority to restore level of inclined planes—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (c. 20), s. 16—South Yorkshire, Doncaster and Goole Railway (Deviation and Extension of Elsecar Branch) Act, 1850 (c. xxxv), s. 3.

In 1850 a railway company, predecessors in title of the Railway Executive, were authorised by the South Yorkshire, Doncaster and Goole Railways (Deviation and Extension of Elsecar Branch) Act, 1850, which incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to make and maintain a railway "across and upon the level of" a public road at W. It was necessary to construct the railway above the level of the road, and it, therefore, became the railway company's statutory duty to build inclined approaches to facilitate the passage of users of the highway across the railway line. These inclined approaches were properly constructed by the company. In 1942 mining operations carried on by third parties caused a subsidence of both the railway and the road, and it became necessary for the safe user of the railway that the railway line should be restored to its original level. This restoration would cause an obstruction of the road unless the level of the inclined approaches was also made up, and the question arose whether the Railway Executive or the highway authority should execute and bear the cost of the restoration of the level of the approaches. Under s. 3 of the special Act of 1850 and s. 16 of the Act of 1845, the railway company had power to maintain what they had constructed under statutory authority.

HELD : the Railway Executive were entitled to restore the railway line to its original level without themselves raising the inclined approaches or contributing to the cost incurred by the highway authority in doing so.

APPEAL by the West Riding of Yorkshire County Council from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 15, 1948.

D

ROXBURGH, J., held that the Railway Executive were under no liability to restore the level of inclined approaches constructed by their predecessors in title to facilitate the passage of road traffic across their railway line, notwithstanding the fact that, in restoring the level of the railway, which was necessitated by a subsidence affecting both the railway and the road, they would cause an obstruction of the roadway. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

H

SOMERVELL, L.J. : In 1850 the predecessors of the plaintiffs, the South Yorkshire, Doncaster and Goole Railway Co., were authorised by a special Act, which incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to make and maintain certain railways, and, in particular, to construct a railway "across and upon the level of" a public road in the township of Worsborough. That level crossing, as it is ordinarily called, was constructed, and, although I do not think that this affects the issue of the present appeal, the railway company wanted the level of their railway to be somewhat above the level of the road as it had existed. In those circumstances, it was their statutory duty to build what are called "inclined planes," so that those who used the highway were gradually taken up a slight incline to the new higher level at which it suited the railway to cross the road. The road in question is a county road and the defendants, as highway authority, are responsible for it under the Local Government Act, 1933. There are minerals under the level crossing and the road and there has been subsidence due to mining operations, causing the railway line at the level crossing and the road to sink. So far as the highway alone is concerned, the subsidence has caused no inconvenience. Because of the railway, however, it is agreed that the road must be put back to the old level. In the agreed statement of facts this matter is dealt with in these words :

"Owing to such subsidence of the railway lines at the said level crossing the maintenance and safe working of the railway could only be ensured by the plaintiffs restoring the same to the level shown on an agreed plan section and cross sections annexed hereto . . . being a level authorised by the said special Act and such restoration was carried out by the plaintiffs in or about August, 1945."

In other words, the line was then restored to the old level authorised under the statute at which it was constructed in 1850 or shortly afterwards, and if nothing were done about the road it would clearly become obstructed and unusable for the purposes for which highways exist. It is common ground that, the railway line having been restored to its old level, the highway, if it was to remain usable, had to be inclined up to it.

The question in this case can be formulated in this way : Have the plaintiffs, on executing these works, themselves to see, at their own expense, that the highway remains usable ? It is necessary to refer to some of the provisions of the special Act, the South Yorkshire, Doncaster and Goole Railway (Deviation and Extension of Elsecar) Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict., c. xxxv). That Act incorporates the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Section 3 of the special Act provides :

" . . . it shall be lawful for the said company to make and maintain the new or substituted lines of railway, and also the extension railway and branch railways hereinafter particularly described, with all proper works, stations, approaches, and conveniences connected therewith, in the lines and upon the lands delineated on the said plans and described in the said books of reference, and according to the levels defined on the said sections, and to enter upon, take and use such of the lands as shall be necessary for such purposes."

Section 8 deals with the level crossing and provides :

" . . . it shall be lawful for the company to construct the railways hereby authorised across and upon the level of the turnpike roads and public roads numbered in the first mentioned deposited plans as follows . . . "

Then they are numbered and the one in question here is No. 103. By s. 12 :

" . . . the powers of the company for the compulsory purchase of lands for the purposes of this Act shall not be exercised after the expiration of three years from the passing of this Act."

By s. 13 :

" . . . the works hereby authorised shall be completed within five years from the passing of this Act, and on the expiration of such period the powers by this Act granted to the company for executing such works, or otherwise in relation thereto, shall cease to be exercised, except as to so much thereof as shall then be completed."

We were referred to some sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Section 16 re-asserts what is contained in s. 3 of the special Act, i.e., the right of the railway company from time to time to alter and repair the works and to substitute others and to "do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering or repairing, and using the railway." It re-asserts the right of maintenance which is in question here. Counsel for the Railway Executive submitted that any power contained in an earlier part of s. 16, for example, to make inclined planes, was a power which related only to the period of construction and lapsed after five years. I think that to decide this case it is unnecessary to lay down that that as a matter of law is necessarily right. I can see that difficult questions might arise, though I do not think that they arise in this case. The railway company being authorised to maintain, if it could be shown that some power in the earlier part of s. 16 was necessary for the proper exercise of their right (and, in a sense, their duty) of maintenance, it may be that such a right would necessarily be implied. Section 46 of the Act of 1845 is important. In effect it provides that, if a railway company gets power from Parliament to construct a line across a road, it must cross the road by a bridge unless it derives, in its special Act to do so by a level crossing. Section 53 was relied on as emphasising (and I think that this is the effect of it) the undoubtedly great stress laid in this Act on the necessity for railway companies, in constructing their works, to ensure that the public right of user of highways is not interfered with. If they are going to interfere with that user, they have to provide a substituted road.

A ROXBURGH, J., regarded this case as covered and concluded by the decision of WRIGHT, J., in West Lancashire Rural Council v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry. Co. (1), subsequently approved in the House of Lords in Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Co. v. A.-G. (2). The head-note in the West Lancashire case (1) is :

B “A railway company, being authorised to carry their railway across a high road upon the level, constructed the railway at a slightly higher level than the road, and, in order to bring the road up to the level of the railway, raised it by means of inclined planes on either side of the railway under the powers conferred by s. 16 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845. Held, that there was no obligation upon the railway company to repair the roadway upon the inclined planes, notwithstanding that their act in inclining its surface might have made its maintenance more expensive than before.”

C In a short judgment WRIGHT, J., said ([1903] 2 K.B. 397) :

D “ . . . I agree with Mr. Rowlatt that under s. 56 the obligation of the company is discharged as soon as they have restored the road to as good a condition as it was in before it was altered.”

I think that the effect of that decision is that, where a railway company, because it wants to cross a highway at a higher level, constructs inclined planes, provided that it has constructed them properly and that they are in good and proper condition, they are then to be treated as part of the highway, and the fact that they have been constructed by the railway company becomes from that moment irrelevant. The highway authority thenceforward have such duties and such obligations towards them as if they had not been constructed by the railway company. If that is right, the question in this case is unaffected by the fact that these inclined planes were constructed by the railway company. It would be curious if the relation between highway authority and railway company depended on whether, when a level crossing was made, there had been a slight raising of the level or not. I think that one has to approach this problem on the basis that when the railway was made, for the purposes of carrying out the statute enabling the railway to be made a level crossing was constructed, and the actual altitude of that level crossing was a matter of importance to the railway. The gradients which railways can have are limited.

G The next point to bear in mind is that the railway company have authority to “maintain” what they have constructed under statutory authority. I regard the maintaining which they are authorised and entitled to do in the present circumstances as including the maintenance of this particular portion of railway line at the level at which it was constructed. The only question is whether they have to do the work on the highway which results.

H The most attractive way of putting the case for the county council is to say that from the point of view of what they were interested in and that of their duties, there was no need to do anything, but that, so far as they were concerned, the highway was a perfectly good highway after the subsidence. I was at one time attracted by that way of putting it, but I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right, though I cannot regard the case as so completely covered by the judgment of WRIGHT, J., as he did.

I approach it by a simple method, but one which, I hope, leads to the right result. If the highway had sunk and the railway had remained at its level, I do not think that there is any doubt that the highway authority would have had to have borne the expense of raising the highway and keeping it in a usable condition. They would have had no case for saying that the railway was in any way liable, and they could not have based any case on the argument that, but for the railway, it would not matter that the highway had subsided, as it has, a foot or two. Equally, of course, if the railway had sunk without the highway, the railway company would have been entitled to maintain their line so as to bring it up to the old level which had been fixed under the statute. In the course of the argument I suggested this possible view of the facts. Supposing that a subsidence had taken place, and, while the railway company had been able to take steps to see that the railway line did not subside, the roadway had subsided, I do not think that it could have been suggested that the highway authority would have had any claim against the railway company to pay or contribute to the cost of the raising of the highway. I do not think that it makes any difference that the two things have happened together. I think that the result of the railway being built at the level at which it was built was to throw on the highway authority duties and obligations to keep the highway available for the public which would not have been placed on them if the railway had not been built under statutory authority. For those reasons I think that the learned judge was right and that in the events which have happened the plaintiffs are entitled to put back their railway in the position in which it was without themselves raising the highway (even if they have power to do so, which I doubt), or bearing the expense which the defendant council incur in so doing. No doubt, they have to give, and have given, due notice to the highway authority, so that the highway authority can make proper arrangements to see that the highway is put into a usable condition and is obstructed as little as possible in the course of the work. I think that the appeal fails.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I agree. I think that the case is by no means free from difficulty, and I was at one time impressed with the possible view that, if the railway company was entitled to restore the level of its line without any obligation to do anything as regards the inclined planes or approaches, they would in the end have crossed a turnpike road or public highway other than on the level as authorised by the special Act, or otherwise than by a bridge, as authorised by s. 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, but I think that the answer to that point is provided by counsel for the Railway Executive when he says that both the provision in the special Act and s. 46 are directed to the construction of the line. Therefore, that particular point fails.

The facts of the case are very special. This is not a case of ordinary repair of the approaches, though it is significant that s. 46 does impose an obligation, as I follow it, to maintain the approaches to bridges, though not the approaches to level crossings. As SOMERVELL, L.J., has pointed out, in this case, owing to the activities of third parties, namely, a colliery undertaking, the land on which the railway line and the highway rested subsided. They might not have subsided together, and, on any view, each party concerned might have had to do restoration work, but, as it turned out, the subsidence has so operated that the highway authority is able to allow things to remain as they now are, though that is not the case with the railway company. As pointed out in the agreed statement of facts, unless the level is restored, the line cannot be safely maintained, so that the railway company, in effect, must restore their line to the level at which it was before the subsidence took place. Put in another way, they seem to me to have put themselves in the position that they would have been in had the subsidence affected only the approaches to the railway.

I think, for the reasons which my Lord has already stated, that the highway authority cannot call on the plaintiffs to undertake the obligation of bringing the highway up to the original level, now restored, of the railway. For these reasons, as well as those stated by my Lord, I think that this appeal fails.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : I agree. It was argued attractively by counsel for the county council that after the subsidence the road was still fit for its purpose as a highway although the railway was not fit for its purpose, and that in those circumstances, if the railway company wanted to raise the railway to the old level, they must also be responsible for raising the approaches. I do not consider that that position follows. The result of the exercise by the railway company of the powers given to it by the special Act and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, was that at the expense of the railway company the level of the road at and approaching the level crossing was raised, and it was so raised to enable the railway to cross it at the higher level which was necessary. So long as the railway exists and is operated, the railway and the road must, as it seems to me, be linked in the sense that they must be at a common level to allow the railway to operate across the road and the public to use the road across the railway. To my mind, the road was, so to speak, tied to a particular level, because ex hypothesi, the railway, to be safe, must operate at the higher level, and there was a duty on the highway authority to maintain the approaches at that level which was required to enable the public to use the road, having regard to the right and obligation of the railway company to maintain the railway at the higher level. A common disaster occurred in the shape of a subsidence affecting both the road and the railway and it is agreed that, in order to discharge its statutory obligations, the railway company had to raise the railway to its former level. It follows, in my view, that the highway authority had cast on it the duty to raise the road to the "tied" level so that the public should be enabled to continue to use the road, which Parliament has authorised to be crossed by a railway at a higher level than the road originally was. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MIDDLETON (EARL) v. COTTESLOE AND OTHERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord du Parcq, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord Reid), February 21, 22, April 8, 1949.]

Estate duty—Settlement—Investments in England representing proceeds of sale of land in Eire—Whether investments notionally land in Eire for fiscal purposes—Settled Land Act, 1882 (c. 38), s. 22 (5).

The Settled Land Act, 1882, which, although repealed and replaced by the Settled Land Act, 1925, in England, still applies to Eire, provides by s. 22 (5) : "Capital money arising under this Act while remaining uninvested or unapplied, and securities on which an investment of any such capital money is made, shall, for all purposes of disposition, transmission, and devolution, be considered as land, and the same shall be held for and go to the same persons successively, in the same manner and for and on the same estates, interests, and trusts, as the land wherefrom the money arises would, if not disposed of, have been held and have gone under the settlement."

Various portions of land situate in Eire, the subject of an Irish strict settlement made on May 15, 1909, were from time to time sold both under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the Irish Land Purchase Act and parts of the proceeds were invested by the trustees of the settlement in their names in the purchase of inscribed or registered stocks or shares transferable in the books of the Bank of England or on registers kept in England. The trustees were resident in England, and both the former and the present life tenants were domiciled in England. On the death of the first life tenant estate duty was claimed in respect of the securities.

HELD: the provisions of s. 22 (5) did not operate so as to convert, for fiscal purposes, the proceeds of sale of the settled land from securities situate within the United Kingdom to land situate in Eire, and, therefore, the claim to estate duty should be upheld.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal, dated June 10, 1947, and reported [1947] 2 All E.R. 134, affirming a decision of ROXBURGH, J., dated Jan. 28, 1947, and reported [1947] 1 All E.R. 345.

ROXBURGH, J., held that investments in the United Kingdom representing the proceeds of sale of land situate in Eire and subject to the trusts of an Irish settlement were not property situate out of the United Kingdom, and were liable to estate duty. That decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The House of Lords now affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal, but found it unnecessary to decide whether the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 22 (5), had any operation in regard to the English investments, because, even if it had some operation, it could not, in their Lordships opinion, have the operation contended for, namely, to convert the English securities into Irish land for fiscal purposes. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Apr. 8. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, this appeal raises a question which is said to be of general importance and to affect other cases than that which your Lordships have to consider. It concerns the right of the Crown to levy estate duty on English investments which represent the proceeds of sale of Irish land settled by an admittedly Irish settlement. This right which has been established by the decision of ROXBURGH, J., and the Court of Appeal is challenged on this appeal.

The relevant facts are simple and not in dispute. By an indenture dated May 15, 1909, and made between the late Earl of Middleton, of the first part, the appellant, the present Earl of Middleton, of the second part, the Rt. Hon. Madeleine Cecilia Carlyle Viscountess Middleton, of the third part, and the Hon. Arthur Grenville Brodrick and the Hon. Thomas Francis Fremantle (now Lord Cottesloe), of the fourth part, certain mansion houses and lands at Middleton in the county of Cork and other lands and hereditaments in that part of Ireland which is now known as Eire over which the late Earl of Middleton and the appellant had a general power of appointment were appointed and settled to the use of the trustees thereof for a term of 1,500 years on trust to raise a certain capital sum (which does not affect the investments now in question) and subject thereto on trust that the said trustees might, during the joint lives of the late earl and the appellant, receive a rentcharge of the amount (in an event which happened before the death of the late earl) of £700 per annum on trusts thereby declared for the benefit of the appellant and subject thereto to the use of the late earl during his life, with remainder (subject to certain family charges) to uses under which the appellant is now tenant for life in possession (such life estate being determinable in the events therein mentioned) with remainders over. The respondents, the Rt. Hon. Thomas Francis Baron Cottesloe and Sir Henry Charles Lloyd, are the present trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882-1890, having been appointed by a deed dated Nov. 1, 1935. Since the date of the settlement and in the lifetime of the late earl, various sales of lands comprised in the settlement were effected, both under the Settled Land Acts, 1882-1890, and under the Irish Land Purchase Acts. Parts of the proceeds of such sales were invested by the trustees of the settlement in the purchase, in their names, of inscribed or registered stocks or shares transferable in the books of the Bank of England or on registers kept in England. They were of an approximate value of £90,000. The late earl died on Feb. 13, 1942, domiciled in England. The appellant was also then, and still is, domiciled in England. On the death of the late earl a conflict of opinion arose between the revenue authorities of England and Eire respectively. The English authorities claimed estate duty on the investments as being property situate in England which had passed under the dispositions of the settlement on the death. The Eire authorities contended, on the other hand, that, having regard to the origin of the investments and the provisions of s. 22 (5) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the investments were for fiscal purposes to be treated as if they were lands situate in Eire, and, consequently, they were not subject to English estate duty, and they refused relief under the Double Taxation (Relief) Order, 1926 (Irish) (S.R. & O., 1926, No. 42), unless the claim of the English revenue authorities should have been affirmed by the English Court. Accordingly, the respondent trustees issued an originating summons in the Chancery Division to which the Attorney-General and the appellant, the present earl, were defendants, to have determined the question which is now before the House.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 22 (5), is in the following terms :

Capital money arising under this Act while remaining uninvested or unapplied, and securities on which an investment of any such capital money is made, shall, for all purposes of disposition, transmission, and devolution, be considered as land, and the same shall be held for and go to the same persons successively, in the same manner and for and on the same estates, interests, and trusts, as the land wherefrom the money arises would, if not disposed of, have been held and have gone under the settlement.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, has been repealed in toto by the Settled Land Act, 1925, which extends only to England and Wales, but it is still in force in Eire in circumstances which in another case may demand closer examination.

To succeed in his claim the appellant must, as it appears to me, establish two propositions :—(a) that the provisions of s. 22 (5) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, are still operative as an Act of the Imperial Parliament in regard to English investments representing the proceeds of sale of Irish land, and (b) that, being so operative, they have the effect for fiscal purposes of converting such proceeds from securities situate within the United Kingdom to land situate in Ireland. In my opinion, the appellant fails to establish the second of these propositions, and it becomes unnecessary to determine the first of them.

On the second point, on which I concur in, and can really add nothing to, the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, I see no reason why the words “including fiscal purposes” should be read into the section after the word “devolution.” I refer to the necessity of reading such words into the section, for it seems to me clear that by themselves the words “for all purposes of disposition, transmission and devolution” do not naturally include a purpose which only arises under a taxing Act. Moreover, it appears to me that the context in which these words are to be found, viz., the following sentence, in which the beneficial interests of successors are dealt with, lends support to the view that it is only with the right of beneficiaries in regard to disposition, transmission and devolution that the sub-section is dealing. It would, further, be an anomalous result if, in a statute which does not profess to bind, and clearly does not bind, the Crown, the words “for fiscal purposes,” which vitally affect the Crown, were by some implication to be read into the section. Learned counsel for the appellant, whose argument lacked nothing in clarity and cogency, urged on your Lordships that the fiscal burden which is imposed on the “passing” of property by the Finance Act, 1894, is an incident of transmission, and, further, that the provision that capital money is to be enjoyed “in the same manner” as “the land wherefrom the money arises” indicates that it is to be subject to the same fiscal burden, but I hope I do not dismiss the argument too lightly if I say that the relevant words mean just what they say and no more, and that there is no justification for implying other words which, more than most words, demand explicit expression.

Reliance was placed on certain cases, but (with one exception) they do not appear to me to support the appellant's contention. Neither in Re Cartwright (1), nor in Re Cutcliffe's Will Trusts (2), nor in Re Mackenzie (3), was the question now under consideration relevant, and I do not think it necessary to consider whether they were rightly decided. The exception to which I refer is the Irish case of Re Stoughton (4). Like the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS, I must regret that I cannot accept the view of the learned judges who decided that case, but it would seem from the report that they did not have the advantage of a full argument on the point. The appellant failing to establish the second of his propositions, that is an end of the matter and I do not think it necessary to discuss the first proposition. On this, too, the decision of both ROXBURGH, J., and the Court of Appeal was adverse to him. It was conceded that, unless the Settled Land Act, 1882, is still in force, not only in Eire as an Act deriving its validity from art. 73 of the Constituent Act which is scheduled to the Irish Free State Constitution Act, 1922 (Session 2), but also in England as an Act of the Imperial Parliament, it cannot have any operation in regard to English investments. I will say no more than that grave, if not overwhelming, difficulties appear to me to lie in the way of the contention that at any time since the Irish Free State Constitution Act, 1922 (Session 2), came into force any Act which by art. 73 of the Constituent Act thereafter remained in force in Eire could have any extra-territorial operation so as to affect English investments, but I do not think it necessary finally to decide a question which, no doubt, raises a nice constitutional problem. I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, I concur in the opinion which has been delivered, and in the motion proposed.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I also concur.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, it is plain that the question raised by the originating summons must be answered in the affirmative if your Lordships come to the conclusion that the incidence of death duties is not one of the "purposes of disposition, transmission, and devolution" with which alone s. 22 (5) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is concerned. For my part, I do not doubt that this is the correct conclusion. The sub-section carefully limits the purposes for which capital money and investments thereof are to be considered as land, and, in my view, the appellant is really asking this House to give no effect to the limiting words "of disposition, transmission, and devolution," no one of which aptly applies to the incidence of death duties. I think that, if the legislature had intended the sub-section to have any effect on questions of death duties, the words just quoted would have been omitted, or a fourth "purpose," referring expressly to death duties, would have been inserted. I need not further elaborate my reasons for thinking that the appeal fails on this first point, as I am in substantial agreement with the views expressed thereon by the Court of Appeal. As to the cases relied on by counsel for the appellant, I do not think he can derive any real assistance from any of the observations of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Re Cartwright (1) or of myself in Re Outcliffe (2). These observations were not directed to any question of death duties. Nor can counsel rely on the concession made by the Crown, in very special circumstances, in Duke of Marlborough v. A.-G. (5). With all respect to HANNA, J., I cannot accept as correct his observations as to the construction of s. 22 (5) in Re Stoughton (4). It does not appear from the report that the learned judge had had the assistance of argument upon this point. As the appellant fails on this first and vital point, it is unnecessary to arrive at a conclusion on the other very ingenious arguments advanced by counsel for the appellant. I concur in the motion proposed.

LORD SIMONDS : My noble and learned friend, LORD REID, who is unable to be here today, has asked me to say that he concurs in the opinion which I have read.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Simonds, Lord du Parc, Lord Normand and Lord Morton of Henryton), January 11, 12, 13, 14, 17, 18, April 8, 1949.]

H Marine Insurance—War risks—Exclusion—Civil war—Liability of underwriters.

APPEAL by shipowners from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., SOMERVELL, L.J., and ROMER, J.) dated Feb. 20, 1947, reversing a decision of ATKINSON, J., dated May 2, 1946, in an action in which the appellants sued the respondent, a representative underwriting member of Lloyds, on a policy of insurance, in respect of the loss of or damage to four fishing trawlers seized by the republican government of Spain during the Spanish civil war.

The appellants, a Spanish company, owned a fleet of fishing trawlers operating from Pasajes, a port in the Basque provinces of Spain, near San Sebastian. On July 6, 1936, they entered into an insurance policy with Lloyds' underwriters against the loss of or damage to the trawlers and their gear "caused by . . . civil commotions or arising from incendiarism . . . or from any other malicious act whatsoever by any persons, including general average, salvage and salvage charges as a direct result of malicious damage not recoverable under the marine policies. Excluding war risk and excluding all other risks ordinarily covered under the vessels' marine policy." In 1936 a new government was elected in Spain which met with opposition culminating in July in a military uprising headed by a number of generals including General Mola who was in command of the army in the Basque provinces. The government, unable to rely on the regular army, were forced to depend for support on civilians enrolled from the various political parties, who were badly equipped and without uniforms. Fighting took place around San Sebastian and General Mola was nearing the town when, on Aug. 6, one of the appellants' trawlers was seized by government supporters on the authority of the local governor and taken to Bilbao where it was handed over to the governor of that area and used for patrolling the coast. Subsequently, the remainder of the appellants' trawlers were seized and sailed from Pasajes to Bilbao carrying government refugees, both military and civilian, and equipment. On Sept. 8 General Mola captured Pasajes. In October the government formally requisitioned the appellants' vessels, armed them and used them for patrol work. Finally, Bilbao was captured by General Mola. Two of the appellants' trawlers escaped to Bordeaux whence they were ultimately recovered by the appellants; a third, unable to escape from Bilbao, was scuttled, but was subsequently raised and returned to the appellants; and a fourth was sunk by a rebel cruiser.

In a claim under the policy the appellants submitted that in August and September, 1936, the time of the loss or damage, a state of civil war did not exist in the Basque provinces in Spain and that their claim was, therefore, not defeated by a clause in the policy excluding war risk. ATKINSON, J., gave judgment in their favour, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. In the House of Lords (which dismissed the appellants' appeal), it was further argued that "war" in the phrase "excluding war risk" in the policy did not include civil war.

Sir Robert Aske, K.C., Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and A. J. Hodgson for the appellants.

Pritt, K.C., and Eustace Roskill for the respondent.

THEIR LORDSHIPS held: (i) on the facts, a civil war was in existence in the Basque provinces when the trawlers were seized, the action of General Mola being intended to overthrow the recognised government by force, and the government supporters, although without uniform, nevertheless, constituting an organised force recognised by the government.

(ii) the evacuation of refugees from Pasajes, including, as it did, military personnel, was an operation of war.

On the third point, on which their LORDSHIPS approved Curtis & Sons v. Mathews ([1919] 1 K.B. 425 ; 120 L.T. 154),

A LORD PORTER : Finally, it was argued that civil war was not excepted from the risk on the ground that the words " war risk " did not include war between nationals of the same country. So far as the Court of Appeal was concerned, that argument was untenable, the contrary having been decided in Curtis & Sons v. Mathews (1). Before your Lordships three cases were cited dealing with the disturbances in Ireland in the early nineteen twenties. Their names are set out in the speech about to be delivered by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, and, as he says, the sole question at issue in those cases was whether the loss was due to theft or to riot and civil commotion. The question of war, civil or otherwise, was never raised. Like the noble Lord, I see no reason for refusing to include civil war under the expression " war-risk." I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

C LORD SIMONDS, LORD DU PARCQ, and LORD NORMAND concurred.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : Counsel for the appellants submitted that the word " war " in the phrase " excluding war risk " in the policy of July 6, 1936, ought not to be construed as including civil war. If, however, this first submission should fail, he submitted, secondly, that there was no civil war in Spain at the relevant times and places. In support of his second submission he relied on certain authorities to which I shall presently refer. The first submission was not put forward in the Court of Appeal as it was thought that that court was bound by the decision of ROCHE, J., in Curtis v. Mathews (1) approved by the Court of Appeal. Counsel, however, contended that the decision in Curtis v. Mathews (1) turned on the word " bombardment " and, alternatively that the decision was wrong if and so far as it was a decision that the word " war " in a policy prima facie includes civil war. I desire to say quite plainly that, in my view, the word " war " in a policy of insurance includes civil war unless the context makes it clear that a different meaning should be given to the word. There is no such context in the policy now under consideration. I can see no good reason for giving to the word " war " a meaning which excludes one type of war. It is, therefore, unnecessary to analyse the reasons which led the Court of Appeal to its conclusion, with which I agree, in Curtis v. Mathews (1).

In making his second submission, counsel conceded that there was ultimately a civil war in Spain, but contended that there was no civil war in the neighbourhood of Pasajes or San Sebastian, either on Aug. 6, 1936, when the Mistral was seized or on the date, early in September, 1936, when the Vendaval, the Hispania and the Euskal-Erria were seized. In each case, he contended, the seizure, and the consequent loss or damage to the appellants, was caused by " riot or civil commotion," within the meaning of the policy. It is, of course, not unusual to find civil war preceded by rioting and civil commotion, and it may well be very difficult to decide when the stage of civil war has been reached. The difficulty is well illustrated by Bolivia Republic v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Co., Ltd. (2). In the present case, however, I entertain no doubt that there was civil war in the relevant area before Aug. 6, 1936, and that this civil war was the proximate cause of the ships being seized and taken to Bilbao. I shall not take up your Lordships' time by giving my reasons for this view, as I cannot improve on the reasoning set out in the judgments of LORD GREENE, M.R., and SOMERVELL, L.J. It may, however, be desirable that I should say a few words about three decisions of this House, relied on by counsel for the appellants, which are not mentioned in these judgments. They are Cooper v. General Accident, Fire and Life Assurance Corp'n., Ltd. (3), Motor Union Insurance Co., Ltd. v. Boggan (4) and London and Lancashire Fire Insurance Co., Ltd. v. Bolands, Ltd. (5). In Cooper's case (3) a car was taken from the owner's garage in co. Cork in October, 1920; in Boggan's case (4) a car was seized by four armed men while it was in the care of the owner's chauffeur in co. Wexford in November, 1920; and in the last-mentioned case four armed men entered the City of Dublin Bakery in June, 1921, held up the employees with revolvers, and took £1,250 cash from the cashier's office. Counsel argued that the circumstances in which the ships were taken in the present case bore a strong resemblance to the circumstances in which, for instance, the car was taken in Cooper's case (3), having regard to the state of affairs in Southern Ireland in 1920 and the purpose for which the car was taken. In none of these three cases, however, was it suggested that the loss was due to civil war. Your Lordships' House had to choose in each case between theft on the one hand and riot or civil commotion on the other hand, as the cause of the loss to the assured, and in each case the cause was held to be riot or civil commotion. This being so, it would, I think, serve no useful purpose to point out the differences between the surrounding circumstances in these three cases and the surrounding circumstances in the present case. I agree that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

GILMOUR v. COATS AND OTHERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord du Parc, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, and Lord Reid), January 26, 27, 31, February 1, 2, April 8, 1949.]

Charitable Purpose—Advancement of religion—Public benefit—Carmelite convent—Association of strictly cloistered and purely contemplative nuns.

The income of a trust fund was to be applied to the purposes of a Carmelite convent, if those purposes were charitable. The convent comprised an association of strictly cloistered and purely contemplative nuns who devoted themselves entirely to worship, prayers and meditation and engaged in no activities for the benefit of anyone outside their own association. They were regarded, however, in the Roman Catholic Church as causing, by means of their private worship, prayers and meditations, the intervention of God to bring about the spiritual improvement of members of the public (both Catholic and non-Catholic) outside the convent, and also as providing an example of self-denial and concentration on religious matters which was of spiritual benefit to the public. The question was whether the gift would involve public benefit, so as to be a valid charitable trust. It was contended on behalf of the convent (a) that, since the evidence in this case established that in the belief of the Roman Catholic community the prayers of the sisters of the convent and the sanctity of their lives brought Divine Grace on mankind in general and Roman Catholics in particular, this belief should be accepted by the court as true for the purpose of establishing public benefit; (b) that the sisters, by the holiness of their lives, afforded such measure of edification by example as to provide the requisite public benefit; (c) that the element of public benefit was also to be found in the fact that qualification for admission to membership of the community was not limited to any group of persons but was open to any Roman Catholic woman who had the necessary vocation.

HELD : (i) the decision in Cocks v. Manners (1871) (L.R. 12 Eq. 574 ; 24 L.T. 869) that a gift to a community which was similar to the Carmelite convent in this case was not a gift on a charitable trust as it lacked the element of public benefit had for so long been followed and was so well established that it could not now be repudiated unless a radical change of circumstances, established by sufficient evidence, should compel the court to accept a new view on the matter, and no such change of circumstances had been so established.

(ii) though the advancement of religion was, generally speaking, one of the heads of charity, it did not follow that the court must accept as proved whatever a particular church believed, and a gift to cloistered nuns in the belief that their prayers would benefit the world at large did not derive validity from that belief alone any more than did the belief of any other donor for any other purpose : Re Hummeltenberg ([1923] 1 Ch. 237 ; 129 L.T. 124) approved ; the court could only act on proof, and no temporal court of law could determine the truth of any religious belief ; and, therefore, since the purpose of a trust must be one which the court itself could determine, the court was not entitled to accept and act on the belief of the Roman Catholic Church that the spiritual benefit to mankind flowing from intercessory prayer was sufficient to establish the necessary element of public benefit.

(iii) the benefit to be derived by others from the example of pious lives was something too vague and intangible to satisfy the test of public benefit.

(iv) as the law was disabled from recognising any public benefit resulting from the existence of the community, the fact that admission to membership was open to any Roman Catholic woman having the necessary vocation did not provide the element of public benefit to make the gift a valid charitable gift.

APPEAL by the prioress of the Carmelite Priory, St. Charles Square, Notting Hill, London, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., ASQUITH and EVERSLED, L.JJ.), dated Mar. 9, 1948, and reported sub nom. Re Coats' Trusts, Coats v. Gilmour, [1948] 1 All E.R. 521, affirming an order of JENKINS, J., dated July 16, 1947, and reported [1947] 2 All E.R. 422.

The trustees of a declaration of trust took out a summons to determine whether the purposes of a Carmelite convent were charitable purposes within the legal definition of charity. The nuns of the convent belonged to one of the strictly cloistered and purely contemplative orders of the Roman Catholic Church. JENKINS, J., held that the purposes of the convent were not charitable purposes and his judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The appeal of the prioress from the decision of the Court of Appeal was now dismissed by the House of Lords. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Russell, K.C., and Hewins for the prioress.

Gray, K.C., and Humphrey King for the Converts' Aid Society.

The House took time for consideration.

Apr. 8. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, the appellant, Ethel Gilmour, is the present prioress of the Carmelite Priory of St. Charles Square, Notting Hill, London. In that capacity she appeals against a judgment of the Court of Appeal whereby that court dismissed an appeal from a judgment of JENKINS, J., who had in effect declared the purposes of the Carmelite Priory not to be charitable in the technical sense which the law ascribes to that word. The question arises in this way. By a declaration of trust made on June 10, 1946, between the respondent, Evelyn Dudley Coats, of the one part, and herself and George Bellow (therein called "the trustees"), of the other part, a sum of £500 cash was settled on trust, after payment of costs, for investment as therein mentioned and to hold the resulting trust fund :

"... upon trust, if the purposes of the Roman Catholic community situate and known as the Carmelite Priory, St. Charles Square, Notting Hill, in the county of London, are charitable to apply the income of the trust fund to all or any such purposes ... but if the purposes of the said community are not charitable then upon trust to apply the trust fund to all or any of the purposes of the Converts Aid Society of 20, Holmes Road, Twickenham, Middlesex."

This settlement was admittedly made for the purpose of raising the question which has now reached this House. Accordingly, within a short time an originating summons was issued in the Chancery Division by the trustees, to which the prioress and certain persons representing the Converts Aid Society, who are the present respondents, were made defendants, asking how the trustees ought to apply the income of the trust fund. The question, though framed in this general way, was intended to raise the issue whether the purposes of the Carmelite Priory were charitable. For it was clear that the settlement created a perpetuity in favour of that community, so that, if the purposes were not charitable, the gift over in favour of the Converts Aid Society would take effect.

What, then, were the purposes of this Carmelite Priory, which I will sometimes refer to as "the convent" or "the community" ? On this matter evidence was given by the prioress herself and by His Eminence Cardinal Griffin, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster. This evidence is stated at length in the very careful judgment of JENKINS, J., and I will refer to certain salient features of it. The whole of it has been carefully considered by the House. It appears that this community is one of the communities of the Discalced Nuns of the Order of Our Blessed Lady of Mount Carmel, and that the Discalced Friars and Nuns have been a separate branch of the order under the jurisdiction of their own Father General since the General Chapter of the whole order held at Cremona in 1593. They were founded by St. Theresa of Avila with the object of restoring the strict enclosure and intensifying the contemplative life of the communities and promoting their share in the apostolate. The first convent of nuns was founded by her at Avila in 1562. The convent here in question was founded in 1878 from the Convent of the Incarnation in Paris and from it 33 other convents have been founded in England, Scotland and Wales. The Discalced Carmelite Nuns throughout the world follow the Primitive Rule, which was drawn up by St. Albert Patriarch of Jerusalem and confirmed by Pope Innocent IV in 1247, and the Constitutions of 1591, as modified in 1926 to bring them into conformity with the new code of canon law of the Roman Catholic Church. Each Carmelite convent consists of not more than 20 or 21 nuns who live in community and are presided over by a prioress. Each convent is autonomous and all are subject to the jurisdiction of the General of the Discalced Carmelite Friars or of the local bishop. The purposes of the nuns are conveniently summarised in the prologue to the Constitutions of the Discalced Carmelite Friars which states :

“ . . . two vocations in their due order have been distinctly ordained.

The more important aim of our life shall be the love and contemplation of divine things and the secondary aim the apostolate, particularly all that pertains to our neighbours' salvation.”

The nuns take vows of perpetual poverty, chastity and obedience and live under rules which impose and regulate the strict enclosure and observance of silence, which are said to be the conditions of the true and fruitful following of the contemplative life. So, too, their rules prescribe the occupations which are to fill their lives. They must assist devoutly and every day at the celebration of the mass and the recital of the Divine Office and other offices and prayers of the Church, must spend so many hours a day in mental prayers which are offered with general or special intentions in furtherance of their aims, must never be idle but must spend all the time that is not occupied in community duties in prayer or spiritual reading or work in their cells. Further, the rules prescribe practices to further the spirit of humility and particular mortifications, as, for example, a monastic fast lasting from Sept. 14 to Easter, and the prohibition throughout their lives of those aids to comfort which by ordinary women are regarded as necessities rather than luxuries of life.

This, then, is the life which it is the purpose of this community to promote in the women who join it. Is it a charitable purpose and is a trust for its furtherance a charitable trust ? The community does not engage in—indeed, it is by its rules debarred from—any exterior work, such as teaching, nursing, or tending the poor, which distinguishes the active branches of the same order. A Catholic woman, it is said, joins such a contemplative order as this to promote in herself more fully and perfectly the love of God, expressed in as perfect a submission to His will as she can achieve with the help of His Grace, to promote that love in her neighbour and to make reparation to God for the sins of mankind. It is the teaching of the Church that the religious life thus led is, as it is called, “ the state of perfection.” But it is not a complete statement of their purpose to say that it is merely to work out their own salvation. For it is the established belief of the Roman Catholic Church, as appears from the Apostolic Constitution “ Umbratilem ”, that the prayers and other spiritual penances and exercises, in which the nuns engage for the benefit of the public, in fact benefit the public by drawing down on them grace from God, which enables those who are not yet Christians to embrace the Christian religion and those who are already Christians to practice Christianity more fully and fruitfully, and, further, that the prayers and other spiritual exercises of the nuns are the more efficacious by virtue of the fact that they devote their lives with especial devotion to the service of God. It is this benefit to all the world, arising from the value of their intercessory prayers, that the prioress puts in the forefront of her case in urging the charitable purpose of the trust. Nor is it only on the intercessory value of prayer that the prioress relies for the element of public benefit in the lives of the nuns. For it is the evidence of Cardinal Griffin—and I do not pause to ask whether it is evidence of fact or opinion—that the practice of the religious life by the Carmelite nuns and other religious is a source of great edification to other Catholics—and, indeed, in innumerable cases to non-Catholics—leading them to a higher estimation of spiritual things and to a greater striving after their own spiritual perfection, and that the knowledge that there are men and women who are prepared to sacrifice all that the worldly in man holds dear in order to attain a greater love of God and union with Him inculcates in them a greater estimation of the values and importance of the things which are eternal than they would have if they had not these examples before them. Here, then, is the second element of public benefit, on which the prioress relies, the edification of a wider public by the example of lives devoted to prayer.

I will reserve for final consideration an argument which was not urged in the courts below—that the trusts declared by the settlement are beneficial to the public in that qualification for admission to the community is not limited to any private group of persons, but any person being a female Roman Catholic may be accepted, and, therefore, those trusts provide facilities for the intensified and most complete practice of religion by those members of the public who have a vocation for it. Your Lordships were reluctant to listen to an argument on which you have not the advantage of the opinions of the learned judges in the courts below, but in the special circumstances of this case thought fit to admit it.

I turn then to the question whether, apart from this final consideration, the prioress has established that there is in the trusts which govern this community the element of public benefit which is the necessary condition of legal charity. If now for the first time the necessity for determining that question arose, it might be a more difficult one to answer than it now appears to me to be. But, my Lords, when I consider the law of charity, its origin and the manner of its development, when I find that, though communities such as this have existed over a considerable period and their charitable character has been rarely advocated and never sustained, I do not think that it is possible to open the door and admit them to the house of charity unless there is some novel and compelling reason for doing so.

When I speak of the law of charity, I mean that law which the Court of Chancery and its successor, the High Court of Justice, has evolved from a consideration of the statute 43 Eliz., c. 4. It is a commonplace that that statute, as its title implied, ["An Act to redress the misemployment of lands, goods and stocks of money heretofore given to certain charitable uses."], was directed not so much to the definition of charity as to the correction of abuses which had grown up in the administration of certain trusts of a charitable nature. But from the beginning it was the practice of the court to refer to the preamble of the statute in order to determine whether or not a purpose was charitable. The objects there enumerated and all other objects which by analogy "are deemed within its spirit and intendment," and no other objects, are in law charitable. This is settled and familiar law. I refer to it for two reasons. First, I think that it follows that, however valuable an investigation of the earlier law may be for determining the legality of religious practices (as was shown in Bourne v. Keane (1)), it is of negligible importance for determining whether an object is charitable. Three hundred and fifty years have passed since the statute became law; few, if any, subjects have more frequently occupied the time of the court. In the law of mortmain, the law of perpetuity, and in latter days the revenue law, in all these aspects it has over and over again been the vital issue whether or not an object is charitable, and always it is primarily to the statute of Elizabeth and not behind it that the court has looked for guidance.

This leads me to my second reason. A great body of law has thus grown up. Often it may appear illogical and even capricious. It could hardly be otherwise when its guiding principle is so vaguely stated and is liable to be so differently interpreted in different ages. But, be that as it may, I suppose that, if there was any question on which in this branch of the law an answer based on authority could confidently be given, it would be the question whether a gift to a community such as this was a gift for charitable purposes. This is no question of a patent misinterpretation of a statute. If it were, following Bourne v. Keane (1), I might not hesitate to say that a new departure should be made. But it is far otherwise. It is a matter in which the court has consistently over a long period of time, acting on those principles which it has laid down for its own guidance, held that a particular object is not charitable. I do not seek to qualify what I recently said in National Anti-Vivisection Society v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) that there may be circumstances in which the court will in a later age hold an object not to be charitable which has in earlier age been held to possess that virtue. And the converse case may be possible. That degree of uncertainty in the law must be admitted, but I would ask your Lordships to say that it is only a radical change of circumstances established by sufficient evidence that should compel the court to accept a new view of this matter. Let me then examine briefly the law as it is today and, having done so, ask what are the compelling reasons for a change.

I need not go back beyond Cocks v. Manners (3), which was decided nearly eighty years ago by WICKENS, V.-C. In that case the testatrix left her residuary estate between a number of religious institutions, one of them being the Dominican Convent at Carisbrooke, a community not differing in any material respect from the community of nuns now under consideration. The learned judge, who was, I suppose, as deeply versed in this branch of the law as any judge before or since (for he had been for many years junior counsel to the Attorney-General in equity cases), used these words (L.R. 12 Eq. 585) which I venture to repeat, though they have already been cited in the courts below :

“On the Act [the statute of Elizabeth] unaffected by authority I should certainly hold that the gift to the Dominican convent is neither within the letter nor the spirit of it ; and no decision has been referred to which compels me to adopt a different conclusion. A voluntary association of women for the purpose of working out their own salvation by religious exercises and self-denial seems to me to have none of the requisites of a charitable institution, whether the word ‘charitable’ is used in its popular sense or in its legal sense. It is said, in some of the cases, that religious purposes are charitable, but that can only be true as to religious services tending directly or indirectly towards the instruction or the edification of the public ; an annuity to an individual, so long as he spent his time in retirement and constant devotion, would not be charitable, nor would a gift to ten persons, so long as they lived together in retirement and performed acts of devotion, be charitable. Therefore the gift to the Dominican convent is not, in my opinion, a gift on a charitable trust.”

No case, said the learned Vice-Chancellor, had been cited to compel him to come to a contrary conclusion, nor has any such case been cited to your Lordships. Nor have my own researches discovered one. But since that date the decision in Cocks v. Manners (3) has been accepted and approved in numerous cases. They are referred to in the judgment of JENKINS, J., and I need only remind your Lordships, first, that LINDLEY, L.J., in Re White (4) used these words ([1893] 2 Ch. 51) :

“A society for the promotion of private prayer and devotion by its own members, and which has no wider scope, no public element, no purposes of general utility, would be a ‘religious’ society, but not a ‘charitable’ one : see Cocks v. Manners (3).”

—and, secondly, that in Dunn v. Byrne (5) ([1912] A.C. 410) LORD MACNAGHTEN, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, referred to Cocks v. Manners (3) as the exemplar of a case in which the purpose would be considered by a devout Catholic to be “conducive to the good of religion” but which is “certainly not charitable.”

I have thus stated the law as it was universally accepted in case-law (except in some recent Irish cases) and also in all text-books of authority at the date when these proceedings were begun, and I now ask what is the argument on which your Lordships are invited to unsettle it. Apart from what I have called the final argument, which I will deal with later, the contention of the prioress rests, not on any change in the lives of the members of such a community as this, nor, from a wider aspect, on the emergence of any new conception of the public good, but solely on the fact that for the first time certain evidence of the value of such lives to a wider public together with new arguments based on that evidence has been presented to the court. Never before, it was urged, has the benefit to be derived from intercessory prayer and from edification been brought to the attention of the court; if it had been, the decision in Cocks v. Manners (3) would, or, at least, should, have been otherwise. I have examined the records of Cocks v. Manners (3) which were supplied to me by the Record Office and I find that the case has been fully and accurately reported. There was no such evidence as was adduced in this case by the prioress and Cardinal Griffin. Nor, as appears from the report, was any argument addressed to this specific point nor any judgment on it. What weight is to be attributed to this, which is the mainstay of the prioress's case? To me, my Lords, despite the admirable argument of counsel for the prioress, the weight is negligible. True it is that WICKENS, V.-C., emphasised that aspect of the religious life which is admittedly its more important aim, “the love and contemplation of divine things.” But “its secondary aim, the apostolate, particularly all that pertains to our neighbour's salvation” (I use the prioress's words) is no new thing and I cannot suppose that it was absent from the learned judge's mind that those who devote their lives to prayer pray not for themselves alone, or that they believe that their prayers are not in vain. Nor, as I think, can he have been unaware of the effect which the example of their lives may have on others. As I venture to think, these aspects of the case were neither insisted on in evidence or argument, nor discussed by the learned judge, because they do not afford any real support for the contention that there is in the purpose of the community the element of public benefit which is the condition of legal charity.

My Lords, I would speak with all respect and reverence of those who spend their lives in cloistered piety, and in this House of Lords Spiritual and Temporal, which daily commences its proceedings with intercessory prayers, how can I deny that the Divine Being may in His wisdom think fit to answer them? But, my Lords, whether I affirm or deny, whether I believe or disbelieve, what has that to do with the proof which the court demands that a particular purpose satisfies the test of benefit to the community? Here is something which is manifestly not susceptible of proof. But, then it is said, this is a matter not of proof but of belief, for the value of intercessory prayer is a tenet of the Catholic faith, therefore, and, in such prayer there is benefit to the community. But it is just at this “therefore” that I must pause. It is, no doubt, true that the advancement of religion is, generally speaking, one of the heads of charity, but it does not follow from this that the court must accept as proved whatever a particular church believes. The faithful must embrace their faith believing where they cannot prove: the court can act only on proof. A gift to two or ten or a hundred cloistered nuns in the belief that their prayers will benefit the world at large does not from that belief alone derive validity any more than does the belief of any other donor for any other purpose. The importance of this case leads me to state my opinion in my own words but, having read again the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., I will add that I am in full agreement with what he says on this part of the case.

A I turn to the second of the alleged elements of public benefit, edification by example, and I think that this argument can be dealt with very shortly. It is, in my opinion, sufficient to say that this is something too vague and intangible to satisfy the prescribed test. The test of public benefit has, I think, been developed in the last two centuries. Today it is beyond doubt that that element must be present. No court would be rash enough to attempt to define precisely or exhaustively what its content must be. But it would assume a burden which it could not discharge if now for the first time it admitted into the category of public benefit something so indirect, remote, imponderable and, I would add, controversial as the benefit which may be derived by others from the example of pious lives. The prioress called in aid the use by B WICKENS, V.-C., of the word "indirectly" in the passage that I have cited from his judgment in Cocks v. Manners (3), but I see no reason to suppose that that learned judge had in mind any such question as your Lordships have to determine.

C I must now refer to certain cases on which the prioress relied. They consist of a number of cases in the Irish Courts and Re Caus (6), a decision of LUXMOORE, J. A consideration of the Irish cases shows that it has there been decided that a bequest for the saying of masses, whether in public or in private, is a good charitable bequest: see e.g., A.-G. v. Hall (7) and O'Hanlon v. Logue (8). In Re Caus (6) LUXMOORE, J., came to the same conclusion. I would expressly reserve my opinion on the question whether these decisions should be sustained in this D House. So important a matter should not be decided except on a direct consideration of it. It is possible that, particularly in regard to the celebration of masses in public, good reason may be found for supporting a gift for such an object as both a legal and a charitable purpose. It follows, however, from what I have said in the earlier part of this opinion that I am unable to accept the view, which at least in the Irish cases is clearly expressed, that in intercessory E prayer and edification that public benefit which is the condition of legal charity is to be found. It is, perhaps, significant that even in Ireland, where in regard to the saying of masses the law has thus been established, there is no consensus of opinion that a gift to a community of contemplative nuns is charitable: see Munster and Leinster Bank v. A.-G. (9), Maguire v. A.-G. (10), and Re Keogh (11). From the judgment of BLACK, J., in Munster and Leinster Bank F v. A.-G. (9) I would quote these words ([1940] I.R. 30) which succinctly express my own view:

G "There are perhaps few forms of human activity, good in themselves, but solely designed to benefit individuals associated for the purpose of securing that benefit, which may not have some repercussions or consequential effects beneficial to some section of the general community; and unless a further and sweeping inroad is to be made on the rule against perpetuities, the line must be drawn somewhere. Cocks v. Manners (3) has drawn it."

H Of the decision of LUXMOORE, J., in Re Caus (6), I would only say that his ratio decidendi is expressly stated to be, first, that it (i.e., a gift for the saying of masses) enables a ritual act to be performed which is recognised by a large proportion of Christian people to be the central act of their religion, and, secondly, that it assists in the endowment of priests whose duty it is to perform the ritual act. The decision, therefore, does not assist the prioress's argument in the present case and I make no further comments on it.

It remains, finally, to deal with an argument which, as I have said, was not presented to the Court of Appeal but appears in the prioress's formal case. It is that the element of public benefit is supplied by the fact that qualification for admission to membership of the community is not limited to any group of persons but is open to any woman in the wide world who has the necessary vocation. Thus, it is said, just as the endowment of a scholarship open to public competition is a charity, so also a gift to enable any woman (or, presumably, any man) to enter a fuller religious life is a charity. To this argument, which, it must be admitted, has a speciously logical appearance, the first answer is that which I have indicated earlier in this opinion. There is no novelty in the idea that a community of nuns must, if it is to continue, from time to time obtain fresh recruits from the outside world. That is why a perpetuity is involved in a gift for the benefit of such a community, and it is not to be supposed that, to mention only three masters of this branch of the law, WICKENS, V.-C., LORD LINDLEY, or LORD MACNAGHTEN failed to appreciate the point. Yet, by direct decision or by way of emphatic example, a community such as this is by them regarded as the very type of religious institution which is not charitable. I know of no consideration applicable to this case which would justify this House in unsettling a rule of law which has been established so long and by such high authority. But that is not the only, nor, indeed, the most cogent, reason why I cannot accede to the prioress's argument. It is a trite saying that the law is life, not logic. But it is, I think, conspicuously true of the law of charity that it has been built up, not logically, but empirically. It would not, therefore, be surprising to find that, while in every category of legal charity some element of public benefit must be present, the court had not adopted the same measure in regard to different categories, but had accepted one standard in regard to those gifts which are alleged to be for the advancement of education and another for those which are alleged to be for the advancement of religion, and it may be yet another in regard to the relief of poverty. To argue by a method of syllogism or analogy from the category of education to that of religion ignores the historical process of the law. Nor would there be lack of justification for the divergence of treatment which is here assumed. For there is a legislative and political background peculiar to so-called religious trusts, which has, I think, influenced the development of the law in this matter. Thus, even if the simple argument that, if education is a good thing, then the more education the better, may appear to be irrefutable, to repeat that argument substituting "religion" for "education" is to ignore the principle, which I understand to be conceded, that not all religious purposes are charitable purposes. It was, no doubt, this consideration which led WICKENS, V.-C., to say [in Cocks v. Manners (3) (L.R. 12 Eq. 585)] that a gift to a Dominican convent was "one of the last gifts which the legislature which passed the Act would have thought of including in it." On this final argument I would add this observation. I have stressed the empirical development of the law of charity and your Lordships may detect some inconsistency in an attempt to rationalise it. But it appears to me that it would be irrational to the point of absurdity, on the one hand, to deny to a community of contemplative nuns the character of a charitable institution, but, on the other, to accept as a charitable trust a gift which had no other object than to enable it to be maintained in perpetuity by recruitment from the outside world.

Finally, I would say this. I have assumed for the purpose of testing this argument that it is a valid contention that a gift for the advancement of education is necessarily charitable if it is not confined within too narrow limits. But that assumption is itself difficult to justify. It may well be that the generality of the proposition is subject to at least two limitations. The first of them is implicit in the decision of RUSSELL, J., in Re Hummeltenberg (12). The second is one that is not in the nature of things likely to occur, but, if it can be imagined that it was made a condition of a gift for the advancement of education that its beneficiaries should lead a cloistered life and communicate to no one, and leave no record of, the fruits of their study, I do not think that the charitable character of the gift could be sustained. For the reasons that I have given I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, I cannot usefully add any words of my own to what has been said by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in support of the view that a principle which has for so long been followed and is so well established as that laid down in Cocks v. Manners (3) cannot now be repudiated. For the reasons which he has so convincingly stated, I believe it to be the duty of your Lordships' House to treat that decision as conclusive of this appeal, unless it be possible to find a real distinction between that case and this. It is on the question whether any such distinction exists that I wish to add some observations.

The appellant, the prioress, seeks to draw the necessary distinction on three grounds, none of which, as my noble and learned friend has pointed out, was very likely to have been overlooked in earlier cases if it had any validity. As to the third of these grounds I have only to express my concurrence in what my noble and learned friend has said. The two other contentions were founded on evidence which had not been before the court in Cocks v. Manners (3). First, there was here evidence (in the affidavit of Cardinal Griffin) that in the belief of the Roman Catholic Church :

“ . . . the prayers and mortifications of the members of the Church for their neighbour both inside and outside the Church advance religion and are an inestimable spiritual benefit to their neighbour.”

Secondly, there was evidence, which again was lacking in Cocks v. Manners (3), that the practice of the religious life by the Carmelite nuns is a source of great edification to other Roman Catholics and also (it is said) “ in innumerable cases to non-Catholics.” Under both these heads, it was submitted, the necessary element of public benefit is found.

My Lords, the first of these three heads of the argument must stand or fall with a further submission which was powerfully urged at the Bar and is not without the support of authority. This submission requires the acceptance of the proposition that, when a question is raised as to the spiritual efficacy of religious acts, the court is bound to assume that the doctrines of the religion which practises them are true, and must ascertain according to those doctrines whether or not they have the spiritual efficacy which is claimed for them. The learned counsel for the prioress, in their presentation of this argument, naturally relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland in O'Hanlon v. Logue (8), and, in particular, on the judgment of PALLES, C.B., in that case. Earlier, in A.-G. v. Delaney (13) the learned Chief Baron had stated the law in these words (I.R. 10 C.L. 126, 129) :

“ I am of opinion that a gift for a religious, or for any other purpose, to be charitable within the statute of Elizabeth, must, to some extent at least, be in the nature of a general public use. It must be of such a nature that the court can determine that its execution shall confer a benefit upon the public or upon some section of the public . . . To constitute a charitable use in analogy to the statute of Elizabeth the purpose must be one which the court itself can ascertain and declare to be public or beneficial to the public. It cannot, in my opinion, derive the element of public benefit from the efficacy spiritual or temporal which, according to the faith of the testatrix, the religious act may possess.”

Over thirty years later, in O'Hanlon v. Logue (8) the learned Chief Baron was persuaded that he had been wrong in the view which he had expressed in Delaney's case (13) and reached the conclusion that if, according to the doctrines of the religion in question, an act of divine service does result in public benefit, either temporal or spiritual, the act must, in law, be deemed charitable.

My Lords, in my respectful opinion the earlier of these two opinions of PALLES, C.B., is, and the later is not, consonant with the law as it has developed in England. I must add, after giving careful consideration to the reasoning of the learned Chief Baron in the later case, that it does not seem to me to be convincing. I am now referring to the third reason which the Chief Baron gave ([1906] 1 I.R. 275) for his decision, a reason which, as he said, was "of wider application" than the others which he gave, and would, if valid, be applicable to the present case. It may be stated fairly, I think, in this way. The law can only know what spiritual efficacy religious acts have by knowing first what efficacy the doctrines of the particular religion concerned ascribe to them :

"But when it knows those doctrines, although it knows that, according to them, such an act has the spiritual efficacy alleged, it cannot know it objectively and as a fact, unless it also knows that the doctrines in question are true."

It cannot know this, and, therefore, one of two results must follow :

"... either (1) the law must cease to admit that any divine worship can have spiritual efficacy to produce a public benefit ; or (2) it must admit the sufficiency of spiritual efficacy, but ascertain it according to the doctrines of the religion whose act of worship it is."

My Lords, the learned Chief Baron ruled out the former of these alternatives as impossible, because to accept it, he said (ibid., 276) would be "to refuse to recognise the essence of all religion." The other result, therefore, he held, must necessarily ensue.

It must be remembered that the law of England recognises as proper objects of charitable endowment at least all those varied forms in which the Christian religion is professed and practised. In some respects there are differences and irreconcilable conflicts of opinion between some of the many religious bodies which are thus recognised. An argument which leads to the conclusion that the courts, when they are considering whether it is for the public benefit that property should be devoted for ever to a religious purpose, are compelled to accept as true any doctrine of a particular religion which ascribes efficacy, spiritual or temporal, to acts which that religion enjoins on its followers, cannot, I think, be sound. The learned Chief Baron spoke of a "hypothetical admission" of the truth of the religious belief, but a court is not performing its duty if it treats a hypothesis as a proved fact and proceeds to draw inferences from it. It appears to me, therefore, that the conclusion to which one is forced is that expressed by the learned Chief Baron earlier, in A.-G. v. Delaney (13), that the purpose of the trust must be one which the court itself can determine and declare to be beneficial to the public. Judged by this test, the case before your Lordships cannot, in my opinion, be distinguished on the first ground from that of the convent in Cocks v. Manners (3). The conclusion which PALLES, C.B., feared [in O'Hanlon v. Logue (8)], that the law would deny spiritual efficacy to all prayers and religious exercises, by no means follows from the adoption of his original opinion. The law may assume, without inconsistency, that all intercessory prayer for spiritual benefits, offered by devout persons of no matter what religion, is capable of benefiting the public generally or a section of it. This will not suffice the prioress. It is not merely on the ground that the nuns offer intercessory prayer that the prioress's case must rest. It is not to be supposed that, if they did not live in seclusion, they would cease to pray, though it is, of course, true that a life in the world would not allow them to give their time so unremittingly to prayer and devotion. The religion which they follow with such self-sacrificing zeal itself teaches, as the Cardinal's affidavit tells us, that "public prayer excels any other." It has not been suggested that private prayer is a fit subject for charitable endowment unless there is something to distinguish it from that offered by the ordinary man. What it would be necessary to accept as a fact, in order to show "public benefit" in the sense in which that phrase is used of charity, is that (I again quote the Cardinal's words) :

" . . . the prayers and mortifications of the contemplative and practising religious are especially efficacious."

A Here we are outside the region of proof as it is understood in our mundane tribunals. This is ground on which the law does not presume to tread.

When I turn to the second contention, I find that (apart from the fact that, as has already been said, edification by example is too remote a public benefit to be considered) the same difficult arises. It is true that those who share the beliefs of these devout women, and some, it may be, of those who do not share

B them, are moved to admiration, if not to imitation, by the knowledge of their example. But the total effect on the community outside the convent of a life lived according to ideals which one faith, but by no means every faith, ranks among the highest is something which the law has no means of judging. It happens that in the present case the litigants who were before the court were at one in accepting the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion. If there

C were evidence before a court concerning religious acts which the creed of a particular church commended, or enjoined as duties, and if it were said on behalf of one party to a dispute that these acts resulted in the edification of many, and, on behalf of another, that they aroused in the hearts of no less a number of persons feelings injurious to the advancement of religion, it must surely be conceded that no court could properly attempt the task of deciding

D between the disputants. Indeed, it could hardly be desired by the devout followers of any creed that such a task should be essayed by a temporal court. I have only to add that, although I am unable to accept part of the reasoning which led the Court of Appeal in Ireland [in O'Hanlon v. Logue (8)] to the conclusion that a bequest for masses, whether they were to be said privately or in public, was a good charitable bequest, I do not desire to express, and, indeed, have not formed, any opinion as to the propriety of that decision on other grounds. It follows that I must reserve my opinion as to the correctness of the decision of LUXMOORE, J., in Re Caus (6). I concur in the recommendation of the Committee that this appeal should be dismissed.

F LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I agree with the opinions which have been delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and by my noble and learned friend, LORD DU PARCQ. I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend, LORD REID, and I concur with that also.

G LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, I have also had the advantage of reading the opinions to which my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, has referred. I agree with them and I have come to the conclusion that I cannot helpfully add anything to them.

LORD REID : My Lords, in this case a sum of money was given to be held by trustees :

H " . . . upon trust if the purposes of the Roman Catholic community situate and known as the Carmelite Priory, St. Charles Square, Notting Hill, in the county of London, are charitable to apply the income of the trust fund to all or any such purposes . . . but if the purposes of the said community are not charitable then upon trust . . ."

for other purposes. The question for decision is whether or not the purposes of that community are charitable in the legal sense of that word. It is admitted, and properly admitted, by the appellant, the prioress of the community, that the fact that it is a gift for religious purposes is not enough to make this gift charitable in the legal sense. The prioress can only succeed by showing that the gift involves a benefit to the public. On the other hand, it is not disputed that, if benefit to the public can be held to be established, the appeal must succeed. Accordingly, the sole point in issue is whether or not there is any ground on which it can be held that the gift would involve public benefit.

The community referred to is a community of Discalced Carmelite nuns belonging to one of the orders of the Roman Catholic Church which are called contemplative orders. According to the affidavit of Cardinal Griffin :

" They are so called because their members are strictly enclosed in their convents and engage in no exterior works but devote their lives to contemplation and penance, contemplation including not only assisting at mass and reciting the Divine Office and other vocal prayers but also reflection of the mind on God and the things of God which evokes from the will or heart acts of adoration, propitiation, love and intercession towards God and which in the case of contemplatives as a general rule passes sooner or later and to a less or greater degree into mystical prayer."

B

That affidavit and the affidavit of the prioress set out at length the purposes of the order and the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church. As I understand it from these affidavits, the essential part of that teaching for the present purpose is that the daily prayers and mortification which these nuns offer for others advance religion and are an inestimable spiritual benefit to those both inside and outside the Church, and that the prayers and mortification of contemplatives are especially efficacious in view of the high degree of union with God which results from the following of their vocation. Counsel for the prioress submitted three grounds on each of which he argued that the prioress is entitled to succeed. If none of these three grounds is valid, the appeal must fail. His main argument was that a court is entitled to accept the belief of Roman Catholics that spiritual benefit to mankind flows from intercessory prayer as sufficient to establish the necessary element of public benefit. It was not suggested that the effect of prayer is capable of legal proof by evidence. No temporal court of law can determine the truth of any religious belief : it is not competent to investigate any such matter and it ought not to attempt to do so. How then does the law deal with a question like that now in issue ?

E

The leading authority cited by counsel for the prioress was O'Hanlon v. Logue (8). In that case it was held, on a re-consideration of the older Irish authorities, that the celebration of mass in private was a charitable purpose. The question there decided is not the same as that which arises in the present case, but many of the reasons stated by the Irish judges are equally applicable to both questions. I shall examine them in some detail. By doing so I shall deal with the main argument for the prioress. WALKER, L.C., stated ([1906] 1 I.R. 259) :

" There are some legal propositions germane to the case for which it would be mere pedantry to cite authority . . . (b) that included amongst charitable objects is one which, according to the ideas of the giver, is for the public benefit."

G

It appears from the report of the argument in O'Hanlon v. Logue (8) that there had been cited from the opinion of FITZGIBBON, L.J. ([1898] 1 I.R. 446) in Re Cranston (14), this passage :

" . . . the benefit must be one which the founder believes to be of public advantage, and his belief must be at least rational, and not contrary either to the general law of the land, or to the principles of morality."

H

WALKER, L.C., appears to have accepted this view and I think that his whole opinion is largely based on it. But counsel for the prioress could not maintain that it correctly states the law of England. I do not think that there has been any doubt, at least since the decision of Re Hummeltenberg (12), by RUSSELL, J., that the court cannot accept the opinion of the donor as sufficient to establish public benefit. As regards an opinion or belief other than a religious belief, I think that that is conclusively settled by the decision of this House in National Anti-Vivisection Society v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). The point could only now be maintained in the form that, when the opinion of the donor is based on a religious belief of the church of which the donor is a member, different considerations apply. That, I think, is the question to be determined in the present case.

A The opinion of PALLES, C.B., in O'Hanlon v. Logue (8) is based on three considerations. In the first place he deals with the validity of gifts for religious purposes prior to the Reformation. Such gifts were regarded as gifts to God and were frequently stated to be gifts to God and to a particular abbey or church. I think that his view was that such a gift was always held to be charitable without there being any need to inquire further whether there was any public benefit involved in it. It may well be that that is correct. It is the next step in his reasoning that I am unable to accept. He takes the view that after the Reformation the only reason why gifts such as gifts for masses to be celebrated in private ceased to be regarded as charitable was that the purposes of such gifts had been made illegal by statute and that [as he says ([1906] 1 I.R. 273)] :

D “When . . . in 1793, all laws prohibiting or discouraging the practice of the Roman Catholic religion were repealed, the illegality determined, and they resumed the character they enjoyed in pre-Reformation times, and once more became charitable (1) because of their piety ; (2) because they were devoted to the support and maintenance of the clergymen, the celebrants.”

E With the greatest respect to that great judge, I think that he has not given due weight to an essential difference between the position before the Reformation and the position now. Before the Reformation only one religion was recognised by the law and, in fact, the overwhelming majority of the people accepted it. It was natural that the law should accept the beliefs of that religion without question and act on them. But since diversity of religious beliefs arose and became lawful, the law has shown no preference in this matter to any church and other religious body. Where a belief is accepted by some and rejected by others, the law can neither accept nor reject. It must remain neutral. If the law before the Reformation accepted gifts for religious purposes as charitable simply because of their piety and without further consideration of the question of public benefit, I think that it did so on grounds which are no longer available. I think that PALLES, C.B., sums up this part of his opinion when he says (ibid., 274) that the celebration of mass is

G “. . . an act from which the common law knew previous to the Reformation, and therefore knows now, that benefits spiritual and temporal flow to the general body of the faithful—benefits which, even were they spiritual only, would render the service charitable within 10 Car. 1, sess. 3, c. 1 [the Irish statute analogous to 43 Eliz., c. 4].”

H I have difficulty in seeing how this could be consistent with the law showing no preference to any particular religion. There may be a new religion with new beliefs which the common law never knew. To preserve equality between the old and the new it would be necessary to hold that the law must also know, in the sense of accepting as true, new beliefs which may directly contradict the old. Whatever other reasons there may be to support the prioress's case, this reason appears to me to be invalid. I am unable to agree with PALLES, C.B., when he says (ibid., 270) :

“Even had the common law acknowledged more religions than one, it would have held pious any gift making provision for the worship of God, irrespective of the particular acknowledged religion according to which the worship was to be offered, provided only such religion were recognised as lawful."

If this were so, one would expect to find some authority to support it after the law did acknowledge more religions than one. I have not found it. The second ground of judgment of the learned Chief Baron (ibid., 274) appears to be based on the premiss:

"All will admit that the divine service of the Reformed Church was, by virtue of its spiritual efficacy, a charitable act, so long as it remained the established church . . ."

I can find no basis for drawing a distinction in the matter of charity between the Established Church and other churches. But apart from that it has been decided in England that it is not a charitable purpose to provide for Church of England services in a private chapel: see Hoare v. Hoare (15). The third ground of judgment of PALLES, C.B., is, perhaps, the most relevant to the present argument. It is to the effect that the only basis on which the law can hold, as it does hold, that public benefit flows from divine worship, is the acceptance as true of the beliefs of the worshippers. PALLES, C.B., puts a dilemma (ibid., 276):

" . . . there must be one of two results: either (1) the law must cease to admit that any divine worship can have spiritual efficacy to produce a public benefit; or (2) it must admit the sufficiency of spiritual efficacy, but ascertain it according to the doctrines of the religion whose act of worship it is."

HOLMES, L.J., puts the matter thus (ibid., 285):

"I am wholly at a loss to know now, if the court cannot determine whether the celebration of a private mass carries with it public benefits, by what means it can determine that a mass said in public confers such benefits."

Again, I must with great respect suggest that these learned judges have taken too narrow a view. There is another way of looking at the matter which avoids these difficulties.

The law of England has always showed favour to gifts for religious purposes. It does not now in this matter prefer one religion to another. It assumes that it is good for man to have and to practise a religion, but, where a particular belief is accepted by one religion and rejected by another, the law can neither accept nor reject it. The law must accept the position that it is right that different religions should each be supported, irrespective of whether or not all its beliefs are true. A religion can be regarded as beneficial without it being necessary to assume that all its beliefs are true, and a religious service can be regarded as beneficial to all those who attend it without it being necessary to determine the spiritual efficacy of that service or to accept any particular belief about it. Admittedly, public benefit in the present case can only be established if the court is entitled to accept and act on the beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church. This would, in my view, now be something new. In Cocks v. Manners (3) there was a gift to a community which belonged to a contemplative order of the Roman Catholic Church and in that case that gift was held not to be a charitable gift because it lacked the necessary element of public benefit. The only difference between that case and the present case is that in that case there was no evidence of the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church about the efficacy of intercessory prayer or of the special place which these orders occupy in that church; but I find it difficult to believe that these matters were wholly unknown not only to WICKENS, V.-C., who decided that case but also to the numerous judges of great eminence, both English and Irish, who have referred to that decision with approval and without even suggesting that it may have been decided without all the relevant facts being before the court. I think that it is also noteworthy that, with one exception, the Irish courts have not, since the decision of O'Hanlon v. Logue (7), taken the view that Cocks v. Manners (3) should no longer be followed in Ireland. In Charities Comrs. v. M'Cartan (16) a gift to establish a monastery was held not to be charitable. O'CONNOR, M.R., said ([1917] 1 I.R. 396):

A " . . . monasteries of men and women are often, if not mostly, institutions the members of which devote their lives exclusively to acts of piety such as pious meditation, prayer and self-denial. Such institutions, however praiseworthy, are not charitable in the sense recognised by this court."

B In Munster and Leinster Bank v. A.-G. (9), to which I shall return in another connection, BLACK, J., recognised Cocks v. Manners (3) as good law. In Re Keogh (11) gifts for the purposes of Discalced Carmelite Orders were held not to be charitable. The one exception is Maguire v. A.-G. (10), where GAVAN DUFFY, J., held that a gift to found a convent for the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament was charitable. He said ([1943] I.R. 250):

C "To rescue the gift here from the post-Elizabethan morass and place it upon firm ground, I am driven back to the earlier position, before proscriptive legislation had for the time being blocked the steady flow of the common law."

D Having expressed the opinion (ibid., 254) that O'Hanlon v. Logue (8) was decided on the "dual grounds that the gift was charitable at common law and that it imported the element of public benefit necessary to bring a gift within the Statute of Pious Uses," he said: "I rest my judgment upon the common law." Accordingly, this case is not an authority which helps the main argument of counsel for the prioress on public benefit. For the reasons which I have given, I do not think that this argument can succeed.

E Before passing to the second argument, I should notice Re Caus (6). In that case LUXMOORE, J., held, following O'Hanlon v. Logue (8), that a bequest for private masses was a good charitable gift. There are grounds on which it can be argued that such a gift is charitable which do not apply to the present case. I express no opinion whether this decision can be supported on these grounds. But, in my view, it cannot be supported on the ground that a court is entitled to accept the beliefs of Roman Catholics or the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church regarding the mass as sufficient to establish the necessary element of public benefit.

F The second argument of counsel for the prioress is founded on Cardinal Griffin's affidavit in which it is stated:

G "It is an undoubted fact that the practice of the religious life by the Carmelite nuns and other religious bodies is a source of great edification to other Catholics—and, indeed, in innumerable cases to non-Catholics—leading them to a higher estimation of spiritual things and to a greater striving after their own spiritual perfection and that the knowledge that there are men and women who are prepared to sacrifice all that the worldly in man holds dear in order to attain a greater love of God and union with Him inculcates in them a greater estimation of the value and importance of the things which are eternal than they would have if they had not these examples before them."

H This argument must be considered on the footing that it has already been decided that the necessary element of public benefit cannot be directly established under the first argument—otherwise the prioress would succeed without this argument. Counsel for the prioress relies on a passage in the judgment of WICKENS, V.-C. (L.R. 12 Eq. 585) in Cocks v. Manners (3):

“ It is said, in some of the cases, that religious purposes are charitable, but that can only be true as to religious services tending directly or indirectly towards the instruction or the edification of the public . . . ”

He says that it is proved by evidence that the public or, at least, a sufficient section of the public are edified. I doubt whether WICKENS, V.-C., meant to use the word edification in this sense. But, whether he did or not, there must be some limit to the kind of indirect instruction or edification which will constitute a public benefit. It is hard to imagine any form of religious activity by an organised religious body which does not have some effect of this kind, and, if the words were applied literally, the requirement of public benefit would virtually disappear. Counsel for the prioress admitted that it must be a question of degree whether or not in any case the public benefit is too remote. In this case I think it is too remote. Moreover, I do not think that, when a decision has stood for three-quarters of a century as Cocks v. Manners (3) has, it ought to be reversed on a question of degree of this kind. No broad principle is here involved. I agree with the view of BLACK, J. ([1940] I.R. 31) in Munster and Leinster Bank v. A.-G. (9) that “ . . . unless a further and sweeping inroad is to be made on the rule against perpetuities, the line must be drawn somewhere. Cocks v. Manners (3) has drawn it.”

The third argument submitted by counsel for the prioress is of a different character. It was not submitted to the Court of Appeal. It is that the existence of this community enables some twenty women to practice religion in a way which would otherwise be impossible for them, and that, if the law recognises the practice of religion as beneficial, it must regard any gift to enable religion to be practised more fully as a gift for a beneficial purpose. On this argument the necessary element of public benefit is found in the fact that the twenty persons benefited are not drawn from any limited class, but from the whole body of Roman Catholic women who have a vocation for a contemplative life. I am prepared to assume that, if the law can regard the purposes of this community as beneficial, the necessary element of public benefit could be so found. But this argument, like the last, can only be reached after the prioress has failed on the first argument and it has, therefore, been decided that the law is disabled from recognising any public benefit resulting from the existence of the community. Counsel for the prioress, when asked, was unable to cite any authority to the effect that it can be a valid charitable purpose to assist persons to do something which cannot be shown to have any public utility. In the absence of authority, I can see no reason why this should be regarded as a valid charitable purpose, and, therefore, I think that this argument fails. Accordingly, I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. The trust fund to be applied in the first place in payment of the costs of the respondent trustees, and, in the second place, in payment of the costs of the other respondents. No other order as to costs.

Income Tax—Settlement—“Power to revoke or otherwise determine settlement”—Power not found in terms of settlement—Settlement of dividends from shares in company controlled by settlor—Power of settlor to prevent declaration of dividend or to wind-up company—Finance Act, 1938 (c. 46), s. 38 (1) (a).

The Finance Act, 1938, s. 38 (1), provides: “If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that—(a) any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future, and whether with or without the consent of any other person, to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof and, in the event of the exercise of the power, the settlor . . . will or may cease to be liable to make any annual payments payable by virtue or in consequence of any provision of the settlement . . . any sums payable by the settlor . . . by virtue or in consequence of that provision of the settlement in any year of assessment shall be treated as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person. . .”

The capital of a private investment holding company consisted of 1,000 shares of £1 each of which the taxpayer held 700, his two brothers 100 each, and his father's trustees (of whom the taxpayer was one) the remaining 100. Each share carried a vote. To make provision for their sisters, the taxpayer and his brothers entered into a deed of covenant under which they each covenanted to pay to trustees for the benefit of the sisters such sum each year as, after the deduction of income tax, left a sum equal to the net amount of all dividends received by them during the previous twelve months on the ordinary shares of the company. The Crown contended that since the taxpayer, as the holder of seven-tenths of the shares of the company, was in a position to prevent any dividends being declared during the whole period for which his covenant was operative, and, furthermore, since by procuring the co-operation, or abstention from voting, of another shareholder holding a sufficient number of votes, he could secure the passing of a special resolution for winding-up the company, the taxpayer had (either by himself or with another person) power to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or a provision thereof within s. 38 (1) (a).

HELD: the power referred to in s. 38 (1) (a) must be found in the terms of the settlement and not aliunde, and, as there was no such power conferred by the deed of covenant, the annual payments made thereunder should not be treated as income of the taxpayer.

MacAndrew v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1943) (25 Tax Cas. 500) criticised by LORD NORMAND and distinguished by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON.

G

PER LORD NORMAND and LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: The ability of the taxpayer to prevent the declaration of dividends during the relevant period or to secure the winding-up of the company did not constitute a power in him “to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof.”

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of the Court of Appeal, reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 725, affirming an order of ATKINSON, J., dated June 6, 1947, and reported [1947] 2 All E.R. 150.

ATKINSON, J., reversed a decision of the Special Commissioners that certain payments made by the taxpayer under a deed of covenant must be treated as his income for the purpose of assessment to sur-tax. The Court of Appeal (TUCKER and SOMERVELL, L.JJ., COHEN, L.J., dissentiente) affirmed that decision. The House of Lords now dismissed the Crown's appeal from the order of the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Sir Frank Soskice, K.C., S.-G., J. H. Stamp and R. P. Hills for the Crown (appellants).

Sir Roland Burrows, K.C., and Graham-Dixon for the taxpayer (respondent).

The House took time for consideration.

April 8. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, this appeal raises a question on s. 38 (1) of the Finance Act, 1938, on which there has been a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal. The facts which are fully stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts are very simple. The respondent, Isaac Wolfson, was at all material times the holder of 700 ordinary shares of £1 each in a company called Leonard Gordon Estates, Ltd., which had been used by him and his brothers as a private investment holding company. The capital of the company was £1,000, and the remaining 300 shares were held as to 100 by his brother Charles Wolfson, as to 100 by his brother Samuel William Wolfson and as to the remaining 100 by the trustees (of whom the respondent was one) of a settlement known as Solomon Wolfson's settlement. Being minded to make provision for his sisters, on Mar. 26, 1940, the respondent entered into a deed of covenant of that date to which he and his brothers, who were therein called "the settlors," were parties of the one part, and one Henry Arthur Chetham, and the respondent, as trustees, were parties of the other part. By this deed, each settlor irrevocably covenanted with the trustees that he would, on Apr. 1 in each year, during the period of seven years from Apr. 1, 1940, or until his death (whichever period should be the shorter), pay to the trustees an annual sum calculated according to the provisions contained in cl. 2 thereof, such annual sum to be held by the trustees on the trusts and subject to the powers therein declared and contained. The method of calculation was as follows :

"Each annual sum hereinbefore covenanted to be paid by each settlor shall (subject to the proviso hereinafter in this clause contained) be such an annual sum as after deduction of tax at the standard rate for the time being in force leaves a sum equal in amount to the net amount in the aggregate of all dividends received by him during the previous twelve months expiring on the said Apr. 1 in each year upon the ordinary shares of Leonard Gordon Estates, Ltd., held by him as set out in sched. I hereto."

There followed a proviso dealing with the event of the settlor selling or otherwise disposing for value of his shares but not with the event of his disposing of them gratuitously, and a further clause provided for the re-investment of the proceeds of sale or disposal for value of such shares. The deed also contained trusts for the benefit of the settlors' sisters, who are therein described as the beneficiaries, or their children or next of kin.

Your Lordships will not be troubled with any details of figures in this case. It is sufficient to say that it is conceded for the purposes of this appeal that a net sum of £14,612 10s. 0d. was received by the trustees in discharge of the respondent's liability under the deed for the year ending Apr. 5, 1940. The claim of the respondent was limited to the deduction from his income for income tax purposes of the gross sum representing this sum of £14,612 10s. 0d., and there is no question but that he is entitled to deduct such a sum unless the provisions of s. 38 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1938, are operative in regard to it. The Special Commissioners, conceiving that they were bound by the decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., in MacAndrew v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), held that the deduction was not permissible, but their decision was reversed by ATKINSON, J., A whose judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal (TUCKER and SOMERVELL, L.JJ., COHEN, L.J., dissentiente).

Section 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, is, so far as material, as follows :

“(1) If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that—(a)
 any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future,
 B and whether with or without the consent of any other person, to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof and, in the event of the exercise of the power, the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor will or may cease to be liable to make any annual payments payable by virtue or in consequence of any provision of the settlement; ...
 C any sums payable by the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor by virtue or in consequence of that provision of the settlement in any year of assessment shall be treated as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person : Provided that, where any such power as is referred to in para. (a) of this subsection cannot be exercised within the period of six years from the time when the first of the annual payments so referred to becomes payable, and the like annual payments are payable D in each year throughout that period, the said para. (a) shall not apply so long as the said power cannot be exercised.”

It is contended on behalf of the Crown that the sums received by the respondent during the relevant year of assessment and accounted for to the trustees of the deed must be treated as his income under s. 38 (1) (a), because the terms of the deed were such that he (either by himself or with others or with the E consent of others) had power to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or a provision thereof and thereby would or might cease to be liable to make the annual payment payable under the deed. It is common ground that the “settlement” consists of the deed of Mar. 26, 1940, alone. It is, therefore, the terms of that deed alone that have to be considered. In support of their contention it was said by learned counsel for the Crown that the settlor, as the
 F holder of seven-tenths of the shares of Leonard Gordon Estates, Ltd. (which I will call “the company”), was in a position to determine how much of the profits of the company should be distributed in any year by way of dividend. He might, if he thought fit, by the exercise of his majority vote prevent any dividend being declared during the whole period for which his covenant was operative. Thus, it was said, he could determine the settlement or a provision
 G thereof. It was further urged that, as the holder of seven-tenths of the shares, he could, by procuring the co-operation, or, indeed, the abstention, of another shareholder holding a sufficient number of votes, secure the passing of a special resolution for winding-up the company. This, too, it was said, was a power to determine the settlement or a provision thereof.

My Lords, the main part of the argument has revolved round the simple H words : “If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that...” On the one hand, it is said that it is only in the terms of this settlement that one may look for the power which the sub-section describes—that the words bear the same meaning as the words : “If and so long as the terms of the settlement provide.” On the other hand, it is said that they have a meaning, which, to do justice to the argument of the learned SOLICITOR-GENERAL, I will state in his own words. This was his formula : “If the settlement is so framed that its immediate impact on the circumstances in relation to which it was executed produces the result that some persons, whether settlors or others, get the power, whether by the exercise of some independent right they already possess or however else, to revoke and thus finally cancel or otherwise bring to an end the continued happening of something for which the settlement provides."

My Lords, between these alternatives I must unhesitatingly adopt the former. I am not greatly influenced by the absurd results which flow from an adoption of the latter, though it would appear to cover every covenant that ever was entered into, since in this view the covenantee has power, by releasing the covenantor from his liability, to put an end to the settlement. I am chiefly influenced by the consideration that, if it had been intended that regard should be had to powers not to be found in the settlement and exercisable by persons not parties to or named in the settlement, nothing could have been easier than to say so. I agree with both TUCKER and SOMERVELL, L.JJ., and ATKINSON, J., in thinking that the language of sub-ss. (3) and (4) provide a valuable contrast to that employed in sub-s. (1). It was urged that the construction that I favour leaves an easy loophole through which the evasive taxpayer may find escape. That may be so, but I will repeat what has been said before. It is not the function of a court of law to give to words a strained and unnatural meaning because only thus will a taxing section apply to a transaction which, had the legislature thought of it, would have been covered by appropriate words. It is the duty of the court to give to the words of this sub-section their reasonable meaning, and I must decline on any ground of policy to give to them a meaning which, with all respect to the dissentient Lord Justice, I regard as little short of extravagant. It cannot even be urged that, unless this meaning is given to the sub-section, it can have no operation. On the contrary, given its natural meaning it will bring within the area of taxation a number of cases in which by a familiar device tax had formerly been avoided.

As I have already noted, in this case the "settlement" consists of the deed of covenant alone. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the cases in which, the settlement being held to consist of a number of documents and transactions, it was found that the power to revoke or determine was among the terms of the settlement. The question whether the court may look outside the terms of the settlement did not arise. Of such cases Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Payne (2) is an example. I would expressly reserve the question how far such decisions can be regarded as correct after the decision of this House in Chamberlain v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3). Nor do I think it necessary in this case to determine whether, if it could be regarded as a "term of the settlement" that the settlor had power to dictate whether any and what dividend should be declared, that would amount to a power to determine the settlement, nor yet whether, if it is such a term that the settlor can with the consent or co-operation of other shareholders wind-up the company, that would be such a power. These are questions which may have to be determined in other cases in which they are decisive. For the purposes of this appeal it is sufficient to say, affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal, that the terms of the deed of Mar. 26, 1940, are not such that the respondent has power to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof. I move, accordingly, that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, I concur in the report of the Appellate Committee and in the motion which my noble and learned friend has proposed from the Woolsack.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, the relevant provisions of s. 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, are already before the House. So also are the material clauses of the deed of covenant. It is desirable to bring to notice at the outset that in this case the "settlement" and the deed of covenant are one, and that it is not found, or maintained by the appellants, that Leonard Gordon Estates, Ltd., should be included in the "settlement" by virtue of the definition in s. 41 (4) (b).

The appellants' case depends on the contentions that in the inquiry whether "any person has or may have power . . . to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof" it is permissible to look outside the terms of the settlement for the "power" and for the "person" who may exercise it, and to treat as a revocation or determination of the settlement or of a provision thereof the frustration of the obligation to make the annual payment under cl. 1 which would result from the liquidation of the company, the dividends of which are the measure of the sums to be paid. These contentions do not hinge on the settlor's control of the company with or without the aid of his brothers. COHEN, L.J., in his dissenting judgment, concisely states the principle of the appellants' case thus ([1948] 1 All E.R. 730) :

"Wherever the annual payment is to be measured by, and conditional on, the payment of dividends by a company, it necessarily follows that some person or persons have or may have power to determine that liability since the company can be put into liquidation by the requisite majority of shareholders passing a special resolution under s. 225 of the Companies Act, 1929."

The appellants relied on the opening words of s. 38 (1) : "If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that", and contrasted them with the words "if the terms of [the settlement] provide", which are to be found in s. 21 (8) of the Finance Act, 1936. It is on this contrast that COHEN, L.J., founded his dissenting judgment, but with great respect I find the similarity of meaning between the two phrases more striking than the contrast of the words. There is, and here I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., an ambiguity in the opening words of sub-s. (1), and standing by themselves they are not insusceptible of the meaning for which the appellants contend, but a power to "revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof" points rather to a power to be found within the settlement than to a power to be found in external circumstances, and the contrast with the opening words of sub-s. (3) of the same section is, to my mind, more relevant and cogent than the contrast with the words in a section of the earlier Finance Act. The opening words of sub-s. (3) are : "If and so long as the settlor has an interest . . ." and they are obviously selected because it was intended, not that the "interest" should be limited to one created or provided by the settlement, but that it should include an "interest" independent of the terms of the settlement. As TUCKER, L.J., pointed out ([1948] 1 All E.R. 727), if the appellants' case is right there was no necessity for the words "and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that." Indeed, the appellants' case would be much stronger if these words were absent. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL conceded that the meaning for which he was contending would be correctly expressed if sub-s. (1) ran somewhat as follows : "If and so long as any person is or may be able so to act . . . as to revoke" etc. I would not make too much of his assent to this paraphrase, nevertheless the reference to the terms of the settlement in this sub-section and the omission of such a reference in sub-s. (3) are significant. I, therefore, agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal that the power and the person who may exercise it must be found within the settlement. On the second contention put forward by the appellants, it is, I think, not appropriate to describe as a revocation or a determination of the settlement or of one of its provisions the effect which the liquidation of the company could have in making abortive the obligation to pay annual sums under cl. 2 of the settlement.

In general, the appellants' argument overstrains the language of the sub-section, though it may at no point be plainly inconsistent with it. More than once it was urged that, unless the argument was accepted, the sub-section would be nugatory or easily evaded. That the sub-section will be nugatory

I see no reason to think, and I have little doubt that it was framed to deal with, and has successfully dealt with, settlements of a certain type which had come to the notice of the Inland Revenue. That it may be easily evaded is possible. That is a consideration which is irrelevant to its proper interpretation, and there is the practical answer that it may be easily amended, but that that is for Parliament, not the courts. Of the cases cited, I think that MacAndrew v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) alone may be consistent with the conclusion to which I have come. The report of this case is not satisfactory, but I assume what was stated by counsel in this appeal, that, according to the Crown's case, the deed of July 11, 1940, alone constituted the settlement. On that assumption MacAndrew's case (1) was on all fours with the present case and must be regarded as wrongly decided. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, I can express my views very briefly, as I am in agreement with the judgments of the majority in the Court of Appeal.

In my view, no settlement comes within s. 38 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1938, unless the power described in that sub-section is found in, and conferred by, the terms of the settlement. This seems to me to be the natural meaning of the words used. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL sought to rely on the difference in wording between the opening words : "If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that" and the phrase "if the terms of the settlement provide" which is to be found in s. 21 (8) of the Finance Act, 1936. It would, indeed, be a trap for the taxpayer if the legislature intended the scope of taxation to be extended by some subtle difference in meaning between "the terms of the settlement are such that" and "the terms of the settlement provide," and, for my part, I think that the two phrases have the same meaning. The view which I have expressed as to the construction of s. 38 (1) (a) is fatal to the Crown's contentions in this case, for it is plain that the deed of covenant of Mar. 26, 1940, does not come within the sub-section, so construed, and the Crown concedes that the only document to be considered in the present case is the deed of covenant. This concession distinguishes the present case from Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Payne (2) and MacAndrew v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) and it is unnecessary to consider whether either of those cases was rightly decided. As to the other questions raised in argument, I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., and ATKINSON, J., that, if the respondent were to use his majority shareholding to withhold the payment of a dividend by Leonard Gordon Estates, Ltd., in any year, he would not thereby "revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof." Every clause in the settlement would remain in full force, and the only result would be that the "annual sum" mentioned in cl. 2 would be nil in that year. I have not found it necessary to form a concluded view upon any other question. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD REID : My Lords, I think that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons which your Lordships have given. In particular, I would express my agreement with my noble and learned friend, LORD SIMONDS, that it is not the function of a court of law to give to words a strained and unnatural meaning because only thus will a taxing section apply to a transaction which, had the legislature thought of it, would have been covered by appropriate words.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re CRANSTOUN'S WILL TRUSTS. GIBBS v. THE HOME OF REST FOR HORSES AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), March 22, 1949.]

Legacy—Renunciation—Right to retract—Voluntary disclaimer owing to misunderstanding—Position not altered to anyone's detriment.

A By her will a testatrix, who died in 1929, gave her residuary estate to the Home of Rest for Horses. There was considerable difficulty in realising the estate and it was not known for some time whether there would be any surplus after the liabilities had been met. In 1935 the sole executor died intestate, leaving part of the estate unadministered, and in 1937 the Home, on being informed that it was entitled to a grant of letters of administration, renounced not only its right to take a grant but also all claims to the estate, not knowing that it could renounce the grant without renouncing the benefits given to it by the will, and that, if it took a grant, it would not be liable for the debts and liabilities of the testatrix beyond the assets of the estate. In January, 1948, administration of the estate being still incomplete, the secretary of the Home was given liberty to retract the renunciation of the grant, and letters of administration of the unadministered estate of the testatrix were granted to him as the nominee of the Home. The residuary estate now amounted to £4,000, and the question was whether, if there had been an effective renunciation by the Home of its right to the benefits under the will, it was entitled to retract that renunciation.

D HELD: assuming that the renunciation of 1937 was effective, it was a voluntary renunciation; no one had altered his position to his detriment in consequence of it; and, therefore, the Home was entitled to retract it.

F ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a beneficiary under the will of the testatrix had renounced its right to benefits under the will, and, if so, whether it was entitled to withdraw the renunciation.

By her will, dated Aug. 9, 1925, the testatrix, Pauline Emily Cranstoun, appointed Charles Edward Shirley Hardman and James Harry Edwards to be the executors and trustees thereof. After bequeathing pecuniary legacies to various named persons and charities, she devised, by cl. 5:

"... my freehold house and premises Hurst Hill House . . . unto my trustees in fee simple upon trust at their discretion to sell the same . . . and to pay the net proceeds of such sale unto the Home of Rest for Horses, Westcroft Stables, Cricklewood in the county of London and until the same . . . shall be sold to permit the said Home of Rest for Horses to have the use and occupation thereof."

By cl. 8 she gave her residuary estate to her trustees on the usual trusts for sale and conversion and directed them:

"... to pay my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts (including mortgage debts) and pecuniary legacies bequeathed by this my will or any codicil hereto and the estate duty legacy duty and every other duty payable in respect of my death in relation to the property passing under this my will and to pay the residue of the said moneys to the said Home of Rest for Horses to whom I bequeath the same . . .”

The testatrix died on Aug. 13, 1929, and her will was duly proved on Jan. 10, 1930, in the Principal Probate Registry by Hardman (the second executor, Edwards, having died in 1929). The premises known as Hurst Hill House were subject to a mortgage of £1,700 in favour of the trustees of the will of the father of the testatrix, Lord Cranstoun. The secretary of the Home of Rest for Horses informed Hardman that it could not undertake to run Hurst Hill House as a separate home of rest. In January, 1931, the property was sold for £1,000 and the trustees of Lord Cranstoun's will concurred in the conveyance to release the property from the mortgage. They directed payment of the purchase money to Hardman, the testatrix being entitled to the mortgage moneys under her father's will. The net proceeds of the sale were applied in the discharge of certain liabilities of the estate. The principal asset of the estate was the sum of £3,400, with interest thereon at $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., secured by Scottish bonds and dispositions in security on certain property in Scotland, known as the Benholm Estate. This sum was vested in the trustees of Lord Cranstoun's will, the testatrix being the beneficial owner thereof by virtue of the will of Lord Cranstoun, a power of appointment of his widow and a deed poll executed by the testatrix on Mar. 28, 1908. Correspondence took place between Hardman and the secretary of the Home with regard to the assets and liabilities of the testatrix's estate and whether there was likely to be any surplus from the residuary estate. On Jan. 26, 1931, Hardman wrote to the Home saying that it was difficult to estimate the exact benefit which the Home would receive under the will owing to the difficulty of realising the Scottish estate, but it was expected that there might be a residue of about £2,000. At a meeting of the committee of the Home on Jan. 28, 1931, it was agreed to renounce all claim to the estate. This decision was communicated to Hardman by a letter of Jan. 29, 1931, but, on Feb. 12, 1931, the secretary wrote again to Hardman informing him that he had discussed the matter again with certain members of the committee, it appeared that they had not fully appreciated the position in regard to the Benholm Estate, and they asked Hardman to disregard the letter of Jan. 29, 1931. In 1932 the secretary of the Home died, and his successor, Captain W. T. C. Joyce, was appointed on June 27, 1932. Hardman died intestate on June 9, 1935, leaving part of the estate of the testatrix unadministered. On July 13, 1936, the solicitors acting for the administrator of Hardman's estate wrote to Captain Joyce informing him that the administration of the estate had not been completed and that the position was complicated by the fact that the Benholm Estate could not be sold and certain pecuniary legacies had not been paid. They said that it was necessary for someone to obtain a grant de bonis non and that the Home was the person first entitled to the grant, but that, if the Home were appointed administrator, it would be responsible for the winding-up of her affairs. On July 21, 1936, Captain Joyce wrote to the solicitors saying that in view of the resolution of Jan. 28, 1931, he had been instructed by the committee not to proceed with the matter. It appeared that Captain Joyce and the chairman were unaware of the letter of Feb. 12, 1931, and of certain subsequent correspondence and of resolutions passed at committee meetings of the Home later in 1931. Later, the solicitors wrote to Captain Joyce asking for the names of the trustees of the Home who would renounce the right of the Home to take a grant. They added that the estate was still in a state of confusion, but that, if the Scottish property could be realised, they considered that there would be sufficient funds to pay everyone. At a meeting of the committee of the Home on Oct. 14, 1936, it was unanimously agreed to renounce all claims to the estate. On Jan. 23, 1937, Captain Joyce signed a formal renunciation to that effect. It appeared that no officer of the Home or member of the committee was ever advised that it was competent for the Home to renounce the grant of letters of administration without also renouncing the benefits given to it by the will, or that, if the Home took a grant, it would not be liable for the debts and liabilities of the testatrix beyond the assets of her estate. On Mar. 11, 1937, letters of administration with the will annexed of the testatrix's unadministered estate were granted to Eileen Russell, a legatee. She died in 1945, leaving part of the testatrix's estate still unadministered. On Jan. 15, 1945, the plaintiff, Hugh Edward Gibbs, became secretary of the Home. By an order made by Mr. Registrar Forbes on Jan. 22, 1948, the plaintiff was given liberty to retract the renunciation of Jan. 23, 1937. On Apr. 10, 1948, letters of administration with the will annexed of the unadministered estate of the testatrix were granted out of the Principal Probate Registry to the plaintiff as the secretary and duly appointed nominee of the Home. By reason of his successful administration of the estate and the sale of the Scottish property, the residue of the estate now amounted to a sum of £4,000. The question raised by the summons was whether the Home had renounced its right to the benefits under the will of the testatrix, and, if it had, whether it was entitled to retract that renunciation.

D ROMER, J. [after stating the facts]: The question which I have to determine is what, in the events which have happened, is the effect on the rights of the Home to the benefits given it under the will of the testatrix. It is clear that the chairman and the secretary of the Home thoroughly misunderstood the position. They were frightened of assuming the responsibilities of meeting the testatrix's liabilities, and they were under a wrong impression as to the mortgages on the two properties. They were in a state of considerable confusion as to what would happen if they accepted the inheritance. Counsel for the Home has argued that there never was an effective renunciation, but only informal indications as to its intention. His main argument, however, was that, assuming that there was a renunciation by the Home—inasmuch as it was purely voluntary and one in respect of which the Home received no consideration and on account of which no one had changed his position—then it was open to the Home at any time to retract the renunciation and to re-assert its position under the will. Inasmuch as, in my view of the matter, counsel for the Home is right on that point, I do not find it necessary to come to any concluded view whether or not the correspondence did or did not amount to an effective renunciation.

G I am willing to assume that there was a renunciation in 1931 and 1937 by the Home. What, then, is the position of a person who renounces a legacy and then thinks better of it on the hypothesis that no one has taken any steps to alter his position in consequence of that renunciation? In the absence of any authority I should have thought that it was open to anyone at any time to change his mind, when no one has acted to his hurt on the faith of the renunciation, and in the absence of authority that is the conclusion at which H I would have arrived myself, but I have been referred to Re Young (1), a decision of SWINFEN EADY, J., which deals with the point which I have to decide. Counsel for those entitled in the event of an intestacy says that the point was not actually decided in that case, and that the matter is still open for decision. It is probably strictly true that the learned judge's observations on this point were obiter, but I have the view of SWINFEN EADY, J., that, if a renunciation is not acted on, it may be withdrawn. The only other case to which I have been referred is Doe d. Smyth v. Smyth (2). From the scanty material available on this principle of renunciation, it seems that it was introduced for the benefit of beneficiaries, so that a beneficiary should not be obliged to take what might be an onerous burden, but a natural corollary of the principle is that, if anyone acted on the faith of his renunciation and altered his position to his detriment in consequence thereof, the beneficiary would not be allowed to retract his renunciation. Where, as here, no one has altered his position, I cannot see why the claim to retract should not prevail.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate.

CAMINER AND ANOTHER v. NORTHERN AND LONDON INVESTMENT TRUST, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), March 3, 4, April 12, 1949.]

Negligence—Nuisance—Tree—Elm tree adjoining road—Fall on passing car—Fall due to disease—Liability of occupier of land.

The defendants were lessees of a block of flats which they occupied by their tenants. In the forecourt of the flats was a row of elm trees. On Apr. 7, 1947, the plaintiffs were driving past the flats when one of the trees fell on their car, wrecking it and injuring both the plaintiffs. The fall was proved to have been due to a disease of the roots, which was of long standing, but the disease had not taken a normal course and there was no indication from the condition of the tree above ground that it was affected by the disease. The tree, which was about 130 years old, carried a considerable crown and had not been trimmed or topped for many years. Evidence was given that elm trees should be inspected every five to seven years, and, if this tree had been topped, it was unlikely that it would have fallen when it did, but it did not appear to be dangerous to any of the witnesses who were called. On Mar. 1, 1947, the defendants had engaged a timber haulage contractor to top this and other trees for the purpose of tidying up the premises, but he had not reached the tree in question when the accident occurred.

Held: the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the defendants, as ordinary, careful laymen and not as experts, knew, or ought to have known, that the tree was dangerous, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable.

Decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1101), reversed.

APPEAL by the defendants from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated Nov. 26, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 1101.

The first plaintiff and his wife, the second plaintiff, were injured by the fall of an elm tree standing on property occupied by the defendants, and claimed damages from the defendants for negligence, and, alternatively, nuisance. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that it was the duty of all owners of property to manage it in accordance with the principles of good estate management, so that their property might not be in a condition likely to cause damage* to persons lawfully using highways in the immediate vicinity; as good estate management involved the inspection and trimming of trees from time to time, there was a duty on landowners to carry out those operations; and, therefore, the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgments of TUCKER and SINGLETON, L.JJ.

Fox-Andrews, K.C., and Rees-Davies for the plaintiffs.

Marven Everett for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 12. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., awarding damages to the plaintiffs for personal injuries suffered by them as a result of the fall of an elm tree which was growing in the fore-court of a block of flats, known as St. James's Close, at the corner of Prince Albert Road and Wells Rise in St. John's Wood, London, of which the defendants were lessees and in occupation by their tenants. The defendants became lessees in 1940, but in June, 1941, the premises were requisitioned by the Air Ministry who remained in occupation until April, 1946, when the premises were returned to the defendants. On Apr. 7, 1947, the elm tree fell on the plaintiffs as they were motoring along Prince Albert Road past this block of flats.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., found the following facts. The day was fine, there was nothing exceptional about the wind, but it was blowing in strong squally gusts from time to time. The tree was a large, well-grown elm, between 120 and 130 years old. After it fell it was found that three of its roots were badly affected by a disease known as elm butt rot. The other three roots showed signs of rot, but were not so badly affected. The disease was of long standing and must have been present in the roots long before the defendants took possession of the property. The roots had not been cut before the tree fell. There was no indication from the condition of the tree above ground that it was affected by this disease which had not taken a normal course. The fungus was working out sideways along the main roots and had not affected the trunk. There was nothing to indicate that the tree was in any way diseased. It carried a considerable crown—some 35 ft. in extent. It had not been trimmed or lopped for a great many years—indeed it was doubtful if it had ever been so treated. LORD GODDARD, C.J., found that the fall was due to a combination of circumstances, namely, the action of the wind on a tree bearing a large crown, the roots of which had rotted to a greater or less extent. He added ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1103) :

“Had it not been for the condition of the roots, it is probable that the wind was not heavy enough on the day in question to cause the tree to fall. On the other hand, had the tree not been bearing the amount of topshamper that it, in fact, was, and if it had been topped or pollarded, there is no reason to suppose that the tree would have fallen when it did, and it might have stood for a very considerable time.”

Save in one respect, viz., the size of the crown, none of the above findings of fact was challenged before us. The finding with regard to the crown was, however, strongly criticised. It was said that it was based entirely on the evidence of a witness named Dunk on his being re-called. It was pointed out that the Lord Chief Justice had, apparently, rejected the evidence of this witness on an important issue in the case, namely, whether or not the roots had been cut before the fall, and that Dunk, who was the garden superintendent of the St. Marylebone Borough Council, had never made any adverse report on this tree although it was part of his duty to inspect the trees in the neighbourhood for the purpose of causing the removal of branches overhanging the roadway lower than seven ft. from the ground, and he agreed that he would report any tree which he regarded as a potential danger. Furthermore, when first called he had been asked no question as to the size of the crown. No other witness who had seen the tree growing said that the crown was large or considerable, and the suggested extent of 35 ft. was only put in cross-examination to one witness, viz., Mr. Prosser, who had a good view of the tree from his flat every day. He did not agree and said there was no evidence of the tree being top heavy. If the judgment had been based on the ground that the crown of the tree was of abnormal size so as to make it apparent to a layman that it was a potential danger, I should have been of opinion that the evidence was not sufficient to justify such a finding. A study of the judgment, however, satisfies me that it was not based on this finding. The Lord Chief Justice does not say it was abnormal, merely that it was large or considerable, which I take to mean no more than that it was the kind of crown which an elm tree of this age which had never been lopped might be expected to carry. The real ground of the decision is, I think, to be found in the following passage in the judgment. LORD GODDARD, C.J., says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1103):

" . . . it is the duty of all owners of property to manage it in accordance with the principles of good estate management so that their property may not be in a condition likely to cause damage to persons lawfully using highways in the immediate vicinity, and, if good estate management involves the inspection and trimming of trees from time to time, there is a duty on landowners to carry out those operations. Mr. Le Sueur, who was called by the defendants, and who gave his evidence with a frankness which was most refreshing, said that elm trees should be inspected every five or seven years, and that if this tree had been lopped it is very unlikely that it would have fallen when it did. If, therefore, principles of good estate management require periodical inspection and cutting, it is not open to an occupier of property who maintains on his land trees which immediately adjoin or are very close to a highway to say: 'Well, I did not know that I ought to have done it'."

Later he said (ibid., 1104), after referring to Brown v. Harrison (1):

"That, however, was a case where a dead tree fell, and it is true that in that case the judge found that it was apparent to the owner that the top boughs were dead and, therefore, likely to blow down. In this case the evidence satisfies me that it is a reasonable and proper precaution for the occupier of property on which there are elm trees bordering or near to the road to top or pollard them as an ordinary incident of good estate management. I may say that this was the opinion of SINGLETON, J., in Cunliffe v. Bankes (2). The learned judge in that case concluded his judgment by saying ([1945] 1 All E.R. 465): 'Those who have property of this kind have to realise there is a duty to the public.' He emphasised that the duty was there, though in that case he held that the owner had adequately performed the duty by periodical inspection. In this case, I think that the defendants did not realise their duty, and, though, with another object in view, namely, to get a tidy appearance, they had begun to do what good management required, unfortunately they had not done so in time."

There can be no doubt since the decision in Noble v. Harrison (3) that whether the claim is based on nuisance or negligence the plaintiff in such an action as the present must establish either that the defendant knew of the danger or that he ought to have known of it. "Ought to have known" cannot mean more than "would have known if he had taken the precaution which a reasonable landowner would take." There are many things the doing of which may be in accordance with good estate management, but the failure to perform which I venture to think may not amount to negligence. I doubt, therefore, whether it assists the solution of the problem to test it in the terms of good estate management, unless this means no more than doing that which a reasonable landowner would know was necessary for the protection of the public. In the present case the defendants did not know of the existence of the danger, and the only question is whether they omitted to take some step which a reasonable landowner would take and which, if taken, would have prevented the continuance of the danger. An elm, though notoriously a shallow rooted tree, has not yet been placed in the category of things which a man keeps on his property at his peril, and, though it may be wise and in accordance with good estate management to lop elms every five or seven years, I do not think the evidence in the present case established that elms 120 or 130 years old (which is less than half of the normal life of an elm) normally becomes dangerous after seven years without lopping so that it can be said that on proof of failure to lop for seven years a prima facie case of negligence is established which can only be rebutted if the defendant can show that he omitted to lop as a result of advice received after expert examination. I am, accordingly, of opinion that, once the presence of disease is eliminated as an element of which the defendants were or should have been aware, the plaintiffs, in order to succeed, must show there was something in the appearance of this tree which should have indicated to the defendants the probability of danger. In this I think they failed. No witness who had seen the tree when growing said it looked dangerous. Two of these witnesses—Chipping and Dunk—were men who had had many years' experience of trees. The evidence of Chipping is, I think, of great importance. He is a timber and haulage contractor who has been engaged in timber felling since 1915. He was actually engaged in lopping the trees on this property when the accident occurred. He saw nothing dangerous in the appearance of this tree. There is no indication in the judgment under appeal that the Lord Chief Justice took an adverse view of this witness. This evidence of an expert, if reliable, would seem to absolve the defendants, who are not experts, from negligence in failing to appreciate the existence of danger, and, furthermore, would appear to lead to the conclusion that, if they had sought advice from this expert, they would have remained in ignorance. They cannot be required to call in an expert with the high qualifications of Mr. Le Sueur, but, even if he had been consulted, although it is highly probable he would have advised lopping, I do not think it is by any means certain he would have condemned the tree as dangerous.

The real cause of this unfortunate accident was the presence of elm butt rot, which disease had taken an unusual course with the result that there was nothing to indicate its presence to a layman or an expert. Once the defendants are absolved from responsibility in this respect, I do not think the evidence is sufficient to establish that their conduct in this matter fell short of the standard to be expected from a reasonable landowner of property adjoining a public highway. For these reasons, I would allow this appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J. : After much hesitation in what seems to be a difficult and delicately balanced case, I have come to the same conclusion as my Lord, for the reasons given by him, and I desire to add nothing.

SINGLETON, L.J. : The claim of the plaintiffs was laid in negligence, or, alternatively, in nuisance. An occupier of property owes a duty to his neighbours and to users of a highway alongside his premises. It is a duty to exercise that care which the circumstances demand—in other words, to act as a reasonably careful man would act. PROFESSOR WINFIELD in his TEXT BOOK ON THE LAW OF TORT, 4th ed., p. 453, in dealing with the law of nuisance in relation to projections over the highway, states the position thus :

"If damage is done owing to the collapse of the projection on the highway or by some other mischief traceable to it, the occupier of the premises on which it stood is liable if he knew of the defect or ought, on investigation, to have known of it. At any rate that is the rule with respect to a thing that is naturally on the premises, e.g., a tree."

He cites Noble v. Harrison (3), in which it was pointed out that a tree was not in itself a dangerous thing and that to grow trees was one of the natural uses of the soil. Neither the defendant in that case nor his servants knew that the bough which fell was dangerous—indeed, the fracture was due to a latent defect not discoverable by any reasonably careful inspection. It was held that a claim based on negligence failed, as also did a claim based on nuisance.

A tree may become dangerous as was the case in Brown v. Harrison (1). In that case the tree, which hung over the road, was in a state of decay and that could be seen by anyone. SOMERVELL, L.J., in the Court of Appeal (177 L.T. 282) approved of the statement of the law by STABLE, J., who had stated :

"Having regard in each particular case to the circumstances of that particular case, if there is a danger which is apparent, not only to the expert, but to the ordinary layman, which the ordinary layman can see with his own eyes, if he chooses to use them, and he fails to do so, with the result that injury is inflicted, as in this case, upon somebody passing along the high road, the owner is in those circumstances responsible, because in the management of his property he has not acted as a normal reasonable landowner would act. That, as I understand it, is the extent of the duty'."

SOMERVELL, L.J., added : "The danger, therefore, must be apparent to the ordinary layman." There may, of course, be cases in which the circumstances are such that the ordinary layman ought to foresee danger or risk and to take the precaution of calling in expert advice.

In the case now under appeal the elm which fell was about 130 years old. The character of the neighbourhood had altered considerably during its lifetime. The tree was at a corner of the defendants' property and was twelve ft. from one road and six ft. from the other road. It showed no sign of disease outwardly, but it had, in fact, a disease of the roots (elm butt rot) of long standing, a disease which follows an injury or wound though there was no sign of any injury on the tree itself and the Lord Chief Justice accepted the evidence of Mr. Le Sueur that there was no indication that the roots had been cut at any time. Mr. Chipping, who was called in on Mar. 1, 1947, to advise the defendants as to tidying up the garden in which the tree stood, noticed nothing abnormal about the tree—"nothing that would denote that it was rotten in any way." He advised lopping this and other trees as part of the general tidying up process, and he would have left about 25 ft. of the tree standing which meant taking off about 15 ft. He said there was nothing whatever to make him suspicious about the tree and that "it had not a large crown—an ordinary one." Mr. Chipping is a man of experience in regard to trees. He knew that elms fall more easily than other trees, probably because of their shallow rooting. He said that he had occasionally been asked to deal with elms because of risk to adjoining property. Mr. Chipping began the lopping of the trees on the defendants' property the week before Easter, and all had been done except two when the accident happened on Easter Monday. This elm would have been dealt with on the Tuesday had it not fallen. Mr. Chipping was leaving it until the last, not anticipating any danger whatsoever. The property was managed by Messrs. Hillier, Parker, May & Rowden, surveyors and property agents of great experience. Mr. Metcalf of that firm had been in charge. The building contractors who had been engaged almost continuously since the property was de-requisitioned were nearing the end of their work, and Mr. Metcalf came to the conclusion that the garden should be put in order—and that involved something being done to the trees, not from the point of view of safety but to let more light and sun into the garden. He was asked “As an

A ordinary layman, indeed, not as an ordinary layman, as managing agent, had you observed anything which called your attention to this tree?”, and he answered: “I had no reason to suppose that it required any special attention.”

Mr. Gabell, maintenance surveyor with the same firm, was called and gave the reason for the calling in of Mr. Chipping, which had nothing to do with safety. It may well be asked: “What more can be expected of those who

B are occupiers of property?” They had most experienced managing agents to look after the property; the agents called in Mr. Chipping who has been engaged in timber felling, etc., since 1915. The agents are accustomed to managing property; they saw no danger, nor did the man they called in—and one whose daily work is the felling of trees is probably as good a judge of the age of a tree and of the risks arising from falling trees as anyone.

C Mr. Atkins, a witness called on behalf of the plaintiffs, expressed the opinion that some of the roots of the tree had been severed at some time, but the Lord Chief Justice did not accept that view. The witness further said that an elm of this age “with a large crown” and in this position ought to have been lopped for reasons of safety. He added that elm trees, provided that they are not wounded, will go on for two, three, four hundred years, or, even up to five hundred years. He had not seen the tree, but went to the site on Jan. 2, 1948.

D Mr. Dunk, the garden superintendent of the St. Marylebone Borough Council, was another witness called on behalf of the plaintiffs. He also expressed the opinion that the roots of the tree had been cut many years previously. In cross-examination he was asked:

“Q.—In the course of your inspection and walking round, supposing
E you come across a tree which you regard as a potential danger to the public in any way, do you as a fact report it? A.—I do. Q.—Have you ever had any occasion to make any adverse report on this tree? A.—No.”

Mr. Dunk has held his position for 20 years. The tree was in his area and he saw it from time to time. During the period when the property was under

F requisition by the Air Ministry he had asked for some of the low branches overhanging the road to be cut back, but he had made no other suggestion.

The witness was recalled at a later stage and he said that the tree had a crown of about 35 ft. and “I should certainly say it was a large crown.” This was the nearest approach to evidence that the crown of the tree was unusual in any sense, and it must be taken in conjunction with the fact that the witness

G had not thought there was anything which called for a report. There was a considerable volume of evidence to the effect that there was nothing unusual about the tree. The defendants called as an expert witness Mr. Le Sueur, a consultant forester, who examined the remains of the tree and said he would not call it old for an elm but “more or less well into middle age.” He described the disease from which it suffered and which had taken an abnormal course,

H and he said he thought it was most unlikely that the disease would have been found even by boring. Mr. Le Sueur gave certain answers on which the plaintiffs’ counsel placed great reliance. He said that elms are untrustworthy and “you have more accidents with elms” and “they are more dangerous than any other species.” He was asked:

“Q.—In the case of an elm 130 years old, if it had a crown spreading, say, 35 ft. to 40 ft., standing close to the highway, it might well be advisable to have it inspected with a view to lopping? A.—I absolutely agree.”

The Lord Chief Justice asked :

"Q.—What did you agree to ? A.—That it should be inspected with a view to action being taken, or necessary action."

He gave his opinion on lopping and he was asked :

"Q.—It certainly ought to be inspected with a view to lopping before it is 100 years old ? A.—I quite agree. Q.—And if you inherit it . . . when it is 120 years old and it has not been lopped at all, common sense decrees that it should be inspected for that purpose ? A.—I could not argue against that."

He was asked by the Lord Chief Justice "Do you think you might have said if you went by : "Why on earth don't they have it lopped ?", and he answered : "Yes, I think so."

The Lord Chief Justice attached great importance to the evidence of Mr. Le Sueur, and it would seem that his judgment in favour of the plaintiffs is based very largely on some of the answers given by that gentleman. It is to be remembered that Mr. Le Sueur was an expert witness and was speaking as one having great knowledge of trees. In this respect he is not in the same category as the ordinary layman or as the reasonably careful occupier. Moreover, he was speaking after the event. He never saw the tree alive. The Lord Chief Justice formed the opinion that the defendants did not realise their duty. Yet they had Messrs. Hillier, Parker & Co. looking after the property for them, and one may think that property agents are not slow in calling in other expert advisers if they think it desirable to do so. Indeed, they did call in Mr. Chipping—not to advise on safety but as part of the tidying up scheme. Mr. Chipping saw no danger. If he had, he would not have left this tree until the last. If he had been consulted as to possible danger, it would not appear as though there would have been any change in his methods. In other words, that which happened was in no way due to any failure of the defendants to realise their duty. It was just sheer bad luck that this elm was caught by a gust of wind on Easter Monday. It would have been lopped (or topped) three days earlier except that it was Good Friday, and, in the ordinary course, it would have been dealt with on the Tuesday.

The evidence, taken as a whole, does not satisfy me that the defendants have failed in their duty or that they were negligent. It is not a case of the credibility of a witness or of witnesses. I find myself unable to agree with the conclusion at which the Lord Chief Justice arrived. If there had been evidence of apparent disease, or that the tree was unduly old, or that it had an unusually large top, the case would have been different. In the absence of any such evidence it seems to me that the Lord Chief Justice's judgment places an undue burden on the occupiers of property and goes far towards laying down the standard of the expert rather than that of the reasonably careful man who has elms in his garden or on his farm. I agree that the appeal should succeed.

KENNEWELL v. DYE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), March 17, 18, 1949.]

Option—Option to purchase freehold—Notice of exercise of option—Notice to grantor's personal representative.

By a tenancy agreement, dated Apr. 6, 1923, it was provided: "The landlord . . . lets to the tenant and the tenant . . . accepts [the property] from Apr. 6, 1923, at the yearly rental of £15 payable half-yearly commencing with the first payment of rent six months from the date of the commencement of the tenancy which will be arranged between the [landlord] and the [tenant]." There followed certain provisions with regard to the payment of rates and taxes, liability for repairs, assignment or underletting, and re-entry for non-payment of rent, and the agreement continued: "The said landlord . . . agrees to allow the tenant . . . the enjoyment of the said premises without any interference whatsoever as long as the said [tenant] pays his rent and keeps to the covenants in the agreement as hereby contained." The agreement was then signed and witnessed, but it proceeded: "It is further hereby agreed and declared that the said [landlord] will sell to the said [tenant] this property for the sum of £350, subject to the said [tenant] giving to the said [landlord] three months notice of his intention of so doing." The agreement was then again signed by both parties and witnessed. On June 24, 1947, the landlord died, and on Nov. 24, 1947, the tenant purported to exercise the option to purchase by notice to the landlord's personal representative. The court found as a fact that the option clause formed part of the tenancy agreement and was, therefore, supported by consideration.

HELD: the burden of the option clause devolved on the personal representative and notice to him was sufficient compliance with the requirements thereof.

Harwood & Bincks v. Hilliard, (1677) (2 Mod. Rep. 268), applied.

Case referred to:

(1) Harwood & Bincks v. Hilliard, (1677), 2 Mod. Rep. 268; 3 Keb. 848; Freem. K.B. 247; 24 Digest 619, 6493.

ACTION for specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of freehold land, or damages.

The action arose out of a memorandum of agreement by which the landlord granted a tenancy to the tenant, and, by way of an addendum, also an option to purchase the freehold, on notice being given to the landlord. The landlord having died, the tenant purported to exercise the option by notice to the landlord's legal personal representative. ROXBURGH, J., held the notice to be good, and ordered specific performance. The facts are set out in the head-note.

Jopling for the plaintiff, the tenant.

Vaughan, K.C., and N. F. M. Robinson for the defendant, the legal personal representative of the landlord.

ROXBURGH, J. [having stated the facts, and having decided that the whole tenancy agreement, including the option clause, was executed at one and the same time, and that the option clause was, therefore, supported by consideration, continued:—] it is said that this was an option which, on its true construction, was incapable of exercise after the death of the grantor of the option. I think I may take the statement of the law on this subject from WILLIAMS ON EXECUTORS, 12th edn., p. 1126:

"The executors or administrators so completely represent their testator or intestate, with respect to the liabilities above mentioned, that every bond, or covenant, or contract of the deceased (not being a contract personal to the deceased) includes them, though they are not named in the terms of it; for the executors or administrators of every person are implied in himself."

It does not, therefore, matter whether or not the words "executors or personal representatives" are expressly used, but, if they are used, cadit quaestio.

In my judgment, there are only two matters which would prevent the burden of this option from devolving on the personal representative of the grantor. One would be if, as a matter of construction of the document, I should hold that it was not intended so to devolve. I can find nothing in the document which would induce me so to hold. The other would be if the contract were personal to the deceased. I can see nothing in this case to make vicarious performance difficult on either side. The obligation on one side is to execute a conveyance, the obligation on the other side is to pay some money, and both of those transactions are readily capable of vicarious performance. Accordingly, I can see no ground for holding that the burden of this option did not devolve on the personal representative of the grantor.

It is said, however, that the notice has to be given to Mr. Dye, and that the giving of a notice to his personal representative is not the giving of a notice to him. In my judgment, that point is precluded by a very old case which counsel for the plaintiff cited to me, Harwood & Bincks v. Hilliard (1) (2 Mod. Rep. 268). In that case:

"By an agreement between the plaintiffs and the testator of the defendant, a parcel of lands was to be sold for £400; but if it did not arise to so much, then they covenanted with each other to repay proportionable to the abatement; and the defendant's testator covenanted for himself and his executors to pay his proportion to the plaintiffs, so as the plaintiffs gave him notice in writing of the said sale by the space of ten days; but doth not say that such notice was to be given to his executors or administrators. And now the plaintiffs averred, that they gave notice accordingly to the defendant who was executor; and the breach assigned was, that he hath not paid, etc. The defendant demands oyer of the indenture, wherein was a variance between the covenant (which was for notice to be given to the testator) and this declaration (by which notice is averred to be given to the executor); and for this reason he demurred . . . SIR FRANCIS NORTH, C.J., and ATKINS, J., upon the first opening this matter this term [which was the Michaelmas term in the 29th year of the reign of Charles II] inclined that the notice ought to be personal, and that the variance was material; but afterwards in Hilary term following, mutata opinione, the whole court agreed it to be otherwise, because the covenant runs in interest and charge, and so the executor is bound to pay; and therefore it is necessary that he should have notice."

In that case it was plain from the language of the covenant that the burden of it devolved on the executor of the testator. Therefore, that case is no authority on that aspect of my problem; but once I have decided on other grounds that the burden of the covenant does devolve on a personal representative, it appears to me that that authority shows plainly that in such a case the notice which the contract or covenant requires to be given to the deceased can be given, and should be given, to his personal representative. Accordingly, in my judgment, the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of the contract.

PYRAH v. DONCASTER CORPORATION.

Workmen's Compensation—"Accident"—Tuberculosis—Hospital nurse subjected to repeated attacks of tuberculosis germs—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 1 (1).

In 1938 the applicant was employed as a nurse in the employers' isolation hospital for tuberculosis patients. In October, 1944, the applicant was found to be suffering from tuberculosis, and the evidence showed that between February, 1943, and April, 1944, she was subjected to constant attacks of tuberculosis germs. The evidence further disclosed particular incidents in which she had been brought into unusually close contact with tubercular patients. The question for decision was whether the applicant's infection with tuberculosis was an "injury by accident" entitling her to compensation under s. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, or whether it was a disease due to a process of work.

HELD (BUCKNILL, L.J., dissentiente): although it might not be possible to fix the exact dates on which the applicant inhaled tuberculosis germs, on each occasion on which that occurred there was an assault of bacilli which constituted an "accident", and, therefore, the applicant was entitled to compensation.

APPEAL by the employers from an award made by His Honour JUDGE CAPORN, at Doncaster County Court, dated Sept. 10, 1947, whereby he awarded the applicant compensation in respect of total incapacity at 30s. a week from Nov. 1, 1944, by reason of an injury by accident occurring in the course of her employment. The learned judge had made his award before the opinion of the House of Lords was given in Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries Co., Ltd. (1), and the Court of Appeal adjourned the present case pending the House of Lords decision. The court now, by a majority, distinguished the present case from Roberts' case (1) and dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Beney, K.C., and E. Ould for the employers.

P. M. O'Connor for the applicant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 17. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from an award dated Sept. 10, 1947, made by His Honour JUDGE CAPORN in favour of Lorna Pyrah, the applicant, in proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Acts against the employers, the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of Doncaster. The award was in respect of total incapacity since Nov. 1, 1944. After the employers had lodged this appeal this court made an order standing the case out of the list to await the determination of the case of Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries Co., Ltd. (1), which was pending in the House of Lords and in which judgment has now been given.

The material facts in the present case are as follows. The applicant was a nurse in the employment of the employers' isolation hospital at Doncaster. She started work there in 1938 when she was 25 years of age. The patients were suffering from tuberculosis. Up to 1941 the practice was for a nurse to wear a mask and a gown when attending a patient, but the applicant said that this practice was discontinued when the resident medical superintendent left. In the sanatorium sputum cans were provided for each patient, and they were emptied each morning into a pail by nurses. In January, 1943, the hospital authority introduced a routine X-ray for nurses every six months. The applicant was examined in February, 1943, and was free of tuberculosis. There is no history of tuberculosis on either side of her family. Her evidence was that during the war the ventilation was impaired by the black-out conditions, and owing to the shortage of staff she did not get away for the usual two hours absence from the ward. There were very many acute cases of tuberculosis in the hospital in 1943. In January, 1944, she was relief night sister and was on duty throughout the night. In the fever ward, where the applicant also nursed and where the patients had tuberculosis, there were no sputum cans. In May, 1944, the applicant began to feel tired, had pains in her joints, and had to go off duty. She returned to duty for three weeks in July, and after a further absence in August and September—due to other causes—she returned to work in the hospital on Sept. 25. On Oct. 27, 1944, the routine X-ray disclosed tuberculosis in her left lung. This was treated, but she has been unable to do her work as a nurse since Nov. 1, 1944. I need not refer to the medical evidence called before the judge, except to say that the deputy medical officer for health, in charge of the hospital since 1941, said that nurses were told to use masks and that he had no knowledge of their not being used after 1941, but he had on occasions seen nurses not wearing masks. The judge said that he found that the applicant became infected by tuberculosis bacilli as a result of constant and repeated doses between February, 1943 and April, 1944, and probably within a few months before April, 1944, and made an award in the applicant's favour.

It was conceded by counsel for the employers that if Fitzsimons v. Ford Motor Co. (Aero Engines) (2) is an authority which this court ought to follow, this appeal must fail, but his argument was that Fitzsimons' case (2) cannot be so regarded because of the more recent decision of the House of Lords in Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries (1). An important question, therefore, in this appeal is whether the decision in Roberts' case (1) is inconsistent with the present award. The legal position in this kind of case is summed up in the following passage in LORD PORTER'S speech in Roberts' case (1) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 205):

"In truth, two types of case have not always been sufficiently differentiated. In the one type there is found a single accident followed by a resultant injury, as in Brintons, Ltd. v. Turvey (3), or a series of specific and ascertainable accidents followed by an injury which may be the consequence of any or all of them, as in Burrell (Charles) & Sons, Ltd. v. Selvaige (4). In either case it is immaterial that the time at which the accident occurred cannot be located. In the other type, there is a continuous process going on substantially from day to day, though not necessarily from minute to minute or even from hour to hour, which gradually and over a period of years produces incapacity. In the first of these types, the resulting incapacity is held to be injury by accident. In the second it is not. In the case of silicosis it is, of course, possible to divide up the cause of the final collapse and say that each particle of silica striking upon and adhering to the lung is a separate accident, but, however analytically maintainable, the attribution of the resultant silicosis to an accidental cause is an unreal one. The distinction between accident and disease has been insisted on throughout the authorities and is, I think, well-founded . . . I do not know, however, that any explicit formula can be adopted with safety. There must, nevertheless, come a time when the indefinite number of so-called accidents and the length of time over which they occur take away the element of accident and substitute that of process. In my opinion, disability from silicosis is one of such instances. It cannot be said to be the result of injury by accident."

The problem is to decide in which category the present case falls. It seems to me that the solution to this problem must turn partly on the answer to the question: Is this an injury by accident within the meaning of that word as defined by various decisions which are binding on us? It must also turn partly on the solution of a more technical question, namely, (a) whether as a matter of law the disease of tuberculosis contracted in this case is indistinguishable in principle from the disease in Fitzsimons' case (2), and (b) whether Fitzsimons' case (2) is still a valid authority which this court ought to follow.

First, was this an injury by "accident" as defined by the authorities binding us? LORD MACNAGHTEN in Fenton v. Thorley & Co., Ltd. (5) said ([1903] A.C. 448):

"... the expression 'accident' is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word as denoting an un-looked for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed."

This definition was qualified by the speech of LORD HALDANE, L.C., in Trim Joint District School Board of Management v. Kelly (6) where he said ([1914] A.C. 676:

"I think that the context shows that in using the word 'designed' LORD MACNAGHTEN was referring to designed by the sufferer."

In Kelly's case (6) it was held that murder might be an accident, because it was unexpected by the workman although carefully designed by the murderer. This definition includes one essential feature, namely, that it is an event or series of events of such a nature as does or do not normally occur in the course of the employment of the applicant. Applying that test to the present case, can it be said that it is to be expected that a nurse in a hospital where there are tuberculosis patients will herself develop tuberculosis? No such evidence has been given in this case, and it has not been suggested in argument. Provided proper appliances are used and proper safeguards taken, I think that such a suggestion would be untenable. However, no evidence was directed to this point, and the only inference one can draw from the use of masks by the nurses is that there is an obvious risk of infection if proper precautions are not taken. The arbitrator was presumably unable to infer from the evidence that the successful attack or attacks of the tuberculosis bacilli on the applicant's lung had been due to some particular incident, such as that to which she referred in her evidence, in January, 1944 (about three months before she began to feel pain and weariness). I think it would be impossible in the present case to attribute the onset of the disease to any particular incident and that the judge was right when he attributed it to the constant and repeated inhalations by the applicant of tuberculosis bacilli during the thirteen months between the first test and the time when she first began to feel ill.

The question then arises whether such inhalations can properly be said to constitute an accident. On the one hand it is argued that the case falls within the process category. That argument is, I think, best supported by quoting the passage in the speech of VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, L.C., in Fife Coal Co., Ltd. v. Young (7), which was relied on by LORD SIMONDS in Roberts' case (1). The passage in VISCOUNT CALDECOTE's speech is as follows ([1940] 2 All E.R. 88):

"The two cases, one of 'beat hand' and the other of 'beat knee,' which came before the Court of Appeal very shortly after the decision of your Lordships' House in Brintons, Ltd. v. Turvey (3)—namely, Marshall v. East Holywell Coal Co., Gorley v. Backworth Collieries (8)—followed a different line. They were each decided in favour of the employer on the grounds that the injury was the inevitable result of work long continued, and was not anything which could be described as having happened on a particular duty. Walker v. Hockney Bros. (9), the case of the man who gradually over a period of five years acquired paralysis by riding a carrier bicycle, was another decision in favour of the employer. There is no reason to doubt the correctness of the decisions in the three cases I have last mentioned. In all of them the facts were such as to make it impossible to identify any event which could, however loosely, be called an accident. In these cases, the workman failed, not because a disease is outside the purview of the Workmen's Compensation Act altogether, but because the burden of proof that there has been an accident was not discharged."

On the other hand it is argued that each inhalation of bacilli which, in fact, injured the lung of the applicant was an event which could be called an accident within the meaning given to that word in the decided cases. In Innes v. Kynoch (10) blood poisoning starting at an abrasion on the leg of the workman and caused by bacilli in artificial manure which was being handled by the workman was held to be an accident, and in Selvage v. Burrell (4) injury from a series of cuts made in the workman's hands which gradually became septic was also held to constitute an accident.

I think that ultimately it becomes very largely a question of fact whether it can be said in any particular case that individual events, however numerous they may be, which brought about the injury to the workman, may be said to be an accident. I cannot distinguish between injurious incursions into the body of living organisms, or chemical bodies such as particles of gas, or of mineral bodies such as minute fragments of silica dust. In each case they may do injury to the body, and the question in each case is whether the injury is done in such a way and over such a period of time as to describe it as a process, or whether it is done in such a way and over such a period of time as to describe it as an accident.

A A great deal was said in the course of the argument on the question whether the opinions of the House of Lords in Roberts' case (1) made the decision of the Court of Appeal in Fitzsimons' case (2) invalid. On this point it is necessary to consider carefully the facts in Fitzsimons' case (2). The applicant was employed by the respondents as a "rotary fettler," which required him to hold in his hand a machine which vibrated at the rate of 2,800 revolutions a minute. He held this machine in his left hand whilst with his right hand he pressed it against the material to be cut. After he had been working in this way for about a year the workman found his hand going dead, and the hand became useless after another six months. The medical evidence was that the workman's condition, known as Reynaud's disease, was caused by the vibrations of the machine, and that each vibration constituted a tiny blow to the workman's hand and arm which was transmitted to the nerves and injured them, and thereby interfered with the normal flow of blood to the hand. The application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts was dismissed by the arbitrator on the ground that to constitute an injury by accident within the Acts the workman must be "suddenly and decisively attacked at his work," and in effect that the gradual ruining of his blood vessels did not bring him within the Acts. This judgment was reversed in the Court of Appeal. SCOTT, L.J., in giving the judgment of the court in a reserved judgment said that the court thought it their duty to follow Selvage v. Burrell (4). Each vibration was an infinitesimal blow to the man's hand and arm, causing an infinitely small damage to their tissues. SCOTT, L.J., added this ([1946] 1 All E.R. 430):

D "Some men may have better powers of resistance to such attacks than others, but the mere fact that the breakdown does not occur until the cumulative effect of the tiny blows from the vibrations produces a certain degree of alteration in the nerves does not affect the character of the cause."

E Eighteen months after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Fitzsimons' case (2), Hughes v. Lancaster Steam Coal Collieries, Ltd. (11) came before the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, SOMERVELL and EVERSHED, L.JJ.). In that case the workman was employed in working a pneumatic drill. After he had been working it for some time, which is not specified in the report of the case, he noticed a lump in his groin which developed into a hernia and made an operation necessary, and he was away from work in consequence for a little over three months. The judge dismissed the man's claim for compensation on the ground that he had not proved that the use of the machine contributed to the onset of the hernia. In the Court of Appeal, TUCKER, L.J., in the course of his judgment allowing the appeal, said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 558):

G "Counsel for the employers has urged that . . . injury must be due to a series of accidents, each of which is specific and ascertainable. He has referred us to a number of authorities, some on one side of the line and some on the other, some cases dealing with the controversial question when and in what circumstances the contraction of some disease can be said to be due to an accident, and other cases where it has been held that a number of small accidents may cumulatively amount to an accident within the meaning of the statute."

H TUCKER, L.J., cited that part of the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., in Fitzsimons' case (2) which I have set out and said (ibid., 559):

"I think that all those observations are applicable to the evidence in the present case . . ."

Hughes v. Lancaster Steam Coal Collieries (11) was decided in the Court of Appeal in July, 1947, six months after Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries Co., Ltd. (1) had been decided in the Court of Appeal (SCOTT and MORTON, L.JJ., and myself). In Roberts' case the workman had been employed in the slate works of the same employers for some 20 years, and during that time was in frequent contact with slate dust and silica particles. He then became totally incapacitated from injury to his lungs through gradual inhalation of particles of silica. These caused minute injuries to the air passages and cells of the lungs, and gradually produced the disease known as silicosis. SCOTT, L.J., when giving judgment dismissing the workman's appeal, said that the case was concluded by the decision in Williams v. Guest, Keen & Nettlefolds (12). He said (176 L.T. 542):

"It may be that, on an appeal, the House of Lords will reconsider Williams v. Guest, Keen & Nettlefolds (12), or possibly the decision of this court in Fitzsimons v. Ford Motor Company (2). This court there decided a question which has some apparent similarity to that in Williams v. Guest, Keen & Nettlefolds (12) but not sufficient for us to regard it as leaving the latter decision open to criticism by this court. That being so, I take that decision as binding on this court at present. It completely covers this case. . ."

I venture to describe that passage as a discreet invitation to the House of Lords to express their disapproval of the decision in the Guest, Keen case (12), which was also a case of silicosis. The House of Lords, however, in Roberts' case (1) expressed their approval of the Guest, Keen decision (12), but said nothing about Fitzsimons' case (2).

Counsel for the employers informed this court that when he argued Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries (1) in the House of Lords he relied strongly on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Fitzsimons' case (2). The fact that their Lordships did not mention Fitzsimons' case (2) in their opinions leads me to the conclusion that they thought, not that Fitzsimons' case (2) was wrongly decided, but that it was a very difficult case which appeared to lie between the two categories of process or accident and that it was unnecessary for them to decide into which category it ought to fall. I, therefore, find it impossible to accede to the argument of counsel that the House of Lords decision in Roberts' case (1) impliedly overruled the decision in Fitzsimons' case (2). That being so, it seems to me that this court is free to hold that the constant inhalations of noxious bacilli into the applicant's lungs in this case was either an "accident" similar in principle to the blows from the electric machine in Fitzsimons' case (2), or the blows from the pneumatic drill in Hughes' case (11), or else a process similar to the injury done by the inhalations of silica dust as in Guest, Keen's case (12) and Roberts' case (1). I think that the answer is to be found in the comments by LORD CALDECOTE in Fife's case (7), which I have already set out. With genuine regret I must express my opinion that the disease of the applicant cannot properly be said to be the result of a series of ascertained or ascertainable accidents. I think it was the result of a gradual process of breathing air containing noxious bacilli, as in the silicosis case, and that there is no such evidence of accidental cuts or blows as would put the case in the category of accident. It is for the applicant to prove her case, and if the matter is left in doubt, then I think the inevitable result is that the applicant fails to establish her claim to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed, but COHEN and DENNING, L.JJ., think that the appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J. [after stating the facts]: The learned county court judge did not refer to any of the particular instances which I have mentioned. We were informed that this was because his attention was directed to the decision of this court in Fitzsimons v. Ford Motor Co., Ltd. (2), and he considered that the principle of that case bound him to decide the present case in favour of the applicant. In that case a workman was employed for some nineteen months continuously as a rotary fettler which involved his gripping tightly in the left hand a machine with movable parts which revolved at 2,800 revolutions a minute. The resulting vibrations gradually damaged the tissues and nerves of his hand until he became incapacitated. The learned county court judge dismissed his claim for compensation, holding that there had been no accident, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. SCOTT, L.J. said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 430) :

A “In our opinion he was wrong in so holding. Each vibration caused by the rapidly rotating instrument was, as it were, an infinitesimal blow to the man's hand and arm, transmitted to the nerves, causing an infinitely small damage to their tissues, and in the end cutting off the flow of blood needed to keep the hand in a healthy condition. Some men may have better powers of resistance to such attacks than others, but the mere fact that the breakdown does not occur until the cumulative effect of the tiny blows from the vibrations produces a certain degree of alteration in the nerves does not affect the character of the cause.”

B Counsel for the employers, while admitting that, if Fitzsimons' case (2) is still good law, it would be difficult for him to succeed in the present case, submitted that it had been in effect overruled in Roberts' case (1) and that the present case was indistinguishable in principle from Roberts' case (1). Counsel for the applicant pointed out that the House of Lords did not overrule Fitzsimons' case (2) despite an invitation by SCOTT, L.J., in the Court of Appeal (see 176 C L.T. 542) to do so, an invitation which the argument of counsel for the employer himself, when the case was before the House of Lords, necessarily endorsed. Counsel for the applicant submitted, therefore, that Fitzsimons' decision (2) still stood. He went on, however, to submit, and he really made this the main ground of his argument, that, whether Fitzsimons' (2) was good law or not, the present case was distinguishable on its facts from Fitzsimons' (2) and fell within D the principle of three decisions of the House of Lords, Brintons, Ltd. v. Turvey (3), Innes (or Grant) v. Kynoch (10) and Burrell & Sons Ltd. v. Selvaige (4). It will be convenient to consider this argument first.

E In Brintons' case (3) while the workman was employed sorting wool in a factory a bacillus (according to the medical evidence or theory) passed from the wool to the eye of the workman and infected him with anthrax of which he died. On the facts as found by the learned judge the germ did not enter through any abrasion or pimple, but alighted on the eye. The judge found in favour of the workman and the House of Lords (LORD ROBERTSON dissenting) affirmed his decision, holding that it was a case of injury by accident within the meaning of the Acts.

F In Innes' case (10) a workman employed in handling artificial manure, consisting mainly of bone dust, died from blood poisoning caused by his becoming infected through an abrasion on his leg by certain noxious bacilli which were present in large numbers in bone dust, but were also found in the air and in other substances, though in a much lesser degree. It did not appear when or how he received the abrasion and it was impossible to say with certainty when the infection occurred. The arbitrator found in favour of the workman and his decision was upheld in the House of Lords. LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., based his decision on the earlier decision in Brintons' case (3) saying ([1919] G A.C. 770, 772) :

H “In that case, therefore, the essentials of the composite phrase ‘injury by accident’ were satisfied. This decision may easily prove with the development of scientific discovery to be one of far-reaching importance. Had your Lordships been invited to reach this conclusion in the absence of authority, I should have given the most anxious attention to the many powerful arguments contained in the dissenting judgment of LORD ROBERTSON. But I am clearly of opinion that Brintons' case (3) does in fact govern the present case. The sequence of incident is a little difficult to describe in precise speech, because the courts have necessarily applied to infection by microscopically small organisms language which is more commonly used of, and therefore suggests, larger and more material forces; thus the invasion of the bacillus is conceived of as a blow or physical assault. And an interval is assumed (perhaps rightly) before the assault, which is the accident, is followed by the infection or contraction of disease, which is the injury. When Brintons' case (3) was decided the area conceded by contemporary science to idiopathic disease was much larger than is the case today. It follows that the area of disease which is now traced to infection by bacillus has correspondingly grown. The result is that the decision in Brintons (3) is likely to increase in range. But no apprehension founded upon these scientific observations can affect our duty to follow the decision when once we are agreed upon its scope. . . It is no doubt the fact that in Brintons' case (3) a particular time was found as being that at which the contract occurred. But all that is material is that the infection should have been the result of contact at some one particular time and that this one particular time should have been during the course of the employment. . . That it should be some particular occurrence happening at some particular time is essential, otherwise it is not in the nature of an accident. What that particular time was is immaterial so long as it reasonably appears that it was in the course of the employment."

In Burrell's case (4) the applicant, who was employed in cleaning shell adaptors for copper plating, in the course of her work scratched and cut her hands very frequently. Some of the scratches and cuts suppurated and caused septic poisoning, so that in April, 1918, she had to give up work and was quite incapacitated. It appeared that it was impossible to identify any particular scratch as having caused the injury, but there was no doubt that the injury was the result of the septic condition produced by the scratches. The House of Lords decided that she had suffered an injury by accident for which she was entitled to compensation, although the times and places of the several scratches or causes could not be fixed and her condition could not be attributed to one particular injury. LORD BUCKMASTER said (126 L.T. 50):

"The only question therefore for consideration is whether when the disease is due not to one specific and definite accident, but to a series of accidents, each one of which is specific and ascertainable although its actual influence on the resulting illness cannot be precisely fixed, the workman is disentitled to the benefit of the statute. I cannot find any words in the statute which permit of such a construction. In the present case personal injury was suffered, it was suffered by accident, and the injury is no less accidental because it occurred on a series of occasions instead of on one. It follows that the claim to compensation was properly established."

In all these cases it will be observed that the accident was due to the infection of the bacilli. In Burrell's case (4) the infection took place through scratches themselves incurred in the course of the employment, but in Brintons' case (3) there was nothing to show that the applicant had suffered any injury prior to the infection of the anthrax germ, and in Innes' case (10) there was nothing to show whether the scratch from which the germ was thought to have entered was incurred at work or not. Moreover, both in Innes' case (10) and Burrell's case (4) the infection was due to a number of accidents, and it was impossible to attribute it to any particular one of them. Counsel for the applicant submitted that the principle of the cases I have cited necessarily involved that the applicant was entitled to succeed. Counsel for the employers pointed out that there was no reported case where a workman had succeeded when the invasion of the bacilli took place through the normal habit of breathing. That is true, but equally there is no authority that the workman cannot succeed in such a case. Moreover, in Brintons' case (3) the germ found its way into the system without any external injury. I can see no reason in principle why there should be any difference between an invasion through the nostril and invasion through a cut incurred outside the course of the employment. It seems to me that the principle of the cases counsel for the applicant cited applies to the present case.

Counsel for the employers, however, submitted that we were debarred from so holding by the recent decision of the House of Lords in Roberts' case (1). He referred us in particular to the passage in the speech of LORD PORTER, which is as follows ([1948] 2 All E.R. 205, 206) :

- A "In truth, two types of case have not always been sufficiently differentiated. In the one type, there is found a single accident followed by a resultant injury, as in Brintons, Ltd. v. Turvey (3), or a series of specific and ascertainable accidents followed by an injury which may be the consequence of any or all of them, as in Burrell (Charles) & Sons, Ltd. v. Selva (4). In either case it is immaterial that the time at which the accident occurred cannot be located. In the other type, there is a continuous process going on substantially from day to day, though not necessarily from minute to minute or even from hour to hour, which gradually and over a period of years produces incapacity. In the first of these types, the resulting incapacity is held to be injury by accident. In the second it is not . . . I do not know, however, that any explicit formula can be adopted with safety. There must, nevertheless, come a time when the indefinite number of so-called accidents and the length of time over which they occur take away the element of accident and substitute that of process. In my opinion, disability from silicosis is one of such instances. It cannot be said to be the result of injury by accident."
- D In my opinion, the facts of this case as found place it in the first of the types specified by LORD PORTER, not the second. It seems to me that every time the applicant inhaled a tuberculosis germ, that was an assault of bacilli within the meaning of LORD BIRKENHEAD's speech in the Innes case (10), that that assault constituted an accident, and that these incidents did not occur over such a length of time or in such circumstances as to deprive them of the character of accident and substitute that of process. Counsel for the employers also
- E relied on a passage in LORD SIMONDS' speech in the same case where he said that he regarded Burrell's case (4) as the high-water mark and felt it impossible to say that the disease in Roberts' case (1) was due to a series of accidents each one of which was specific and ascertainable. I do not find myself embarrassed by LORD SIMONDS' words. It seems to me that, for the reasons I have given, every time the applicant inhaled a tuberculosis germ, an accident
- F occurred, and that, though it may not be possible to fix the exact dates on which these incidents occurred, yet, as it is quite plain that they all occurred in the course of her employment, and that the infection was due to one or more of them, she is entitled to succeed. For these reasons I think the appeal fails and I do not think it desirable on this appeal to go into the question of whether Fitzsimons' case (2) is good law as that point is more clearly raised in the second
- G case with which we have to deal, Roberts v. Penrhyn (13)*.

* ROBERTS v. PENRHYN (LORD).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), March 2, 17, 1949.]

Workmen's Compensation—Accident—Continuous process—Diseased hip caused by working pneumatic drill—Process extending over twenty years—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (c. 84), s. 1 (1).

- H APPEAL by the employer from an award dated Dec. 23, 1947, made by His Honour JUDGE EVANS, K.C., sitting at Bangor County Court, whereby he awarded compensation to the workman on the ground that he had suffered an "injury by accident" within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925.

The workman had been employed as a rock driller in the employer's quarries for over twenty years. This work involved the use of a drilling machine which constantly came forcibly into contact with the left side of the workman's hip. In 1943 or 1944 pain developed in the hip and shortly afterwards the workman became totally incapacitated by reason of an osteo-arthritic condition which was directly attributable

DENNING, L.J.: Many diseases cannot in their nature be due to accident, but some may be. These include the diseases produced or precipitated by trauma (that is, injury or shock), by exposure or exertion, by infection or contagion, or by contact with or invasion by foreign elements. If one of these diseases is due to an accident or series of accidents, it may form the subject of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, but if it is due to a process of work, and not to an accident or accidents, it will not form the subject of compensation unless it is one of the scheduled diseases. The present question is: Where is the line to be drawn between a disease which is due to an accident or accidents, and a disease which is due to a process of work. In my opinion, the solution to that question is to be found by remembering that an accident is something fortuitous, something which is unsought but happens by chance, something of which it can be predicated that, even if it is very likely to happen, and happen repeatedly, nevertheless it is still a chance that it does happen. Applying this test, if a disease can be attributed to one external factor only, whether that factor be trauma, exposure, exertion, or infection, or such like, then it is undoubtedly due to an accident, even though the precise occasion on which it occurred cannot be ascertained: see Brintons v. Turvey (3), Innes v. Kynock (10) and Fife Coal Co. v. Young (7); but if the disease is due to a number of external factors acting in combination, such as inhaling foreign particles over a long period, exposure to dust, or numerous cuts, then a distinction has to be drawn. On the one hand, the disease is due to a series of accidents if to the vibration caused by the use of the drill. The question was whether this condition was an "injury by accident" within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 17. The COURT OF APPEAL, in a considered judgment, held that the length of time over which the series of impacts occasioned by the vibration of the pneumatic drill occurred was such as to take away the element of accident and substitute that of process, so that the injury sustained by the workman was not an "injury by accident" within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1925 and the workman was not, therefore, entitled to compensation.

Per COHEN, L.J.: I should not hesitate to refuse to follow Fitzsimons v. Ford Motor Co., Ltd. (Aero Engines) (2), if I were satisfied that it could not be reconciled with the decision of the House of Lords in the Dorothea case (1). I have, however, to bear in mind that when the Dorothea case (1) was before this court, the court invited the House of Lords to reconsider Fitzsimons case (2), and, we were informed during the hearing of the present matter by counsel for the employer, when he was arguing for the workman in the Dorothea case (1) in the House of Lords, he relied strongly on the Fitzsimons case (2) and submitted that, if it were correctly decided, it necessarily followed that he was entitled to succeed in the Dorothea case (1). Despite this invitation both from this court and counsel, none of their Lordships mentioned the Fitzsimons case (2), and in these circumstances I hesitate to come to the conclusion that their Lordships have impliedly held that Fitzsimons case (2) was wrongly decided. Counsel relied on the fact that in the Dorothea case (1) their Lordships expressly approved the decision of this court in Williams' case (12)—a silicosis case—and, apparently, approved the decisions of this court in Marshall v. East Holywell Coal Co.; Gorley v. Backworth Collieries (8), the "beat hand" and "beat knee" cases. These cases are difficult to distinguish from the Fitzsimons case (2), but the distinction may be that in neither of the earlier cases was it possible to fix on any particular occurrence corresponding to the vibration in Fitzsimons case (2) which could be described as an accident. Moreover, it has to be borne in mind that in Fife Coal Co. v. Young (7), when the earlier cases first received the blessing of the House of Lords, the House of Lords distinguished them and decided in favour of the workman.

the external factors which produce it occur fortuitously as a matter of chance. That was the case in Charles Burrell v. Selvage (4) where, although the cuts were numerous and repeated, nevertheless each one occurred as a matter of chance. On the other hand, a disease is due, not to a series of accidents, but to a process of work if the external factors which produce it are a continuous and necessary concomitant over a long period of the work in which the man is engaged. That was the case in Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries Co., Ltd. (1) where the inhaling of the silica dust was not fortuitous but a necessary incident of the work.

The decision of the House of Lords in Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries Co., Ltd. (1) makes it necessary to re-consider the previous cases on the subject. It calls a halt to the recent tendency to treat diseases due to a process of work as if they were diseases due to accident. Its effect, in my opinion, is to restore the authority of Marshall v. East Holywell Coal Co. (8) and to render the Fitzsimons (2) and Hughes (11) cases no longer of authority. Applying this principle to the present case, the question, to my mind, is what is the proper interpretation of the judge's finding that the nurse became infected by tuberculosis bacilli as a result "of constant and repeated doses" between February, 1943 and April, 1944. If that means, as BUCKNILL, L.J., thinks, that it was the result of a gradual process of breathing air containing noxious bacilli, I would agree that it would not be due to a series of accidents, but I do not read the finding in that way. I read it as meaning that there was a repeated number of incidents such as those she described in evidence when she was brought by chance into close contact with a patient who had been coughing. She could not, of course, remember all the incidents and she specified only a few of them, but they were all accidental. On this view the case falls within the cases of which Burrell v. Selvage (4) is an example, and not within Roberts v. Dorothea Slate Quarries Co., Ltd. (1). I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

KELLY v. STOCKPORT CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), April 6, 1949.]

County Court — Jurisdiction — Negligence — Damages — Apportionment — Damages assessed at sum in excess of that which court had jurisdiction to award—Reduced to amount within limits of jurisdiction—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 40 (1)—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (c. 28), s. 1 (1) (2).

The Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 states: " (1) Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage . . . (2) Where damages are recoverable by any person by virtue of the foregoing sub-section subject to such reduction as is therein mentioned, the court shall find and record the total damages which would have been recoverable if the claimant had not been at fault."

In an action brought in the county court by an infant plaintiff and his mother for personal injuries and out-of-pocket expenses respectively the plaintiffs claimed £200 damages, the maximum amount recoverable in the county court. The learned judge, applying the provisions of the Act of 1945, found that the infant plaintiff was one-third to blame, and, having assessed at £300 the damages which would have been recoverable if the infant plaintiff had not been at fault, awarded the plaintiffs two-thirds of that sum, viz., the full amount claimed. A

HELD: the Act of 1945 did not empower the county court judge to assess an amount of damages either in excess of that claimed or beyond the limits of the county court's jurisdiction, and, therefore, the reduction should have been of the sum of £200.

[FOR THE LAW REFORM (CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE) ACT, 1945, s. 1 (1) (2), B see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 38, p. 357.]

APPEAL by the defendants from a decision of His Honour JUDGE BATT in the Stockport County Court, dated Nov. 30, 1948, whereby he awarded £190 damages to an infant plaintiff, suing by his father as next friend, for personal injuries, and £10 to his mother, the second plaintiff, for loss of wages. The learned judge assessed the damage suffered by the plaintiffs at £300 (£100 more than that claimed) and, apportioning the blame as to one-third to the infant plaintiff and two-thirds to the defendants, awarded the plaintiffs a total sum of £200. The Court of Appeal now held that the judge had no jurisdiction to make such an award and allowed the appeal. C

Gerrard, K.C., and Mais for the defendants. D

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE BATT in the Stockport County Court whereby he awarded £190 to the infant plaintiff and £10 to his mother, also a plaintiff, for her out-of-pocket expenses. The claim was brought in respect of injuries suffered by the infant. It contained particulars of special damages amounting to £26 10s. 6d., a claim for £13 10s. 0d. for loss of wages by the mother, and it ended: "and the plaintiffs claim £200 damages." E

By s. 40 of the County Courts Act, 1934 (as amended by the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1938, s. 16):

"(1) A county court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine any action founded on contract or on tort where the debt, demand or damage claimed is not more than £200, whether on balance of account or otherwise." F

It is clear that £200 was the sum which the plaintiffs were seeking to recover, and it was the maximum sum which they could recover in the county court. The learned judge, having determined the issue on liability, found, applying the provisions of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, that the infant plaintiff was one-third to blame and the defendants two-thirds. Notwithstanding that, he awarded the full amount claimed, £200, to the plaintiffs. He did that on the basis that he was satisfied that the amount of damages recoverable by the plaintiffs amounted to £300 and that, under the provisions of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, he had power to apportion the blame as to one-third and two-thirds, and, accordingly, he awarded the plaintiffs two-thirds of the sum which he thought represented what they had suffered, which came to £200. G H

This was the total claimed by the plaintiffs in the action, and, thereupon, counsel for the defendants submitted to the judge that under the provisions of the Act of 1945 he had to apportion the sum of £200, the amount claimed, and not some other sum, namely, £300, which had never been claimed and to award which he would have no jurisdiction. The learned judge rejected this submission.

The case is very plain. It turns entirely on the language of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. Section 1 (1) reads as follows :

A "Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage."

B In the present action the damages recoverable were limited, by reason of the provisions dealing with the jurisdiction of the county court, to £200. It is, therefore, the £200 which has to be reduced. In other words, it is not the damage sustained, in fact, by the plaintiff, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof which must be taken into consideration in this connection.

Sub-section (2) provides :

C "Where damages are recoverable by any person by virtue of the foregoing sub-section subject to such reduction as is therein mentioned, the court shall find and record the total damages which would have been recoverable if the claimant had not been at fault."

D Under that sub-section, the sum which the court has to record, as being that which would have been recoverable if the plaintiff had not been at fault, must necessarily be a sum which it was within the jurisdiction of that court to have awarded if it had not found that the claimant had been to blame. If counsel for the plaintiffs is right, the result of this sub-section would be to require the county court judge to record, as the sum which would have been recoverable, a sum in excess of that which he had jurisdiction to award. In my opinion, £200 was the sum which had to be apportioned in this case, and the result is that the maximum sum recoverable by the plaintiffs is £133 6s. 8d.

E ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. The operation of s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, seems quite plain. It raises two questions :—(i) What is the claim in respect of the damage suffered ? and, (ii) What are the damages recoverable in respect of that claim ? The claim was for £200 and the damages recoverable in respect of that claim cannot exceed £200 for two reasons :—(i) because a party cannot recover more damages F than he claims in any civil court ; and (ii) because he cannot recover more than £200 in the county court owing to the limits of its jurisdiction. £200 is the "damages recoverable," and it is this sum which, by sub-s. (1), has to be reduced in the event of contributory negligence being established. It, therefore, seems to me that the appeal must be allowed.

G SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree. Despite the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs I feel it was not within the contemplation of the legislature that, in a case of this nature, if, perchance, the plaintiff was found four-fifths to blame, the county court judge should have jurisdiction up to £1,000 damages in order that the plaintiff could recover £200. The defendants have established their principle.

Appeal allowed. No order as to costs.

COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE v. INGRAM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Evershed, L.J. and Wynn-Parry, J.), March 17, April 5, 1949.]

Purchase Tax—Information to be supplied by “person concerned with the purchase . . . of goods”—Information as to sales—“Purchase”—Form of order—Lapse of time since period under consideration—Finance Act, 1946 (c. 64), s. 20 (3).

The Finance Act, 1946, s. 20, provides : “ (3) Every person concerned with the purchase or importation of goods or with the application to goods of any process of manufacture or with dealings with imported goods shall furnish to the commissioners within such time and in such form as they may require information relating to the goods or to the purchase or importation thereof or to the application of any process of manufacture thereto or to dealings therewith as they may specify . . . ”

The defendant carried on businesses from October, 1946, until June, 1947, in the course of which he purchased “chargeable goods” within the statutes relating to purchase tax. In July, 1948, he received a written demand from the Commissioners of Customs and Excise expressed to be pursuant to s. 20 (3) to produce for inspection the books, accounts and other documents relating to the goods purchased. The defendant informed the Customs and Excise officers that his books and accounts had been stolen on Dec. 13, 1947, and this was not challenged in cross-examination. In October, 1948, the commissioners, pursuant to s. 20, served a formal notice on the defendant (i) to produce for inspection his books, accounts and other documents, and (ii) to furnish the commissioners with certain information relating both to the purchases by the defendant and also to his sales. In November, 1948, the summons in the present proceedings was issued by the commissioners under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 14, for an order that, inter alia : “The defendant do . . . furnish to [the commissioners] pursuant to s. 20 of the said Act the following information . . . : (a) the names and addresses of the persons from whom goods were purchased by him . . . the quantities, descriptions and values of the goods so bought from each supplier, and the date of each purchase ; (b) the names and addresses of the persons to whom goods were sold by him . . . the quantities, descriptions and values of the goods so sold to each purchaser, and the date of each sale.” After the matter had come before the master and had been adjourned, the defendant gave certain information with regard to his purchases, but none as regards his sales. The summons was restored, and the master ordered that “the defendant do . . . give information to [the commissioners] regarding the goods, of what they consist, and of the persons from whom they were bought and to whom sold.” The judge in chambers dismissed an appeal from that order. On appeal to the Court of Appeal in so far as the order related to sales made by the defendant, HELD : (i) by the combined effect of s. 67 (3) of the Act of 1946 and s. 41 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, the word “purchase” in s. 20 (3) of the Act of 1946 meant any contract which is a contract of sale within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 ; the liability of the defendant was as a person concerned with such contracts for the sale of goods whether as buyer or seller ; and the information which might be required of him under s. 20 (3) related to such contracts made by him whether as buyer or seller, and the order of the master should be affirmed.

Customs and Excise Comrs. v. Ingram ([1948] 1 All E.R. 927), considered.

HELD, further, that, while the order should be as precise as possible, on the construction of s. 20 (3) there was no jurisdiction in the court to specify the form in which the information must be given, but the court was not deprived of all discretion in regard to the order and should not impose on the defendant obligations which were beyond his power to discharge.

A Case referred to :

(1) Comrs. of Customs and Excise v. Ingram, [1948] 1 All E.R. 927.

APPEAL by the defendant taxpayer from an order of FINNEMORE, J., in chambers, dated Jan. 14, 1949, affirming an order of the master whereby the defendant was ordered to supply to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise under s. 20 (3) of the Finance Act, 1946, information regarding goods dealt with by the defendant in the course of his businesses, of what they consisted, of whom they were bought, and to whom sold. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal, but varied the order to the effect that the defendant should furnish the information "to the best of his knowledge and belief or which it is within his control to procure." The facts appear in the judgment of the court, and are summarised in the headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 5. EVERSHED, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.

D This appeal raises, for the first time (as we understand), a question of the scope of s. 20 (3) of the Finance Act, 1946, relating to purchase tax - namely, whether a "person concerned with the purchase . . . of goods" (as the defendant admittedly is for the purpose of this appeal) can be required to furnish information relating to the sale by him to others of the goods which he purchased.

The material facts may be briefly stated. Mr. Marcus Ingram, the defendant to the proceedings and the appellant in this court, carried on certain businesses from October, 1946, to June, 1947 (according to his own evidence) in the course of which he purchased "chargeable goods" within the meaning of the statutes relating to purchase tax. In July, 1948, he received from the Commissioners of Customs and Excise a written demand, expressed to be pursuant to s. 20 of the Act of 1946 to "produce for inspection" to an officer of the commissioners the books, accounts and other documents relating to the goods purchased by or from him in the course of the above mentioned businesses. According to the defendant's evidence it so happened that "on or about the night of Saturday, Dec. 13, 1947," a burglar entered on certain premises occupied by another business with which the defendant was then connected and possessed himself of some confectionery, a radio set and a leather suitcase into which all the books of accounts and other records of the businesses in question happened to have been packed. The defendant says that he immediately informed the police of this calamity, but that none of the stolen property was ever recovered. He also says that when he was visited by two officers representing the commissioners in July, 1948, he informed them likewise of the theft. No evidence in reply has been filed on the part of the commissioners nor has the defendant's evidence been challenged in cross-examination. For the purposes of the present appeal, therefore, it must be taken that all the relevant books of accounts and other records disappeared in December, 1947. The commissioners, nevertheless, in October, 1948, served on the defendant a formal notice pursuant to s. 20 of the Act of 1946, requiring him (1) to produce for inspection his books, accounts and other documents relating to the said businesses, and (2) to furnish to the commissioners' agent certain information relating both to the purchases by the defendant and also to his sales. It is unnecessary to refer further to the form of this notice since its language was reproduced in the summons issued by the commissioners in November, 1948, pursuant to s. 14 of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, from the order made on which summons the present appeal is brought. Paragraph 1 of the summons related to books and other documents and is immaterial for present purposes. Paragraph 2 is in the following terms :

“ The defendant do within four days hereof furnish to an officer of the plaintiffs at City Gate House, Finsbury Square, E.C.2, in the county of London, pursuant to s. 20 of the said Act the following information in so far as it is not included in the books and accounts referred to above :
(a) the names and addresses of the persons from whom goods were purchased by him trading as the Castle Paper Co., and trading as Ingram's Associated Distributors, the quantities descriptions and values of the goods so bought from each supplier, and the date of each purchase ;
(b) the names and addresses of the persons to whom goods were sold by him trading as the Castle Paper Co., and trading as Ingram's Associated Distributors, the quantities description and values of the goods so sold to each purchaser, and the date of each sale.”

On the summons first coming before the learned master it was adjourned, and the defendant by his solicitors then wrote to the commissioners giving—without prejudice to what the defendant's rights and duties might be—certain information in regard to the purchases made by the defendant but containing no information in regard to his sales. The summons was then restored and on Dec. 22, 1948, the master ordered that :

“ . . . the defendant do within 21 days after service of the order give information to the plaintiffs regarding the goods : of what they consist and of the persons from whom they were bought and to whom sold.”

An appeal by the defendant from this order was dismissed by the judge in chambers who, however, gave leave to the defendant to appeal to this court. Counsel for the defendant raised no point before us in regard to the order made save in so far as it related to sales made by the defendant. His main contention was that upon the true interpretation of s. 20 (3) of the Finance Act, 1946, there was no jurisdiction to make any order in regard to such sales. Counsel further contended that, having regard to the facts already narrated, and, particularly, to the length of time which has elapsed since the unfortunate occurrence of Saturday, Dec. 13, 1947 (told to the commissioners in July of last year), it would, in any event, be inequitable now to order the defendant to furnish information in regard to his sales.

It will be convenient to deal first with this latter contention, for it is, in our view, without substance. The chronology of the present case provides, in our judgment, no ground for saying that the commissioners have been dilatory or have unreasonably delayed the issue of proceedings under the Act of 1947. If, in truth, the defendant, because of the lapse of time, cannot now recall the facts in regard to the relevant sales, that is a matter proper to be taken into account on any step taken by the commissioners to enforce any order made on this application, but it does not disentitle the commissioners to the order if it is within the court's jurisdiction and otherwise proper to make it.

We return to the main question raised on the appeal. The language of s. 20 (3) of the Act of 1946 is, so far as material, as follows :

“ Every person concerned with the purchase or importation of goods or with the application to goods of any process of manufacture or with dealings with imported goods shall furnish to the commissioners within such time and in such form as they may require information relating to the goods or to the purchase or importation thereof or to the application of any process of manufacture thereto or to dealings therewith as they may specify . . . ”

It is clear from the form of the words used in the sub-section that four categories of persons are comprehended by its terms, namely, those concerned with (i) the purchase of goods, (ii) the importation of goods, (iii) the application to goods of any process of manufacture, and (iv) dealings with imported goods. Counsel for the defendant argued that the kind of information which the commissioners may require is likewise divided into categories, each category being appropriate, exclusively, to one of the four classes of "persons" which we have enumerated, plus the further category—that is, information relating to the goods—which must (according to the argument) in the context mean and mean only information relating to the character of the goods as physical things as distinct from information relating to transactions with the goods. From counsel's analysis of the language of the sub-section it follows that information relating to "dealings therewith" must be confined to dealings with imported goods and that the only words which can be applicable to the defendant are "information relating . . . to the purchase thereof," which (according to counsel's argument) must on the natural acceptance of the language refer only to purchases by the defendant and exclude his sales. Counsel for the commissioners has desired to keep open the question whether the analysis of counsel for the defendant is sound, and whether, accordingly, the words "information relating to the goods" and "information relating to dealings therewith" can have the restricted significance which the defendant attributes to them. The main argument for the commissioners has been that, even if the analysis of the sub-section put forward on behalf of the defendant be assumed in his favour, nevertheless the phrase "information relating to the purchase thereof" means and includes, in its context and having regard to certain other sections of the Act of 1946 and of the Finance Act (No. 2), 1940 (which first imposed purchase tax), not only purchases by the defendant but purchases from him—that is, sales by him of the goods which he purchased.

It must, we think, be conceded that the drafting of the sub-section is not on any view entirely felicitous, and (assuming the defendant's analysis) it seems to us that a first and natural reading of its terms would confine "purchase" to the purchase by the "person concerned," but s. 67 (3) of the Act of 1946 requires that the relevant part of that Act should be read with pt. V of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940 (which related to purchase tax) and makes applicable to s. 20 (3) of the 1946 Act the relevant definitions contained in s. 41 (1) of the Act of 1940, and by the last named section "purchase" is defined to mean—be it observed that the word is "mean" and not "include"—any contract which is a contract of sale within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The remainder of the definition is immaterial. Having regard to this definition, which, as we have stated, must be read into s. 20 (3) of the Act of 1946 by virtue of s. 67 (3) of the same Act, it is necessary for the purpose of construing the former sub-section to write in, for the word "purchase," the formula contained in s. 41 (1) of the Act of 1940. In the result it is, in our opinion, impossible to restrict the scope of the information which the defendant is required to furnish as his counsel contends. For the liability of his client is as a person concerned (inter alia) with contracts for the sale of goods (within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893) whether as buyer or seller, and the information which he may be required to furnish relates to such contracts made by him, again whether as buyer or seller.

If this view is right, then counsel for the commissioners succeeds on his main point and it is unnecessary to express any concluded opinion on the ambit of the other phrases—"information relating to the goods" or "information relating to dealings therewith." We must not, however, be taken, as at present advised, to be suggesting that the commissioners might not well be entitled to succeed also under either or both these phrases. A division of the kinds of information required into categories corresponding with the four classes of "persons concerned" is, having regard to the language used, prima facie attractive. Nevertheless, there remains as a kind of fifth wheel "information relating to the goods," and as a matter of ordinary English it is not easy to see why this phrase should not mean and include information not only as to the character of the goods but also as to what has happened to them. And, again, as a matter of ordinary English, it is not easy to see what meaning can fairly be given to the words "thereof" "thereto" or "therewith" save "of the goods" "to the goods" and "with the goods," nor to formulate and justify the glosses which would, as we think, necessarily have to be read into the sub-section if the defendant's construction is to be adopted. In the circumstances, however, it is unnecessary to express a concluded opinion on these matters.

In our judgment, the conclusion at which we have arrived is supported by a consideration of the characteristics of the purchase tax itself and also by the reasoning of this court in an earlier case of the same name as the present—Comrs. of Customs and Excise v. Ingram (1). In that case the question was as to the extent of the obligation of the defendant, Ingram (not the same person as the present defendant), in regard to documents under the concluding words of s. 20 (3) of the Act of 1946 :

" . . . and shall, upon demand made by any officer or other person authorised in that behalf by the commissioners, produce any books or accounts or other documents of whatever nature relating thereto for inspection by that officer or person at such time and place as that officer or person may require."

On that question, this court held that the word "accounts" embraced (inter alia) sales invoices or copy sales invoices as well as documents relating to purchases made by the "person concerned."

In considering questions such as those raised in the present and in the preceding case, it is not to be forgotten that, having regard to the nature and incidence of purchase tax, certain traders have imposed on them the duty of adding the tax to their selling prices and of thereby collecting the tax and accounting for it as trustees or agents for the commissioners. The statutory provisions designed to render effective, in such circumstances, the collection of the tax, must, to adopt the phrase of LORD GODDARD, C.J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 929), not be given so narrow a meaning as "to stultify" the orders made. It is true that the main point argued in the present case was not directly raised in the earlier case. Nevertheless, the general consideration to which LORD GODDARD alluded is no less pertinent to the present appeal than it was to the case then before the court. Information relating to sales by "persons concerned in the purchase of goods" is as relevant to the proper administration and collection of the tax as are sales invoices and other documentary evidence of their sales. And it would be, indeed, anomalous if such persons were bound to produce the accounts in their possession relating to such sales, but were not bound (where no document existed) to give any information in regard thereto. In our judgment, therefore, the conclusion at which we have arrived is supported by the earlier decision and by the reasoning which underlies that decision.

In the result, it follows that the present appeal cannot succeed, but there remains the form of the order which it is proper to make. On this two points arise. In the first place, it is observed (and, again, the language used by the draftsman seems to us unhappily vague) that there is no indication of the form in which the required information is to be given or may be ordered to be given—whether orally, in writing, on oath, or otherwise. Secondly, it was argued on the part of the commissioners that, once the commissioners have proved the facts bringing the case within the ambit of the sub-section, the

A court has no discretion in the matter and is bound to make the order asked in the general form indicated by the sub-section and cannot in any way restrict or qualify the obligation imposed on the defendant—for example, in the light of such facts as must be taken to have been proved or conceded in the present case by ordering the defendant to furnish information “to the best of his knowledge and belief.” Having regard to the penal consequences of failure to comply with any order made, it is, on general principles, both necessary and proper that the terms of the order should be as precise as possible and should leave no room for doubting what are the exact obligations imposed thereby, but, having regard to the language of the sub-section, we think that there is no jurisdiction in the court to specify the form in which the information must be given. Thus, it is not, in our judgment, competent for the court to order that the information should be furnished on oath or in any particular form. All the court can do is to order the defendant to furnish the information, and he is entitled to do so in any form he chooses. In practice it may well be that the matter is academic. For if, after an order has been made, the commissioners should be dissatisfied with what the defendant may do by way of compliance with the order and should make out a prima facie case for committal or attachment, the defendant would, by his sworn answer, in effect put on oath all that he may have said by way of furnishing information together with his inability to do more. On the other hand, we cannot think that the court is deprived of all discretion in regard to the order which it makes. In the present case the commissioners have not asked for an order on para. 1 of the summons, but, had they done so, we cannot think that the court would not, on the state of the evidence before it, have been entitled to refuse to make an order with which on the evidence it would plainly have been impossible for the defendant to comply. So, also, it must, in our judgment, be competent for the court to make such an order for the furnishing of information (that is, an order subject to such limitations and qualifications) as in all the circumstances it seems just and proper to make. In other words, the court on such an application as the present can and should make such an order as, on the one hand, will make reasonably clear to the defendant what he is called on to do, and, on the other, will not impose on the defendant obligations which are beyond his power to discharge.

 service of the order furnish the information set out in the summons to the best of his knowledge and belief or which it is within his control to procure.*

Re OWEN (deceased). OWEN v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), March 31, 1949.]

Estate Duty—Gift inter vivos—Date when made—Cheques drawn more than three years, but presented less than three years, before death.

On Mar. 12, 1941, the donor directed his solicitors to sell certain securities and out of the net proceeds to pay £1,000 into the donor's current banking account, £2,000 into the donor's deposit account, one half of the remainder to his sister M., and a share of the residue each to his niece K. and his nephew T. On Mar. 29, 1941, the sales were made, and the proceeds, amounting to some £17,000, were paid into the solicitors' account. The solicitors drew a cheque for the whole amount in favour of the donor and paid it into a special account at the donor's bank on May 21, 1941, and the donor signed cheques drawn on the special account by the bank manager to effect the intended arrangement. On May 22 the solicitors' cheque was cleared. On June 4 M. presented her cheque for payment. On June 5 K. presented hers, and on July 2 T. presented his. On June 1, 1944, the donor died, and the question arose whether the gifts were liable to estate duty as having been made within three years of the donor's death and so aggregable with the donor's free estate for the purposes of the ascertainment of the rate of duty chargeable.

HELD: the instructions to the solicitors did not create a trust of the proceeds of the sales, nor did the signing of the donees' cheques by the donor amount to an equitable assignment of those moneys; until the cheques were cleared and the money was credited to the donees' accounts no gift had been made; and, therefore, the gifts were made within three years of the donor's death.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether three gifts were made more than three years before the death of the donor. No question arose regarding a gift to another donee which the donor made out of the same fund as those under consideration, because the money was received by this donee more than three years before the donor's death. ROMER, J., held that the gifts were not made more than three years before the death. The facts are set out in the headnote.

Blaise for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the donor's will.

J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

ROMER, J. [having stated the facts]: Counsel for the trustees puts his case in two ways. He contends that these gifts were effective and perfected gifts prior to June 1, 1941. He says, first, that, at some date prior to June 1, 1941, there was established a trust affecting the sum of £17,000 which came into the hands of the testator's solicitors, that the effect of the instructions which the testator gave to his solicitors was to create a trust under which, directly the proceeds of sale came from the brokers to the solicitors, the latter were to hold them as trustees on trust, apart from the £3,000 which was to go into the testator's own accounts, to divide the proceeds among the sister, the nephew, and the nieces in the manner indicated to the solicitors by the testator. If that is so, it means that directly the £17,000 was received by the solicitors they were trustees and subject to all the obligations of trustees in relation to that money, and, consequently, anybody who took the money with notice of the trust would equally be affected by such obligations, including the testator himself. Counsel does not shrink from that view of the matter. He says that, if the testator had died at any time after the proceeds of sale had been received from the brokers by the solicitors, the solicitors would have held those proceeds as trustees, not for the testator's estate, but for the beneficiaries who were in equity entitled to those proceeds by virtue of the trust already executed. It was not only an arrangement, counsel says, under which equitable interests were created in favour of the beneficiaries, to the exclusion of the testator himself except for the £3,000, but one which as from that moment of time the testator was unable to revoke or interfere with in any way.

A Counsel says there was certainty as to the subject-matter of the trust, certainty as to the trustees, certainty as to the objects, and, therefore, all the elements necessary for constituting a trust were brought into being. It follows from that, therefore, that when the testator signed these cheques and sent them off, he did so, not as a donor of this property, but in pursuance of his obligations as a trustee and to implement the trust which he had brought into being.

B I am quite unable on the facts to accept that view of the matter. It appears to me that this was the ordinary case of a man instructing his solicitors to get in touch with some brokers for the purpose of realising investments and putting the proceeds at the disposal of the solicitors in order that ultimately he might put them to the use which he had in mind. As counsel for the Crown pointed out, if, in fact, the intention was to create the solicitors trustees of these proceeds, then they committed a breach of trust for which they could have been subsequently rendered liable at the instance of the beneficiaries when they paid over these moneys to the testator's own account. It is unfortunate that the beneficiaries have been disappointed because the Inland Revenue is now enabled to make this claim, but that is an inevitable result of what happened.

C D Alternatively, counsel for the trustees said that, if there was not a trust, the general arrangement as disclosed by the evidence established a valid assignment of the money which was paid by the solicitors into the testator's account on which the cheques were subsequently drawn. So far as I can make it out—the evidence is somewhat obscure—the testator had at his bank a current account and a deposit account. When the solicitors received from the brokers the cheque for £17,000 odd they thought that it would be a good idea for the testator to implement his generosity by his personal act, namely, by signing the cheques himself and drawing on his own account cheques in favour of the relatives whom he desired to benefit. So the solicitors took to the testator's bank manager a cheque drawn on their account which was paid into an especially opened new account. It was on that account that the testator then drew the two cheques in favour of himself, one to be paid into his current account and the other into his deposit account. The other four cheques were in favour of the beneficiaries. Counsel for the trustees, while admitting that the mere payment of a cheque cannot, having regard to the authorities, be treated as a gift of the sum mentioned in the cheque, says that the whole arrangement, if looked at and analysed properly and carefully, constituted an equitable assignment. He relied on a passage in the speech of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Brandt's (William) Sons & Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Co. (1) where LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1905] A.C. 462), dealing with this class of equitable assignment :

"All that is necessary is that the debtor should be given to understand that the debt has been made over by the creditor to some third person."

H With reference to that passage in LORD MACNAGHTEN's speech counsel says that the testator gave the bank manager to understand that a debt, namely, £17,000, less the £3,000, which he paid over to himself, had been made over by him to his relations when he signed the cheques which the manager had drawn for his signature. Counsel says that from that moment there was in existence a complete valid equitable assignment amounting to an effective transfer in the various proportions, a transfer recognisable and enforceable in equity, of the sum of money which had been paid into the special account.

Counsel had not any very direct authority to support his proposition, but he did refer me to one or two cases. First, he referred me to the decision of STUART, V.-C., in Bromley v. Brunton (2). The headnote is :

"A cheque was given by A. to B., and presented without delay. The bankers had sufficient assets of A., but refused payment because they doubted the signature. The next day A. died, the cheque not having been paid : Held, a complete gift, inter vivos, of the amount of the cheque."

The Vice-Chancellor said (L.R. 6 Eq. 277) :

"In order to make a gift of this description valid it is necessary, according to the settled doctrine of the court, that it should be complete—that everything should be done on the part of the donor. The gift in this case being made in the form of a cheque drawn on the bankers of the donor, if there had been no funds in the hands of the bankers then of course there would have been an incompleteness in the gift on the part of the donor. It is clear, however, that when the cheque was presented on the second occasion the bankers had sufficient funds in their hands to pay it. The reason why they did not pay it was one proceeding from their minds—they doubted the authenticity of the donor's signature, and the result is that the funds which the donor had dedicated to the purpose of this gift, through no act of the donor, and through no default of the donee, came into the hands of the executors of the donor. I conceive that, under these circumstances, no further act was necessary on the part of the donor to make the gift complete. The failure, so far as the gift has failed through non-payment to this time, occurred through the default of third parties, whose duty it was to pay it."

Then comes the passage on which counsel for the trustees particularly relied :

"The effect of the cheque was to appropriate so much of the donor's money, and my opinion is that the funds, the subject of the gift, are in the hands of the executors just as much liable to the payment of the cheque as they were in the hands of the bankers. It was said that Tate v. Leithead (3) is an authority in favour of the executors refusing to pay this cheque ; but in that case the cheque was never presented to the bankers, while here the cheque was presented on two occasions, and the failure in the receipt of the money by the donee is not attributable to her but to the conduct of the bankers. I am of opinion that the gift was as complete as the donor and the donee could make it, and, consequently, that the cheque must be paid out of the funds in the hands of the executors, with interest, as claimed."

Bromley v. Brunton (2) was overruled by the Court of Appeal in Re Swinburne (4), but counsel says that the principle that in certain circumstances money paid to the credit of a banking account may be appropriated in such a way as to constitute an equitable assignment (which was the proposition visualised by STUART, V.-C.), is a sound principle, and nothing that happened in Re Swinburne (4) disturbed it.

G

Re Beaumont (5), which came before BUCKLEY, J., was a case of donatio mortis causa, and I was only referred to it because of some observations which BUCKLEY, J., made on Bromley v. Brunton (2). He said ([1902] 1 Ch. 895) :

H

"Bromley v. Brunton (2) at first puzzled me. There the deceased gave her cheque to Bromley, who at once presented it. The assets of the customer were sufficient to pay it, but the signature was shaky, and the banker refused to pay until the signature was confirmed. The drawer died, and the cheque was not paid. STUART, V.-C., held that there was a complete gift inter vivos of the amount of the cheque. He must have so decided either because the cheque was constructively paid, the bankers having substantially said that they would pay, so that the payment constructively related back to the date of presentation; or because the bankers had in effect said: 'The account is in credit, and we will hold enough of the balance to satisfy the cheque subject to the signature being shewn to be genuine,' and therefore, that there was a good equitable assignment. The Vice-Chancellor says: 'The effect of the cheque was to appropriate so much of the donor's money, and my opinion is that the funds, the subject of the gift, are in the hands of the executors just as much liable to the payment of the cheque as they were in the hands of the bankers.' I cannot suppose that he meant that the cheque by itself operated as an equitable assignment of money at the bank. Probably he meant that the effect of the cheque coupled with the bankers' action on it was to appropriate enough of the money at the bank to meet the cheque—that the bankers, so to speak, constructively honoured the cheque."

Counsel says that is the kind of conception on which he relies in the present case, and that BUCKLEY, J., apparently, referred to such a position without any disapprobation.

C Re Swinburne (4) is a decision of the Court of Appeal. The headnote of that case is:

"A. drew a cheque for £700 in favour of B. and gave it to B., who presented it forthwith. A. had current and deposit accounts at the bank, but her money on current account was not sufficient to meet the cheque without resort to the money on deposit. It had been the practice of the bank to allow A. to overdraw her current account so long as the overdraft was covered by her money on deposit. The bank refused payment of the cheque, not because of the state of A.'s current account, but because they doubted A.'s signature on the cheque. A. died before anything further was done. Held, that in the circumstances there had not been any appropriation or dedication of the money in the bank, or any constructive payment of the cheque; and that there had been an incomplete gift inter vivos of the amount of the cheque, which gift would not be perfected by the assistance of equity."

Mr. Raeburn, for the appellant, argued, among other things ([1926] Ch. 39):

F "The handing over of the cheque to the appellant showed an intention on the part of the donor to dedicate or appropriate this money."

SIR ERNEST POLLOCK, M.R., said ([1926] Ch. 41):

G "Now a cheque is clearly not an assignment of money in the hands of a banker. A cheque, as explained by LORD ROMILLY, M.R., in Hewitt v. Kaye (6), is nothing more than an order to obtain a certain sum of money, and it makes no difference whether the money is with the bankers or elsewhere. It is an order to deliver the money; and if the order is not acted upon in the lifetime of the person who gives it, it is worth nothing. Let me assume, therefore, that there was money in the current account ready to meet this cheque as and when it was accepted for payment by the banker, but it is clear law that the fact that this cheque was outstanding did not indicate that there had been any assignment of the money on current account to meet the cheque. It is merely a mandate or authority in the hands of the holder of the cheque to go to the bank and get the money from it."

Then he makes some observations on Bromley v. Brunton (2) and continues (ibid., 42):

"It is fair to point out that SIR JOHN STUART, V.-C., who decided that case, decided it on the basis that the donor had dedicated to the purpose of the gift the sum which was indicated by the cheque, and he says he conceives that under these circumstances no further act was necessary on the part of the donor to make the gift complete. Now if the Vice-Chancellor was able to find those facts—namely, that there had been an actual dedication of property, that no further act was necessary on the part of the donor to make the gift complete, and that there had been a transfer of the property—then I think that that case falls into line with the other cases, and his judgment can be supported. Whether I should have been able to construe the facts as amounting to what the Vice-Chancellor finds them to be is quite another question; but unless the basis of the case is that there had been an actual transfer of property and no further act necessary on the part of the donor to make the gift complete, it appears to me that Bromley v. Brunton (2) stands apart from, and is in contradiction with, the authority of the other cases to which I have referred, and can no longer be considered as law. Now in this case all that was received by Mrs. Gifford was a cheque. No indication had been given by the bank, by the certification of the cheque or otherwise, that they held a sum of money exclusively to answer the cheque; and under those circumstances it appears to me that the cheque remains a mere order to receive the money as and when it can be paid."

Bromley v. Brunton (2) was treated rather more harshly by the other members of the court, WARRINGTON, L.J., and SARGANT, L.J. WARRINGTON, L.J., said (ibid., 44):

"With all respect to the judgment of STUART, V.-C., I share the doubt expressed by BUCKLEY, J., in Re Beaumont (5) as to whether it really can be supported. I think the vice of the judgment, if I may so express it, is found in the expression 'the effect of the cheque was to appropriate so much of the donor's money, and my opinion is that the funds, the subject of the gift, are in the hands of the executors just as much liable to the payment of the cheque as they were in the hands of the bankers.' With all respect to STUART, V.-C., the drawing of the cheque does not, in my opinion, appropriate money in the hands of the bankers to the payment of that cheque. It authorises and requires the bankers to pay it, but it is no appropriation of the money itself . . . I feel very great difficulty about introducing any such theory as that of constructive payment, and on the whole, if it were actually necessary to decide it, as at present advised, I should not follow Bromley v. Brunton (2). I should even go further, and say that Bromley v. Brunton (2) must be treated as overruled."

Finally, SARGANT, L.J., said (ibid., 47):

"The mere instruction by means of a cheque to a banker to pay the money to the drawee of the cheque is not a gift. It is merely a revocable authority to the agent to make the payment; and the piece of paper containing that revocable authority is not a piece of property when it is given to the drawee by the drawer. It is merely the handing to the drawee of the means of entitling the drawee to obtain from the agent acting in pursuance of the authority the sum in question. In my judgment, even if this had been claimed as a donatio mortis causa, the claim must have failed; a fortiori it must fail when the claim is made as on a gift inter vivos. I think I should add this, because I myself argued the case of Re Beaumont (5) before BUCKLEY, J. I am quite sure that BUCKLEY, J., then only a judge of first instance, although finding a possible way of reconciling Bromley v. Brunton (2) with the decision he was about to give, really thoroughly disapproved of the case. I also disapprove of the case, and I think that from this time forward it cannot be relied on."

- A It is said by counsel for the trustees that there was here an actual dedication of property, namely, the amount standing to the testator's credit on his special account in favour of the relations whom he desired to benefit, and that what happened constituted an assignment in equity of that balance, complete at a point of time not later than when the testator signed those cheques. The occasions have been innumerable on which incomplete gifts have been sought to be interpreted in some such way as to achieve the validity which otherwise they would lack. Looking at the facts, I can only describe this as another such attempt. The one thing which appears to me to be plain beyond all doubt is that the testator's intention was to benefit his relations
- B in a specific and particular manner, namely, by causing some investments to be sold and having the proceeds transferred to a banking account, and then drawing cheques on that account in the ordinary way in favour of the donees, so that by using those cheques in the way that cheques are used the participants would get the benefit which the testator intended to confer on them. But it was through the medium of cheques alone that the testator
- C intended to pass the benefit and to pass the property. It seems to me that I have to blind myself to the facts of the whole arrangement as disclosed by the evidence before me if I am to hold that when the testator was closeted with the bank manager an effective assignment of this money was brought about. It seems to me that it is impossible to find what POLLOCK, M.R., in Re Swinburne (4) said that the Vice-Chancellor was able to find in Bromley
- D v. Brunton (2), namely, that there had been a complete dedication of property, that no further act was necessary on the part of the donor to make the gift complete, and that there had been a transfer of the property. I am well satisfied that that is not the proper interpretation of the facts here. The proper interpretation of the facts is that until the donees had received their cheques and paid them into their own banking accounts, and the cheques were
- E cleared and the money came into the donees' banking accounts, no property was transferred at all, nor was any effectual gift achieved. With regard to the observations that SIR ERNEST POLLOCK, M.R., made ([1926] Ch. 42) in Re Swinburne (4), namely :

- F "No indication had been given by the bank, by the certification of the cheque or otherwise, that they held a sum of money exclusively to answer the cheque . . ."

- G it must be observed that what he had in mind was an indication to the donee and not to the drawer of the cheque. It is plain that no indication had been given in that sense by the bank to the donees of the cheques in this case. I am satisfied that the three gifts referred to in the summons were made within three years of the testator's death on June 1, 1944, because they were made on the occasion on which each of the cheques was cleared into the donee's own account.

Declaration accordingly. Costs as between party and party out of the estate.

EVERITT v. EVERITT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Merriman, P., Bucknill and Cohen, L.JJ.), March 30, 31, 1949.]

Desertion—Offer by deserting husband to resume cohabitation—Wife's refusal—Reasonable belief in husband's adultery.

Desertion—Parties living under same roof—Need to prove de facto separation—Interruption of period of desertion—Husband returning to matrimonial home—Parties living in three-roomed flat. A

A husband and wife were married on Apr. 28, 1943, and lived together until Sept. 6, 1943, when the husband left the wife and went to live in the house of a woman with whom he had had sexual relations before his marriage, a fact which was known to the wife. About August, 1945, the husband expressed his wish to resume cohabitation, stating that the woman had now married and was going abroad, and adding that, although he had lived in the woman's house, he had not committed adultery with her. The wife refused to have him back, but he managed to instal himself in the three-roomed flat in which she was living with her child. After four months the wife left the flat and later petitioned for a divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion. B C

HELD: (i) where a wife who had been deserted refused to resume cohabitation in the amply justified belief that the husband had committed adultery, and, later, petitioned for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion, the fact that the judge hearing the petition was not satisfied that the adultery was proved did not bring the period of desertion pleaded in the petition retroactively to an end. D

(ii) where a husband who had deserted his wife offered to resume cohabitation, but had been guilty of adultery which was uncondoned, the wife's refusal to resume cohabitation did not put an end to his desertion and turn her into the deserter. E

Lodge v. Lodge (1890) (15 P.D. 159; 63 L.T. 467), overruled.

(iii) the principle that the necessary element of separation could not subsist when a husband and wife were living under the same roof unless they had ceased to share one household and had set up two households applied not only to the inception of the alleged desertion but also to the interruption of a period of desertion, and, therefore, as the husband and wife were living for four months in a three-roomed flat, it would be difficult to hold that desertion continued during that period, even if the husband had, in the first instance, forced his way in, and on the facts the wife had failed to satisfy the court that during those four months they had lived absolutely separate and apart. APPEAL by the wife from an order of MR. COMMISSIONER BLANCO WHITE, K.C., dated July 14, 1948, dismissing her petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion.

The learned commissioner held that, by refusing to resume cohabitation, the wife had terminated the desertion. The Court of Appeal now held that, as the wife believed, with ample justification, that the husband had committed adultery, her refusal to resume cohabitation did not terminate the desertion, but they dismissed the appeal on other grounds. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

Miss C. Colwill for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is a wife's appeal from a decision of MR. COMMISSIONER BLANCO WHITE, K.C., sitting as a special commissioner in divorce, whereby, on July 14, 1948, he dismissed her petition for divorce on the ground of her husband's desertion. The case raises two important and distinct questions. The first is whether in the circumstances the wife, who had undoubtedly been deserted before the statutory triennium, was entitled to refuse to resume cohabitation, as she unquestionably did, without either, at the least, bringing the husband's desertion to an end, or even, at the worst, becoming herself the deserter. The second question is whether, assuming that the wife was entitled to refuse to resume cohabitation in the fullest sense of the word, there was such a degree of cohabitation during the triennium as to prevent the previous state of desertion from continuing to subsist during the whole of the statutory period. The learned commissioner decided the case against the wife on the ground that by refusing to resume cohabitation she terminated the husband's desertion. As to the second question the learned commissioner, apparently, accepted the wife's evidence (at any rate, in one material particular, to which I shall allude more particularly later) as against the husband's, but did not actually decide the point.

The parties were married on Apr. 28, 1943. The marriage was, in one sense, a marriage of necessity. We do not know whether the parties would in any case have got married, but it is plain that they were married when they were because a child, of which the husband was admittedly the father, had already been conceived. They lived together until Sept. 6, 1943. During those months, according to the evidence of the wife, the husband had been spending unconscionable periods of his time with a woman with whom admittedly he had had sexual relations before he had married his wife. It was said that he was constantly lunching with her, and that, barely staying long enough to change his clothes in the evening, he went to spend his evenings with this woman. Finally, on Sept. 6, 1943, before the expected child was born, he left his wife, and by Oct. 20 he had gone to live in the house of this woman with whom, as I say, he had already had sexual intercourse before marriage, a fact which, it is important to note, was well known to the wife. This act of his in deserting his wife and within a few weeks going to live in that particular house clearly falls within the description of conduct on his part calculated to make the wife believe that he had resumed and intended to continue an association with his old love which, by reason of his intervening marriage, had now become an adulterous association. Plainly, there was abundant evidence on which the learned commissioner could hold that on Sept. 6 the husband deserted the wife. On Feb. 1, 1944, the wife obtained an order from one of the metropolitan magistrates on the ground of desertion. It is true that that order was never enforced, but it is also true that the husband made no payments under it. In these circumstances it seems to me impossible to contend that the inception of a period of desertion in September, 1943, was not fully proved.

After the lapse of nearly two years, i.e., at the end of July or early in August, 1945, the husband intimated his wish to resume cohabitation. He accompanied this intimation with a statement that the woman at whose house he had been living had married a Belgian some little time before and had gone with her husband to Belgium. He added, presumably in response to some expostulation on the part of the wife, that he never had, in fact, committed adultery with this woman, though he had lived under her roof, because from the time he went there she was taken up with the Belgian whom she married. The wife says that she refused to have him back. Nevertheless, by some means which have not been made plain to us, the husband contrived to instal himself in the wife's flat. The flat consisted of three rooms, a bedroom, a sitting-room, and a small kitchenette with a stove in the passage outside. The wife said—and here there was an acute conflict of evidence between the two spouses—that during the period that she remained in this flat (which was a period of almost exactly four months, as she left the flat on Nov. 29, 1945), she not merely did not consent to his coming in and installing himself but she never consented to his remaining there; that they slept in separate rooms, she and the child retiring to a couch in the sitting-room and the husband occupying her bedroom; that there was no sexual intercourse between them; and that she performed no wifely duties of any sort for him. The husband, on the other hand, swore that they were living together as husband and wife in the full sense of the word, including sexual relations, and that she was performing all the ordinary wifely duties such as looking after his rations, preparing his meals, and all the rest of it.

On Nov. 29 the wife left. In connection with this part of the case, I shall have to return later to the examination of the circumstances in which she left and I will say no more about it for the moment. In view of the possibility that other proceedings may supervene later, I do not propose to express any opinion or to find any fact, for I think we have no material for finding facts about what happened after Nov. 29 beyond saying this which is common ground. The wife went to another flat, which she had obtained, and after about a fortnight the husband joined her there. I hope I have used a sufficiently colourless expression. Again, after yet another fortnight, she departed, leaving him in that particular flat. There, so far as this matrimonial history is concerned, I propose to stop and to examine now the issues raised by the learned commissioner's judgment.

The learned commissioner is recorded as summarising the matter in these words :

“ The question is whether, in these circumstances, the husband, by offering

A to return to his wife and to resume matrimonial life with her—and, indeed, doing all he could physically to resume life with her—has terminated his desertion. Counsel for the wife argued that there was no obligation on her to accept an offer to return, because that would mean an obligation to condone adultery and, therefore, his offer, however sincere and however often repeated, did not terminate the desertion. He relies on several cases, in particular on Basing v. Basing (1). I think that I must have regard to the fact that at the time the husband came back in the middle of 1945 his association with Mrs. Reeves was, to the knowledge of the wife, completely over. Mrs. Reeves had married another man and she was going to leave the country—indeed, shortly after that, to the knowledge of the wife, Mrs. Reeve did leave the country with her new husband. The circumstances were totally changed from the circumstances at the time the husband deserted the wife. Though the wife may have believed that there had been adultery, she knew that the circumstances were changed, and not only was there no misconduct taking place but the circumstances had changed in which that misconduct did take place. That the husband desired to return to his wife I personally have no doubt and, though the wife had the right if she could prove adultery to get a divorce on the ground of adultery, I do think, and I hold, that the husband, by coming back to his wife in the changed circumstances, terminated the state of desertion in which he was, and, therefore, I dismiss the petition.”

D I will only add, before I comment on this crucial passage in the judgment, that the learned commissioner, seeing the difficulties that were likely to arise, had made more than one plain suggestion to induce the wife to amend her petition by charging adultery, but it was not felt possible to accede to that intimation.

E That brings me to a consideration of the last paragraph, in which the learned commissioner gives his reason for dismissing the petition. We have had considerable discussion during the argument about the meaning of this passage. I am bound to say that I am still in doubt what the learned commissioner actually was holding. There are three possibilities. I will deal with each one in turn. If he meant that the husband’s explanation to the wife when he returned in 1945, including, as it did, an express denial of having committed adultery at all, ought to have dispelled the wife’s belief that he had committed adultery, hitherto a belief the learned commissioner found amply justified by the husband’s conduct, that decision would be correct in law, but the difficulty I have is that it seems to me to be in conflict with an earlier finding in the judgment where the learned commissioner, after referring to the husband’s statement that during his sojourn in Mrs. Reeves’ household he had been merely a lodger, says :

G “Adultery with Mrs. Reeves is not alleged in this case. If it were alleged, having regard to the presence of the Belgian whom she subsequently married, I should find on the evidence before me that I was not satisfied as to the adultery. Having regard, however, to the previous intimate association between the husband and Mrs. Reeves, I think that the wife was amply justified in concluding that adultery between them had taken place.”

H I must say that on the facts I should have some difficulty in coming to this suggested conclusion. I would point out, incidentally, that it means re-writing a crucial sentence in the last paragraph of the judgment, for it means in effect that in the passage “not only was there no misconduct taking place but the circumstances had changed in which that misconduct did take place” one would have to substitute for those last words the words “in which that misconduct was justly supposed to have taken place,” which is certainly not what he is reported as saying. I say, without expressing any concluded opinion, that I should be the more doubtful about accepting that view of the passage unless I was very sure that the learned commissioner had so found the facts, because the wife's belief was, to some extent, at any rate, fortified by statements which she was allowed to say Mrs. Reeves had made to her. I am not at all dissenting from the learned commissioner's decision that the evidence was admissible. I think it was rendered admissible by the form of a question in the cross-examination of the wife. At any rate, the evidence was given. I am not going to refer to the passage; it is not necessary. Moreover, there was some evidence given by the wife's mother which corroborated the wife's suspicion that the husband had been resuming his association with Mrs. Reeves even before he left the wife. For the moment I prefer to say no more about this view of the matter than that I am doubtful whether on the facts I should be prepared to support that finding, if that is the correct interpretation of it.

The second possible meaning is that the wife's petition must be dismissed because of the learned commissioner's finding that he was not, at the moment of giving judgment, satisfied that the husband had committed adultery, though up to that moment the wife was amply justified in concluding that adultery between them had taken place. That is the alternative view of the passage which I have already quoted. If that is what he meant, that conclusion, in my opinion, would be in plain conflict with the decision of the Divisional Court of the Divorce Division in Glenister v. Glenister (2) and, in particular, with the reasoning on which that decision is based ([1945] 1 All E.R. 518).

I am in the embarrassing position in this case of being obliged to refer to a number of my own judgments. I only hope that I am able to deal with it with becoming humility. Glenister v. Glenister (2) is a case which, until it has been overruled—and, as far as I know, it has not yet been criticised by higher authority—establishes this proposition. I am reported as saying ([1945] 1 All E.R. 518):

"Take a hypothetical case, in which, short of actual and direct proof of adultery, the wife so conducts herself to the knowledge of the husband as to warrant the inference that adultery has been committed, though (I am supposing) that is ultimately held not to be the fact."

I then posed the dilemma that the husband, if he continues to cohabit with his wife, risks being held to have condoned the adultery if it is ultimately established, and, if he leaves his wife because of this belief induced by her own conduct, he is liable to be held to be a deserter, and I went on to say (ibid.):

"It seems to me to put the husband in an almost impossible position, if that is the law. But the question is whether it is the law. I do not think it is. If the wife has so conducted herself as to lead any reasonable person to believe, until she gives some explanation, that she has committed adultery, the husband, becoming aware of the facts and honestly drawing that inference and leaving his wife on that ground ought not to be held to have left her without reasonable cause."

I founded that judgment in part on a decision of SIR JAMES HANNEN (Judge Ordinary) in Ousey v. Ousey and Atkinson (3). It is not necessary to examine that case, or to go through the analysis of it on which I based my judgment in Glenister v. Glenister (2), but I would like to call attention to the fact that, as long ago as 1900, SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in deciding Synge v. Synge (4), referred ([1900] P. 197) to Ousey v. Ousey (2) in these words:

"The primary question to be decided is, Had the husband reasonable ground for desertion? If belief is to be taken into consideration, why should not his honest belief that his wife refused him marital rights without cause justify his conduct, even though the wife honestly believed that she had good grounds for such refusal?"

Then he adds words which are of general application:

"The solution of the problem presented by such conflict of belief is, I think, to be found in holding that where the fact can be determined, the fact must prevail, and that erroneous beliefs on either side are immaterial."

A On this hypothesis the facts, at the earliest, were ascertained at the moment when the learned judge gave judgment. In Wood v. Wood (5) I called attention ([1947] 2 All E.R. 97) to this sort of position—a confession by the wife of adultery with every circumstantial detail fully justifying the husband's belief in the fact that she had committed adultery and, so long as that belief subsisted, entitling him to withdraw from, or to refuse to resume, cohabitation, but there might come a moment when, in spite of her confession, or, indeed, because of her oath that her confession had been false, and supported with equally circumstantial detail, a judge might hold that, not only was the charge of adultery not proved, but the wife had not, in fact, committed adultery. B From that moment the fact has been ascertained and there is no longer any room for the belief, but that does not act retrospectively or retroactively. So long as the belief is reasonably and properly held, the husband's conduct and their respective rights in relation to cross charges of desertion are regulated by the existence of the belief, though there may come a moment beyond which C that is no longer possible. If, therefore, the learned commissioner was holding that his saying that he was not satisfied that adultery had been proved, though the wife up to then had been amply justified in believing that it existed, had brought the period of desertion pleaded in the petition retroactively to an end, he was, in my opinion, wrong.

D There remains the third alternative. If the passage in question means that there had, indeed, been an actual adulterous association, but that its cessation, because of the marriage and departure for Belgium of the woman in question, did not justify the wife's refusal to resume cohabitation, the decision, in my opinion, was also wrong. I think that there is a good deal to be said for the argument that that is what the learned commissioner really meant. The short passage in the penultimate paragraph seems to me to suggest this interpretation. E I will read the passage once more. The learned commissioner said :

"I think that I must have regard to the fact that at the time the husband came back in the middle of 1945 his association with Mrs. Reeves was, to the knowledge of the wife, completely over. Mrs. Reeves had married another man and she was going to leave the country—indeed, shortly after that, to the knowledge of the wife, Mrs. Reeves did leave the country with her new husband." F

Then he adds the phrase in the next paragraph which I have already read :

"...not only was there no misconduct taking place but the circumstances had changed in which that misconduct did take place."

G I know of no authority in support of the proposition involved in this interpretation of a doubtful passage in the judgment except Lodge v. Lodge (6). Counsel for the wife, who has argued this case most admirably, says he did not actually cite, or does not recollect actually citing, Lodge v. Lodge (6) to the learned commissioner, but he tells us that he was, so to speak, steering his argument away from Lodge v. Lodge (6) and towards Basing v. Basing (1), H to which I shall shortly have to refer, and, I have no doubt, in the process clearly indicating the proposition which he was combating. It may be—because, unfortunately, it is the fact that Lodge v. Lodge (6) is still cited in the text-books on this subject—that the learned commissioner looked at the note in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE in which it is embodied. However that may be, the statement of the proposition in the paragraph that I have just read almost exactly expresses the point of the decision in Lodge v. Lodge (6). I said a moment ago that it was unfortunate that this case still appears in the legal textbooks, even in the very latest edition of RAYDEN ON DIVORCE (5th ed., p. 116). It is unfortunate because on Oct. 14, 1940, in Volp v. Volp (7), a Divisional Court composed of HODSON, J., and myself expressed in no measured terms that Lodge v. Lodge (6) was no longer to be regarded as the law. Unfortunately, it did not occur to anyone that it was worth while reporting that decision. We have been provided for the purposes of this case with a transcript of the material part of my judgment and to avoid repetition, and because I find that I wish to say exactly what I said in Volp v. Volp (7), I propose to read and adopt one or two passages from that transcript. I began by saying :

"The argument for the husband has been founded on Lodge v. Lodge (6). This is a case which has not found favour with text-writers. It is a case of the decision in which there has, for many years, been very adverse criticism in the well-known text-book, RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, but, as we are constantly having this case cited to us in support of an argument like the present in these appeals from justices, I think the time has come to say something dogmatic about the case."

I then went on to analyse the decision of BUTT, J. After referring to the fact that the original parting had been by arrangement, that the wife had then pressed the husband to rejoin her, and had been met by a refusal, I said :

"It is quite plain from the judgment of BUTT, J., that he considered that that amounted to desertion on the part of the husband. In fact, he says in his judgment (15 P.D. 160) : 'Desertion undoubtedly commenced in August, 1886, when the husband on one excuse or another refused to accompany his wife to Bournemouth ; but the question is whether that desertion has been continued for two years and upwards.'"

I ought to say, to make the point clear, that in Lodge v. Lodge (6) the wife was petitioning for divorce on the ground of adultery coupled with the desertion, as the law then stood, for two years and upwards at any time, whether or not immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. I then went on [in Volp v. Volp (7)] :

"It appears that in the course of the two years, namely in February, 1887, the wife acquired for the first time knowledge of the fact, which was not disputed at the trial, that her husband had been living in adultery with another woman for at least six years. It appears, if it had ever ceased, at any rate to have continued down to what the learned judge describes as 'the autumn of last year', i.e., the autumn of 1889."

From that it followed that the adultery had been going on through more than the period of two years which was, in fact, relied on. Then my judgment continues :

"After setting out those facts, BUTT, J., is reported as having said (15 P.D. 160) : 'That being so, she was within her right to decline to resume cohabitation with the respondent...'—a phrase about which I should venture to suggest there could be no possible doubt at all. He goes on (ibid., 161) : '... but there remains the question, can she insist on a separation from her husband and at the same time use the separation which she insists on as a desertion by her husband ?' Well, of course not. If she has insisted on a separation to the extent of obtaining a decree, obviously she cannot thereafter insist that any separation after that is desertion on the part of the husband. But that is not apparently what the learned judge means, because there had been no decree in that case. He was referring to the fact that she was trying to get a divorce for desertion based on her remaining absent because of her husband's adultery. He said (ibid.) : 'I think not. More than one offer was made by the husband to return to cohabitation ; but the wife's reply to those offers was to direct her solicitors to inform her husband that she had made up her mind not to live with him. In the witness-box she stated that to have been, and to be, her determination.' It must be borne in mind that the learned judge had already found that she was within her right in declining to resume cohabitation. If so, she was under no obligation to accept these offers of her husband. The true answer was not in question whether the offers were

A genuine or not genuine, but in whether she had the absolute right to refuse them. But the learned judge goes on (ibid.): 'If it appeared that the husband's offer to return to cohabitation was not bona fide, it would not bar the wife's remedy. But the onus of showing that lies with the petitioner, and I am of opinion that it has not been shown in this case.' Accordingly, he pronounced a decree of judicial separation on the ground of adultery.
B If, as seems to me to be indisputable, the wife had ample grounds for refusing any offer made by her husband, it seems to me that the question of the genuineness of the offer does not arise at all. If by refusing an offer made in those circumstances she is precluded from saying that a state of desertion continues, it seems to me that is tantamount to saying that she makes herself a deserter by such refusal, but that quite unquestionably is not the law."

I then proceeded to analyse the proposition that any such conception of the law is in direct conflict with the well-known judgment of WARRINGTON, L.J. ([1924] P. 201) in Thomas v. Thomas (8). I do not propose to read the passage in that judgment or to comment on it at length, for, if I did so, I should merely be repeating what I said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 174) in a later case also named
D Thomas v. Thomas (9). I have read and re-read that passage for the purpose of this judgment and I am prepared to stand by it. The point was that, for what I hoped was the last time, the well-known passage from the judgment of SIR J. P. WILDE (Judge Ordinary) in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (10) had been cited and pressed on the Divisional Court. SIR J. P. WILDE (Judge Ordinary) said (1 P. & D. 698):

"... if the state of cohabitation has already ceased to exist, whether by the adverse act of husband or wife, or even by the mutual consent of both, 'desertion,' in my judgment, becomes from that moment impossible to either, at least until their common life and home have been resumed."

As I stated ([1946] 1 All E.R. 173), I had already, in Jordan v. Jordan (11)
F set out ([1939] 2 All E.R. 35) a number of cases in which that dictum had been criticised almost to vanishing point, and had pointed out that even in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (10) itself the subsequent history shows that SIR JAMES HANNEN (Judge Ordinary) decided exactly the opposite when two or three years later the same parties came before him and he pronounced a decree on the ground, among other things, of desertion, although it was plain beyond the slightest
G doubt that there had been no resumption of cohabitation, there had been no restitution suit, and there had been nothing more on the part of the wife than a formal demand that her husband should resume married life. Moreover, in Pardy v. Pardy (12) the Court of Appeal had decided that, in the case of a consensual separation, when once the separation deed was got out of the way because there had been a repudiation by one spouse accepted by the other, it was quite H competent for the aggrieved spouse to establish a state of desertion without any previous resumption of cohabitation, but in Thomas v. Thomas (9) we were being pressed to say that that was all very well as regards a consensual separation—that you could, so to speak, start from the neutral and establish the positive—but you could not start from the negative and go straight to the positive without an intervening state of rest by a resumption of cohabitation. To show the fallacy of that, the point of my judgment was that it was in flat contradiction of the real meaning of what WARRINGTON, L.J., said ([1924] P. 201) in the earlier Thomas v. Thomas (8). Without reading the passage, for it would be tedious to do so, I can paraphrase the proposition in this way. The only possible conclusion from the judgment of WARRINGTON, L.J., in Thomas v. Thomas (8) is that the unjustified refusal by the spouse who has been deserted to resume cohabitation not merely terminates the desertion but also reverses the process; it "turns the tables," or "puts the boot on the other leg," or whatever metaphor one chooses to adopt; and it is immaterial whether the case is one of mere desertion which is terminable by a simple offer on the part of the deserter to return or is a case of constructive desertion terminable, with more difficulty no doubt, but terminable by appropriate repentance and appropriate assurance of amendment of such a kind, according to the individual circumstances, as the aggrieved spouse is not justified in refusing. To that, of course, must be added the qualification that at the end of his judgment WARRINGTON, L.J., said ([1924] P. 201):

"In each case the question must be determined on its own merits. . ."

In another decision in the Divisional Court—Edwards v. Edwards (13)—my judgment concluded with this ([1948] 1 All E.R. 160):

"There may be some conduct so gross that no woman could be expected ever to resume cohabitation with him. The point is that every case must be dealt with on its merits, and if the husband's merits are so slight that he has very little hope of ever being taken back, that is one of the consequences of his own conduct, and it ought not to affect the result of the case."

It follows, therefore, in my opinion, that if, e.g., it is the husband who is offering to resume cohabitation but he has been guilty of adultery which is uncondoned (as in Lodge v. Lodge (6)) or of cruelty of so atrocious a character that the wife could not possibly be expected to subject herself to a risk of recurrence, then, as WARRINGTON, L.J., said ([1924] P. 201) in Thomas v. Thomas (8):

"... the actual separation must continue to have the quality of desertion by the husband; otherwise I see no alternative except to regard the wife as deserting him, which would be impossible."

That is precisely what was done in Lodge v. Lodge (6) which conflicts with the decision in Basing v. Basing (1) to which the learned commissioner was referred. It is true that it only conflicts with a part of the judgment which, strictly speaking, is obiter, but I will read the passage because, in my opinion, every word of it is right. It is again a judgment of SIR J. P. WILDE (Judge Ordinary). He said (3 Sw. & Tr. 517):

"The only question in the case was, whether this letter, if it amounted to an offer to renew cohabitation with his wife, could be any bar to her right to divorce on the above ground. I am of opinion that it was not. The petitioner was not bound to condone her husband's adultery, and take him back. The necessary period of desertion was complete before the letter was written. Supposing that it were in any case necessary under the statute to show that the desertion continued up to the filing of this petition, such necessity could not apply to a case in which the husband had in the meantime created a bar to his wife's return by the commission of adultery."

In Lodge v. Lodge (6) the letter interrupted the two years. Nowadays, of course, we have to deal with a triennium which immediately precedes the presentation of the petition, which is exactly the case supposed in the last sentence from the judgment of SIR J. P. WILDE (Judge Ordinary) which I have just read. Whichever it is, the point is that it is impossible to uphold the decision in Lodge v. Lodge (6) without turning the wife, who refuses to return to an adulterous husband, into a deserter by the very fact of her refusal, and I now venture to repeat in the Court of Appeal the words with which I concluded my judgment in Volp v. Volp (7) nearly nine years ago :

“ In my opinion, the time has come to say plainly that Lodge v. Lodge (6) cannot be cited as a case of authority.”

A The result so far is that I am very doubtful whether I should find it possible to uphold the learned commissioner's judgment on the ground on which it was based, but that brings me to the further and better particulars of the answer dealt with under what I call the second heading. I propose only to deal with the period, four months in duration, of the alleged cohabitation at 193 South Lambeth Road. I have already alluded to the subsequent fortnights and I propose to say no more about them. In regard to this period of four months at 193 South Lambeth Road, I am not concerned with the question whether B desertion was condoned—a question which may raise some difficulties (which, in my opinion, it is unnecessary to pursue) arising out of the wife's assertion that she had nowhere else to go. The fundamental point about this part of the case is that it was decided by this court in Hopes v. Hopes (14) that the necessary element of separation cannot subsist when a husband and wife are living under the same roof unless they have ceased to share one household and have set up C two households there. In my opinion, it is impossible to limit that decision merely to the inception of the alleged desertion. The same principle must apply to the interruption of a period of desertion. In that case the Court of Appeal rejected the allegation of desertion on facts which were not so strongly in favour of the petitioner as those which the wife here attempted to prove. Be it remembered that what, in effect, she was saying was that the husband D forced his way into the house and that they only remained together, in the sense in which she said they were together, because he insisted on staying there against her will and she had nowhere else to go. That, putting it, I think, at its highest, was the wife's case—a much stronger case than that which was actually dealt with in Hopes v. Hopes (14). Agreeing, as I most heartily do, apart altogether from the fact that, whether I agree with it or not, this court is bound by it, I E think the simplest and shortest way to apply the decision in Hopes v. Hopes (14) to this case is to look at it the other way round and to see what every member of the court regarded as, so to speak, the high-water mark, or the top limit, of the class of case in which, though living under the same roof, the parties could be regarded as in a state of separation. Every member of the court approved a judgment, which again happened to be one of my own, in Smith v. Smith (15). F That was a test case and the King's Proctor had been brought in to argue it. I am not going to refer to it. It is sufficiently summarised in a couple of sentences in another decision of the Divisional Court, Angel v. Angel (16), which also found approval in Hopes v. Hopes (14). In Angel v. Angel (16) I said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 637) :

G “ In a word, Smith v. Smith (15) was a case in which, there being, so to speak, three tiers of the structure in which the spouses lived (a basement, a ground floor and a first floor) the husband had withdrawn from the wife's society and had made his home, so long as she was alive, with his mother, who lived in the basement, and he only went to the ground floor on which the wife thereafter lived, because he could only get to his bedroom on the first floor by going that way. The mother died, and the husband thereafter H continued to make his home in the basement, everything else continuing as before.”

I think I need only add to that description of Smith v. Smith (15) one other word, viz., that there was the additional circumstance that, on his way through, he left from time to time sums of money, arbitrarily selected by himself, for his wife, on her table, without ever speaking to her or giving her any opportunity of speaking to him.

In this case, taking the wife's evidence at its highest and assuming that it has been accepted by the learned commissioner, not only as regards the one thing about which he expresses his belief (viz., that there was no sexual intercourse), but in its entirety, I doubt whether it would be possible, even if one thought that the husband had forced his way in, in the first instance, to hold that for the whole period of four months a state of separation still subsisted. I must admit that I doubt very much whether, applying the test laid down in Hopes v. Hopes (14), it would be possible to hold that there was, not only the creation, but also the subsistence, of two households in those three rooms. But it is not necessary, I think, to express a concluded opinion on that for this reason. It was said that, when the wife left on Nov. 29, 1945, there was found a note. I gather that there had been, if not discovery, at any rate mutual inspection of documents, for counsel for the wife, fully appreciating the gravity of this note in relation to this part of the case, took the bull by the horns and put it to the wife in examination-in-chief, and she denied that she had written it. She made that denial no less than three times altogether, once in response to what was obviously a serious question by the learned commissioner himself. She was cross-examined about this denial, she was made to write down certain words which appeared in the note, and her writing was made an exhibit. Unfortunately, that exhibit has not been forthcoming, but we have two letters which are, admittedly, in her handwriting. The resemblance between the writing in those two letters and the pencil writing on the note was so striking that we invited further consideration of the wife's position. Eventually counsel for the wife was instructed to say that the wife no longer denied that she wrote that note. In other words, she committed rank perjury and counsel for the wife quite rightly, for reasons which I will make plain in very few words, admitted that, if she wrote that note, it was impossible to continue the argument that during these crucial four months there had been no cohabitation, and that whether it was or was not accompanied by sexual intercourse was immaterial. The note is as follows :

" Dear Ted, Forgive me for going like this but I can't stand it any longer. Please look after Freddie I told them that he will be at the nursery tomorrow. I will get your rations in tomorrow dinner time as I shall go to work in the morning. Nobody need know. Also please don't go running to my people as it will make it worse all round. In time I shall properly [qu., probably] come to my senses. Until then please look after Freddie. Will see you in work tomorrow. Flo. Have left some matches on shelf. Hope you have a box. Olive [the neighbour upstairs in the flat above] has got Freddie ; she thinks I have gone to get some fish. I shall be going away this weekend."

I wish to make it clear that I am deciding nothing whatever about the merits of this parting on Nov. 29, 1945, and still less anything about the subsequent parting a month later. What I am deciding is that this note, now admitted to be in the wife's handwriting, is utterly inconsistent with her story that she and the husband were living together for four months as it were by force majeure so far as she was concerned. The result, therefore, is that, though I should feel great difficulty in upholding the dismissal of this petition on the ground on which the learned commissioner based his judgment, I think that it must inevitably be dismissed on the ground that it is impossible for the wife to establish on the known facts, known as they are now, that a state of desertion subsisted during the statutory triennium. For these reasons, in my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree. I do not feel altogether easy about the case because I think that the learned commissioner came to the correct decision for a wrong reason. In the first place, one of the most important issues in the case was whether the wife had written this letter (which she now no longer denies she did write) and counsel for the husband, in the brief argument that she put forward before the learned judge, specifically asked him to deal with its authenticity. Counsel said: "My Lord, in this case I submit that there is here no case of desertion," to which the commissioner replied: "What you say is that the husband offered to return and the three years period was broken?" and counsel for the husband said: "Yes." Then she said: "I would ask your Lordship to find that the note which was written, and which the husband found, is in the wife's handwriting." The learned commissioner did not deal with the disputed letter at all, although in his judgment he did deal with the correspondence. He says:

B "There is for instance a letter the postmark of which is June 25, 1946, in which she writes to her husband 'Ted received your letters safely'."

He did not decide the question who wrote the disputed letter, although he had a test made at the time and asked the wife to write out words to compare them with the disputed writing. I think the reason why he did not deal with this issue about the letter was that he thought the issue was immaterial for the reason that the husband had made an offer to come back and that, in itself, terminated the desertion. Immediately after the passage that I have read, in which he dealt with the letter of June, 1946, he says:

D "The question is whether in those circumstances the husband, by offering to return to his wife and to resume matrimonial life with her—and, indeed, doing all he could physically to resume life with her—has terminated his desertion."

I will not read the passage at the end of the judgment again, as my Lord has read it, but it seems to me to be consistent with the commissioner's view that the husband's offer to return terminated the desertion. I think the learned commissioner was wrong and that he must have based his decision on the judgment of BUTT, J., in Lodge v. Lodge (6). I agree, if I may respectfully say so, with the learned President's criticism of that decision, and I agree also with the judgment of the Divisional Court in Volp v. Volp (7).

E The passage in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., p. 115, para. 128, on this point says:

F "Thus, a wife is always justified in refusing to return to her husband, so long as he continues an adulterous connection; and may insist upon his fulfilment of reasonable requirements as a condition of return to cohabitation."

Among the notes to that paragraph is the following:

G "The decision in Lodge v. Lodge (6) would be in accordance with the modern view, if there had been evidence in that case that the husband had ceased his adulterous connection."

I think that anyone, reading the words of that paragraph and the note (and I see that this statement of the law was also in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 2nd ed., p. 95, published in 1926) and the decision in Lodge v. Lodge (6), would infer that, if the husband announced that he had ended his adultery, he was entitled to ask to be taken back, and that, if the wife refused to take him back, he then terminated his desertion. I am puzzled to know why BUTT, J., came to that conclusion in Lodge v. Lodge (6). The decision seems to be inconsistent with the decision in Basing v. Basing (1), and also to be contrary to any natural idea of justice, because it means that a husband may go away and live in adultery with another person for years and, when that other died, he might say to his wife: "Take me back," and, if the wife refused, she would then be in the wrong. That seems to me to be a quite unreasonable proposition.

H

I think that the learned commissioner was misled by the decision in Lodge v. Lodge (6), and had not the advantage of seeing the judgment in Volp v. Volp (7) because that case had not been reported and the remarks in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE do not suggest that Lodge v. Lodge (6) was wrongly decided. It is unsatisfactory, to my mind, to have to support a judgment which has been based on a wrong reason. One cannot forget that the husband admitted sexual intercourse with Mrs. Reeves before his marriage, and, as regards their relations after his marriage, the learned commissioner in his judgment says :

"I think the wife was amply justified in concluding that adultery between her husband and Mrs. Reeves had taken place."

He is there referring to the period of time after their marriage, between 1943, when the husband left his wife, and 1945, when he returned. So far as I can see, reading the evidence, the husband never did anything to remove that belief except to tell his wife that in 1944 Mrs. Reeves had become engaged to a Belgian and that Mrs. Reeves and her husband, the Belgian, went to Belgium sometime in 1945—the year the husband wanted to come back to his wife—or early in 1946. It looks as if, when Mrs. Reeves decided to marry the Belgian, the husband decided to go back to his wife.

As regards the second point, the husband in his evidence admitted that his wife's attitude, during the four months when they were in the same flat, was that as soon as the opportunity presented itself she would leave. Most unfortunately, however, the wife has lied on a crucial matter, the letter. I would not decide that a husband, having deserted his wife and having lived in circumstances which reasonably led her to think that he was committing adultery while in desertion, could terminate the desertion by forcing himself back into the wife's flat and insisting on living there against her will. This was a little flat, it had only one bedroom, one sitting room and a kitchenette, and she was living there with her child and was the tenant of the flat. When, however, one finds a husband and wife living together in such a small flat for four months, it is almost impossible—I will not say absolutely impossible—to hold that desertion continued during those four months. I think it is for the wife to satisfy the court that during those four months they lived absolutely separate and apart so far as that was physically possible. The terms of the disputed letter, which she denied writing, are quite inconsistent with her story that she lived as far apart from her husband as she possibly could. When one finds her lying on that issue, I think she clearly fails to establish that during those four months the state of desertion continued. I, therefore, think the wife has failed to establish desertion for the necessary three years and the appeal should be dismissed.

GALLAGHER v. SHILCOCK.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Finnemore, J.), March 17, 25, 1949.]

Sale of Goods—Unpaid seller—Re-sale—Buyer's right to recover deposit—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (c. 71), s. 48 (3).

A By s. 48 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893: "Where the goods are of a perishable nature, or where the unpaid seller gives notice to the buyer of his intention to re-sell, and the buyer does not within a reasonable time pay or tender the price, the unpaid seller may re-sell the goods and recover from the original buyer damages for any loss occasioned by his breach of contract."

B The plaintiff agreed to purchase a boat from the defendant and paid £200 as deposit and part payment. He was subsequently informed that he must pay the balance of the purchase money by a certain date or the boat would be re-sold. After a reasonable time had elapsed in which to make the payment, the plaintiff offered the money to the defendant, but the boat had already been sold for more than the original contract price. In a claim by the plaintiff for, inter alia, the return of the deposit:

C HELD: the defendant, by exercising his right of re-sale under s. 48 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, did not rescind the contract or resume the property in the goods, but merely exercised his statutory remedy of re-sale to obtain the contract price; consequently, he did not re-sell as a full and untrammelled owner; and, therefore, the £200 paid by the plaintiff as deposit and part payment must be brought into account, and, as there had been no loss on the re-sale, the plaintiff was entitled to recover that sum.

G ACTION for specific performance of a contract for the sale of goods, damages for breach of the contract, and for the return of a deposit of £200 paid.

H On May 17, 1947, the plaintiff agreed to buy a boat from the defendant for £665 and he paid £200 as a deposit. The sale was "subject to survey" at the plaintiff's expense. The report being satisfactory, the plaintiff finally accepted the boat on May 31 and the defendant agreed to postpone payment of the purchase price pending registration of the boat to enable the plaintiff to raise a mortgage on it and pay the balance due. The boat was never registered, and, on July 16, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff saying that, unless the balance of the purchase price was paid by July 31, the boat would be re-sold and the deposit would be forfeited. On Aug. 22 the plaintiff saw the defendant and offered him the balance, but the defendant told him that the boat had been sold on Aug. 7 for £700. The defence to the plaintiff's claim for the return of the deposit was that the contract was not performed by the plaintiff because he did not find the purchase price at the right date, and, therefore, he was not entitled to the return of the deposit. FINNEMORE, J., held that the deposit was recoverable.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 25. FINNEMORE, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, found (following Howe v. Smith (1) and Maison v. Clouet (2)) that the payment by the plaintiff of the £200 was a deposit, or "a security for the completion of the purchase": per BOWEN, L.J., in Howe v. Smith, 27 Ch.D. 98; that the agreement of May 31 was not a new contract conditional on the registration of the boat; that more than a reasonable time had elapsed by Aug. 22 for the plaintiff to have tendered the balance of the purchase price; and, accordingly, that the defendant was entitled to re-sell the boat. He further held that the property in the boat had passed to the plaintiff on May 31 and that, therefore, he was not entitled to specific performance of the contract or to the damages claimed, and, on the claim for the return of the deposit, he continued: The point left is one of some considerable difficulty, and I am not sure that it has ever yet been decided in terms. It is whether or not in the circumstances of this case the deposit is forfeited. It depends on the construction of the relevant sections of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. As I have said, it is common ground that the property passed and the boat became the boat of the plaintiff on May 31. Had it caught fire and been burnt the next day the loss would have been the plaintiff's. Had it for some reason increased in value, the increase would have been to the plaintiff's benefit. He was entitled at any moment after that date to say to the seller: "Give me my boat," but the seller was entitled to say: "First give me the balance of money due," because payment and delivery are concurrent conditions unless the parties have otherwise agreed.

Mere failure to pay on the appointed day does not rescind such a contract as this unless the parties have otherwise agreed, and time is not of the essence of the contract unless it is expressly made so. This is dealt with in BENJAMIN ON SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY, 7th ed., p. 864, where the editor thus comments on s. 49 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act:

"Whenever the property has passed and the goods have reached the actual possession of the buyer, the seller's sole remedy is by personal action. He stands in the position of any other creditor to whom the buyer may owe a debt: all special remedies in his favour qua seller are gone. By the law of England, in this respect agreeing with the civil law, mere delay by the buyer in paying the price will not justify the rescission of the contract by the seller, unless the right to rescind be expressly reserved."

The leading case on the subject is Martindale v. Smith (3) in which LORD DENMAN, C.J., said (1 Q.B. 395):

"Having taken time to consider of our judgment, owing to the doubt excited by a most ingenious argument, whether the vendor had not a right to treat the sale as at an end and re-invest the property in himself by reason of the vendee's failure to pay the price at the appointed time, we are clearly of opinion that he had no such right, and that the action is well brought against him. For the sale of a specific chattel on credit, though that credit may be limited to a definite period, transfers the property in the goods to the vendee, giving the vendor a right of action for the price, and a lien upon the goods, if they remain in his possession, till that price be paid. But that default of payment does not rescind the contract... In a sale of chattels, time is not of the essence of the contract, unless it is made so by express agreement..."

After May 31 the seller had two courses open to him. Under s. 49 (1) he could have sued for the price. That subsection provides:

"Where, under a contract of sale, the property in the goods has passed to the buyer, and the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to pay for the goods according to the terms of the contract, the seller may maintain an action against him for the price of the goods."

It seems to me beyond argument that, if the seller in this case had taken that course, he could not possibly have sued for the full contract price—£665 and at the same time have kept the £200 without giving credit for it. If he takes proceedings under s. 49 (1) and so invokes the principle which it enshrines, he is not rescinding the contract. He is taking steps to get the contract price paid to him. Clearly, therefore, if the £200 was in part payment of the purchase price as well as being a deposit, and here, beyond any possibility of doubt it was, he must bring that into account and give credit for it.

- B He also has another remedy if the goods have not reached the purchaser. He may retain the goods and so exercise the unpaid seller's lien and in certain circumstances re-sell. He chose in this case to re-sell. I think it would be a curious thing that, if he decided to sue the purchaser for the contract price, he should be limited to that price, but, if he kept the goods and then sold them, he would be entitled not only to get the full contract price but also to keep in his pocket any deposit which had been paid beforehand. I think this must depend ultimately on whether, if the unpaid seller sells against the original purchaser, the contract has been rescinded and the goods have been re-vested in him or whether the view is that he is pursuing the remedy under the Act given to him in order to become no longer an unpaid seller but a paid seller. The special rights of an unpaid seller are contained in s. 39 of the Sale of Goods Act. Sub-section (1) enacts that "... notwithstanding that the property . . . may have passed to the buyer, the unpaid seller . . . has . . . (a) a lien on the goods or right to retain them . . . (c) a right of re-sale as limited by this Act."

- E It is important to remember that the only right to re-sell which the unpaid seller has is the one which is given to him by the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 48, which provides :

- "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, a contract of sale is not rescinded by the mere exercise by an unpaid seller of his right of lien or retention or stoppage in transitu . . . (3) Where the goods are of a perishable nature, or where the unpaid seller gives notice to the buyer of his intention to re-sell, and the buyer does not within a reasonable time pay or tender the price, the unpaid seller may re-sell the goods and recover from the original buyer damages for any loss occasioned by his breach of contract. (4) Where the seller expressly reserves the right of re-sale in case the buyer should make default, and on the buyer making default, re-sells the goods, the original contract of sale is thereby rescinded, but without prejudice to any claim the seller may have for damages."

- G It is plain that the Act draws a distinction between the person who sells under sub-s. (3) and the person who sells because in the contract he has expressly reserved a right to re-sell. Sub-section (4) provides in terms that in the second case the contract is rescinded. There are no such words in sub-s. (3), and the only inference to be drawn is that under sub-s. (3) the contract is not rescinded. Had it been otherwise nothing would have been simpler than to put into the Act : "Where the goods are of a perishable nature, or where the unpaid seller gives notice to the buyer of his intention to re-sell, and the buyer does not within a reasonable time pay or tender the price, the contract of sale is thereby rescinded." The Act does not say that. It says that the unpaid seller may re-sell the goods, and, if that sale does not reimburse him, he may still recover damages for any loss which he has suffered. It is really in essence a way in which the seller makes sure of getting his contract price.

The general principle of English law is that mere lateness or unpunctuality in making payment for goods does not rescind the contract of sale. It would be a curious thing if, nevertheless, the exercise of the remedy of the seller because of delay should rescind the contract. When the unpaid seller sells the goods, does he sell them as a person who, by rescission of the contract, has had full title to the goods re-vested in him, or does he sell them in a capacity analogous to that of pledgee or in some limited capacity? So far as I know, this matter has not been in terms decided. In HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (1st ed.), vol. 25, p. 264, it is put like this:

"Whether the unpaid seller under the foregoing provisions re-sells the goods in the capacity of an owner, so as to be entitled to any profit which may be realised by the re-sale, or whether he re-sells the goods in a capacity analogous to that of a pledgee... is doubtful."

In the Hailsham (2nd) edition, vol. 29, p. 186, the following words have been added to that paragraph "but semble, the former is the correct view." As I have indicated I have come to the other view. I do not think the unpaid seller sells an absolute owner. The property has already passed, and the lateness of payment does not rescind the contract.

There has been discussion at times whether the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, made new law or whether it only declared the existing common law. In the main the Act codified and clarified the common law and it may be helpful to look at the position before the Act. There were many cases on this problem before the Act and I am fortified in the view I have taken by some remarks of LORD BLACKBURN in BLACKBURN ON CONTRACT OF SALE, 3rd ed., p. 495, where he is dealing with the lien which the seller has and the rights which follow from it.

"Assuming, therefore, what seems pretty well established, that the seller's rights exceed a lien, and are greater than can be attributed to the assent of the buyer, under the contract of sale, the question arises, how much greater than a lien are they? It is clear that in no case do they amount to a complete resumption of the right of property, or in other words, to rescind the contract of sale, but perhaps come nearer to the rights of a pawnee with a power of sale, than to any other common law rights."

The power of re-sale which is given to the seller who has exercised his lien or right of retention is, I think, properly described in that way. There is no rescission of the contract. There is, therefore, no complete resumption of the right of property on the part of the seller and when he re-sells he does not sell as the full, complete and untrammelled owner. If that view be right it follows that the defendant must bring into account the £200 he has already received. The £200 was paid under the contract, and the contract has not been repudiated by the purchaser although he has failed to make his payment by the due date. Nothing which has happened has rescinded the contract. What has happened is that the seller has enforced his remedy to obtain the contract price by the right of re-sale given to him under the Act of 1893.

In those circumstances, the deposit must be brought into account and all the seller is entitled to receive is a total of £665, which is the agreed contract price, subject to the right given to him expressly by the Act to claim any damages he may, in fact, have suffered by the purchaser's breach of contract. That conclusion is also fortified by some observations of FRY, L.J., in Howe v. Smith (1). In that case in addition to the £500 which was paid as deposit and in part payment of purchase money the contract provided that the purchase must be completed on a certain day and there was also a clause that, if the purchaser should fail to comply with the agreement, the vendor should be at liberty to re-sell and to recover any deficiency in price as liquidated damages. In other words, that contract gave an express right of re-sale to the seller quite apart from what the legal position might be about deposit. Towards the end of his judgment FRY, L.J., says (27 Ch.D. 104) :

“ Yet another point has been raised and demands decision. The eighth clause of the agreement gives, as I have already stated, a power to the vendor to re-sell if the purchaser fail in his performance, and declares that the deficiency on such second sale shall be made good by the defaulting purchaser and be recoverable as liquidated damages. In the present case, the defendant, the vendor, declined to perform the contract on the ground of delay on the part of the plaintiff, the plaintiff brought this action, and about six months subsequently the vendor re-sold the property at the original price ; and it is contended by the plaintiff that the defendant thereby lost all right of retaining the deposit. If the vendor had chosen to re-sell under this power and to sue the purchaser for the deficiency, he would, in my opinion, and in accordance with the case of Ockenden v. Henley (4), have been obliged to bring the deposit into account ; but that is not the course which he has pursued . . . in my opinion there has been such default as justifies the vendor in treating the contract as rescinded ; it affords the vendor an alternative remedy, so that he may either affirm the contract and sell under this clause or rescind the contract and sell under his absolute title. If he act under the clause, he must bring the deposit into account in his claim for the deficiency : if he sell as owner, he may retain the deposit, but loses his claim for the deficiency under the clause in question.”

The case dealt with a sale of land and with the special contract there made, but I think that the position arising by virtue of s. 48 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act is comparable in that the seller who re-sells and so ensures the contract price and any damages he may have suffered is affirming and not rescinding the contract, and, accordingly, must bring the deposit into account. The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of £200 paid by him as deposit.

NORTON v. WHITE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Singleton, L.JJ.), April 4, 5, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Dwelling-house owner-occupied from 1930 until 1936—Let before 1930 at 14s. per week and after 1936 at 35s. per week—Owner's occupation not registered—Whether house controlled immediately before the Act of 1938—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 1 (2).

The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12, provides : “ (2) This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling, where either the annual amount of the standard rent or the rateable value does not exceed [certain amounts] and every such house or part of a house shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which this Act applies.” By the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 1 (2) : “. . . the principal Acts shall not apply to any dwelling-house unless it is a dwelling-house to which they applied immediately before the passing of this Act [i.e., before July 18, 1933] . . . and it is also a dwelling-house of which either the annual amount of the recoverable rent on the appointed day or the rateable value on the appointed day did not exceed" certain amounts. The Act of 1933 also provides in s. 16 (1): "' Dwelling-house ' has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let."

Until 1930 a dwelling-house was let at 14s. per week, and thereafter until 1936 the house was occupied by the owner, but he did not register the house under s. 4 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, as having become free from control by virtue of s. 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1923. On Nov. 30, 1936, the house was let to the present tenant at 35s. per week, and in August, 1939, the present landlord became the landlord. On Oct. 25, 1948, the tenant applied to the county court to determine the standard rent, and it was decided by the registrar, whose order was affirmed by the county court judge, that the standard rent was 14s. per week. On appeal, it was argued by the tenant that, as the landlord had failed to register the "decontrol" under s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1938, the Acts were, by s. 4 (2) of that Act, deemed to apply to the house and, therefore, the standard rent was 14s. per week, and not 35s. which it was agreed would be the amount if the house was brought under control by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939.

HELD: in both s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 and s. 16 (1) of the Act of 1933, a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply is defined as "a house . . . let as a separate dwelling"; on July 17, 1933, the house in the present case was not let, but was occupied by the owner; and, therefore, it was not one to which the Acts applied on July 17, 1933, and so was "decontrolled" by s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1933 and the standard rent was 35s. per week.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of HIS HONOUR JUDGE DONE, at Edmonton County Court, dated Nov. 23, 1948, affirming an order of the registrar that the standard rent of a dwelling-house was 14s. per week. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, holding that the standard rent was 35s. a week, which was the amount which had been paid by the tenant since 1936. The decision turned on the question whether the house was controlled immediately before the passing of the Act of 1938, which depended on whether it was controlled immediately before the passing of the Act of 1933. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J., and are summarised in the headnote.

Scott Henderson, K.C., and L. S. Fletcher for the landlord.

J. F. Donaldson for the tenant.

TUCKER, L.J.: Before 1930 the premises in question here were let at 14s. per week. From 1930 till 1936 they were owner-occupied. On Nov. 30, 1936, by an agreement of that date, the house was let to the present tenant for three years at £91 per annum, i.e., at 35s. per week, by the present landlord's predecessor in title. In August, 1939, the present landlord became the landlord of the property. From November, 1936, until these proceedings, the tenant has duly paid the rent of 35s. per week. On Oct. 25, 1948, the tenant applied to the registrar to fix the standard rent, claiming that the standard rent was 14s.

- A per week, the figure at which the premises were first let after August, 1914, and not the 35s. per week he had been paying for 12 years. Until 1931, the rateable value of the house was £19, and since April, 1931, it has been £25. No question of rateable value arises in these proceedings. It is conceded that, so far as rateable value is concerned, the premises are within the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, and, if they are controlled by that Act, the standard rent is 14s. per week, as fixed by the learned judge.
- B On the other hand, if they are not within the Act of 1938, but if they were only caught by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, the standard rent is 35s. per week, the sum agreed on Nov. 30, 1936.

- C In my view, the point on which this decision depends is whether the principal Acts applied to this dwelling-house on July 17, 1933. It is necessary to refer to the relevant sections in the Acts. It is conceded that up till 1930 the house was within the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. It came within s. 12 (2) of that Act, which provides :

- D "This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling, where either the annual amount of the standard rent or the rateable value does not exceed [certain amounts] and every such house or part of a house shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which this Act applies."

The Act of 1923, by s. 2 (1) provides :

- E "Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act, or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house."

- F In the present case, the landlord did come into possession after the passing of this Act, namely, in 1930, and, accordingly, as from that date, the principal Act ceased to apply to the dwelling-house. The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 1 (2), provides :

- G "As from Sept. 29, 1933, the principal Acts shall apply to any dwelling-house unless it is a dwelling-house to which they applied immediately before the passing of this Act or then formed part of such a dwelling-house, and it is also a dwelling-house of which either the annual amount of the recoverable rent on the appointed day or the rateable value on the appointed day did not exceed "

- H certain specified amounts. As I have already said, it is common ground that this house is within that second limb. The question is whether it was a house to which the principal Acts applied immediately before the passing of this Act, that is to say, was it a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts applied on July 17, 1933 ? In one sense, it clearly was not, because it had been taken out of the principal Acts by s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1923, but it is said that it would have been outside the purview of the principal Act in any event, apart altogether from the provision of the Act of 1923, and that it is not necessary for the landlord to rely on the Act of 1923 at all. The Act of 1933 contains a definition of "dwelling-house" in s. 16 (1) :

" ' Dwelling-house ' has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let."

In s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1938 there is this provision :

" Subject to the provisions of this Act relating to registration, the principal Acts as from Sept. 29, 1938, shall not apply to any dwelling-house unless it is a dwelling-house to which they applied immediately before the passing of this Act . . . " and is within certain rateable values. So, subject to the provision relating to registration, a dwelling-house is outside the Act if it is a dwelling-house to which the Acts did not apply immediately before the passing of this Act.

It is, therefore, necessary to see whether or not this was a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts applied immediately before the passing of the Act of 1938, and, in order to do so, we are thrown back to s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1933. The premises in question were not let on July 17, 1933, but they were let in 1936. It is said on behalf of the landlord that, having regard to the Act of 1933 and the position of these premises on July 17, 1933, the principal Acts did not apply to them on that day, irrespective altogether of the provisions of the Act of 1923.

I now pass to the provisions with regard to registration in the Act of 1938, because the whole of s. 2 of that Act is subject to the provisions dealing with registration. Those provisions are to be found in s. 4 (1) :

" If the landlord of any dwelling-house let as a separate dwelling immediately before the passing of this Act, being a dwelling-house of which the rateable value on the appointed day did not exceed the respective amount mentioned in s. 2 of this Act, claims that by virtue of the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1923 the principal Acts had ceased to apply to the dwelling-house before the passing of this Act, he shall within three months after the passing of this Act make to the council of the county borough or county district in which the dwelling-house is situated application in the prescribed form for the registration of the dwelling-house."

Thus, where a landlord is claiming to be excluded by the Act of 1923, in order to preserve his exclusion he must register. Sub-section (2) of the same section provides :

" If, in any proceedings with respect to any dwelling-house which is, or immediately before the passing of this Act formed part of, a dwelling-house to which sub-s. (1) of this section applies, it appears that but for the provisions of the said s. 2 of the Act of 1923 the principal Acts would have applied to the dwelling-house and that no application has been made by or on behalf of the landlord under that subsection within the time therein mentioned, the dwelling-house shall, subject as hereinafter provided, be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply."

In an admirable argument counsel for the tenant urged that these premises were removed from the control of the Acts by the Act of 1923, and that the landlord could not escape from that. When, therefore, he claims that he is outside the scope of the Acts after the coming into force of the Act of 1938, if he shows as part of his case—as he must do—that the house has been taken out of the control of the Acts by the Act of 1923, then, if he has not registered, the exclusion from control is not preserved. Furthermore, counsel says, apart from the provisions of the Act of 1923, on July 17, 1933, this dwelling-house would have been a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts applied, notwithstanding the fact that it was not at that date let as a separate dwelling, because it was a house within the limits of rateable value prescribed by the Acts and had at one time been let. The argument on behalf of the landlord is that, by reason of the definition of " dwelling-house," whether you take the definition in the Act of 1933 or that in the Act of 1920, in order that a house shall become a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply it must be a house which at the material date was let as a separate dwelling, and on July 17, 1933, this, house was not let as a separate dwelling. Therefore the landlord says that, apart altogether from the provisions of the Act of 1923, the principal Acts did not apply and would not have applied in any event. He says: "I am not claiming under s. 4 of the Act of 1938, that, by virtue of the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1923, the principal Acts have ceased to apply to this dwelling-house. I am saying that, apart altogether from the Act of 1923, this house was not within the principal Acts at the material date."

The learned county court judge said that, in his view, the application of s. 4 to the house was "quite clear." It was decontrolled by the Act of 1923, and, but for that Act, the principal Acts would have applied. I confess that, whatever the proper answer may be to the problems which arise in the present case, I do not find them clear. I have come to the conclusion that the interpretation put on these sections by the landlord is the correct one, and so have arrived at a different conclusion from that reached by the registrar and the learned county court judge. It seems to me that the point that the principal Acts had no application to this house on July 17, 1933, is a good one. In my view, for the Acts to apply to a house at any particular moment of time with which the court is concerned (and in this case the court is concerned with July 17, 1933), it is essential that it should, at that moment of time, be a dwelling-house let as a separate dwelling. In that connection, I should like to refer to what was said by SLESSER, L.J., in Schaffer v. Ross (1). The question had arisen previously of the effect of the definition of "dwelling-house" in s. 16 of the Act of 1933, having regard to the definition in s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920. I have read those definitions, and I will not repeat them, but they are not in quite the same language. SLESSER, L.J., said ([1939] 4 All E.R. 365):

"A doubt was expressed in Brooks v. Brimecome (2) as to the effect of that definition in the Act of 1933 on the earlier definition which I have cited in s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, but, if the matter has now to be considered, for myself, I am of the opinion that, having regard to that subsequent definition, and having regard, indeed, to the whole mischief to which the Acts are directed, s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 should be read as if the word 'let' governed the whole house as well as part of it."

I respectfully concur with what SLESSER, L.J., said there, so far as it applies to the case with which we are dealing, and to the extent that it conflicts with the decision of SARGANT, J., in Woodfield v. Bond (3). Therefore, in my view, it matters not whether it is the definition of the Act of 1933 or the definition of the Act of 1920 to which we have to look for the purpose of deciding the status of this dwelling-house on July 17, 1933.

In arriving at this decision, I have derived some assistance from R. & P. Properties v. Baldwin (4). It is true that the facts of that case are different from those of the present case. In that case, two adjacent flats in a block of flats were controlled under the Acts and let to two separate tenants at separate rents. In June, 1935, the tenant of one of the flats left, and the landlords then made certain alterations in the two flats and turned them into one, and thereafter let the one flat at an increased rent of 15s. The learned deputy county court judge held that the alterations made by the landlords were of a minor kind and did not change the identity of the flats as a separate dwelling-house, and that the combined premises continued to be subject to the Rent Acts. In giving his judgment and coming to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the deputy county court judge, SLESSER, L.J., emphasised the fact that he regarded the reconstruction as having completely altered the identity of the premises. Having set out what the alterations were, SLESSER, L.J., said ([1938] 4 All E.R. 847):

"To my mind, it is impossible, on that evidence, after the new flat rent had been fixed at 15s., following upon the assimilation of No. 69 and No. 70 into one occupied premises, to come to the conclusion, as the judge did, that the identity of No. 69 or No. 70 continued as a separate identity. To my mind, it is clear that there was, after June, 1935, a new occupation of new premises, which did not exist as premises before that time. There was thereafter only one doorway giving access to both the premises. The space in the wall was now capable of utilisation as a passage to and fro, a state of affairs which did not exist before. There were those and other physical alterations. The obligation of rent was an obligation agreed on to pay 15s., extending, as Mr. Stewart said, over the new combined flat. I think that the judge was wrong, on those facts, in coming to the conclusion that, as a matter of law, from the point of view of the Rent Restriction Act, one could still look at No. 69 or No. 70 as separate dwelling-houses, admittedly controlled under the Act before 1935."

Having referred to the provisions of the Act of 1938 and the Act of 1933, he said (ibid.):

"If the right view be, as I have said, that this combined flat was let as a separate dwelling, it is clear that it could not have been let as a separate dwelling before June, 1935, because before that date it did not exist, and, therefore, was not a dwelling-house within the meaning of s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1933."

CLAUSON, L.J., and GODDARD, L.J., attached little, if any, importance to the extent of the physical alterations in the premises. CLAUSON, L.J., referred to them and then said (ibid., 848):

"The landlord made the alterations of a quite minor character which were necessary to enable No. 69 and No. 70 together to be occupied as one flat. Those alterations had, however, the very important effect of turning what had previously been two tenements separately occupied into one tenement capable of a single occupation... The position seems to me, when one studies the intricacies of it, to be reasonably plain. By reason of s. 2 of the Act of 1938, a house let as a separate dwelling is not a house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts apply unless it is a house which, let as a separate dwelling, is one to which the Acts applied before the passing of the 1938 Act. It appears from s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1933 that no house let as a separate dwelling before the passing of the Act of 1938 is a dwelling to which the Rent Restrictions Acts apply unless the Acts applied to that house let as a separate dwelling before the passing of the Act of 1933. At the time the Act of 1933 was passed, the combined flat No. 69 and No. 70 was not a house let as a separate dwelling. At that time, two separate flats, No. 69 and No. 70, were separately let and separately occupied. The combined flat of No. 69 and No. 70 thrown together only came into existence as a subject-matter of a letting, and as a house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts might possibly apply, in 1935. In other words, it was not a house which existed at all as a house to which the Act could apply in 1933."

GODDARD, L.J., said (ibid., 849):

"To my mind, it makes very little difference—in fact, it makes no difference, I think—whether or not they have had, at some time since 1933 or 1935, internal connection made between them. They are adjoining premises. In 1935—and, indeed, in 1933, before [July 18] 1933, they were not let as a separate dwelling, but they were let as two separate dwellings."

I pause there because I cannot help feeling that, if the fact had been that at the material date they were not let at all, the reasoning of GODDARD, L.J., would have applied with still greater force. GODDARD, L.J., continued:

"They were treated as two distinct hereditaments, let at two distinct rents to two distinct persons. Therefore, I cannot see how it can be said that the premises which are comprised in the demise to Mr. Baldwin, in respect of which this action is brought, were, at the material date to which I have referred, let as a separate dwelling. If they were let as two dwellings, it follows that they are not let as a separate dwelling."

A I would substitute for that, "If they were not let at all, but were in the occupation of the landlord, it follows that they were not let as a separate dwelling." GODDARD, L.J., continued :

"It may be that those which have been two are made into one. That is another matter. The person who lives in the flat which previously was two flats, and has been reconstructed into one, does not say that he lives in two flats, but that he lives in one flat. The fact is that these premises were never let as a separate dwelling until 1935. As they were not let as a separate dwelling in 1933, the Act does not apply."

Counsel for the tenant says that one material distinction to be made in regard to that case is that, although it might be true to say that, if these premises had never at any time been let and had been owner-occupied on July 17, 1933, they would have been outside the Acts, it is different if at some previous date they had once been let. The difficulty I find about that is that, although it might be quite a possible view of the matter for the legislature to have taken, I cannot anywhere find in the Acts any such provisions, nor can I find any authority to that effect. It seems to me, although I agree that the facts are very different, that the reasoning—at any rate, of CLAUSON, L.J., and GODDARD, L.J.—in the judgments which I have just read apply to the present case. On July 17, 1933, the landlord being in occupation, these premises could not be said to have been let as a separate dwelling. Not being let as a separate dwelling at the material date, they were not within the principal Act. I think the landlord can establish the exclusion of these premises without reference to the Act of 1923 at all, and effect can be given to the provisions of s. 4 of the Act of 1938, by which registration is required in certain circumstances by the landlord, because they are clearly necessary and would operate in a case where the premises had been taken out of the Acts by the Act of 1923 but were let on July 17, 1933. In that case, the only way in which the landlord could preserve the exclusion which the premises had acquired under the Act of 1933 would be by registering under the provisions of s. 4 of the Act of 1938. In my view, in the present case there was no need for the landlord to preserve the exclusion which existed—irrespective altogether of the Act of 1923—and which attached, if I may use the expression, to these premises on July 17, 1933. For these reasons, I think that in this very complicated and difficult case the argument of the landlord prevails. In my view, the appeal succeeds.

G SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal allowed. Declaration that the standard rent was 35s. per week. No order as to costs in the county court. Landlord to have the costs of the present appeal.

NOTE.R. v. DUFFY

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Cassels, JJ.), April 4, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Murder—Manslaughter—Provocation—Direction by judge.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, who was convicted on Mar. 16, 1949, before DEVLIN, J., at Manchester Assizes, of the murder of her husband, had been subjected to brutal treatment by him. On the night of the offence, there had been quarrels and blows had been struck. The appellant had wished to take their child away and the husband had prevented her. The appellant left the room for a short while and changed her clothes, and eventually, when her husband was in bed, she returned with a hatchet and a hammer, with both of which she struck him. For the defence it was pleaded that the appellant had acted under provocation, but the jury, having been directed by the judge as to what constituted provocation sufficient to reduce murder to manslaughter, found the appellant guilty of murder. The Court of Criminal Appeal now dismissed the appeal. Giving the judgment of the court, LORD GODDARD, C.J., approved the direction given to the jury by DEVLIN, J., and it is to place the terms of that direction on record that the case is noted.

LORD GODDARD [delivering the judgment of the court]: The only possible defence that could be set up was that the appellant acted under such provocation as to reduce the crime to manslaughter, and on this point the summing-up of the learned judge, in the opinion of this court, was impeccable. I am going to read a passage from his summing-up, because I think it deserves to be remembered as as clear and accurate a charge to a jury when provocation is pleaded as can well be made. He said:

"Provocation is some act, or series of acts, done by the dead man to the accused which would cause in any reasonable person, and actually causes in the accused, a sudden and temporary loss of self-control, rendering the accused so subject to passion as to make him or her for the moment not master of his mind. Let me distinguish for you some of the things which provocation in law is not. Circumstances which merely predispose to a violent act are not enough. Severe nervous exasperation or a long course of conduct causing suffering and anxiety are not by themselves sufficient to constitute provocation in law. Indeed, the further removed an incident is from the crime, the less it counts. A long course of cruel conduct may be more blameworthy than a sudden act provoking retaliation, but you are not concerned with blame here—the blame attaching to the dead man. You are not standing in judgment on him. He has not been heard in this court. He cannot now ever be heard. He has no defender here to argue for him. It does not matter how cruel he was, how much or how little he was to blame, except in so far as it resulted in the final act of the appellant. What matters is whether this girl had the time to say: 'Whatever I have suffered, whatever I have endured, I know that Thou shalt not kill.' That is what matters. Similarly, as counsel for the prosecution has told you, circumstances which induce a desire for revenge, or a sudden passion of anger, are not enough. Indeed, circumstances which induce a desire for revenge are inconsistent with provocation, since the conscious formulation of a desire for revenge means that a person has had time to think, to reflect, and that would negative a sudden temporary loss of self-control which is of the essence of provocation. . . . Provocation being, therefore, as I have defined it, there are two things, in considering it, to which the law attaches great importance. The first of them is whether there was what is sometimes called time for cooling, that is, for passion to cool and for reason to regain dominion over the mind. That is why most acts of provocation are cases of sudden quarrels, sudden blows inflicted with an implement already in the hand, perhaps being used, or being picked up, where there has been no time for reflection. Secondly, in considering whether provocation has or has not been made out, you must consider the retaliation in provocation—that is to say, whether the mode of resentment bears some proper and reasonable relationship to the sort of provocation that has been given. Fists might be answered with fists, but not with a deadly weapon, and that is a factor you have to bear in mind when you are considering the question of provocation."

That is as good a definition of the doctrine of provocation as it has ever been my lot to read, and I think it might well stand as a classic direction given to a jury in a case in which the sympathy of everyone would be with the accused person and against the dead man and it was essential that the judge should see that the jury had an opportunity of vindicating the law, whatever the consequences might be. That the appellant was properly convicted of murder according to law there can be no doubt, and, therefore, this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

LITTLECHILD v. HOLT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Denning, L.J., and Birkett, J.), March 31, April 1, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Landlord becoming such by purchase after Dec. 6, 1937—Death of landlord intestate—Widow suing as administratrix and personally—Whether widow landlord by purchase—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. I, para. (h) (as amended by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938 (c. 26), sched. II).

The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (h) (as amended by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, sched. II), provides that an order may be made for possession where "the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord (not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after Dec. 6, 1937) for occupation as a residence for (i) himself..."

On Mar. 9, 1944, L. bought a dwelling-house which was subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920-1938, and was occupied by M., as statutory tenant, and M.'s daughter, H. On Mar. 17, 1945, M. died, and H. continued to reside in the house, paying the rent, and becoming the statutory tenant by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. On May 26, 1948, L. caused to be served on H. a notice to quit expiring on June 6, 1948. On June 8, 1948, proceedings for possession were started by L., but on the day before that fixed for an adjourned hearing L. died. L.'s widow took out letters of administration and on Oct. 4, 1948, an order to continue the proceedings was made, the widow being substituted for L. as plaintiff.

HELD : (i) it was open to the widow to pursue the claim for possession both as administratrix and in her own right.

(ii) L. was a landlord by purchase after Dec. 6, 1937, and the widow, whether in her personal capacity or as administratrix, having derived her title from L. was in no better position than L. had been, and was, therefore, unable to recover possession.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE CLOTHIER at Guildford County Court, dated Nov. 18, 1948, whereby he granted possession of a dwelling-house to the plaintiff.

The proceedings for possession of the house, which was subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts, were started by L. L. died, and an order was made, substituting L.'s widow (and administratrix) as plaintiff. It being apparent that L. would have been unable to succeed in his claim for possession since he had become landlord by purchase after Dec. 6, 1937, the main question for the court was whether L.'s widow was in a better position. The Court of Appeal, differing from the learned county court judge, held that she was in the same position as L. had been and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J. D

Niall MacDermot for the tenant.

E. P. Wallis-Jones for the plaintiff (L.'s widow). E

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : On Mar. 9, 1944, Mr. Ernest Edward Littlechild bought a dwelling-house which was occupied by one Mills. It is conceded that Mills was a tenant who was entitled to take advantage of the Rent Acts. Mills' daughter, Mrs. Holt, was living with him when he died on Mar. 17, 1945. Mrs. Holt continued thereafter to live in the premises. On May 26, 1948, a notice to quit expiring on June 6, 1948, was served on Mrs. Holt, who had been paying rent since her father died. The present proceedings were started on June 8, and came on for hearing by the learned judge on July 1. The case was not finished on that occasion and it was adjourned until July 22. Unfortunately, on the day before the case was to be resumed at the Guildford County Court, the landlord, Ernest Edward Littlechild, died. Thereupon, the case had to stand over until his widow had taken out letters of administration and an order to carry on was made. On Oct. 4 an order substituting the widow as plaintiff was made, and the case was heard on Nov. 15. When the case was resumed, the plaintiff took up the position that she was entitled to sue both in her own right and as administratrix. So far as her representative capacity was concerned, she would, of course, only have the rights of the deceased. It may be that she had additional rights in her own capacity as universal devisee and legatee of her husband. F

The first point that was taken by counsel for Mrs. Holt was one of procedure. That can be very shortly dealt with. He said that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to sue in her own right, and that she could only exercise in G the action the rights, and stand in the shoes, of her deceased husband. In my opinion, that point is not sound. It is always the case that a claim by an executor or administrator, as executor or administrator, can be joined with a claim by the executor or administrator personally. So, too, if there is a claim by the executor personally, it can be joined with a claim by him or by her as executor. That being so, it seems to me that it is open to a

- A person who obtains an order to continue proceedings as administrator or executor to join a claim by himself or herself in his or her personal capacity with the claim that is made in the representative capacity. At any rate, it seems to me, it is within the discretion of the court to allow those two claims to be made at the same time. I can well understand that there might be cases in which the court would refuse the joinder of two such causes of action. Supposing, however, a simple claim for goods sold and delivered is brought by a person who dies during the pendency of the action and his executor is appointed to carry on the proceedings, it may be that the executor himself has a claim either for goods sold and delivered or money lent or some other money claim against the defendant. I can see no reason why those two claims should not be joined and proceeded with in the same action. It might be, of course, that on a simple money claim, such as for goods sold and delivered by the deceased, the executor might desire to join a claim, let us say, for unliquidated damages for a tort which he himself alleged that he had against the defendant. The court might say that it would not allow those two causes of action to be joined because it would be inconvenient or embarrassing. These are matters of discretion for the court, but where the two claims are of a very similar nature I can see no reason at all why they should not be joined. Therefore, I think it was open to the learned judge in this case to allow the plaintiff to pursue the action both in her capacity as administratrix of her husband and in her own right.

The question then arises whether or not Mrs. Holt was in the position of a protected person holding over after her father's death. I think there is no doubt that she was. By the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g) (as amended by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935, s. 1):

- E "... the expression 'tenant' includes the widow of a tenant who was residing with him at the time of his death, or, where a tenant leaves no widow or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court."

F Mrs. Holt has been found by the learned judge to be a member of the tenant's family residing with him at the time of his death, and it is necessary that she should have resided there for six months. That also, we must assume, was found in her favour by the learned judge. She never had a contractual tenancy, and her only right to remain in the house appears to me to be that given her by s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920.

G The next question is whether or not the plaintiff, in her own capacity or as the administratrix of her husband, is in a position to ask for an order for possession. The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (h) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1938, sched. II), provides that an order may be made for possession where

- H "the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord (not being a landlord who has become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house or any interest therein after Dec. 6, 1937) for occupation as residence for—(i) himself . . ."

or certain other persons. When the action was launched by Mr. Littlechild he admittedly was a landlord who had become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house after Dec. 6, 1937, and he would not, therefore, have been able to get an order for possession himself. As I have said, we must take it that Mrs. Holt showed during the course of the action that she had been residing in the house as a member of Mr. Mills's family for a period of six months, and, therefore, Mr. Littlechild would not have been able to obtain an order for possession against her. Is the plaintiff in a better position than her husband would have been? It would be a very remarkable hiatus in the Act if she were. Section 12 (1) (g) is inserted in the Act of 1920 for the protection of the tenant. The "tenant" is the expression used all through the Acts as meaning the person who is holding the property. It would be remarkable if the tenant were protected against the landlord, but lost his protection if the landlord died and his interest passed to some other person. The tenant then would have protection as long as the person who bought the property after Dec. 6, 1937, remained the landlord of the property, but the moment that person disposed of his interest in the property otherwise than by sale the tenant would no longer be protected.

I will briefly refer to two cases which have been cited to us: Baker v. Lewis (1) and Fowle v. Bell (2). Those cases, no doubt, decided that a person who takes by will is not a person who has purchased a house within the meaning of para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933. The Court of Appeal held in those cases that "purchasing" meant "buying," and that it had not got the technical conveyancing meaning attributed to it in relation to real property. Baker v. Lewis (1) and Fowle v. Bell (2) are, however, distinguishable from the present case, because the persons who there succeeded to the property by will took the property from a person whose title had not got the clog on it (if I may use that expression) that was on Mr. Littlechild's title in this case. In Baker v. Lewis (1), the plaintiff had acquired the property by will, and there is nothing in the report to show that the testator was a person who himself would not have been able to gain possession of the house by reason of the fact that he had bought the house since the material date. The testator had probably owned the house for many years. He had left it to the plaintiff, who did not acquire it by purchase, and, accordingly, was in a position to exercise the same rights as the testator had exercised, i.e., to claim possession if she could show greater hardship than the tenant. Fowle v. Bell (2) was similar. In the present case, however, the landlord from whom the plaintiff acquired title could not apply for an order for possession because of the provisions of sched. I, para. (h), to the Act of 1933.

Section 12 (1) (f) of the Act of 1920, provides that

"The expressions 'landlord,' 'tenant,' 'mortgagee,' and 'mortgagor' include any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord, tenant, mortgagee, or mortgagor."

That seems to me clearly to indicate that a person who acquires property from a landlord cannot have a better right to an order for possession than the landlord from whom the property was acquired. As, in this case, the original landlord, Mr. Littlechild, would have come exactly within the words in brackets in para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 (as amended) and would have been debarred by those words from obtaining an order for possession on the grounds stated in that paragraph so long as the Act is in force, it follows that the plaintiff was debarred from obtaining possession. For these reasons, I think the appeal must be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: Landlords of houses within the Rent Acts are subject to many restrictions. They cannot, as a rule, get possession without showing that alternative accommodation is available for the tenant, but, if a landlord reasonably requires a house for his own occupation, he may, in certain circumstances, be relieved of the obligation to show that alternative accommodation is available. That, however, does not apply to landlords who have become landlords by purchasing the house since 1937. The intention of the legislature was that people should not be able to buy houses over the heads of the tenants and then turn them out without giving them alternative accommodation. The question in this case is whether the landlord was under that disability. For a landlord to be under the disability, three requisites are necessary. First, there must have been a "purchase" of the dwelling-house or an interest therein since 1937. The acquisition of the reversion, whether it be a freehold or a leasehold, for money or money's worth, and whether payable in a lump sum or by instalments, is plainly a "purchase," but the acquisition of it under a will is not a purchase: Baker v. Lewis (1). Nor, strangely enough, is the acquisition of the reversion in the shape of a new lease at a rack rent: Powell v. Cleland (3). Secondly, there must have been a contractual or statutory tenancy in existence at the time of the purchase which is still in existence today, but there need not be the same tenant there. It is the tenancy which is protected, whether it is a contractual tenancy which since the purchase has become a statutory tenancy, or whether it has been a statutory tenancy all the time. The protection is not lost by a contractual tenant assigning his interest to another, or by a member of the tenant's family succeeding to a statutory tenancy, but it is lost when the tenancy expires and a new one is voluntarily created: Epps v. Rothnie (4); Fowle v. Bell (2). Thirdly, the purchase must have been by the present landlord or his predecessor in title. The disability affects not only the purchaser himself, but also his successors in title: see s. 12 (1) (f) of the Act of 1920. So long as the tenancy continues in existence, the landlord and his successors to the reversion on the tenancy come under the disability. In this case, these three requisites are fulfilled. The house was purchased by Mr. Littlechild in 1944. There was then a statutory tenancy in existence in the hands of Mr. Mills. That tenancy is still in existence today in the hands of his daughter, Mrs. Holt, who, as a member of his family, succeeded to the tenancy. Mr. Littlechild was, therefore, subject to the disability, and his wife, as his successor, is in no better position than he. Therefore, the disability applies, and the landlord cannot get possession without giving alternative accommodation. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT, J.: I agree. I think the decision of the court which has just been announced is in accordance with the purpose of these rather complicated Acts of Parliament. My Lord, in his judgment, stated clearly the position of Mrs. Holt, and came to the conclusion, both on the construction of the Acts of Parliament and on the findings of the learned county court judge, that she was a protected tenant. If that be so, it seems to me that the question in this case is whether the plaintiff has the right or power to overcome the protection which Mrs. Holt had. It is clear that Mr. Littlechild would have had no power to recover possession against the original tenant, Mr. Mills, and none against Mrs. Holt, and the question is: Is the plaintiff in any better position? The learned county court judge has decided this issue, I think, on the literal interpretation of the words. He said that the plaintiff did not purchase the property and, therefore, did not become landlord by purchasing the dwelling-house. Taking the purely literal meaning of the words, he came to the conclusion that the provision—the "clog," as my Lord termed it—which certainly created a disability in the case of Mr. Littlechild was removed in the case of the plaintiff. I do not think so. It is plain that her position depended entirely on the fact that she had succeeded her husband, and I cannot think that she was in any better position than he was. In my opinion, the judgments delivered are correct and with them both I agree.

FAIRMAN v. FAIRMAN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P. and Ormerod, J.), March 22, 23, 1949.]

Adultery—Evidence—Accomplice—Need of corroboration.

The husband, against whom a maintenance order had been made on the ground of his desertion, applied for the discharge of the order on the ground of his wife's adultery with a man who had been staying with her as a lodger. The only evidence of the offence was that of the lodger himself who swore that over a period of at least three years he and the wife had habitually committed adultery in the house where they were living. The wife denied adultery.

HELD : the same strict proof was required of adultery as was required of an offence against the criminal law; the evidence of the lodger was that of an accomplice; it was not corroborated; and, therefore, it should not be accepted and adultery had not been proved.

APPEAL by the wife against a decision of Wealdstone justices, dated Dec. 15, 1948, discharging a maintenance order which had been made in her favour on the ground of the husband's desertion on Apr. 16, 1942. The justices discharged this order on the ground that the wife had committed adultery since it was made.

The justices based their finding of adultery on the evidence of a man who during the relevant period had been staying as a lodger in the house where the wife was living and stated that he had frequently committed adultery with her. This was denied by the wife. The Divisional Court held that the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice to adultery was insufficient to prove that offence and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

Horner for the wife.

Cridlan for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is a wife's appeal against a decision, given on Dec. 15 last by the justices for the Gore petty sessional division of Middlesex sitting at Wealdstone, to discharge a maintenance order made in favour of the wife on the ground of her husband's desertion on Apr. 16, 1942. The order was discharged on the ground that the wife had committed adultery since the making of the order. It is common ground that the man with whom she was alleged to have committed adultery was a lodger for at least three years. That the situation of a landlady and a lodger is such that an opportunity to commit adultery is thereby afforded is indisputable, but it would be preposterous to draw the inference of adultery merely from a business relationship of that sort. A great deal more than such evidence of opportunity is necessary to convict a woman, who, for perfectly valid business reasons and because she has been deserted by her husband, takes people of the opposite sex to lodge in her house, but it is important to bear in mind that in the present case the charge of adultery was not based on merely circumstantial evidence, part of which was the opportunity thus afforded.

There are two main ways in which adultery is normally sought to be proved. The first is where there is no direct evidence of the commission of the offence, but it is sought to prove it circumstantially, by inference from the fact that there is a guilty affection between the two parties coupled with opportunity. If there had been anything worth considering in the present case in the nature of evidence of guilty affection to couple with the evidence of the opportunity afforded by the relationship of landlady and lodger, the case might conceivably have been presented in a different form, but it was not that class of case. It was one of the other group of cases where it is sought to convince the court that adultery has been committed by direct evidence of the offence given by one who, in the nature of things, was an accomplice, for the only evidence was that of the man with whom it was alleged that the wife had committed adultery. Indeed, only two witnesses were called, that man and the wife. He swore that over a period of at least three years, ending in 1946, they had habitually committed adultery in his bedroom at the house in question. She denied on oath ever having committed adultery with him or having been in the same bed. In one respect they were agreed, and that was that there was a time when the man had an accident and was incapacitated from work. Ultimately he recovered compensation in the sum of £300, but meanwhile—for a period which lasted for a considerable time—the wife kept him on as a lodger. When he recovered his compensation he paid her half of it in respect of the time during which he had been unable to pay his rent. The fact that she kept him on in this way was put against her, but it is possible to draw a sinister or a charitable inference from it. The wife herself said that, had she known how long the man would be incapacitated from work and unable to pay his weekly money, she would not have given him credit, but her case was that, once having started to do so, she continued, and at the end he gave her the money which was due to her. I have laid particular emphasis on that matter because it was pressed against her, and it is the only thing which is common ground between her evidence and that of the man, except the overriding fact that he was lodging with her throughout the material time.

The crux of her case is that the finding against her that between 1943 and 1946 she was continually committing adultery with this man depends on his evidence alone and his evidence is plainly that of an accomplice.

There is little doubt how the law stands. I am not going to examine in detail R. v. Baskerville (1) where all the authorities were fully reviewed. It is necessary only to refer to two cases, first, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Statham v. Statham (2), bearing in mind that, though the court were dealing with a matrimonial offence, they were also considering a question of sodomy which, in addition to being a matrimonial offence, is a criminal offence. In that case, RUSSELL, L.J., called attention to the fact that there was no evidence of the commission of the offence except the statement of the wife, and said ([1929] P. 150) :

“The offence of sodomy is an offence of so serious a nature that a rule has grown up, that in criminal trials for certain offences (which include sodomy) the judge must warn the jury of the seriousness of convicting, in the absence of some evidence to corroborate the story of the other party to the act alleged. If no such warning has been given a conviction will be quashed. Notwithstanding the warning the jury may convict—but the warning must be given or the conviction will not stand. Is this rule to be confined to criminal trials for the offence? I can see no reason why it should be so confined.”

That brings me to Ginesi v. Ginesi (3), where the Court of Appeal examined a dictum of my own (indeed, I think it is more than a dictum) in the reserved judgment of the Court of Appeal which I delivered in Churchman v. Churchman (4). In Churchman v. Churchman (4) we were dealing with onus of proof in relation to the allegation that a husband had connived at his wife's adultery. Manifestly, as the Court of Appeal recognised both in that case and in Ginesi v. Ginesi (3), the same sort of principles apply to an allegation of connivance in the offence of adultery as to the offence of adultery itself. In Churchman v. Churchman (4) I said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 195):

“The same strict proof is required in the case of a matrimonial offence as is required in connection with criminal offences properly so-called.”

In Ginesi v. Ginesi (3) the Court of Appeal unreservedly approved that observation in relation to a charge of adultery, including as WROTTESELEY, L.J., expressly said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 376) connivance, while leaving open the question whether the current generality of the observation applied to other matrimonial offences. As a footnote to the phrase I then employed, I would like to add that I have always directed juries and myself on the basis that adultery is a quasi-criminal offence, and that, therefore, to that charge the same principles should be applied as in the case of criminal offences properly so-called, but I am not conscious of ever having directed either myself or a jury that the same strictness applies to other matrimonial offences—in other words, in relation, for example, to desertion, cruelty, or wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance, that it is necessary to direct oneself more strictly than that the onus lies on the spouse who makes the charge to satisfy the court that the offence is proved. The precise measure of proof in other matrimonial offences is, however, no more in question here than it was in either Churchman v. Churchman (4) or Ginesi v. Ginesi (3), and I am prepared to leave the subject where it was left by the learned Lords Justices who decided Ginesi v. Ginesi (3).

The one thing that emerges is that it is not enough in such a case as the present merely to say: “Here is a witness on one side; here is a witness on the other. Which do we prefer?” I cannot see any trace of a direction by these justices to themselves in the terms summarised by RUSSELL, L.J., in the passage I have read from Statham v. Statham (2). It has been suggested to us by counsel for the husband that the justices saw and heard the witnesses and have preferred the evidence of the man to that of the wife, but that will not do on the authority of the House of Lords in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (5), or The Hontestroom (6), for it is common to both those pronouncements of the House of Lords that an appellate tribunal need not accept the decision of the court below on a question of fact if that court has misdirected itself.

One of the cases which is the foundation of the judgment in R. v. Baskerville (1), was expressly approved in Statham v. Statham (2), and is implicit in the passage which I read from the judgment of RUSSELL, L.J., is the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Tate (7). There LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1908] 2 K.B. 682):

“In the present case the judge did not direct the jury in accordance with the settled practice, but told them that the question for them was which of the two witnesses they believed, the boy or the prisoner, thereby leading them to suppose that if they believed the accomplice's story they might properly convict although his evidence was entirely without corroboration."

A I am not satisfied that that is not what has happened here, and in those circumstances, this finding cannot stand.

We have been referred to a judgment of WALLINGTON, J., in Spring v. Spring and Jiggins (8), in which the only evidence of adultery against the co-respondent was that of the wife. The report shows that the learned judge had gone very carefully into the wife's evidence of the adultery and he is stated to have said this ([1947] 1 All E.R. 887):

"Counsel has argued that there ought to be corroboration, but corroboration of what? It can only mean corroboration of the wife's testimony. It cannot mean that, if she is believed, the court cannot draw the irresistible inference from it that it involves necessarily adultery by the co-respondent with the wife. In my view, corroboration in such circumstances is not called for. If it is called for, there is abundant corroboration in the whole of the circumstances of this case."

C

With regard to the latter sentence I have no criticism to offer, and if the evidence did afford abundant corroboration of the wife's evidence as against the co-respondent, it follows that the observation that corroboration in such circumstances is not called for was merely obiter dictum. Whether it is obiter dictum or was necessary to the decision of the case, however, in my view, that statement cannot stand in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in, among other cases, Ginesi v. Ginesi (3).

D

I am satisfied that the decision of the justices in the present case cannot stand for the reasons that I have given, and, in my view, the only proper course to take is to set it aside and to leave the husband—if he is so minded and can get sufficient evidence—to satisfy the justices on a proper direction to themselves about the necessity for corroboration of the evidence of this lodger. In other words the order which I propose is to set aside the finding of adultery and the order discharging the maintenance order in favour of the wife on that ground and to remit the husband's summons for such an order to a different panel of justices for the same petty sessional division for rehearing if the husband is minded to demand a rehearing.

JENKINS v. HOWELLS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Cassels, JJ.), April 7, 1949.]

Education—School attendance—Duty of parents to secure regular attendance of pupils—"Unavoidable cause"—Permanent incapacity of widowed mother—Education Act, 1944 (c. 31), s. 39 (2) (a).

Section 39 of the Education Act, 1944, provides: "(1) If any child of compulsory school age who is a registered pupil at a school fails to attend regularly thereat the parent of the child shall be guilty of an offence against this section. (2) In any proceedings for an offence against this section . . . the child shall not be deemed to have failed to attend regularly at the school by reason of his absence therefrom with leave or—(a) at any time when he was prevented from attending by reason of sickness or any unavoidable cause."

The respondent, the widowed mother of a child aged fourteen, was a chronic invalid awaiting admission to hospital for an operation on her eyes. She owned a farm of 260 acres, which was worked by three unmarried sons, and there was no one on the farm other than the respondent and the child to attend to the household duties. The child failed to attend school during the period Sept. 6, 1947, to July 31, 1948, on 225 out of 390 sessions and for the period ending Sept. 17, 1948, when the school was open for 102 sessions, the child failed to attend at all. The respondent's case was that the child was required to work at home because of her (the respondent's) incapacity.

HELD: "unavoidable cause" in s. 39 (2) (a) was a cause affecting the child; in the present case, the cause only affected the respondent; and, therefore, the respondent had committed an offence under s. 39 (1).

[FOR THE EDUCATION ACT, 1944, s. 39 (2) (a) see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 37, p. 168.]

CASE STATED by Carmarthen justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Newcastle Emlyn, an information was preferred by the appellant, a school attendance officer, under s. 39 (1) of the Education Act, 1944, against the respondent charging that between July 15 and 17, 1948, being the parent of a child of compulsory school age, she was guilty of an offence in that the said child failed to attend regularly at a school where she was a registered pupil. The justices dismissed the charge on the ground that the permanent incapacity of the respondent constituted an unavoidable cause within the meaning of s. 39 (2) (a) of the Act. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal of the school attendance officer.

R. G. Dow for the appellant.

The respondent was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This Case is stated by justices of the county of Carmarthen who found that the respondent, the mother of a girl aged fourteen years and three months at the time of the hearing of the information, was a chronic invalid and had been forbidden by the doctor to take any part in household work and was awaiting admission to hospital for an operation in connection with her eyes. The child has not been sent to the appropriate school, which is two and a half miles away, and under s. 39 (5) of the Education Act, 1944, absence from school is only excused in the case of a child over eight if the school is three miles away from the child's home. The mother owns a farm of some 260 acres. She has three unmarried sons who work on the farm. The child, who is the only daughter of the house, has been kept at home doing household duties while the sons were engaged on the farm, the mother being unable to work.

The justices dismissed the information because they came to the conclusion that the child had not attended the school by reason of an "unavoidable cause" within the meaning of s. 39 (2) (a) of the Act of 1944. This court feels that there was no evidence on which the justices could find "unavoidable cause." The child had been continuously away from school. Out of 390 sessions she had missed 225. We think that the words "unavoidable cause" must be construed in relation to the child. It is a defence under s. 39 (2) (a) if the child is absent "at any time when he was prevented from attending by reason of sickness or any unavoidable cause." In our opinion, sickness in that sub-section must mean the sickness of the child and the "unavoidable cause" must be an unavoidable cause which affects the child. The unavoidable cause in this case affects the mother and not the child. Parliament has not seen fit to provide that family responsibilities or duties can be used as an excuse for a child not attending school. If we allowed the facts in this case, which certainly arouse great sympathy, to afford a defence, it would mean that this child would not go to school at all. How the domestic affairs of this farm and this small family are to be carried on, I do not pretend to know, and I can quite understand the justices taking the view that they did, but I think we are bound to hold that the reason for the child's absence does not amount to a defence. I think that "unavoidable cause" in this sub-section must be read as something in the nature of an emergency. If, for instance, the house where the child lived were burnt down that would be regarded, at any rate for a day or two, as an "unavoidable cause." In the circumstances I think we are bound to hold that there was no evidence of "unavoidable cause" within the meaning of s. 39 (2) (a), and the Case must, therefore, go back to the justices with a direction that the offence is proved.

OLIVER, J. : I agree. When the excuse set up is the chronic illness of a parent, the effect of deciding as the justices have decided would be that the child would never go to school at all. I cannot read s. 39 of the Act of 1944 as intending to include such a state of affairs as that.

LOWTHER v. SMITH.

Justices—Sentence—Fine—Amount—Act under which offender prosecuted only providing penalty of imprisonment—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (c. 49), ss. 4, 5—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (c. 60), s. 376 (1) (d).

By the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 4, where any other Act authorises a sentence of imprisonment, but not a fine, for an offence triable summarily, a court of summary jurisdiction may, nevertheless, instead of imprisonment impose a fine not exceeding £25 and "not being of such an amount as will subject the offender under the provisions of this Act, in default of payment of the fine, to any greater term of imprisonment than that to which he is liable under the Act authorising the said imprisonment." By s. 5 the maximum period of imprisonment in default of payment is fourteen days where the fine exceeds 10s. but not £1.

A court of summary jurisdiction sentenced a seaman to fourteen days' imprisonment for disobeying a lawful order contrary to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 376 (1) (d), under which the penalty for the offence is imprisonment for not more than four weeks and forfeiture of two days' wages. On appeal to quarter sessions, the recorder held that the appropriate penalty was a fine and that the maximum fine permissible under the Act of 1879 was one of £1. On appeal to the Divisional Court by the prosecution, HELD: the amount of the fine must be measured by the length of the imprisonment authorised by the Act under which the offender was convicted, and, therefore, as the maximum imprisonment which could be imposed under s. 376 (1) (d) of the Act of 1894 was four weeks (and so less than a calendar month), the maximum fine permissible was £1, and the decision of the recorder was correct.

CASE STATED by the Recorder of Kingston-upon-Hull.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Kingston-upon-Hull, on Sept. 14, 1948, the respondent, a seaman, was convicted of wilfully disobeying a lawful command, contrary to s. 376 (1) (d) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and was sentenced to imprisonment for 14 days. On Oct. 6, 1948, the respondent appealed to quarter sessions, and the recorder varied the sentence imposed by the court of summary jurisdiction by ordering the respondent to pay a fine of £1 or to be imprisoned for 14 days in default of payment. He held that having regard to the terms of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, ss. 4 and 5, taken in conjunction with the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 376 (1) (d), he had no power to impose a fine exceeding £1. The Divisional Court now dismissed an appeal by the prosecution.

Cumming-Bruce for the prosecution.

E. Ould for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This Case, stated by the recorder of Kingston-upon-Hull, raises a novel point under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, ss. 4 and 5.

The respondent was charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with wilfully disobeying a lawful command during his engagement to serve in a fishing boat, he being a seaman to whom the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 376 (1) (d), applied. The court of summary jurisdiction sentenced him to fourteen days' imprisonment, and against that sentence he appealed to quarter sessions. The learned recorder came to the conclusion that it was a case in which it was desirable to impose a fine and so avoid sending the respondent to prison if he could pay the fine. He thought that £10 would be a proper fine, but he felt constrained to impose a fine of only £1 because of the provisions of ss. 4 and 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act. He has stated this Case asking the court whether he had power to impose a heavier fine. The court had some doubt whether or not a Case could be stated by the recorder on a matter where he had imposed a fine. The more correct procedure might have been for him to refrain from imposing a fine if there were a question of law to be discussed and to take the opinion of the court on what his powers were, but the court does not think that that is a fatal objection to the hearing of this Case because it is stated as a point of law. The fine must be taken to have been imposed subject to the Case, and we need not further consider the point. We have come to the conclusion that the recorder was clearly right in the view he took of the law.

Under s. 376 (1) (d) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the penalty for the offence of wilfully disobeying any lawful command during an engagement to serve in a fishing boat is imprisonment for any period not exceeding four weeks and forfeiture of two days' wages. It is important to notice that Parliament, in 1894 when the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, was some fifteen years old, deliberately used the expression "four weeks" and not "a month."

A By the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 3, if the word "month" had been used, it would have meant a calendar month, and so s. 376 (1) (d) should be read as imposing a liability to imprisonment for any period not exceeding 28 days. Section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, provides :

" . . . where a court of summary jurisdiction has authority under an Act of Parliament other than this Act, whether past or future, to impose imprisonment for an offence punishable on summary conviction, and has not authority to impose a fine for that offence, that court when adjudicating on such offence may, notwithstanding, if the court think that the justice of the case will be better met by a fine than by imprisonment, impose a fine not exceeding twenty-five pounds, and not being of such an amount as will subject the offender under the provisions of this Act, in default of payment of the fine,

B to any greater term of imprisonment than that to which he is liable under the Act authorising the said imprisonment."

C By s. 5 the scale of imprisonment for non-payment is laid down :

" The period of imprisonment imposed by a court of summary jurisdiction under this Act, or under any other Act, whether past or future, in respect of the non-payment of any sum of money adjudged to be paid by a conviction, or in respect of the default of a sufficient distress to satisfy any such sum, shall, notwithstanding any enactment to the contrary in any past Act, be such period as in the opinion of the court will satisfy the justice of the case, but shall not exceed in any case the maximum fixed by the following scale ;

D . . . where [the fine] . . . Exceeds 10s. but does not exceed £1—Fourteen days. Exceeds £1 but does not exceed £5—One month. Exceeds £5 but does not exceed £20—Two months. Exceeds £20—Three months."

No doubt that scale of imprisonment can be reduced, that is to say, if the court imposes a fine of, e.g., £2, it does not follow that the court is bound to send the defendant to prison for a month in default of payment. If the court thinks that the appropriate sentence should be 21 days or fourteen days it can impose that sentence, but we have to consider what fine can be imposed when the maximum sentence of imprisonment given by the Act "other than this Act,"

F which did not authorise imposition of a fine, is a certain defined term.

It seems to me that s. 4 measures the fine as s. 5 measures the imprisonment. Most statutes when giving power to a court to impose a penalty of a fine or imprisonment, or a fine with imprisonment in default, lay down the maximum amount of the fine. Here counsel for the prosecution argues that the court can impose a fine of any amount up to £25 provided that it makes the term of imprisonment in default not to exceed that which the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, provides as the penalty under s. 376 (1) (d), that is to say, four weeks. I find it impossible to construe s. 4 in that way. If it had not been for the words "and not being of such an amount as will subject the offender under the provisions of this Act . . . to any greater term of imprisonment" I think

G counsel's argument would be sound, but it seems to me that those words clearly indicate that Parliament intended that the fine should be measured by the term of imprisonment which the Act under which the offender was prosecuted authorised, that is to say, if the Act provides that a man shall be liable to three months' imprisonment, he can be fined £25, and if it provides that he can be sent to prison for one month, he can be fined up to £5. If, however, the Act provides, as it does in this case, that the penalty of imprisonment is less than a calendar month, the statute, in any judgment, specifies £1 as the maximum fine that can be imposed. That is the only sensible interpretation that can be given to ss. 4 and 5 of the Act of 1879. They are not intended to leave to justices an unfettered discretion to impose any fine they like so long as it does not exceed £25. In fixing a monetary penalty they must have regard to the length of the imprisonment which is authorised by the Act under which the defendant is convicted. It must be assumed that Parliament considered that a fine of £1 and imprisonment for, e.g., 14 days are almost interchangeable terms, and it follows that, if a defendant can only be sentenced to a period of less than a calendar month, the appropriate fine is £1. If the statute had been intended to provide otherwise the words "not being of such an amount" would not have been included. The statute would have provided that the fine should not exceed £25 and that offenders should not be sentenced in default to a longer term of imprisonment than the Act which authorised the imprisonment provided. For those reasons I think that the decision of the learned recorder was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

DOLLFUS MIEG ET COMPAGNIE S.A. v. BANK OF ENGLAND.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), March 10, 11, 15, 16, 17, April 6, 1949.]

Conflict of Laws—Impleading foreign sovereign states—Gold bars belonging to French company seized by Germans and carried off to Germany—Discovery by Allied forces—In possession and under control of governments of United States, United Kingdom and France—Deposit with Bank of England for purpose of applying Agreement by Allied governments on restitution of monetary gold—Action by French company against bank claiming delivery of bars or damages for conversion.

In May, 1939, a French company purchased 64 bars of gold and lodged them for safe custody with a bank at Limoges in a vault hired for that purpose in the company's name. In August, 1944, the gold bars were forcibly seized from the bank by the Germans and carried off to Germany. After the invasion of Germany by the Allied armies, the bars were found by the United States forces in the United States Zone of Occupation and passed into the custody of the United States military authorities. By pt. III of the Agreement on Reparation from Germany, on the Establishment of an Inter-Allied Reparation Agency and on the Restitution of Monetary Gold, dated Jan. 14, 1946, and signed by representatives of eighteen Allied Governments, all the monetary gold found in Germany by the Allied forces was to be pooled for distribution as restitution among the countries participating in the pool in proportion to their respective losses of gold through looting or by wrongful removal to Germany. In September, 1946, a Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold was set up by the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France, for the purpose of applying the terms of pt.

III of the Agreement. The terms "monetary gold" and "non-monetary gold" were not defined by the Agreement, but for the purposes of a questionnaire issued in February, 1947, to enable the Tripartite Commission to carry out its function, "monetary gold" was defined as: "All gold which at the time of its looting or wrongful removal was carried as part of the claimant country's monetary reserve, either in the accounts of the claimant government itself, or in the accounts of the claimant country's central bank or other monetary authority at home or abroad." In March, 1948, the Bank of England was requested by the Treasury to open a gold set-aside account in the name of the Treasury on account of "the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France," the account to be operated by the representatives of these three governments on the Tripartite Gold Commission. In agreeing to this request, the bank stated that it would make charges in connection with the account, and it, therefore, became a bailee for reward. On June 29, 1948, the French company presented to the United States Occupation Authorities a claim in respect of the gold bars, and was informed that the bars were at that time located at the foreign exchange depository at Frankfurt and their disposition was subject to the orders of the Tripartite Gold Commission. In July, 1948, under the orders of the Tripartite Commission, who, apparently, regarded the bars as "monetary gold" within the meaning of pt. III of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946, the bars were conveyed to England and deposited with the Bank of England in the gold set-aside account for disposal in accordance with the provisions of pt. III of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946. In an action by the company against the bank claiming (inter alia) delivery of the bars, and, alternatively, damages for their conversion, the bank contended that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action as it impleaded two foreign sovereign states who declined to submit to the jurisdiction.

HELD : (i) the principle whereby immunity from process in the municipal courts was accorded to foreign sovereign states was not confined to cases where a foreign sovereign was directly impleaded as a defendant or where relief in rem was sought in his absence against property owned by him or in his possession or under his control; any such limitation would be inconsistent with the essential corollary to the principle of immunity that the municipal court would not so exercise its jurisdiction as to put a foreign sovereign to election between being deprived of property owned by him, or of the possession or control of property in his possession or under his control, or else submitting to the jurisdiction of the court; and, therefore, although no foreign sovereign state was a party to the action brought by the French company, and the bank was the sole defendant, and although the relief sought was relief in personam and not in rem, the action was, nevertheless, one to which the principle of immunity might be applicable.

(ii) in opening the gold set-aside account with the Bank of England, the Treasury was not the bailor, but was acting as an intermediary on behalf of the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France, who were the depositors of the gold to be held in the account, and the fact that the bank was a bailee for reward did not exclude the three governments from possession or control of the gold.

Ancona v. Rogers (1876) (1 Ex. D. 285; 35 L.T. 115), applied.

(iii) for the purposes of the principle of immunity, "possession" meant legal or constructive, as opposed to actual or physical, possession (The Arantzazu Mendi ([1939] 1 All E.R. 719; [1939] A.C. 256; 160 L.T. 513), applied), and, therefore, notwithstanding their deposit with the bank, the gold bars were still in the possession of the three governments for the purposes of the principle.

(iv) assuming, however, that the three governments as bailors were not in possession of the gold in the sense intended by the principle of immunity, they were in control of it within the meaning of the principle.

(v) the bailors were not the respective representatives of the three governments on the Tripartite Commission, but the three governments acting for this purpose through their respective representatives on the Commission.

(vi) interference with the joint possession and control of the three governments would be interference with the possession and control enjoyed by each of them jointly with the others, and the fact that the government of the United Kingdom could be sued in this country under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, did not give the court jurisdiction to interfere with the joint possession and control quoad the two governments of foreign states, and, therefore, the principle of immunity was not excluded by the fact that possession and control of the gold bars was vested in the two foreign governments jointly with the government of the United Kingdom.

(vii) assuming that control for public purposes was to be regarded as an essential condition of immunity, the purposes for which the gold bars were held by the three governments were essentially public purposes within the meaning of the principle of immunity, and none the less so because they were public purposes not merely of the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France, but also of the other Allied governments party to the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946; and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the company's action in respect of its claim for delivery up of the bars or for relief by way of injunction.

(viii) the court could not hold the bank to be wrongfully in possession without also holding the three governments to be wrongfully in possession, and it was only on the footing that the bank was wrongfully in possession that any relief, whether by way of damages or otherwise, could be awarded against the bank; an order for delivery up of the gold to the plaintiff company would have the effect of determining the bailment, putting an end to the estoppel subsisting between the bank and the three governments, and leaving the bank free to set up the title of the plaintiff company in any proceedings brought against it by the three governments as equivalent to an eviction by title paramount, and an award of damages against the bank, involving, as it necessarily would, a decision of the court that the title of the plaintiff company was paramount to that of the three governments, would have the like effect; if the bank was ordered to pay, and paid, to the plaintiff company damages representing the value of the gold, the title of the plaintiff company to the gold would pass to the bank, and the bank could in its own right set up that title against the three governments; and, therefore, damages could not be awarded against the bank without interference with the possession or control of the gold bars by the three governments.

(ix) the action was an attempt to sue indirectly the three governments concerned, two of which (viz., the governments of the United States and France), as governments of foreign sovereign states, could not be directly sued in the courts of this country, and, therefore, the action should not be allowed to proceed.

MOTION by the defendants, the Bank of England, applying for an order to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings in an action by a French company, Dollfus Mieg et Compagnie S.A., on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action as it impleaded two sovereign states, the governments of the United States of America and the Republic of France, who declined to submit to the jurisdiction.

The plaintiff company was the owner of some gold bars which had been seized and removed to Germany by the Germans during their occupation of France. In 1948, with the object of carrying out the provisions of an Agreement by the Allied Governments dated Jan. 14, 1946, the bars were deposited by the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France in a "gold set-aside account" which had been opened on their behalf at the Bank of England at the request of the Treasury. In the action against the bank, the plaintiff company claimed (a) delivery of the gold bars, or, alternatively, damages for their conversion; (b) an injunction restraining the bank from dealing with or parting with possession of the bars, and (c) damages for their detention. JENKINS, J., held that the action was an attempt to sue indirectly the governments concerned, two of which were foreign sovereign states who could not be directly sued, and, accordingly he granted the defendants' application. The facts appear in the judgment.

G Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and R. O. Wilberforce for the plaintiff company. Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and Geoffrey Cross for the defendants, the Bank of England.

Cur. adv. vult.

H Apr. 6. JENKINS, J., read the following judgment. In May, 1939, the plaintiffs, Dollfus Mieg et Compagnie S.A., a French company carrying on the business of thread and yarn manufacturers, purchased from or through a Swiss Bank 64 bars of gold, and lodged them for safe custody with the Crédit Commercial de France at Limoges in a vault hired for the purpose in the name of the plaintiff company. In August, 1944, the 64 gold bars were forcibly seized and removed from the Crédit Commercial de France by a detachment of German troops accompanied by German officials, and carried off to Germany. After the invasion of Germany by the Allied Armies the 64 gold bars were found by the United States forces in the United States Zone of Occupation and passed into the custody of the United States military authorities, who placed them in the United States Foreign Exchange Depository at Frankfurt. On Dec. 21, 1945, the Paris Conference on Reparation issued its Final Act (published by the Stationery Office as Command Paper Miscellaneous No. 1 (1946) (Cmd. 6721)) which recommended that the governments represented at the Conference should sign in Paris as soon as possible an Agreement on Reparation from Germany, on the Establishment of an Inter-Allied Reparation Agency and on the Restitution of Monetary Gold in the terms of the draft agreement therein set forth. By an Agreement in the terms, or substantially in the terms, of the draft set forth in the Final Act of the Paris Conference on Reparation, dated Jan. 14, 1946, and signed by the representatives of eighteen allied governments (which was published by the Stationery Office as Command Paper Treaty Series No. 56 (1947) (Cmd. 7173)), provision was made (by pt. I) for German reparation including (in art. 8A) a provision to the effect that a share of reparation consisting (in addition to a sum of dollars therein mentioned) of "all the non-monetary gold found by the Allied Forces in Germany" should be "allocated for the rehabilitation and re-settlement of non-repatriable victims of German action"; (by pt. II) for the establishment, functions and organisation of an Inter-Allied Reparations Agency, to which each government was to appoint a delegate and an alternate to take the place of a delegate in his absence, including (in art. 2B) a provision to the effect that the agency should deal with all questions relating to the restitution to a signatory government of property situated in one of the Western Zones of Germany which might be referred to it by the commander of that zone (acting on behalf of his government), in agreement with the claimant signatory government or governments, without prejudice, however, to the settlement of such questions by the signatory governments concerned either by agreement or arbitration; and (by pt. III) for the restitution of monetary gold, this part consisting of a single article in the following terms:

"Pt. III. Restitution of monetary gold. Single article. A. All the monetary gold found in Germany by the Allied Forces and that referred to in para. G below (including gold coins, except those of numismatic or historical value, which shall be restored directly if identifiable) shall be pooled for distribution as restitution among the countries participating in the pool in proportion to their respective losses of gold through looting or by wrongful removal to Germany. B. Without prejudice to claims by way of reparation for unrestored gold, the portion of monetary gold thus accruing to each country participating in the pool shall be accepted by that country in full satisfaction of all claims against Germany for restitution of monetary gold. C. A proportional share of the gold shall be allocated to each country concerned which adheres to this arrangement for the restitution of monetary gold and which can establish that a definite amount of monetary gold belonging to it was looted by Germany or, at any time after Mar. 12, 1938, was wrongfully removed into German territory. D. The question of the eventual participation of countries not represented at the Conference (other than Germany but including Austria and Italy) in the above-mentioned distribution shall be reserved, and the equivalent of the total shares which these countries would receive, if they were eventually admitted to participate, shall be set aside to be disposed of at a later date in such manner as may be decided by the allied governments concerned. E. The various countries participating in the pool shall supply to the governments of the United States of America, France and the United Kingdom, as the occupying Powers concerned, detailed and verifiable data regarding the gold losses suffered through looting by, or removal to, Germany. F. The governments of the United States of America, France and the United Kingdom shall take appropriate steps within the zones of Germany occupied by them respectively to implement distribution in accordance with the foregoing provisions. G. Any monetary gold which may be recovered from a third country to which it was transferred from Germany shall be distributed in accordance with this arrangement for the restitution of monetary gold."

- A The Agreement also contained (in pt. IV) provisions as to its coming into force and signature under which (according to a note in the Stationery Office Print) it in fact came into force on Jan. 24, 1946.

In September, 1946, the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France set up a Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold for the purpose of applying the terms of pt. III of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946. The only official document in evidence before me regarding the setting up of this Tripartite Commission consists of a copy of a French Government Order dated Sept. 27, 1946, but it was agreed in the course of the argument before me that complementary action on corresponding lines could be assumed to have been taken by the other two governments concerned, namely, those of the United Kingdom and United States. The French Government Order (according to the exhibited translation) prescribes the constitution,

- C organisation and functions of the Tripartite Commission in the following terms :

"The President of the Provisional Government of the Republic, the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Minister of Finance. In view of the Decree of Mar. 5, 1946, promulgating the Agreement on Reparation to be received from Germany, on the Establishment of an Inter-Allied Reparation Agency, and on the Restitution of Monetary Gold, signed in Paris, Jan. 14, 1946. Be it ordered : Article I. For the purpose of applying the terms

- D of pt. III of the Agreement on Reparation from Germany, on the Establishment of an Inter-Allied Reparation Agency and on the Restitution of Monetary Gold, the Government of the Republic has decided in agreement with the Governments of the United States of America and the

- E United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to establish a Tripartite Commission for the restitution of monetary gold complying with the following dispositions : The Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold. 1. For the purpose of putting into effect pt. III of the Paris Agreement on Reparation of Jan. 14, 1946, the governments of the United States of America, of France and the United

- F Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland have decided to form a commission called the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold. 2. Each of the three governments will nominate for Sept. 27, a commission to represent them at the commission. 3. The Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold will be at Brussels but is independent of the Inter-Allied Reparation Agency already established

- G there. The commission has the right to communicate in the name of the three governments concerned, with the allied governments members of the Inter-Allied Reparation Agency, by the intermediary of accredited delegates of those governments with the agency, with the Inter-Allied secretariat of the agency, and, if necessary, with the other governments concerning the questions arising out of pt. III of the Paris Agreement on

- H Reparation. 4. The official languages of the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold will be English and French. 5. The attributes of the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold are the following : (a) To instigate and receive from the governments claiming a right to participate in the distribution of monetary gold found in Germany, or which may be recovered from a third country to which it was transferred from Germany, claims for the restitution of gold looted from it by the Germans or wrongfully removed to Germany ; the claims will have to be supported by detailed and verifiable indications regarding loss suffered. (b) To examine claims received and to determine the share of each claimant government in the gold pooled for distribution as restitution in compliance with pt. III of the Paris Agreement on Reparation and all other agreements relating thereto. (c) To make known at a date required the total value of the monetary pool that has become available for the purpose of distribution as restitution. (d) When all the claims for restitution have been received and decided upon, to make known the portion of the pool of monetary gold available as restitution to each of the countries qualified to participate in its restitution. (e) To co-operate by all the means which the three governments forming the commission may establish for the distribution of the pool of monetary gold to be disposed of as restitution. (f) To take all administrative measures which might be necessary for the carrying into effect of the tasks enumerated in sub-para. (a) to (e) inclusive, subject always to the preceding general observations; to open and operate banking accounts; to enter into contracts for the purpose of fulfilling all the necessary tasks. The expenses of the commission appurtenant to its mission will constitute a prior charge on the monetary gold pool to be distributed. 6. The decisions of the commission will be made by its members unanimously. Article 2. The present Order will be published in the Official Journal of the French Republic. Made in Paris, Sept. 27, 1946."

It appears that in February, 1947, a questionnaire to governments, designed to elicit information required to enable the Tripartite Commission to carry out its functions, was issued by the Tripartite Commission and that for the purposes of this questionnaire the term "monetary gold" was defined as follows :

"All gold which at the time of its looting or wrongful removal was carried as part of the claimant country's monetary reserve, either in the accounts of the claimant government itself, or in the accounts of the claimant country's central bank or other monetary authority at home or abroad."

It is to be noted that the 64 gold bars, having been at the date of their seizure by the Germans the private property of a thread and yarn manufacturing company, did not fall within this definition of "monetary gold." On the other hand, it is to be noted that the definition in question did not form part of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946, which, in fact, contained no definition either of "monetary gold" or of "non-monetary gold." In March, 1948, "a gold set-aside account" was opened at the Bank of England in accordance with the terms of a letter from His Majesty's Treasury dated Mar. 9, 1948, and the bank's reply thereto dated Mar. 11, 1948. These letters are as follows :

"Mar. 9. 1948. My Lord and Sir, I am directed by the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury to request you to open a gold set-aside account in the name of His Majesty's Treasury on account of 'the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France.' This account will be operated by the representatives of the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France on the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold for the deposit and eventual distribution of a portion of the gold looted by Germany from the Occupied States of Europe and recovered by the Allied Occupation Forces. The authorised representatives of the three above-named governments are as follows . . ."

Then representatives are set out for the United States of America, the United Kingdom and France.

A "I am directed to inform you that the above-named representatives are authorised to communicate directly with you and to give you all the instructions they may consider necessary for the operation of this account. Such communications should be signed by a representative of each of the three above-named governments. I am further directed to inform you that their Lordships will arrange for a letter of introduction from His Majesty's Treasury to accompany the first communication from the above-named representatives.

This letter is signed by an official of the Treasury, and addressed to the Governor and Deputy Governor, Bank of England. The bank's reply is dated Mar. 11, 1948, addressed to the Secretary of His Majesty's Treasury :

B "Sir, In accordance with the request contained in Mr. Rowe-Dutton's letter of Mar. 9, I am directed to state that a gold set-aside account has today been opened in the books of the Bank of England in the name of—
C His Majesty's Treasury o/a the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France, to be utilised for the deposit and eventual distribution of gold coming under the jurisdiction of the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold. Due note has been made
D that operations on this account may be effected over the joint signatures of one authorised representative of each of the three governments concerned, the names of which representatives were given in the letter referred to. It is also noted that the first communication to the Bank of England from these representatives will be routed via His Majesty's Treasury for purposes of authentication. I am to add that the bank would propose to make charges in connection with this account on the basis indicated in the semi-official letter from Mr. Gunston to Mr. Maitland of Jan. 28, 1948."

This letter is signed by the assistant chief cashier. The bank's proposal in the last paragraph of the letter of Mar. 11, 1948, as to the charges to be made
E in connection with this account appear to have been accepted, so that the bank became a "bailee for reward" of gold deposited to the account in question.

In the meantime the plaintiff company appears to have been pursuing inquiries as to the whereabouts of the 64 gold bars, and a claim in respect of them dated June 29, 1948, seems to have been presented to the United States Occupation Authorities through Colonel J. L. Bonet-Maury of the French
F Mission for Restitution. This claim was dealt with by Colonel William G. Bray of the United States Army, as Chief of the United States Foreign Exchange Depository at Frankfurt, who replied to it by a letter dated June 29, 1948, in the following terms :

G "To Colonel J. L. Bonet-Maury, French Mission for Restitution, A.P.O. 403 U.S. Army. June 29, 1948. Receipt is acknowledged of your claim No. O.F.R. 869 dated Apr. 30, 1948, in connection with certain gold bars which were lost by Dollfus Mieg & Cie, and claimed to be held by the Foreign Exchange Depository. It is understood that you merely desire to ascertain the location of these bars in Germany in order to support the claim of Dollfus Mieg & Cie, that they were looted from that company.
H In order to facilitate your proof of this claim, you are advised that the 64 gold bars, the numbers of which are listed on the attached sheet which bears my initials, are presently located in the Foreign Exchange Depository. As you know, the disposition of this gold is subject to the orders of the Tripartite Gold Commission and the Office of Military Government for Germany (U.S.) especially with respect to claim, and further dealings in connection with this matter should be taken up with these agencies."

This was signed by Colonel Bray as Chief of the Foreign Exchange Depository.

In July, 1948, the 64 gold bars (as part of a larger consignment of gold) were conveyed to England and deposited with the Bank of England in the gold set-aside account. This was clearly done under the orders of the Tripartite Commission or the three constituent governments, who seem, rightly or wrongly, to have treated the 64 gold bars as "monetary gold" within the meaning of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946, and, therefore, as falling to be dealt with under the provisions of pt. III of that Agreement. On July 16, 1948, the Secretary-General of the Tripartite Commission (at the instigation of the French delegation of the Inter-Allied Reparations Agency) wrote from his office in Brussels a letter to the Bank of England in the following terms :

"Sir, I am directed by the commission to write with regard to the following question. 2. The commission has received a request from the representative of France on the commission that certain gold bars which are included in the second consignment from Frankfurt, now on its way to the Bank of England, should be set aside pending receipt by the commission of a communication from the French government. 3. These bars, net weight of which is stated to be 789 kg., 72654, are said to have been formerly the property of the Société Française Dollfus-Mieg, looted by the Germans in 1944, and to have been recently identified among the bars at Frankfurt. 4. The commission understands that the French government is considering a claim for restitution which it has received from the Société Dollfus-Mieg and that its intention is to request the commission to have these bars set aside, if such action is possible, and included in any future delivery which the commission may decide to make to France. The bars would thus be available for restitution by the French government to the Société Dollfus-Mieg should the French government so decide. 5. A list containing all available particulars concerning these bars is attached hereto. A comparison with the inventories forwarded to you under cover of the commission's letter C/BE 498, dated July 6, 1948, shows that the major portion, if not all, of these bars appear to be contained in [certain boxes referred to in the letter, listed as mentioned in the letter]. The commission would be grateful, providing such action does not present insuperable technical or administrative difficulties, if you could see your way to having these bars set aside intact on arrival, if they can be identified, pending receipt of a further communication from the commission on the subject. 7. The bars are described as Russian Mockba bars (with acceptable London assays) which are normally good delivery bars and there will presumably be no difficulty over assessing their value for the commission's account."

To this letter the bank replied on July 19, 1948, as follows :

"Dear Sir, I write to acknowledge the receipt of your letter (C/BE 523) of July 16 regarding the allocation to the French of specific bars. The proposal which you make is acceptable to the Bank of England provided that at the time we receive the authority of the commission to hold the gold at the disposal of the Bank of France we also receive instructions from them to ship the gold from London. As you are aware, it is now contrary to the Bank of England's practice to set aside specific bars in the name of a customer, but if the French act as indicated above it will not be necessary for the bank to do more than hold the gold at the disposal of the Bank of France. I might perhaps add that the bank have been able to identify all but one of the bars shown on the schedule enclosed in your letter. The unidentifiable bar is shown in the first column and numbered 11090 . . ."

and the weight is stated. That is signed for the chief cashier of the bank.

No action was ever, in fact, taken on these two letters, and on their arrival at the Bank of England the 64 gold bars were simply deposited in the "gold set-aside account" and have remained so deposited to this day. There is no doubt whatever, and it is not disputed, that they are, in fact, the identical 64 gold bars which were seized by the Germans from the vault at Limoges.

A The plaintiff company maintains that, inasmuch as the 64 gold bars are indisputably identified as those which, being the plaintiff company's property, were forcibly taken and carried away by the Germans, they ought on identification to have been forthwith restored to the plaintiff company and were not, and should not have been treated as, "monetary gold" within the meaning of pt. III of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946. In support of this contention reliance is placed in particular on (i) the Tripartite Commission's definition of "monetary gold" to which I have already referred. (ii) The Inter-Allied Declaration against Acts of Dispossession Committed in Territories under Enemy Occupation or Control, dated Jan. 5, 1943 (published by His Majesty's Stationery Office as Command Paper Miscellaneous No. 1 (1943) (Cmd. 6418)), by which (so far as need be stated for the present purpose) the allied governments declared their intention to do their utmost to defeat the methods of dispossession practised by the governments with which they were at war, and reserved all their rights to declare invalid any transfers of, or dealings with, property which was, or had been, situated in the territories which had come under the occupation of the governments with which they were at war, or which belonged, or had belonged, to persons (including juridical persons) resident in such territories, whether such transfers or dealings had taken the form of open looting or plunder, or of transactions apparently legal in form, even when they purported to be voluntarily effected. This Declaration, read in conjunction with the explanatory notes attached to it, was relied on on behalf of the plaintiff company as amounting to a declaration that the policy of the allied governments was to secure that identifiable goods looted by the Germans (as for example the 64 gold bars in the present case) should be the subject of restitution to their true owners. (iii) The plaintiffs also relied on Law 59 promulgated in 1947 by the United States Military Government in the United States Zone of Occupation which made provision for the restitution of identifiable property in terms which (according to the plaintiff company) were applicable, and should have been applied, to its claim for restitution of the 64 gold bars.

F By a letter from its solicitors to the Bank of England dated Sept. 24, 1948, the plaintiff company made a formal claim to the 64 gold bars. This letter having produced no satisfaction, the plaintiff company by a writ dated Oct. 18, 1948, commenced against the Bank of England as defendant the action in which the application now before me is made. The relief claimed by the writ as originally framed comprised: (i) delivery to the plaintiff company of the 64 gold bars; (ii) an injunction restraining the bank, its servants and agents from selling, charging, dealing with, or parting with possession of the 64 gold bars or any of them otherwise than as directed by the plaintiff company; (iii) further or other relief; (iv) costs. After service on the plaintiff company of notice (dated Nov. 2, 1948) of the motion on the part of the bank which is now before me, the plaintiff company on Mar. 8, 1949 (pursuant to leave obtained on the previous day) amended the indorsement of the writ by adding to the claim for delivery up of the 64 gold bars a claim for damages for their detention and by inserting as an alternative to the claim for delivery up a claim for damages for conversion of the 64 gold bars.

H The bank now moves the court for an order that the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action may be set aside on the grounds (as stated in the notice of motion):

"1. That the 64 bars of gold in the writ mentioned are in the possession or under the control of the governments of the U.S.A., the Republic of France and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

 2. And that this action impleads two foreign sovereign states, namely, the governments of the United States of America and the Republic of France, who decline to submit to the jurisdiction of this honourable court."

The evidence in support of the motion includes evidence showing that the governments of the United States of America and the Republic of France decline to submit to the jurisdiction of the court in this matter, and that the bank has been desired by these governments and also by the government of the United Kingdom to take the objection to the jurisdiction of the court on which the motion is based. A

I am not now concerned with the validity of the plaintiff company's claim to the effect that its title to the 64 gold bars, which, admittedly, were its absolute property at the time of their seizure by the Germans, has not been displaced by the course of events above narrated. The sole issue before me is whether (as contended on the part of the bank) the present action, brought in pursuance of that claim, is ex facie one which this court has no jurisdiction to entertain by reason of the well-known principle of international law (which I will term "the principle of immunity"), whereby immunity from process in the municipal courts is accorded to foreign sovereign states. The case has been ably and exhaustively argued and I have been referred to a great number of reported cases and text-books. It will not, however, be necessary for me to embark on any comprehensive review of the authorities by which the principle of immunity is established, for, as I understand the arguments addressed to me, the general principle is not seriously in dispute, and the real contest centres on the application of the general principle to the facts of this particular case, having regard to the form of the present action, the nature and effect of the relief sought in it, and the circumstances in which such relief is sought. B C D

The principle of immunity was thus stated by BRETT, L.J. (5 P.D. 214) in The Parlement Belge (1):

"The principle to be deduced from all these cases is that, as a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority, and of the international comity which induces every sovereign state to respect the independence and dignity of every other sovereign state, each and every one declines to exercise by means of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador of any other state, or over the public property of any state which is destined to public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such sovereign, ambassador, or property be within its territory, and, therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction." E F

It will be observed that this statement of the principle refers to "the property" of foreign sovereign states, but it has since been recognised that a like immunity is enjoyed by a foreign sovereign state in respect of property in its possession or under its control. This clearly appears from the speeches in the House of Lords in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (2). G

It is, however, to be noted that, where the principle of immunity is invoked in cases in which the foreign sovereign state is not itself sued but which concern property in which the foreign sovereign state claims some proprietary or possessory interest, then in the absence of a proved or admitted right of property in the foreign sovereign state, possession or control by it of the thing in suit is a condition essential to the application of the principle. A mere claim by a foreign sovereign state to property in the possession of a third party will not oust the jurisdiction of the municipal court over an action to recover the property brought by some other claimant against the third party. This clearly appears from the speech of LORD MAUGHAM ([1938] 1 All H

E.R. 738) in the Cristina case (2) and from the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R. ([1938] 3 All E.R. 386) in Haile Selassie v. Cable & Wireless, Ltd. (3). The cases appear to establish a further limitation on the principle of immunity to the effect that, if property in this country is subject to a trust, the court has jurisdiction to administer the trust at the suit of any person interested, even though the persons interested include a foreign sovereign state which does not submit to the jurisdiction of the court: see Gladstone v. Musurus Bey (4) (1 Hem. & M. 503) and

- A Lariviere v. Morgan (5). The latter decision was reversed in the House of Lords, but the correctness of the statement of the law it contains on this point was not questioned and seems to have been accepted as authoritative by LORD MAUGHAM ([1938] 1 All E.R. 740) in the Cristina case (2). With, I think, only two exceptions, viz., Twycross v. Dreyfus (6) and Vavasour v. Krupp (7), all
- B the cases cited to me in which the principle of immunity has been held to apply (other than cases involving the direct impleading of a foreign sovereign or person entitled to a similar immunity under the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708, by making him a party to the suit) have been Admiralty cases involving judgment in rem. A judgment in rem, of course, differs from an ordinary judgment in personam in the important respect that the latter is binding only
- C as between the parties to the suit, while the former affects the status of the property in respect of which it is made and binds all persons claiming an interest in the property inconsistent with the judgment, even though pronounced in their absence. Thus, a judgment in rem against property in which a foreign sovereign is interested, whether as owner or as having possession or control of it, must clearly have the effect of ousting the foreign sovereign's interest,
- D whether he is a party to the proceedings or not, and is, therefore, manifestly one which the municipal court has no jurisdiction to pronounce. On the other hand, assuming circumstances enabling relief in personam, in respect of property in which a foreign sovereign is similarly interested, to be claimed in proceedings constituted, without manifest deficiency of parties, against a defendant or defendants other than the foreign sovereign himself, any order
- E made in the absence of the foreign sovereign would not be binding on him, but would leave him free, if so minded, to assert his interest thereafter. But I do not think it can be maintained that the principle of immunity is confined to cases where either a foreign sovereign is directly impleaded as a defendant or relief in rem is sought in his absence against property owned by him or in his possession or control. I cannot regard any such limitation as warranted by
- F the statements and discussions of the principle of immunity contained in the authorities. Indeed, it would be inconsistent with, e.g., the statement of the principle by SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Haile Selassie v. Cable & Wireless, Ltd. (3) and with much of what was said by LORD MAUGHAM in his speech in the Cristina case (2). It would also, I think, be inconsistent with Twycross v. Dreyfus (6) and
- G Vavasour v. Krupp (7), though it is true to say that in the former case the action was defective as regards parties in the absence of the foreign sovereign, quite apart from the question of immunity. It would, moreover, be inconsistent with the essential corollary to the principle of immunity that the municipal court will not so exercise its jurisdiction as to put a foreign sovereign to election between being deprived of property owned by him, or of the
- H possession or control of property in his possession or control, or else submitting to the jurisdiction of the court, as the following example will show. Suppose a foreign sovereign brings to this country in his possession chattels seized by him in his own country by some act of expropriation, the validity of which is questioned by the person who owned them at the date of the seizure. Suppose, further, that the foreign sovereign deposits the chattels in this country for safe custody with an agent not in his own person entitled to diplomatic immunity and the claimant then sues the agent for an injunction restraining him from parting with the chattels otherwise than to the plaintiff and an order for their delivery up. If in these hypothetical circumstances the injunction and order for delivery up were granted against the agent, the foreign sovereign would not be bound, but the agent undoubtedly would be bound. The injunction would entitle and bind the agent to refuse to deliver the chattels to the foreign sovereign without an order of the court, and the foreign sovereign would, therefore, be compelled to elect between submitting to the jurisdiction of the court, by applying to have the injunction dissolved in order to regain the custody of the chattels, and acquiescence in being permanently deprived of their custody. The order for delivery up, with which the agent would be bound to comply, would transfer the chattels from the custody of the agent holding them on the foreign sovereign's behalf to the possession of the claimant, and, although it would leave the foreign sovereign free to assert his right to the chattels, he would again be compelled to elect between submitting to the jurisdiction of the court as plaintiff in an action in which he would have to prove his title, and acquiescence in losing the chattels to the claimant.

In The Parlement Belge (1), BRETT, L.J., said (5 P.D. 219) :

"To implead an independent sovereign in such a way is to call upon him to sacrifice either his property or his independence. To place him in that position is a breach of the principle upon which his immunity from jurisdiction rests."

It is true that this observation was made in relation to an Admiralty action in rem, but I think it applies with equal force to an action in personam of the type postulated above. Accordingly, although in the present case no foreign sovereign is a party to the action, and the sole defendant is the bank, which is obviously not entitled in its own person to any immunity, and the relief sought in respect of the 64 gold bars is obviously relief in personam and not in rem, it is, in my judgment, nevertheless an action to which the principle of immunity may be applicable.

The principle being, therefore, in my view, potentially applicable to the present action, its application or exclusion seems to me to turn on the answers to the following questions : (i) For the purposes of the principle of immunity, are the 64 gold bars, notwithstanding their deposit with the bank, in the possession or control of the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Republic of France ? (ii) If so, is such joint possession or control equivalent for the purposes of the principle of immunity to possession or control simply by the two foreign sovereign states concerned or by one of them ? (iii) If so, is such possession or control for public purposes ? (It is not entirely clear on the authorities whether this element is still to be regarded as an essential condition of immunity, but I will assume so for the purposes of this case). (iv) If so, would the relief claimed in the action, if granted, infringe the principle of immunity ?

I shall deal with these four questions in the above order. (i) I am clearly of opinion that the three governments were in possession or control of the 64 gold bars within the meaning of the principle of immunity. Counsel for the plaintiff company contended the contrary on (in effect) two main grounds. First he contended that, the bank being a bailee for reward of the gold, the only bailor in the case, the only other party to the contract of bailment, was the government of the United Kingdom acting by His Majesty's Treasury. I find myself unable to place this construction on the letter of Mar. 9, 1948. It is true that this letter came from His Majesty's Treasury and that it requested the opening of the gold set-aside account "in the name of His Majesty's Treasury on account of 'the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France'." But it is, in my view, abundantly plain from the remainder of the letter that the intention was, not merely to open a Treasury account labelled for departmental convenience as being on account of the three governments, but to open an account for the three governments, whose representatives on the Tripartite Commission were to operate the account and were to be the depositors of the gold to be held in the account pending its eventual distribution as mentioned in the letter, which distribution was to be done on their instructions. I think the position may fairly be summarised by saying that in opening the account His Majesty's Treasury was acting as an intermediary on behalf of the three governments, and that the account when opened was to comprise gold jointly deposited by and to be held at the joint disposal of the three governments. It clearly appears from the evidence that this is the view of the position taken not only by the bank but also by the three governments themselves. In particular, a letter from His Majesty's Treasury dated Oct. 21, 1948, which is in evidence, described the gold in question as "jointly held by His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and the governments of the United States and the French Republic," and I fail to see how I, for the purpose of investing myself with jurisdiction, can ascribe to His Majesty's government a claim which it does not make to the effect that the gold is held solely by His Majesty's government, to the exclusion of the other two governments concerned. I am, accordingly, of opinion that this contention fails.

Counsel for the plaintiff company, secondly, contended that the legal implications of the bank's position as bailee for reward of the gold are such as to exclude the three governments from possession or control of the gold even though the three governments are joint bailors of it (as I hold them to be), and even though the bailment is merely a bailment at will for safe custody and disposal as directed by the bailors, which is clearly the type of bailment in question here. The result of this contention, if well-founded, would be to reduce the status of the three governments for the present purpose to that of mere claimants of property in the possession of a third party (viz., the bank), and it would follow from Haile Selassie v. Cable & Wireless, Ltd. (3) that the mere claim of the three governments to the 64 gold bars, divorced, as it would be, according to this contention, from possession or control, would not oust the jurisdiction of the court over an action brought by the plaintiff company against the bank for the purpose of establishing its title to, and recovering, possession of the gold. In my view, however, this contention is ill-founded. I accept as applicable to the present case the statement of the law on this point contained in the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by MELLISH, L.J. (1 Ex. D. 292) in Ancona v. Rogers (8) from which I need only quote the following short passage :

"It seems to us that goods which have been delivered to a bailee to keep for the bailor, such as a gentleman's plate delivered to his banker, or his furniture warehoused at the Pantechnicon, would, in a popular sense, as well as in a legal sense, be said to be still in his possession, and we see no valid ground for holding that they are not still in his possession within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act."

It was suggested that this part of the judgment was merely obiter. I cannot so regard it. The question in the case was whether the goods comprised in an unregistered bill of sale were in the possession of the grantor of the bill at the date of her insolvency. It was argued that the goods in question were not then in her possession because they were the subject of a bailment by her to one Horlock and, therefore, in the possession, not of the bailor, but of the bailee, Horlock, at the critical date. The court held on the facts that there was no bailment to Horlock and that the goods had remained in the actual possession of the insolvent. They then went on to consider what the position would be if they were wrong in supposing that the goods were not delivered to Horlock as bailee, and on that hypothesis came to the conclusion appearing from the passage quoted above. This part of the judgment was, therefore, by no means merely obiter, since it stated an alternative ground for the decision. Some reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff company on the later decision of the Exchequer Division in Lincoln Waggon and Engine Co. v. Mumford (9), but I think this case turned on its own particular facts and especially on the circumstance that the goods there in question were pledged to the bailee as security for a loan, and, if and so far as it conflicts with Ancona v. Rogers (8), I think I must clearly prefer the statement of the law contained in that case as a decision of the Court of Appeal. It was suggested that, even if the statement of the law in Ancona v. Rogers (8) should be accepted as correct, it is limited in its application to cases in which the bailor is the owner of the goods delivered to the bailee, and, therefore, does not apply in the present case, because the three governments had at most no more than bare possession or control of the gold, the owner of it being the plaintiff company. I think that this argument (besides prejudging in favour of the plaintiff company the very matter in dispute in the action) involves a confusion between possession and title. Setting aside, as without relevance here, cases of palpably unlawful possession, as of stolen goods deposited by the thief with a receiver, I fail to see how the question whether goods remain in point of law in the possession of a bailor after he has delivered them to a bailee for safe custody can be made to depend on whether the title under which the bailor was in possession of them at the time of such delivery is, or is not, claimed by some third party to be invalid. It was further suggested that the bank, as a bailee for reward, would have a lien on the gold for its charges, and that this in itself would suffice to prevent the gold, once delivered to the bank, from remaining in point of law in the possession of the three governments. It is not clear to me that in the absence of some special bargain (of which there is no evidence) the bank would be entitled to any such lien, but, in any case, I do not think the mere possibility of such a lien being asserted in the event of the charges not being duly and punctually paid would suffice to exclude the three governments from legal possession. I, therefore, hold that the gold, notwithstanding its delivery to the bank, may (in the words of MELLISH, L.J., in Ancona v. Rogers (8)) "in a popular sense, as well as in a legal sense" be said to be still in the possession of the three governments. I hold further, that, accordingly, the gold must be regarded as still in the possession of the three governments for the purposes of the doctrine of immunity. I see no ground for the view that the term "possession," when used in that connection in the authorities, is used in any specially narrow or restricted sense or is to be understood as confined to actual physical possession. A foreign sovereign state (unless embodied in a personal sovereign visiting this country) cannot, so far as I can see, be in actual physical possession of property here otherwise than by its servants. Accordingly, if actual physical possession by a foreign sovereign state were essential to immunity on the score of possession by such state, immunity on that ground could only be claimed in respect of property in this country in the actual physical possession either of some personal sovereign or of a person who could be shown to be in the strict sense a servant of a foreign sovereign state (so as to make his possession that of his master) or else to be himself entitled to diplomatic immunity. The application or exclusion of the principle of immunity would thus be made to depend on nice distinctions respecting the particular mode in which a foreign sovereign state might happen to exercise dominion over property brought by it to this country in its possession or control. For instance, if gold was brought to this country by a foreign sovereign state to be applied in the purchase of goods for the public purposes of that state and placed in the hands of a servant of the state concerned, to be applied in making such purchases in accordance with its directions, the gold would be protected by the principle of immunity on the score of possession by the foreign sovereign state, irrespective of any immunity from process the servant might be entitled to claim in his own person. If, on the other hand, gold brought to this country by a foreign sovereign state for similar purposes was deposited by it with a banker or other agent for safe custody and disposal in accordance with its directions, the gold would at once become exposed in the hands of the banker or other agent to any adverse claims there might be, and the principle of immunity would afford no protection from actions brought by third parties against the banker or other agent for the purpose of establishing such claims. I cannot think that it would be right to make the application or exclusion of the principle of immunity (based as it is on substantial reasons of policy) turn on nice distinctions of this kind. Moreover, I think the contention that "possession" for the purpose of the principle of immunity means actual physical possession is really impossible to reconcile with the decision of the House of Lords in The Arantzazu Mendi (10), where it was held that the vessel was in the possession of the Spanish Nationalist Government by virtue of a decree of General Franco requisitioning it for public services, coupled with declarations by the managing director of the owners and by the master of the vessel that they consented to the order of requisition and held the vessel at the disposal of the Nationalist government. That seems to me clearly to involve the view that legal or constructive, as opposed to actual or physical, possession is possession for the purposes of the principle of immunity.

If I were wrong in my view that the three governments as bailors are in possession of the gold in the sense intended by the principle of immunity, I think it abundantly plain that they are in control of it within the meaning of the principle. I can imagine no better example of control than the case of property deposited with a bank for safe custody and disposal in accordance with the directions of the depositor. I see no justification for limiting "control" for this purpose to "control" ejusdem generis with the powers of direction and user conferred by the requisitioning of a vessel.

I should, perhaps, here mention three more or less subsidiary points taken by counsel for the plaintiff company. He submitted (as I understood him) that the bailors were not the three governments but the respective representatives of the three governments on the Tripartite Commission. In my view, there is no substance in this contention. I think the position clearly is that the bailors are the three governments acting for this purpose through their respective representatives on the Tripartite Commission. He also submitted (as I understood him) that, even if (contrary to his contention) the 64 gold bars were "monetary gold," there was no power in the three governments or the Tripartite Commission under the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946, and the Orders by which the Commission was set up, to take possession of it, bring it to England and deposit it with the bank. With that contention (whatever its effect, if well founded, on the question of title) I am not now concerned, the question now before me, as I have already said, being simply and solely the question of jurisdiction. Counsel for the plaintiff company also suggested (though I think somewhat faintly) that the 64 gold bars were impressed with trusts under which the plaintiff company was interested, and, consequently, that the case could be brought within the exception to the principle of immunity recognised (for instance) in Gladstone v. Musurus Bey (4) and Lariviere v. Morgan (5). I fail to discover any vestige of a trust in favour of the plaintiff company in this case. It seems to me to be simply a matter of competing claims, the rival claimants being the three governments, on the one hand, and the plaintiff company, on the other hand, the claim of the three governments being coupled with possession. The fact that, if the three governments are right in their claim, they may be said to hold the 64 gold bars as trustees for the purposes of pt. III of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946, is, so far as I can see, wholly without relevance for the present purpose.

Before passing from question (i) I should perhaps mention (in case I should be thought to have overlooked them) The Davis (11) and Long v. The Tampico (12), two American cases relied on by counsel for the plaintiff company. Of these two cases I need only say that they seem to have turned very much on their own special facts, but that, if and so far as they can be regarded as inconsistent with the views expressed in this judgment, I decline to follow them.

(ii) In my judgment, the principle of immunity is not excluded by the fact that possession and control of the 64 gold bars is here vested in the two foreign governments concerned jointly with the government of the United Kingdom. Interference with the joint possession and control of the three governments would, in my view, necessarily be interference with the possession and control enjoyed by each of them jointly with the others. I fail to see how the court could arrogate to itself jurisdiction to interfere with the joint possession and control quoad the two of the three governments concerned which are governments of foreign sovereign states because the third is the government of the United Kingdom and capable of being sued in this country under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947.

(iii) In my judgment, the purposes for which the 64 gold bars are (rightly or wrongly) held by the three governments (viz., disposal in accordance with the provisions of pt. III of the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946) are manifestly and essentially public purposes within the meaning of the principle of immunity, and none the less so because they are public purposes not merely of the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and France, but also of the other allied governments party to the Agreement of Jan. 14, 1946.

(iv) It follows from what I have already said that, in view of the answers which should, in my judgment, be given to questions (i), (ii) and (iii), I hold that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiff company's action so far as the claims for delivery up of the 64 gold bars and for relief by way of injunction are concerned.

It remains to consider the claims for damages. It was urged by counsel for the plaintiff company that there was, at all events, jurisdiction to entertain these claims, and that the action should, accordingly, be allowed to proceed as an action for damages only. He included in this submission the claim for delivery up on the ground that the court could, in the exercise of its discretion, order payment by the bank of the value of the 64 gold bars in lieu of an order for delivery up. It should be noted that the claims for damages here (including the claim for payment of the value of the 64 gold bars in lieu of delivery up, which the claim for delivery up by implication includes) are founded on the self-same cause of action as the claims for delivery up and relief by way of injunction, namely the alleged wrongful detention of the 64 gold bars. These claims for damages are, therefore, in no way comparable to a claim for damages for an independent wrong, such as the liability of private owners of a vessel for a collision taking place while the vessel is being operated under the orders of a foreign sovereign state for public purposes, cf. The Crimdon (13), or such as might arise on land in the case, e.g., of a garage proprietor who, being entrusted by a foreign sovereign with a motor car for safe custody, ran down a pedestrian while driving the motor car to his garage. Nor can I regard this case as in any way comparable with one in which a bailee for a private individual is sued in detinue or trover by a third party and elects not to bring in his bailor by interpleader proceedings, but to defend the action on the strength of, and stand off fall by, the title of his bailor. In such a case the question of title is a question arising between private individuals and one which the court has jurisdiction to try, and the bailor is not bound, simply because he is not a party to the suit, and not because the court has no jurisdiction to bind him. In such a case there is no reason, in point of jurisdiction, why the bailor should not be brought before the court or left to make his own application to the court, if so minded.

Here, the bank cannot interplead because two of its three joint bailors are not amenable to the jurisdiction of the court, and the question of title as between the three governments and the plaintiff company is one which the court has no jurisdiction to try. The bank's possession of the 64 gold bars cannot, in my view, be distinguished from the possession of them by the three governments. The bank is in possession simply in right of the three governments and has no independent interest or title whatsoever. It is, moreover, estopped as between itself, as bailee, and the three governments, as bailors, from denying the three governments' title. In sum, the bank must stand or fall simply by the title of the three governments. Therefore, this court cannot hold the bank to be

A wrongfully in possession without also holding the three governments to be wrongfully in possession, and it is only on the footing that the bank is wrongfully in possession that any relief, whether by way of damages or otherwise, can be awarded against the bank.

Moreover, an order for delivery up of the gold to the plaintiff company would, I think, clearly have the effect of determining the bailment, putting an end to
B the estoppel subsisting between the bank and the three governments and leaving the bank free to set up the title of the plaintiff company in any proceedings brought against it by the three governments as equivalent to an eviction by title paramount : see Biddle v. Bond (14). I think an award of damages against the bank, involving, as it necessarily would, a decision of the court that the title of the plaintiff company was paramount to that of the three governments,
C would have the like effect. Further, if the bank was ordered to pay, and paid, to the plaintiff company damages representing the value of the gold, the title of the plaintiff company to the gold would pass to the bank, and the bank could in its own right set up that title against the three governments. I cannot, therefore, accept the proposition that damages could be awarded against the D bank without any interference with the possession or control of the 64 gold bars by the three governments. I should add that I find difficulty in appreciating how the court could have jurisdiction to order the bank to pay damages (in effect) for failing to do that which the court has no jurisdiction to order it to do, viz., to deliver up the 64 gold bars to the plaintiff company.

Those considerations seem to me to point strongly to the conclusion that for the present purpose no distinction should be made between the claims for
E delivery up and relief by way of injunction and the claim for damages. But I think that the objection in point of jurisdiction to the claim for damages can be put on wider grounds. The principle of immunity precludes the court from exercising jurisdiction over any property of, or in the possession or control of, a foreign sovereign state. I think that that necessarily means that, so long as property is in the possession or control of a foreign sovereign state, this court
F can entertain no proceedings which, if successful, would result in an interference with the foreign sovereign state's exercise of such possession or control, whether directly (as by removing the property from the custody of an agent to whom the foreign sovereign state has entrusted it) or indirectly (as by casting in damages for wrongful possession an agent through whom the foreign sovereign state is exercising its possession or control). I think it would be a wholly unwarrantable
G restriction on the principle of immunity to hold that a foreign sovereign state in possession or control of property in this country cannot entrust such property to an agent for safe custody without exposing the agent to the risk of being sued by third parties for wrongful possession, or that an action against the agent for wrongful possession involves no interference with the possession or control of the foreign sovereign state if the court, while holding the possession
H of the agent, and, therefore, that of the foreign sovereign state, to be wrongful possession, declines for want of jurisdiction to order delivery up of the property, but in lieu thereof awards damages against the agent as the price (in effect) of his continuing in possession of the property on the foreign sovereign state's behalf—a price which, as between the foreign sovereign state and the agent, must ultimately fall on the foreign sovereign state itself.

Looking at the substance of the whole matter, I think this action can fairly be described as, in effect, an attempt to sue indirectly the three governments concerned, of which two, viz., the governments of the United States and France as governments of foreign sovereign states, cannot be directly sued in this court, and I think it would be what JAMES, L.J., in Twycross v. Dreyfus (6) termed (5 Ch.D. 618) "a monstrous usurpation of jurisdiction" to allow such an action to proceed. For all these reasons I am of opinion that the motion by the bank in this case should succeed, and I will make an order accordingly.

Order that all further proceedings in the action be stayed. The plaintiff company to pay the bank's costs of the action including costs of the motion.

LARNER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Denning, L.J., and Birkett, J.), March 29, 30, 31, April 11, 1949.]

Mistake—Mistake of fact—Money overpaid under mistake—Resolution of local authority to make up to employees difference between war service pay and civilian pay—Right of authority to recover overpayments.

On Oct. 17, 1939, the defendants, the London County Council, acting under the Local Government Staffs (War Service) Act, 1939, resolved to pay to all their employees who went on war service the difference between their war service pay and their former civilian pay. The resolution expressly provided that every employee should be responsible for advising the council immediately of any change arising in the amount of his war service pay, and that the council should be authorised to make consequential adjustments by deduction from subsequent payments to him. The plaintiff, who was employed by the council as an ambulance driver, was called up for war service in March, 1942. He was aware of the resolution of the council to make up his pay and of his responsibility under that resolution to advise them of changes in the amount of his war service pay. After his call-up he received rises in war service pay of which he did not notify the council, and, in consequence, they made overpayments to him. Some part of the amount of the overpayments the council recouped by first reducing and then discontinuing his allowance to make up his service pay, but the whole had not been recouped by the time of his demobilisation. He returned to the service of the council, and in due course they began to deduct weekly amounts from his wages on account of the balance outstanding. After they had deducted £22 10s. in this way, the plaintiff brought proceedings claiming repayment of the amounts deducted from his wages, and the council counterclaimed for the balance of the sum overpaid then outstanding. It was admitted that the overpayments had been made under a mistake of fact, and it was found that the mistake was due, at least in part, to the failure of the plaintiff to advise the council of the changes in his service pay and that the council were not at fault.

HELD : the payments to make up service pay were not mere gratuities, but were made by the council as a matter of duty in accordance with their resolution under the Act of 1939 ; the fact that the plaintiff had spent the money overpaid and it was beyond recall was not a change of circumstances to his prejudice which would disentitle the council to recover, because the overpayment was due to the fault of the plaintiff and not to that of the council; and, therefore, the council were entitled to recover the overpayments.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE DAYNES, sitting at Southwark County Court, on Nov. 8, 1948, dismissing his claim against the defendants, the London County Council, for £22 10s. which had been deducted from his wages, and allowing the council's counterclaim for £52 10s. the balance of overpayments made to the plaintiff in making up his war service pay to the level of his civilian pay. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of the court read by DENNING, L.J.

P. M. O'Connor for the plaintiff.

Lloyd-Jones for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 11. DENNING, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. On Oct. 17, 1939, the London County Council, acting under statutory authority, resolved to pay to all their employees who went to the war the difference between their war service pay and their civil pay. The resolution expressly provided that every employee should be responsible for advising the council "immediately of any change arising in the amount of his war service pay" and the council should "be authorised to make consequential adjustments by deductions from subsequent payments" to him.

The plaintiff was an ambulance driver employed by the London County Council. He was a married man with two children, and was not called up until March, 1942. He had not actually seen the resolution of the council, but he knew they had decided to make up the difference between war service pay and civil pay and that it was his business to tell them what his war service pay was. Moreover, when he went into the Royal Air Force he filled in a form asking that the allowance "due" to him should be paid to his wife, and on that form there was a clear notice that all alterations in service pay were to be notified immediately to the council. It was, indeed, obvious in 1939 that the men ought to tell the council of any changes in their war service pay, because otherwise the council would not be able to work out what the difference was. At that time the Royal Air Force authorities would not inform employers what a man's service pay was, but three years later they changed their policy and gave the information when asked for it. It served, of course, as a valuable check on the information supplied by the man, but it did not do away with the necessity for the men themselves telling the council of any changes in their service pay. Indeed, most of the 7,000 or 8,000 men did so quite regularly.

The plaintiff, however, did not keep the council accurately informed of the various changes in the amount of his war service pay, and when he did tell them, they did not rely on what he said. They relied on the information received from the Royal Air Force, but this information was only given on request and was not always accurate. Nevertheless, unless the plaintiff told the council whenever he had a rise in service pay, they would not have occasion to ask the Royal Air Force for any information on the subject. Hence, if he did not tell them of a rise, a long time might elapse before it came to their notice. Meanwhile, they would have been paying him too much. This can be illustrated from the facts of this case. Take for the sake of simplicity his service pay excluding the family allowances. A

On Mar. 16, 1942, the plaintiff's service pay was 2s. 6d. a day. This was certified by the Royal Air Force authorities to the council, who paid the difference accordingly. In and after October, 1942, at the end of six months' training, he had increases in pay, and by March, 1943, he was receiving service pay of 5s. a day. There is no trace of any letter from him telling the council of this increase to 5s. The council were calculating his allowance on the basis that he was only receiving service pay of 3s. a day. They did not become aware of the increase to 5s. until July, 1944, and then only because a query had arisen on family allowances which made them write to the Royal Air Force for information about his pay. Meanwhile, the council had been overpaying him at the rate of 2s. a day, that is, £2 16s. 0d. on every monthly cheque they sent him or his wife. The judge has found that this was not due to any carelessness on their part. When they discovered the overpayments, they told the plaintiff about it, started to make deductions from his monthly allowance in order to recoup themselves, and a few months later discontinued payments to him altogether, but they had not succeeded in recouping themselves by the time he was demobilised. He returned to their service and in due course they started to deduct 10s. a week from his wages on account of the balance outstanding. He disputed their right to do this and brought this action for £22 10s. 0d., being 10s. a week withheld for 45 weeks. The council counterclaimed the balance of the sum overpaid, which is said to be £52 10s. 0d. D E

The real question in this case arises on the counterclaim. Are the council entitled to recover from the plaintiff the sums which they overpaid him? Overpay him they certainly did. That is admitted. The overpayment was due to a mistake of fact. That is also admitted. They were mistaken as to the amount of his service pay. But it is said that they were voluntary payments which were not made in discharge of any legal liability, and cannot, therefore, be recovered back. For this proposition reliance was placed on the dictum of BRAMWELL, B., in Aiken v. Short (1) (1 H. & N. 215), but that dictum, as SCOTT, L.J., pointed out in Morgan v. Ashcroft (2) ([1937] 3 All E.R. 101), cannot be regarded as an exhaustive statement of the law. Take the present case. The London County Council, by their resolution, for good reasons of national policy, made a promise to the men which they were in honour bound to fulfil. The payments made under that promise were not mere gratuities. They were made as a matter of duty: see National Association of Local Government Officers v. Bolton Corpn. (3) ([1942] 2 All E.R. 430, 434). Indeed, that is how both sides regarded them. They spoke of them as sums "due" to the men, that is, as sums the men were entitled to under the promise contained in the resolution. If then, owing to a mistake of fact, the council paid one of the men more than he was entitled to under the promise, why should he not repay the excess, at any rate if he has not changed his position for the worse? It is not necessary to inquire whether there was any consideration for the promise so as to enable it to be enforced in a court of law. It may be that, because the men were legally bound to go to the war, there was in strictness no consideration for the promise, but that does not matter. It is F G H not a question here of enforcing the promise by action. It is a question of recovering overpayments made in the belief that they were due under the promise, but, in fact, not due. They were sums which the council never promised the plaintiff and which they would never have paid him had they known the true facts. They were paid under a mistake of fact, and he is bound to repay them unless he has changed his position for the worse because of them.

- A It is next said, however, that the London County Council should not be allowed to recover the money because the plaintiff changed his position for the worse before the council asked for it back. He spent the money on living expenses—or his wife spent it for him—and he spent it in a way which he would not otherwise have done. This defence of estoppel, as it is called—
- B or more accurately, change of circumstances—must, however, not be extended beyond its proper bounds. Speaking generally, the fact that the recipient has spent the money beyond recall is no defence unless there was some fault, as, for instance, some neglect or breach of duty or misconduct, on the part of the paymaster and none on the part of the recipient. In both Skyring v. Greenwood (4) and Holt v. Markham (5) there was a breach of duty by the paymaster and none
- C by the recipient: see also Jones v. Waring & Gillow, Ltd. (6), per LORD SUMNER ([1926] A.C. 693). But if the recipient was himself at fault and the paymaster was not—as, for instance, if the mistake was due to an innocent misrepresentation or a breach of duty by the recipient—he clearly cannot escape liability by saying that he has spent the money. That is the position here. On the judge's findings the London County Council were not at fault
- D at all, but the plaintiff was. He did not keep them accurately informed of the various changes in his service pay. It does not lie in his mouth to say that, if he had done so, it would have made no difference. It might well have put them on inquiry and the mistake might not have been made at all. Many men did, in fact, fulfil their duty and were not overpaid. It would be strange, indeed, if those who neglected their duty were to be allowed to keep their
- E gain. This view of the case makes it unnecessary to discuss the question of ultra vires.

The one remaining question is whether the London County Council were entitled to recoup themselves, after the plaintiff's return, by deductions from his wages. In point of law they were not entitled as of right to make deductions from his wages except by agreement with him, and we do not think the resolution

F is such an agreement. It is, however, of no practical consequence in this action because the amounts due on claim and counterclaim must clearly be set off one against the other. The judge below has given judgment for the balance and that is the correct way of doing it. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re DOWIE'S WILL TRUSTS. BARLAS AND OTHERS
v. PENNEFATHER AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), April 6, 1949.]

Settlement—"All that the share and interest of and in the residuary trust fund under the will of " A.D.—Whether an appointed share is a share under the will—Whether settlement an assignment of present interests only.

By his will A.D. gave his residuary estate to his trustee on trust to sell and hold the proceeds equally for his two daughters, M. and L., for their respective lives. By cl. 6 (2) of his will A.D. directed that, after the death of M., the trustee was to hold her share of the residuary trust fund on trust for all or such one or more of her children or remoter issue as M. should by deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint. In default of and subject to any such appointment her share was directed to be held on trust equally for all her children attaining the age of 21, or, if daughters, marrying. On Sept. 24, 1936, V., a daughter of M., made an ante-nuptial settlement in which was recited the will of A.D., including the power of appointment, and also the agreement that V. should settle "all her share and interest of and in the residuary trust fund under the will" of A.D. Clause 1 of the operative part of the settlement provided: "The wife [V.] hereby assigns unto the trustees all that the share and interest of the wife of and in the residuary trust fund under the will of the said Adam Dowie deceased and the investments for the time being representing the same upon trust for the wife until the marriage and after the marriage upon trust that the trustees shall as to those parts of the premises to which the wife is entitled in possession immediately and as to the residue of the premises when her expectant interests therein respectively shall or may fall into possession call in or procure the transfer or payment thereof to them and shall either retain the same in their then form of investment or with the consent of the wife during her lifetime and afterwards at the discretion of the trustees sell the same and invest the proceeds" and hold the same on trust for V. during her life, and thereafter to the issue of the marriage. On June 15, 1940, M. exercised by deed her power of appointment under the will and inter alia appointed five twenty-fourths of her share of the residuary trust fund under the will of A.D., subject to her life interest, to be held by the trustee of the will on trust on M.'s death for V. absolutely. On July 29, 1947, M. died.

HELD: (i) although the interest created by the appointment did not arise until the appointment was executed, when it did arise V. took it by virtue of the will, and it was, therefore, an interest in the residuary trust fund under the will of A.D.

Dictum of LORD ROMER in Muir v. Muir ([1943] A.C. 485), applied.

(ii) prima facie the assignment of "the share and interest of the wife" by the marriage settlement would as a matter of construction be limited to a present share and interest at the date of the deed, but, having regard to the words "expectant interests," it was impossible to construe the assignment as limited to a present interest, and, therefore, the share appointed to V. by the deed of June 15, 1940, formed part of her marriage settlement funds.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine how a share of the residuary estate of the testator, Adam Dowie, devolved and should be dealt with.

- By his will, dated July 1, 1921, Adam Dowie, who died on Nov. 17, 1922, gave and devised his residuary personal and all his real estate to his trustee (later replaced by three trustees, the present plaintiffs) on trust for sale and to stand possessed of the proceeds, subject to the payment of debts, death duties and certain legacies, on trust for his two daughters, Mary and Lilian, in equal shares subject as therein provided. By cl. 6 (1) of his will the testator provided that the share of each daughter should not vest absolutely in her; but should be held by the trustee on trust to pay the income of the said share to such daughter for her life without power of anticipation. By cl. 6 (2) he provided that after the death of Mary the trustee "shall hold her share in my residuary trust fund or the investments for the time being representing the same and the income thereof upon trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of her children or remoter issue (such remoter issue to be born and take vested interests within 21 years after her death) at such age or time or respective ages or times if more than one in such shares and with such future or other trusts for their benefit and such provisions for their respective advancement either in the lifetime or after the death of my said daughter and maintenance and education at the discretion of my trustee or any other person or persons and in such manner in all respects as my said daughter shall by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint and in default of and subject to any such appointment upon trust for all or any of the children or child of my said daughter who being male attain the age of 21 years or being female attain that age or marry if more than one in equal shares." The daughter, Mary, married and had six children, one of whom was the defendant, Vera Margaret Wyllie Pennefather. Before her marriage with John Pennefather, Vera executed a settlement dated Sept. 24, 1936. The settlement recited the will of the testator (including the power of appointment) and that on the treaty for the marriage it was agreed that the wife should settle in the manner thereafter appearing "all her share and interest of and in the residuary trust fund under the will" of the testator, and declared: "The wife hereby assigns unto the trustees all that the share and interest of the wife of and in the residuary trust fund under the will of the said Adam Dowie deceased and the investments for the time being representing the same upon trust for the wife until the marriage and after the marriage upon trust that the trustees shall as to those parts of the premises to which the wife is entitled in possession immediately and as to the residue of the premises when her expectant interests therein respectively shall or may fall into possession call in or procure the transfer or payment thereof to them and shall either retain the same in their then form of investment or with the consent of the wife during her lifetime and afterwards at the discretion of the trustees sell the same and invest the proceeds" and hold the same on trust for the wife for life, and thereafter to the husband for life or until re-marriage, and thereafter for the children or remoter issue of the marriage. By a deed of appointment, dated June 15, 1940, Mary, in exercise of the power given her by the testator's will, irrevocably appointed and declared that, subject to her life interest, the trustee of the will should stand possessed of her half share of the residuary trust fund under the will on trust on her death to hold five twenty-fourths thereof for the defendant, Vera Margaret Wyllie Pennefather, absolutely. Mary died on July 29, 1947, and the question arose whether Vera's appointed share belonged to her absolutely or should be paid to the trustees of Vera's marriage settlement to be held on the trusts thereof. ROXBURGH, J., held that the share was caught by the marriage settlement.

ROXBURGH, J. [having stated the facts.] The question I have to decide is whether the interest so appointed is comprised in the property assigned to the trustees of the marriage settlement.

Counsel for the wife claims that the appointed fund is not caught by the settlement, and puts his case in two ways. First he says that, even if the assignment includes future property, it does not include the interest created by this appointment because it is not a share or interest of and in the residuary trust fund under the will of Adam Dowie. In the alternative he says that, if he is wrong in that submission, this marriage settlement on its true construction does not extend beyond interests which could be properly described as present interests at the date of the settlement. B

In support of his first contention counsel relied on a number of cases, including Re Dickinson's Settlement (1) and Re De La Bere's Marriage Settlement Trusts (2). In my judgment, these cases do not enable him to make good his proposition of law, and in saying that I found myself on the speech of LORD ROMER in Muir v. Muir (3) in which LORD CLAUSON concurred. That was a Scottish case and related to the application of the Scottish rule against perpetuities which is quite different from the English rule. During the course of the argument De La Bere's Marriage Settlement Trusts (2), Re Dickinson's Settlements (1) and Re Rush (4) were cited, and LORD ROMER dealt with the proposition of law for which counsel now contends. He said ([1943] A.C. 483): C

"If, for example, property be settled on trust for A. for life and after his death on trust for such of A.'s children or remoter issue and in such proportions as B. shall by deed appoint, B. has no interest in the property whatsoever. He has merely been given the power of saying on behalf of the settlor which of the issue of A. shall take the property under the settlement and in what proportions. It is as though the settlor had left a blank in the settlement which B. fills up for him if and when the power of appointment is exercised. The appointees' interests come to them under the settlement alone and by virtue of that document. These remarks apply equally well to the case where the donee of the power of appointment has, not only the power of saying which of the class shall take under the trust, but also the power of saying what interests they shall take." D

Later he said (ibid., 484): E

"It would be strange, indeed, if it were now found that the decision of LORD HARDWICKE in Duke of Marlborough v. Lord Godolphin (5) had contradicted or qualified the principle on which the courts of England have acted for so long. But, in truth, it does nothing of the sort. With all possible respect to the learned judges of the Second Division, LORD HARDWICKE's decision has no bearing on the question that is now before the House. The decision was really no more than the logical application of the principle to the facts of that case. No statement of the principle that I have ever seen has suggested that the appointees under an appointment in their favour take any interest in the subject-matter of the power until the appointment takes effect. It is, on the contrary, quite plain F that they do not, and that is all that LORD HARDWICKE decided in the case in question."

After referring to the facts of that case LORD ROMER continued (ibid., 485) :

A "LORD HARDWICKE pointed out (2 Ves. Sen. 77) that, although an appointee under a special power takes under the deed that creates the power, he does not take from the time of the creation of the power. Until the power is executed he takes nothing. In other words, the blank in the instrument creating the power has not until then been filled up. But, where a power is executed by a will, the interests appointed only vest on the death of the donee of the power and can only vest in appointees who are then living, for the donee cannot appoint to persons who are dead when the appointment takes effect and an appointment by will does not take effect until the death of the donee. Had the son and daughter survived their mother, their interests would have vested as at her death, but the interests would, nevertheless, have been created, not by the will of the wife, but by the will of the husband and would have come to the son and daughter by virtue of the latter document. My Lords, that the interests appointed in pursuance of a special power only arise in point of time when the appointment takes effect was also one of the questions decided by RUSSELL, J., in Re Rush (4). The particular question was this. Under the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, all property, rights and interests within His Majesty's dominions belonging to German nationals at the date when it came into force were subjected to the charge mentioned in the treaty. Now at that date certain German nationals were entitled to reversionary interests in a settled fund and these interests were unquestionably subject to the charge. The interests were, however, liable to be defeated by the exercise of a special power of appointment of which the German nationals were among the objects. After the said date the donee of the power exercised it in favour of the German nationals in question. It was held that the interests that had been so appointed to them were not interests to which they were entitled at the date when the Treaty came into force. But no one could have successfully contended that the interests appointed to them were not created by the instrument from which the power was derived or that they did not take such interests by virtue of that instrument."

F In my judgment, that last sentence, in which LORD CLAUSON concurred, shows clearly that, though the interest created by the appointment did not arise until the appointment was executed, when it did arise the beneficiary took his interest by virtue of the instrument creating the power, or, in other words, the will.

G That, however, is by no means the end of the case, for it is settled and clear also from LORD ROMER's speech that the interest which arises under the appointment is a different interest from that which the beneficiary had in default of appointment, and, accordingly, it is clear that at the date of the marriage settlement the expectancy which the beneficiary had was not a present interest. Therefore, I have now to consider whether or not this settlement is, on its true construction, an assignment of present interests and nothing else. In this connection I ought to refer to Lovett v. Lovett (6), where H the same question arose. In that case ROMER, J., said ([1898] 1 Ch. 86) :

"I bear in mind that the deed was a settlement by an infant of her then property. Prima facie it would only pass her then interest under the settlement referred to in the deed, and not an interest she had not then and only obtained afterwards, namely, the interest under the exercise of the power of appointment by the mother. Ought I in the first place to construe the deed dealing with it as a question of construction as one intended to pass this possible future interest—this expectancy ? "

It is to be noted that ROMER, J., uses that word "expectancy" as the most appropriate description of this possible future interest under the appointment. He continued :

"In the absence of some overwhelming reason to the contrary, I think I ought not to do so, bearing in mind, as I have already said, that the lady was an infant at the time, and seeing that the deed does not purport to pass anything but estates or interests then existing, and does not purport to settle or deal with after-acquired property. In the deed of settlement there is no reference whatever to the power of appointment."

How different is the present case. This is a marriage settlement. The recitals refer not only to the interest in default of appointment, but to the possible future interests under the appointment. I can think of no rational ground for supposing that anyone making a marriage settlement would wish to settle property coming from a particular source in default of appointment and not to settle property coming from the same source under an appointment. If he desired for some special reason to differentiate between the two, I should expect him to do so in plain language.

It is true, however, that considerations of that kind would be irrelevant if the language of the marriage settlement itself were unambiguous, but, in my judgment, it is not. I think that prima facie the assignment of "the share and interest of the wife of and in the residuary trust fund under the will of the said Adam Dowie deceased" would, as a matter of construction, be limited to shares or interests which were present shares or interests at the date of the deed. On the other hand, in the circumstances which I have indicated, I think that no very strong context would be required to exclude that prima facie construction. Here, however, I have what I regard as a strong context, for the assignment goes on to direct the trustees to hold property assigned after the marriage :

"... upon trust that the trustees shall as to those parts of the premises to which the wife is entitled in possession immediately and as to the residue of the premises when her expectant interests therein respectively shall or may fall into possession call in or procure the transfer or payment thereof to them."

In the face of the words "expectant interests," it seems to me impossible to construe this assignment as limited to interests which were present interests at the date of the assignment. Counsel for the wife faces up to this difficulty and asks me to read the word "expectant" as though it were "reversionary." If I could do that, it would fit in with his argument, because a reversionary interest is, undoubtedly, a present interest, but it seems to me that there is nothing to suggest that the word "expectant" is a mistake. It is entirely consistent with what I should expect to find in the circumstances, and I should not be justified in striking out the word which is quite appropriate to an interest under an appointment not yet made and substituting for it some word which is only suggested in order to exclude that construction. I feel bound to construe this deed as including the wife's expectant interests in the residuary trust fund devolving under the will of Adam Dowie, and the interest which the wife subsequently obtained under the appointment was, in my judgment, an expectant interest in the residuary trust fund under the will of the said Adam Dowie at the date of the marriage settlement.

Order accordingly. Costs as between solicitor and client out of the appointed fund.

MALLETT AND ANOTHER v. DUNN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), March 17, 18, April 11, 1949.]

Husband and Wife—Action by husband and wife for injury to wife—Husband's claim for medical and household expenses—Injury to wife through defendant's negligence—Wife's contributory negligence—Reduction of damages awarded to husband—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (c. 28), s. 1 (1).

- A By the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1):
 "Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage . . ."

- B A married woman was injured through the negligence of the defendant. In an action for damages brought by her and her husband, she was found guilty of some contributory negligence and the damages awarded to her were, accordingly, reduced under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1). In respect of the special damages claimed by the husband for medicine and household expenses,

- C HELD: the husband's cause of action was personal to him and distinct from the claim made by the wife, and it was not defeated by the fact that she was guilty of contributory negligence; as the contributory negligence was the fault of the wife and the husband had not been at fault, in making his own claim in respect of the damage which he had suffered the husband was not a person who had suffered damage "as the result partly of his own fault" within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1945; and, therefore, he was entitled to recover in full the damages claimed.

- F ACTION by a husband and a wife claiming damages for negligence.

The wife, Mrs. Mallett, was knocked down and injured by the defendant's car while she was walking along a lane. HILBERY, J., found that the defendant had been guilty of negligence, but that the wife had also been at fault, and he apportioned the responsibility for the damage as to three-quarters to the defendant and as to one quarter to the wife and reduced the £1,600 at which he assessed the general damages for personal injuries to £1,200. On the husband's claim for £290 special damages in respect of medical and household expenses he held that the husband's right of action was not defeated by the wife's contributory negligence and that no reduction of this amount fell to be made under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1). The case is reported only on the question raised by the husband's claim.

Salmon, K.C., and Armstrong-Jones for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 11. HILBERY, J., read the following judgment. At the conclusion of this case I decided that, so far as the claim for personal injuries was the claim of Dorothy Amy Mallett, wife of Robert Stanley Mallett, the claim was partly met by the defendant having established some contributory negligence on the part of that plaintiff. Accordingly, I acted on the provisions of s. 1 and other sections of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, and reduced her claim to the extent which I thought just and equitable, having regard to her share in the responsibility for the damage which she had sustained. The question then arose: What effect, if any, had that finding on the claim by the husband? It was argued by the defendant that the husband's claim must wholly fail since it depended on establishing, in the first place, a tortious act done to his wife for which the defendant was responsible in law, and, unless the husband's claim was saved by the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, the defendant, having established the contributory negligence of the wife, had absolved himself in law from responsibility for the alleged tortious act, and, secondly, that, if the husband's claim was not wholly defeated, it was abated in the same fraction as that of the wife by reason of the provisions of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1).

The question thus raised can only be answered by examining, and, if possible, discovering, the true legal basis of the husband's claim. If, in order to sustain his claim, he must be regarded as standing in his wife's shoes and his cause of action is the same as hers, then it must be true to say that what is an answer to her is an answer to him. If, on the other hand, his cause of action is one which is distinct from that of his wife and is personal to him, then what would suffice to answer his wife's claim, because it is her claim, will not necessarily defeat his action. I, therefore, pass to an examination of the basis of the husband's cause of action. The husband's cause of action is a remedy given by the common law to enable him to recover in respect of the personal damage which he has suffered through a tortious act of the defendant which has injured his wife and consequentially injured him. It has always been a remedy by action on the case given by the common law to the husband for injury done to him by an interference with his right of consortium and for the consequential damage suffered by him. It was not, and still is not, the only form of action on the case given by the common law for an act of a defendant which deprives a husband of his consortium with his wife. An action still lies at the suit of a husband against a defendant for enticing and persuading a wife to leave her husband. In each of these cases the gist of the husband's action, as the old-time lawyers expressed it, lay in the per quod, i.e., the basis of the action was that it was to recover for the husband the damage due to him and to his rights as a husband.

The wife's right to damages for the same act of the defendant as was complained of by the husband was a different and distinct cause of action. True, she had to join with her husband in an action to recover the damages which were claimed for the injury done to her. That was because at that time a married woman could not acquire or own, with certain exceptions, any property apart from her husband, and so he had to join as a party in a claim for her damages, but from the earliest time the husband could bring his action for the wrong done to him per quod consortium amisit without joining his wife as a co-plaintiff. In other words, his cause of action was his own and distinct from that of his wife. It was for the wrong done to him. The headnote to Hyde v. Scysson (1), decided in the seventeenth year of the reign of James I, begins as follows (Cro. Jac. 538):

"In trespass for beating a wife, both the husband and wife must join in the action; but if it be with a per quod consortium amisit, the husband may sue alone . . ."

The first error assigned in that case was that:

" . . . the action was by the husband solely for the battery of his wife, which ought not to be; for the tort and damages are properly done to the wife, and therefore the husband sole without the wife could not maintain this action; and then the damages being entirely given, the judgment is erroneous."

As to that objection the report states :

- A "But all the justices and barons held, that true it is the husband, for the battery of his wife, ought to join his wife with him in the action, if this had been brought for that cause; but here the action is not brought for the battery of his wife, but for the loss and damage of the husband, for want of her company and aid: all is concluded with the per quod consortium amisit, which extends to all that was before; as where an action brought by the master for the battery of his servant, per quod servitium amisit, etc."
- B Here, then, is direct authority for the statement so often to be found in the text-books that the husband's cause of action is separate from that of the wife. How distinct the two causes of action were is plain from the fact that the wife's claim for damages for the personal tort done to her died with her. Her husband had to be joined with her in an action for the damage she had suffered, and, if the action was brought for those damages only, it died with her because the action was brought to remedy the wrong done to her.
- C More-over, her claim for the damage she had suffered was so personal to her that it survived the death of the husband, and she might bring the action after his death.

In BACON'S ABRIDGEMENT OF THE LAW, 7th ed. (1832), vol. 1, p. 732, under the title "Baron and Feme," it is said :

- D "For a battery or other personal tort done to the wife, they must join; and if the wife dies, the action dies with her. (Not for personal or other wrongs done to them both, unless where they have a joint interest, and they have wrong in respect thereof . . .) But the baron may bring an action alone for the battery, carrying away and detaining of his wife, per quod solamen et consortium of his said wife amisit, because the action is founded upon the special damage done to himself, and will be no bar to another action brought by baron and feme, or by the feme after the death of the baron, for the same battery."

- I have searched in vain for any authority which lays it down that such an action by a husband for a tort done by his wife per quod consortium amisit was defeated by the defendant showing that the wife had been guilty of contributory negligence. Nor do I see any sound reason why it should be. The claim by the wife was answered if, at the conclusion of the case, all that had been established was that both she and the defendant had tortiously caused her injury and damage, i.e., if the defendant had proved that she had been guilty of committing negligence, but it was implicit in such a result that the defendant had been guilty of negligence, i.e., the tort alleged against him.
- G It might be just to say that the plaintiff wife ought not to obtain compensation out of the defendant's pocket where she herself was also a cause responsible for her injury and damage. In an action by the husband per quod consortium amisit he must show, as the first part of his action on the case, a wrong-doing of the defendant which has resulted in the damage which the husband claims.
- H If in such an action the husband shows that the defendant was negligent in a way which was partly the cause of the injury to the wife as a consequence of which the husband suffered the damage he claims, he has proved the tort alleged. In my opinion, he is then entitled to succeed, just as a passenger in a vehicle who claims that the defendant, the driver of the other vehicle which collided with that in which the plaintiff was riding, is entitled to succeed although the defendant shows that there was contributory negligence on the part of the driver of the vehicle in which the plaintiff was a passenger. The law says that the passenger is not dependent on his driver's cause of action. The passenger is not identified with his driver and is not defeated through the wrong-doing of his driver which contributed to bring about the accident and the plaintiff's injury. For the reasons I have given, in my opinion, the husband's claim is likewise not defeated by the fact that his wife was guilty of wrong-doing which was also a cause of the injury to her as a consequence of which he has suffered damage.

It must be remembered that it was not the wife who gave her husband the right to consortium. It was the status of marriage which gave that right. The husband did not derive his cause of action from his wife, but from his marriage. Some support for this line of reasoning is, I think, to be found by glancing at the other action on the case given to the husband per quod consortium amisit to which I have already alluded, the action for damages for enticing away a wife. In such an action the fact that a wife is shown eventually to have chosen to leave her husband as a result of persuasion, or inducement, or incitement, or procuring, on the part of the defendant is not only no answer to the claim by her husband against a defendant for damages for so bringing about his wife's desertion of him, but is, in fact, the basis of the cause of action given him by the law: see Winsmore v. Greenbank (2) and per R. S. WRIGHT, J., in Smith v. Kaye (3) quoted with approval by SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1932] 2 K.B. 514) in Place v. Searle (4). In such a case the claim is not based on duress of the wife, which would mean that her will did not go with her act of leaving, nor is it alleged that the wife has been forcibly taken away. The cause of action is for the persuasion or inducing of the wife so that she yields and voluntarily goes. The fact that the husband's loss of consortium in such cases is partly the result of the wife's own wrongful act in leaving her husband in breach of her legal duty to reside and consort with him is a fact in the case which has no effect on the husband's cause of action. None the less, as in the case of contributory negligence, she has herself been guilty of a legal wrong-doing without which her husband would not have suffered the injury and damage for which he brings his action. In my view, the husband's cause of action here is unaffected by the contributory negligence of the wife and he recovers his damages in full.

If it be right that the husband's cause of action per quod consortium amisit is his own and distinct from the claim made by his wife (as I hold), it follows, in my view, that it is not within the words of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. By s. 1 (1) of that Act:

"Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage . . ."

That section applies in express terms to a case where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of another person, and a claim in respect of that damage is not to be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage. The husband making his own claim for the damage which he has sustained is not a person claiming in respect of damage which is the result partly of his own fault. He has not been at fault. Since the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, there seems no vestige of a reason left for imputing a wife's contributory negligence to her husband. She has full responsibility for her own tort. She is a fully independent legal person.

Young and Young v. Otto (5), decided in the Supreme Court of Alberta (Canada) by BOYD MCBRIDE, J., was cited to me as showing that in Canada it has been held that a husband's claim such as I am here considering abates by the same fraction as that of the wife where contributory negligence on the part of the wife is found by the court. The view which the Canadian courts seem to have taken is that before the Contributory Negligence Act, 1942 (the Canadian Act corresponding with our Act of 1945) the husband's claim would have been defeated by a decision that his wife had been guilty of contributory negligence, and that since the passing of the Act the defendant's liability for the consequences of the accident in question is limited to his proportion of fault, and the defendant is answerable only to that extent towards the person claiming damages resulting from the accident, although the claimant be the husband of a wife who has been injured or the father of an injured child. The courts there have said ([1947] 2 W.W.R. 959) that the true purport of the Canadian Contributory Negligence Act "is a limitation as to responsibility."

With great respect to those who have so held, I venture to think that the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, is not so framed. In express terms it only applies to a claim by a person who suffers as the result partly of his own fault. This cannot apply to the husband's claim here unless his claim is identified in law with that of his wife. I have endeavoured to show why, in my view, it is not so identified. In my opinion, the husband here must succeed as to all his claim or totally fail. In my judgment, he succeeds.

LYONS v. DENSCOMBE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Sellers, JJ.), April 12, 1949.]

Street Traffic—Express carriage—Car used to take owner's fellow workmen home from work—Owner paid lump sum a week—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 61 (1).

Insurance—Motor insurance—Third party risks—Policy excluding "use for hire or reward other than private hire"—Supply of car "direct from garage"—Car used to take owner's fellow workmen home from work—Car taken to place of work hours before.

A mineworker drove to the colliery each morning in his motor car and in the evening drove home four fellow workmen, who, pursuant to an agreement made by the mineworker with one of them, paid him 8s. a week (2s. each) whether they used the car or not. The car was licensed as a private hire car and hackney carriage, and it was insured, but the insurance policy did not cover "use for hire or reward other than 'private hire'", which was defined to mean the "letting of the vehicle supplied direct from the policy holder's garage."

HELD: (i) the contract was for the lump sum of 8s. a week and not for separate fares and, therefore, the car was not used as an express carriage as defined by the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 61 (1), without a public service vehicle licence or a road service licence contrary to ss. 67 (1) and 72 (1) of the Act.

(ii) "private hire" meant hire for a defined journey at a defined time as distinct from plying for hire and included the picking up of passengers away from the policy holder's garage even though the car went to the place some hours before the hirers got into it, and, therefore, the car was covered by the policy.

CASE STATED by Glamorgan justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Cowbridge on Nov. 16, 1948, informations were preferred by the appellant charging the respondent with having used his Austin 12 h.p. saloon motor car on a road at Llanharan between July 13, 1948, and Sept. 1, 1948, without there being in force in relation thereto a policy of insurance or other security in respect of third party risks as required by the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), and with having caused the car over the same period to be used on a road at Llanharan as an express carriage without his being the holder of a licence to use it as a vehicle of that class, contrary to s. 67 of the Act, and without being the holder of a road service licence granted by the Road Traffic Commissioners, contrary to s. 72 thereof. The car was licensed for private and hackney purposes and there was no road service licence or public service licence in respect of it. There was a certificate of insurance in force in respect of it which did not cover use for hire or reward other than "private hire," which was defined as the letting of the car supplied direct from the policy holder's garage. The respondent contended that the car was a private hire car. The justices dismissed the informations. The prosecutor appealed and the Divisional Court dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Lloyd-Jones for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The respondent was summoned for using an uninsured motor car on the ground that the use to which he put it was not covered by his policy of insurance. It was also alleged that he had committed an offence because his car was used "as an express carriage without his being the holder of a licence to use the said motor car as a vehicle of that class," and also "for that he between the dates and at the place aforesaid did use the said motor car on a service as an express carriage without being the holder of a road service licence granted by the Road Traffic Commissioners."

The justices found that the respondent was a mineworker at Llanharan Colliery, Brynna, and there also worked at the colliery four men called Ware, Witts, Evans and Dykes. The respondent drove himself to the colliery every morning, and he drove these four men home every night. He had a licence covering the use of his car for private and hackney purposes, and, therefore, so far as the licence was concerned, he was entitled to use the car as what is generally known as a hire car. The four men were brought home each night by the respondent

"in pursuance of an arrangement entered into between Ware and the respondent whereby in consideration of a weekly payment of the sum of 8s. the respondent agreed to convey the said Ware, Witts, Evans and Dykes from the said colliery to Brynna aforesaid on six days in each week."

Each man contributed 2s. a week towards that 8s. a sum which was payable whether all of them rode in the car or not. In other words, the justices found that there was a contract between Ware and the respondent for the use of his car for 8s. a week.

For a vehicle to be an express carriage there must be an agreement for separate fares, and the contention of the appellant is that the justices should have regarded this contract, not as one for a lump sum of 8s., but as four different contracts of 2s. each because these men contributed equally to the 8s. The justices do not find how the men would have contributed if one of them was ill or away from work for a week and the other three continued to use the car. I should expect that in that case those who used it would have to make up the 8s., but the contract the justices have found is clearly one of 8s. a week for the use of the car. That seems to me to put the case entirely outside the provisions with regard to express carriages in the Road Traffic Act and to show that the transaction was simply the hire of a hire car. Therefore, I think the two summonses with regard to the use of the car as an express carriage were rightly dismissed.

The third summons (for using the car when there was not a policy of insurance in force in respect of it) also presents no difficulty. It is found :

- B " . . . that there was in force between the said dates in relation to the said motor car a certificate of insurance which provided that the said certificate did not cover the said motor car against (inter alia) use for hire or reward other than 'private hire,' which expression in the said certificate was stated to mean the letting of the vehicle supplied direct from the policy holder's garage."
- C It is said that the letting of the vehicle was not direct from the policy holder's garage because it was driven to the colliery in the morning and the four men only travelled in it in the evening. It seems to me, however, that this is clearly private hire. Private hire is distinct, in my opinion, from plying for hire, that is to say, using the car as a taxicab, standing in the street or driving about seeking passengers. It is private hire in the way that any private hire car is used, namely, by hiring the vehicle for a defined journey at a defined time.
- D It is said that what occurred in this case was not letting the vehicle direct from the policy holder's garage, but every person who hires a private hire car expects the car to pick him up somewhere. He may, of course, go to the garage and get into the car, there, but he need not do so. If I want a car to meet me at a railway station, it has to come to the station from the garage where it is kept.
- E If it does so, it is supplied direct from the garage. It is not plying for hire. Can it make any difference for the purpose of insurance that the car is driven to the place where the hirers are going to get into it some hours before they do get into it? Admittedly, if this car came straight out from the garage to the colliery and picked up the men there, it would be a letting direct from the garage. Why does it cease to be a letting direct from the garage if it gets to the colliery five minutes before the men get into it? If not, does it cease to be such a letting if half-an-hour or an hour elapses? Obviously not. For these reasons, I think that the policy was in force in respect of this car, that the justices came to a perfectly right decision in this case, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

G OLIVER, J. : I agree.

SELLERS, J. : I agree. The definition of an express carriage is : "A motor vehicle carrying for hire or reward at separate fares," and our decision turns on the finding of the justices that this was a contract for one fare paid weekly. It is possible on the evidence that they might have come to another conclusion, but on their conclusion no infringement has been established.

Appeal dismissed.

ERIC GNAPP, LTD. v. PETROLEUM BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.J.J.), March 28, 29, April 12, 1949.]

County Court—Appeal—Leave—Debt or damages claimed not exceeding £20—Claim for less than £20 on one cause of action coupled with claim exceeding £20 on another—Whether leave to appeal required in respect of smaller claim—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105.

Weights and Measures—"Measures"—"Measuring instrument"—Liquid fuel—Road tank wagon and dip rod—Whether separately or together a "measure" or "measuring instrument"—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (c. 49), ss. 25, 29—Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (c. 21), s. 35.

Contract—Undue influence—Duress—Failure of consideration—Contract with body having monopoly—Petroleum board having sole right to supply petrol—Conditions of contract excluding liability of board for short measure—Whether contract obtained by undue influence or duress.

The County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, provides: "If any party to any proceedings in a county court is dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision or order of the judge may appeal therefrom to the Court of Appeal in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the Rules of the Supreme Court: Provided that, without the leave of the judge, there shall be no appeal: (a) in any action founded on contract or on tort . . . where the debt or damages claimed does not exceed £20."

A company claimed in a county court against the Petroleum Board (i) £1 3s. 4½d. overpaid by the company in respect of alleged short deliveries of petrol, (ii) £4 7s. 6d., and (iii) general damages not exceeding £200, in respect of the failure and refusal of the Board to supply petrol, but limiting the total claim to £200. The county court judge found for the Board in respect of both the short deliveries and also the failure to supply. It was conceded that with regard to the issue as to the failure to supply out of which claims (ii) and (iii) arose the company was entitled to appeal without leave, but it was argued that leave was required in respect of claim (i).

Held: proviso (a) to s. 105 referred to the debt or damages "in any action" and not "in any cause of action," and, as in the action as a whole the "debt or damages" in the aggregate amounted to more than £20, no leave to appeal was required.

The Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 25, provides: "Every person who uses or has in his possession for use for trade any weight measure scale balance steelyard or weighing machine which is false or unjust, shall be liable to a fine . . . and any contract bargain or sale or dealing made by the same shall be void, and the weight measure scale balance or steelyard shall be liable to be forfeited."

Soon after the outbreak of the 1939-1945 war the Petroleum Board was established by agreement with the government as the sole suppliers to retailers of petrol, subsequently receiving statutory recognition as such. The Board delivered petrol subject to certain conditions of sale including: "1. The buyers shall accept as having been discharged from the sellers' road tank wagon such quantity shown by the sellers' road tank wagon dip rod in connection with deliveries of motor spirit. 2. Owing to the volatile nature of petroleum products the sellers cannot guarantee that each package when delivered contains the quantity originally measured, although every precaution is taken when filling packages to see that the correct (full) measure is given, each package being filled by means of a government stamped measure.” A company of petrol retailers, whose contract with the Board contained those conditions complained to the Board from time to time of short deliveries. The Board discovered that the sword-type dip rod (which was calibrated for use with the tank wagon to which it belonged) used for checking deliveries to the company had a loose cross head, and stated that they were willing to make an allowance of one gallon per compartment for every delivery from the vehicle concerned since the date of the last examination of the vehicle. The company insisted, however, that that allowance was inadequate, and that, in using that particular vehicle, the Board was defrauding them with short measure. The Board refused to execute further orders from the company until the allegations were withdrawn. The company did not withdraw, and received no further supplies until the Board ceased to control the supply of petrol. The company claimed damages against the Board for refusal to supply them, and the return of money overpaid to the Board by them. The county court judge found as a fact that deliveries were² short by eleven gallons, but that, in view of the conditions of sale, the company was precluded from recovering the money overpaid.

HELD : (i) the order from which the Board derived its authority at the date of the refusal to supply (the Control of Motor Fuel Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 2058)) did not impose on the Board a duty to supply a dealer with petrol equivalent in quantity to that shown on the coupons surrendered by the dealer, and failure to supply was not made an offence, and, therefore, no right of action was afforded to the company in respect of the failure.

(ii) the fact that the company was bound to accept the terms of contract offered by the Board because it was the sole supplier did not make the contract one obtained by duress or undue influence, nor, having regard to the conditions of sale had there been any failure of consideration.

(iii) neither the dip rod alone (because per se it gave no indication of the amount of its contents), nor the rod and the wagon together (because they were not a simple container) constituted a “measure” within s. 25 or s. 29 of the Act of 1878, and, although the rod and wagon together were a “measuring instrument” within (inter alia) s. 35 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, the provisions of s. 25 were only applied (by the Measuring Instruments (Liquid Fuel and Lubricating Oil) Regulations, 1929) to such instruments used for the measurement of individual quantities not exceeding twenty gallons; here the “instrument” was used to measure quantities up to 300 gallons; and, therefore, the contract between the company and the board was not avoided by s. 25.

APPEAL by a company from an order of His Honour JUDGE GRANVILLE SMITH, at Barnet County Court, dated Oct. 21, 1948.

The company alleged that various deliveries to them of petrol by the Petroleum Board were short, and that, on their charging the Board, after frequent complaints, with dealing fraudulently, the Board refused them further supplies. The company claimed repayment to them of sums alleged to have been overpaid in respect of deliveries of petrol and damages for the Board's refusal to supply. The county court judge dismissed the company's claims. On appeal, after a preliminary point (on the question of the right of the company to appeal without leave of the county court judge) had been decided in favour of the company, the decision of the county court judge was affirmed. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

King-Hamilton for the company.

Milmo for the defendants, the Petroleum Board.

A

TUCKER, L.J. : A preliminary objection was taken that there is no jurisdiction to entertain part of the appeal on the ground that no leave to appeal was obtained from the county court judge.

The claim was one by a company, Eric Gnapp, Ltd., against the Petroleum Board, and the first three paragraphs of the particulars of claim claim £1 3s. 4½d. moneys overpaid in respect of alleged short deliveries of petrol by the Board to the plaintiffs. The remainder of the claim is based on an alleged breach by the Board of their obligation to supply petrol to all licensed retailers provided the said retailers pay the proper price and surrender the appropriate number of coupons. It is alleged that, after disputes had arisen with regard to the matters alleged in the first three paragraphs, the Board refused to supply petrol to the plaintiffs; that they were under a legal obligation so to do; and that, by reason of that breach, the plaintiffs suffered damage. They claim the small sum of £4 7s. 6d. in respect of one failure to deliver and they claim general damages, bringing their total claim up to £200 in respect of the failure to supply. The learned judge decided both these issues in favour of the Board and the plaintiffs now appeal. It is conceded that with regard to the plaintiffs' claim for general damages amounting to £196 odd, they are entitled to appeal without leave, but in respect of the claim relating to £1 3s. 4½d., a point is taken by counsel for the Board that, that being a claim in respect of a debt not exceeding £20, the plaintiffs require leave.

D

The matter turns on the proper interpretation of s. 105 of the County Courts Act, 1934, which provides :

E

"If any party to any proceedings in a county court is dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or equity or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision or order of the judge may appeal therefrom to the Court of Appeal in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the Rules of the Supreme Court."

F

In the present case the plaintiffs are a party aggrieved by a judgment of the county court judge. The section goes on :

"Provided that, without the leave of the judge, there shall be no appeal : (a) in any action founded on contract or on tort . . . where the debt or damages claimed does not exceed £20."

G

This is an action founded both on contract and on tort, and the debt and damages together far exceed £20, but it is said that the proviso should be read in such a way as to require the plaintiffs to obtain leave to appeal. It is argued that if any one cause of action which goes to make up the totality of their claim is for an amount not exceeding £20 they require leave to appeal from any judgment or decision on that cause of action. I do not think that that is the proper interpretation to be put on the proviso. Although the language is by no means clear, I think the words "in any action" are decisive in favour of the plaintiffs. It would have been easy to limit the appeal to specific causes of action, but the words in the proviso are "in any action," and I think the effect is that if, in any action, the total debt or damages claimed exceeds £20, the plaintiff is entitled to appeal without leave. To render it necessary that leave should be obtained there must be a claim for a debt or damages which does, or do, not amount to £20.

We have been referred to Dreesman v. Harris (1), but that was a case under the old Act relating to county courts—13 & 14 Vict., c. 61—and, though the language there was slightly different, I do not think it affords any assistance in the solution of this point. I think the preliminary objection fails.

A

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. Taking the language of proviso (a) to s. 105, it is impossible to say that there was here more than one action, however many causes of action there may have been. It is equally impossible to deny that in that action more than £20 in all was claimed taking debt and damages together. This means substituting “and/or” for “or,” but it does seem to me clearly to be the meaning intended. I agree that the preliminary objection fails.

B

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

[Having heard the arguments of counsel on the main issue the Lordships indicated that they would consider their judgments.]

C

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 12. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : The appellants, who were plaintiffs in the action, are a company who were at all material times carrying on business as garage proprietors and licensed suppliers of petrol at South Mimms. Shortly after the outbreak of war the Petroleum Board was established by agreement with the government, and thereafter dealers in petrol could only obtain supplies from the Board. It subsequently received statutory recognition by the Petroleum (No. 2) Order, 1939 (No. 1447). The order in force at the material date was the Control of Petroleum Order, 1944, art. 8 of which reads, so far as material, as follows : “No person other than the Petroleum Board shall (a) dispose of any petroleum except under the authority of a licence.” The Board, accordingly, by orders having the force of law obtained a monopoly in the disposal of petrol. The terms on which they were willing to do business with dealers contained the following clause :

“Delivery of each product is made subject to sellers’ usual conditions of sale applicable to that product and acceptance of goods will be treated as acceptance of these conditions.”

F

The conditions of sale provided :

“1. The buyers shall accept as having been discharged from the sellers’ road tank wagon such quantity shown by the sellers’ road tank wagon dip rod in connection with deliveries of motor spirit. 2. Owing to the volatile nature of petroleum products the sellers cannot guarantee that each package when delivered contains the quantity originally measured, although every precaution is taken when filling packages to see that the correct (full) measure is given, each package being filled by means of a government stamped measure.”

G

The contract or contracts between the company and the Board with which this appeal is concerned contained these conditions. Before the formation of the Board some, if not all, of the companies supplying motor spirit had the same or similar conditions in their contracts. The company had always objected to these conditions, and in 1942, after having, as they said, received short deliveries on many occasions, they protested that the conditions amounted to a denial of justice. On Sept. 9, 1942, the Board wrote :

H

“We acknowledge your letter of the 3rd instant containing the serious allegation that we use unjust methods of trading, adding the comment that you have not time to go fully into the matter. We have to inform you that we are not prepared to continue selling to a buyer who takes up that attitude. If, therefore, you wish us to continue to supply, will you either withdraw the allegation or find time to justify it. We deny that we have made any short deliveries to you."

On the next day the company withdrew their allegations in a letter from which the following is an extract :

"We withdraw the allegation contained in our letter to you dated Sept. 3, 1942. This confirms our telephone conversation of today with Mr. H. K. Stein, [and] we hope a better feeling of understanding will be mutual."

Thereafter the company, according to their evidence, continued to receive short measure. Early in 1948 further complaints were made, and ultimately, by letter of Feb. 18, the Board wrote informing the company that it had been found that the cross head of the sword type dip rod used to measure vehicle No. 1458 was loose, and saying this would have accounted for short measure to the extent of one gallon in each compartment. They, accordingly, stated they were willing to make an allowance to the extent of the price of one gallon per compartment for every delivery from this vehicle since Mar. 12, 1946, when it was last checked. This amounted to £1 7s. 3d. The last of such deliveries which was admitted to have been short to the extent of one gallon was a delivery of 300 gallons on Jan. 17, 1948. The company were, however, not satisfied with the Board's explanation, as, in their view, the shortages had exceeded one gallon per compartment and short deliveries continued to be made after the date when the dip rod was said to have been rectified. On Apr. 13, 1948, the company wrote :

"We enclose cheque value £27 10s. 0d. and request delivery of three hundred gallons of petrol in a vehicle whose tank is accurately and properly calibrated. In our opinion, your delivery to us today ex vehicle No. 1458 front compartment is defrauding us with short measure, and that you are defrauding us with intent by continuing to use this vehicle. We have coupons ready ; please acknowledge."

The Board replied :

"Our St. Albans depot have today received a cheque for £27 10s. 0d. together with your order for 300 gallons petrol. This order included certain conditions and observations which are at variance with the arrangement reached between our legal department and yourselves in September, 1942, and are also not in line with an undertaking then given by you to our legal department. We are instructed to inform you that the Board is not prepared to execute an order subject to the observations and conditions contained in your communication now to hand, and may consider it necessary to implement what was indicated to you in the correspondence and conversations of September, 1942. If you agree to withdraw the observations made in your last communication and to tender us a fresh order on a basis in line with the understanding reached in September, 1942, we shall be pleased to give the matter our attention."

The company did not withdraw. On Apr. 19 their cheque for £27 10s. 0d. was returned, and thereafter they received no supplies of motor spirit until July 7, by which date the Petroleum Board had ceased to control the supply of motor spirit. The company brought an action in Barnet county court claiming £1 3s. 4½d. as money overpaid in respect of short deliveries on Jan. 17, Mar. 18, Mar. 19 and Apr. 12, 1948, from vehicle 1458 amounting in all to eleven gallons. The delivery on Jan. 17 which was the last of the deliveries admitted by the Board to be short to the extent of one gallon, was alleged by the company to have been deficient to the extent of four gallons. The other deliveries were alleged to have been deficient to the extent of two gallons on Mar. 18, and two and a half gallons on each of the other two occasions. They also claimed damages for the Board's refusal to supply the 300 gallons order on Apr. 13, 1948, and for their refusal to make any further supplies thereafter, making their total claim £200. The learned county court judge found in favour of the Board under both heads of claim.

A I will deal first with the claim for damages for refusal to supply. It was contended, in the first place, that the company were entitled to succeed by virtue of the Statute of Monopolies, 1623, s. 4, although it was conceded that the monopoly was lawfully given to the Board by virtue of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 1 (4). A study of s. 4 of the statute of 1623 makes it clear that it affords no remedy to a trader with whom the grantee of a monopoly refuses to do business. It deals with damage caused by the creation of a monopoly. The claim based on s. 4 of the statute clearly fails.

B It was said, however, that where there is a monopoly created or recognised by an instrument having statutory force which prohibits a trader already established in business from obtaining supplies essential to his trade from any other source, there is a duty on the monopoly holder to supply the commodity against tender of the appropriate price and on compliance by the trader with any of the requirements of the relevant statutory rules and orders or other lawful directions governing the control and supply of the commodity in question, for example, in the present case, the surrender by the dealer of the requisite number of coupons. It was further contended that a breach of this duty gives the injured party a remedy in damages. Such a duty, if it exists, must in the present case be found in the orders and regulations governing petrol rationing. The Order in force on Apr. 13, 1948, was the Control of Motor Fuel Order, 1947 (No. 2058). In pt. I of this Order it is provided :

E “ (1) Except under the authority of a licence (a) no person other than a supplier shall furnish any supply of motor fuel, and no person shall acquire any such supply otherwise than from a supplier; and (b) no person shall furnish or acquire a supply of motor fuel otherwise than against the surrender of valid coupons to the supplier at the time of supply, and in accordance with any condition or instruction appearing on or attached to those coupons. (2) (1) The provisions of the preceding article shall not apply to (a) a supply of motor fuel furnished to a dealer, against the delivery by him to a supplier of coupons indicating the previous supply by him of a quantity of motor fuel not less than the quantity thereof then supplied to him (less an allowance of one per cent.), if such information as is required to be so furnished has, except in so far as the Minister may otherwise direct, been inserted by him in writing.”

F “ Dealer ” and “ supplier ” are defined in art. 35 as follows :

G “ ‘ Dealer ’ means a supplier carrying on that business as a retail business. ‘ Supplier ’ means a person carrying on the business of supplying motor fuel.”

H The Order nowhere in terms requires a supplier to supply to a dealer motor fuel equivalent in quantity to that shown on the coupons surrendered by the dealer. The failure to supply is not made an offence, nor is any such obligation placed on the Board by the Order which gave it the monopoly. This kind of question may some day in a proper case require careful consideration. With the growth of statutory corporations to which monopolies are given by the statutes creating them, it may become of supreme importance to decide, on the construction of the relevant statute, to what extent, if any, a refusal by the statutory body to do business with a particular trader may afford that trader a right of action. In the present case we are dealing with a temporary monopoly given in time of war for the safety of the realm, and I can find nothing in the relevant orders which have been brought to our attention which affords a right of action to a dealer where the Board in the bona fide exercise of its discretion has imposed reasonable terms as a condition of doing business with that dealer. I, accordingly, agree with the learned county court judge that this part of the claim fails.

With regard to the claim for the return of money overpaid different considerations arise. The judge has found as a fact that the deliveries complained of were short to the extent of eleven gallons, but held that the company were precluded by the conditions of sale from recovering the money overpaid. A number of points were taken at the trial on behalf of the company in support of their contention that the conditions of sale were not binding on them and most of these points have again been relied on in this court. Some of them can be shortly disposed of. First, it was contended that the company's consent to the contract had been obtained by duress or undue influence, and that, accordingly, they were not bound by its terms. It was truly said that for a contract to be enforceable it must be freely entered into, but that does not mean that one party to a contract can escape its provisions merely because he was compelled to accept the terms of the other contracting party because there was no one else with whom he could contract for the supply of the particular commodity he required. There is here no question of force or threat of force or fear of personal suffering or abuse of legal proceedings. None of the essential elements of duress is present, nor is it a case where undue influence of one party over the other is presumed or has been proved to have been acquired and abused. Secondly, it was said that the price of the motor fuel which was paid in advance included tax, and that the company were entitled to recover that part of the money paid for motor fuel which represented tax collected from them in respect of fuel which they never received. In truth, no tax is paid or collected from the dealer. The tax is payable at an earlier stage and is merely reflected in the increased price charged to the dealer and by him to the public. There is no substance in this point. Thirdly, it was argued that the money was recoverable as on a total failure of part of the consideration. If, as I have held, the conditions of sale are binding, there has been, as I see it, no failure of consideration. There was, in truth, no contract for the delivery of 300 gallons on the dates in question. The contract was for the delivery of and payment for the quantity shown by the dip rod as being in the compartments of the wagon. The company got what by the contract they were bound to accept as good delivery. There was, accordingly, in my view, no failure of consideration. Fourthly, it is contended that the contracts under which each of the deliveries in question were made were void under the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 25 (as amended by the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, s. 3), which provides :

"Every person who uses or has in his possession for use for trade any weight measure scale balance steelyard or weighing machine which is false or unjust, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £5, or in the case of a second offence £20, and any contract bargain sale or dealing made by the same shall be void, and the weight measure scale balance or steelyard shall be liable to be forfeited."

The first question is whether, as the company contend, the tank wagon and/or dip rod either singly or in combination is a "measure" within the meaning of the section, and the next, if so, whether it was "false" or "unjust." The Act contains no definition of a "measure." It was common ground that the dip rod which is affixed to each wagon is calibrated so that it can be used to ascertain the contents of a particular wagon. There are different markings on each side of the dip rod appropriate to each compartment. A dip rod is of no use for measuring purposes save in the compartments of the particular wagon in relation to which it has been calibrated. The wagon by itself contains no markings by which its contents can be measured. It was contended for the Board that neither the wagon nor the dip rod singly or in combination is a "measure." It was said that the wagon is merely a vessel for transporting motor fuel and that the dip rod is a "measuring instrument" within the meaning of the amending Weights and Measures Act, 1889, which is to be read together with the principal Act. By s. 35 of the Act of 1889 a

- A "measuring instrument" includes "any instrument for the measurement of length, capacity, volume, temperature, pressure, or gravity, or for the measurement and determination of electrical quantities." By s. 1 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1926, the definition is extended to include "any instrument for the measuring of superficial area, or for measurement by counting." In my view, the contention of the Board is correct. A study of the provisions of the
- B Act as a whole leads me to the conclusion that a measure of liquid connotes a simple vessel or container which by itself constitutes an independent unit of measurement. I have had the advantage of reading the judgments which are to be delivered by ASQUITH, L.J., and SINGLETON, L.J., on this part of the case, and I am content to say that I am in agreement with the reasoning by which they have arrived at the same conclusion.

- C I am, accordingly, of opinion that this contention also fails, with the result that the appeal should be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. The main question in this case is whether a contract which includes condition (1) of the conditions of sale is avoided by s. 25 or s. 29 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878. Section 25 of that

- D Act avoids contracts made by any "measure" which any person has in his possession for use for trade, if such "measure" is "false or unjust." Section 29 avoids contracts made by a "measure" which any person has in his possession for use for trade which is not stamped as required by that section. These particular sections apply, as between "measures" and "measuring instruments," only to the former. Is the dipstick used in this case, or the tank, or the complex of dipstick plus tank, a "measure"? "Measure," as
- E contrasted with "measuring instrument," is nowhere defined in the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878, 1889, 1904 or 1926, and few cases have been decided in relation thereto as compared with those decided on weights and weighing machines, but (a) these few authorities, (b) other provisions of the Act of 1878, and (c) regulations made in 1907 all concur to suggest that a "measure" means a simple vessel or container which, when full or full up to a certain mark,
- F purports to hold a gallon or some multiple or aliquot part thereof, for instance, eight gallons, or a quart, pint, gill, etc. (a) As to the authorities, Robinson v. Golding (2) decided that a pint pot of milk, in fact holding, when full, a pint, but unstamped, is a "measure," so, again, a milk churn marked internally with discs purporting to show, for the purposes of trade, the quantity of milk it contains is a "measure" if used for measuring the volume of milk, but
- G not if used merely for carriage of milk; (b) the same conclusion is pointed to by such provisions of the Act of 1878 as s. 17. It is headed "Measure of capacity when used to be stricken or filled up." It deals with dry measures of capacity and provides that an imperial measure of capacity shall be, not "heaped," but either "stricken" or, if the article cannot from its size or shape "be conveniently stricken," shall be "filled in all parts as nearly to the level
- H of the brim as the size and shape of the article will admit." This, again, suggests a plain container with a mouth or brim which, when full to the brim, holds the amount it professes to hold. The Weights and Measures Regulations, 1907, embodied in S.R. & O., 1907, No. 698 (made under s. 5 of the Act of 1904), not only reinforce this suggestion, but in the section headed "Liquid Measures of Capacity" make it, to my mind, irresistible. For example, by reg. 35 :

"A glass measure shall not be stamped unless the capacity is defined either (a) by the brim of the measure, or (b) by a line at least two inches in length, distant not less than half an inch nor more than one and a half inches from the brim."

Or reg. 38 :

"Every measure from eight gallons to a quarter gill, both inclusive, shall be tested by filling the standard with water and emptying the contents of the standard into the measure submitted for verification."

Now, the dipstick per se is plainly not a container, and, therefore, not a "measure." Indeed, by itself it can measure nothing, for it is useless except in combination with a tank specially adapted to it. Nor is the tank per se a "measure," for, although a container, it gives per se no indication as to what it will contain when full or full up to any given level. Is, then, the complex of dipstick plus tank a "measure" ? No, for this complex is not a simple container (and, incidentally, it is difficult to see how it could be stamped). On the other hand, the complex of the two seems to fall exactly within the class of things which is referred to in the Acts, in a manner which impliedly contrasts them with "measures," under the designation of "measuring instruments."

Section 35 of the Act of 1889 defines a "measuring instrument" as any instrument for the measurement, inter alia, of capacity or volume. The Act of 1926 extended the regulation-making power given by s. 5 of the Act of 1904 by enabling the Board of Trade to apply to such "measuring instruments used for trade as may be specified in the regulations" any of the provisions of the Acts of 1878 and 1904, and the Board of Trade, by art. 2 of the Measuring Instruments (Liquid Fuel and Lubricating Oil) Regulations, 1929 (S.R. & O., 1929, No. 183), applied s. 25 of the Act of 1878, among other sections, to "any instrument used in trade for the measurement of liquid fuel . . . in individual quantities not exceeding twenty gallons other than a simple independent measure." No other provision applies s. 25 (or s. 29) to "measuring instruments" as opposed to "measures." Such a composite apparatus as the dipstick and tank would be caught by the regulations of 1929 but for the words "not exceeding twenty gallons," for, as the evidence shows in this case, the apparatus was used in trade for the measurement of liquid fuel in individual quantities greatly exceeding twenty gallons, namely, 300 gallons.

For these reasons, I think the apparatus in question (1) was not a "measure", and was, therefore, not hit by the provisions of s. 25 or s. 29 of the Act of 1878 ; (2) was a "measuring instrument," but was not hit by the Liquid Fuel Regulations, 1929, for the reason just given ; and, accordingly, (3) that the contracts of sale, including condition of sale 1, are not void by reason of the Weights and Measures Acts. On this and the other points of the case I wholly concur in the judgment of my Lord, and the appeal must be dismissed.

SINGLETON, L.J. : The learned county court judge found that there were shortages in the deliveries of petrol to the company of the amounts claimed in the particulars of claim. He further found that there was no evidence before him to show that any measuring instrument of the Board was inaccurate or wrong. Now, the Board had admitted that their dipstick was out of order at the time of the first delivery of which complaint was made in the claim, and that that "would have accounted for short measure on each compartment to the extent of one gallon" : see their letter of Feb. 18, 1948. In those circumstances, the judge ought to have found that at least one gallon of the shortage in January, 1948, was due to the faulty dipstick. He might have found that the whole of the shortage (four gallons) on that delivery was due to that cause though he was not bound to do so if was of opinion that there was another cause.

The point of importance in the appeal is whether the company are bound by condition No. 1 of the conditions of sale which has already been read. They relied on the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, s. 25, and they claimed that the dip rod (or dipstick) was a "measure" within the meaning of the word in that section, that on the Board's admission it was false or unjust (at least in regard to the January, 1948, delivery), and that the contract, bargain, sale or dealing made by it was void accordingly. If that argument is sound, the company are entitled to succeed in regard to the January delivery. Later deliveries would not be affected in view of the findings of fact to the effect that the fault in the dip rod was a temporary matter and was corrected before

- A the next delivery. Among dictionary definitions of "measure" I find the following: "An instrument for measuring," "a graduated rod, line, tape, etc.," "that by which anything is computed or estimated, or with which it is compared in respect of quantity." It might be thought that the dip rod falls within some of these. The question to be determined depends on whether the dip rod is a measure within the meaning of s. 25 of the Act of 1878.
- B The Act does not give any definition of "measure." It is to be noticed that s. 25 makes it a criminal offence for anyone to have in his possession for use for trade a measure which is false or unjust. Section 28 provides that weights and measures shall be stamped, and s. 29 provides that every measure and weight whatsoever used for trade shall be verified and stamped by an inspector with a stamp of verification under the Act, and provides penalties for breach.
- C Thus, if the dip rod is a measure within s. 25, a further penalty was incurred under s. 29. Each road tank wagon carried its own dip rod, and each dip rod was calibrated for the tank wagon to which it belonged. The vehicles differ in construction. If the dip rod has to be verified and stamped with a stamp of verification that can only be done in its relation to a particular tank wagon, from which it would seem that the dip rod is not a measure in the same sense as
- D is a pint vessel or a yard stick. It would create an impossible position if you had thousands of dip rods marked with the stamp of verification and yet varying according to the tank wagon to which each was calibrated.

The submission of the Board is that the dip rod is no more than an instrument for measuring what is in, or what is taken out of, a particular tank wagon.

- E Counsel pointed out that the difference between a measure and a measuring instrument was recognised by the legislature, and he referred to the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, s. 12, and to later enactments. Again, in 1929, the Board of Trade made regulations, the Measuring Instruments (Liquid Fuel and Lubricating Oil) Regulations, 1929, which defined a "measuring instrument" as "any instrument used in trade for the measurement of liquid fuel or lubricating oil for sale in individual quantities not exceeding twenty gallons, other than a simple independent measure to which the Weights and Measures Regulations, 1907, apply": reg. 2. See also regs. 4 and 5 and the schedule to the Order. I should add that regulations had been made by the Board of Trade under the Weights and Measures Act, 1904 (Statutory Rule and Order, 1907, No. 698), and that those regulations dealt with instruments, including measuring instruments. It is, indeed clear that there is a well recognised
- G distinction between a measure and a measuring instrument.

I have come to the conclusion that the contention of the Board is right. The difficulties of verification and stamping, and which would arise therefrom, seem to me conclusive against the argument that the dip rod is a measure within the meaning of s. 25 of the Act of 1878. I have considered whether it can be said that in the circumstances the Board cannot be heard to say that as between

H them and the company the dip rod was not a measure within the meaning of s. 25. The section is a penal section, and its terms do not apply unless the dip rod is a "measure." I do not so regard it, and I cannot see that the doctrine of estoppel can help the company. I agree that the appeal of the company should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, CHELSEA. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. WAR DAMAGE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Evershed, L.J.J., and Wynn-Parry, J.), March 31, April 1, 12, 1949.]

War Damage—Temporary works payment—“Works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage”—Provision of alternative accommodation on the hereditament but away from site of damage—Permanent structures—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 6 (2). A

In 1941 the S. hospital suffered severe damage by bombing. In 1942, to bring the hospital back into use, the hospital authorities carried out certain works which involved (a) the construction, on the site of a former store room, of a new main kitchen and scullery, in place of a kitchen and scullery which had been rendered unusable, and (b) the dividing of a former ward on the ground floor into several parts which were converted into a new operating theatre, surgeon's dressing room, sterilising room, anaesthetising room, X-ray room, dark room and office, to replace those on the first floor which had been damaged. In the course of construction it was necessary to take up a timber floor, fill in the cavity with rubble and lay down a thick concrete floor, provide electric lighting, tap the electric main in the street for intake and instal heavy electric cables to the X-ray room. In respect of these works the hospital authorities claimed a temporary works payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 6 (2). B

HELD: the damage contemplated by the War Damage Act, 1943, was limited to damage to land and buildings; the temporary works payment under s. 6 (2) of the Act was limited to payment of the cost of dealing in an essentially temporary manner with the direct result of such damage and did not include payment in respect of the provision of substituted accommodation erected at a distance from the damage even though it was within the curtilage of the hereditament; and, therefore, the works in question were not “works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage” within the meaning of s. 6 (2). C

Per curiam: The work for which payment could be made was not limited to repair, but included works of precaution, and the durability of any works done was not necessarily the test of their temporary character. D

Decision of VAISEY, J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 444), affirmed. E

[FOR THE WAR DAMAGE ACT, 1943, s. 6 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 36, p. 342.] F

APPEAL by the London County Council, owners of St. Luke's Hospital, Chelsea, from an order of VAISEY, J., dated July 9, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 444, dismissing their appeal from a determination of the War Damage Commission that certain works completed by the council were not “works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by [war] damage,” within the meaning of the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 6 (2), so as to entitle the council to a temporary works payment in respect of them. The respondents, the War Damage Commission, contended that the repairs were adaptations, for the convenience of the council, of the undamaged, or comparatively undamaged, portions of the hospital. VAISEY, J., upheld the determination of the commission, and the council's appeal from his decision was now dismissed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J. G H Moelwyn Hughes, K.C., and Squibb for the London County Council.

Rowe, K.C., and Danckwerts for the War Damage Commission.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 12. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of VAISEY, J., in an appeal by the appellants, the London County Council, on a point of law from a determination of the War Damage Commission. The right of appeal is given by the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 32 (3), and the procedure is regulated by R.S.C., Ord. 55c. The issue comes before the court by way of a Case stated by the War Damage Commission. By agreement between the parties certain correspondence was admitted by the learned judge by way of amplifying the facts as set out in the Case. I do not think any difficulty arises in the present appeal, but it is desirable, if possible, that all facts which the court may be required to consider should be contained in the Case or exhibits thereto.

It is, perhaps, unnecessary to state that the War Damage Act, 1943, provides primarily for two categories of payment, a payment for the cost of works executed for making good the damage, or a value payment when the damage involves a "total loss" as defined in s. 7 (2) of the Act. It is agreed that the damage in the present case was such that it will rank ultimately for a cost of works payment. The present appeal is not concerned with this, but with whether the London County Council can claim in respect of certain works a payment which is referred to in the Act as a "temporary works payment."

On May 11, 1941, St. Luke's Hospital, Chelsea, provided and maintained by the London County Council, sustained war damage within the meaning of the War Damage Act, 1943. The damage, caused by a high explosive bomb, was mainly to the central building. In 1942 certain works of permanent or temporary reinstatement were done as to which no question arises, and the War Damage Commission, the respondents to the appeal, admit that their cost falls within the provisions of the Act. The dispute arises as to other works which are described in para. 5 of the Case Stated, which reads as follows :

"These works, which were carried out for the purpose of affording substituted accommodation for the provision of services, were not executed by way of reinstating or repairing the parts of the damaged building in which the corresponding accommodation and services had been provided before the occurrence of the war damage, but were carried out in different parts of the building as follows : (i) the main kitchen and scullery, which had been in the basement, were constructed in a space formerly occupied by stores in the basement at the southern end of the main building ; and (ii) the operating theatre, surgeon's dressing room, sterilising room, anaesthetising room and X-ray room, dark room and office, which had been on the first floor, were constructed in a space previously occupied by a ward on the ground floor at the north end of the main building. The works relating to (i) consisted of the removal of stud and matchboard partitions which formed basement rooms, the taking up of a timber floor, the filling of the cavity with brick rubble, forming channels and putting down a concrete floor about six ins. thick, the installing of sinks, and the installing of gas, electric and general engineering services. The works relating to (ii) consisted of the division of a ground floor ward by the erection of partitions constructed of timber covered with wallboard so as to form separate rooms, the painting of the walls and doors, the provision of electric lighting, the tapping of the electric main in the street for intake, and installing heavy electric cables to the X-ray room."

The question is whether the cost of these works falls within the provisions of s. 6 (2) of the War Damage Act, 1943. The learned judge decided that it did not. The correspondence makes clear the urgent need for the reinstatement of bed accommodation at the hospital and the necessity or importance of the works in dispute if the hospital was to function.

I will now refer to the relevant provisions of the Act. Section 1 (1) (a) provides that payment shall be made in respect of "war damage to land." Section 2 defines "war damage." Nothing, I think, turns on this, but the categories of damage must be damage to land to be within the Act. As the learned judge said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 447):

"The Act does not deal with damage to a man's pocket or to his convenience, but only with damage to his tangible property—in this case damage to his buildings."

It does not set out to make provision for the expense a man will be put to in living or carrying on his business elsewhere than in the property damaged. There is a reference in s. 2 (2) to "any physical change in land." Section 5 defines the units that are to be treated as hereditaments for payments in respect of war damage. It is common ground that the works in question were within the "developed hereditament" into which the bomb fell, though in undamaged portions of it. The case turns on s. 6, which is:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, a payment to be made thereunder shall be of one or other of the following kinds, that is to say, (a) a payment of cost of works, being a payment of an amount determined by reference to the cost of works executed for making good the damage, as provided by s. 8 of this Act; or (b) a value payment, being a payment of an amount determined by reference to the depreciation in the value of the hereditament caused by the damage, as provided by s. 10 of this Act. (2) Where either a payment of cost of works or a value payment is made in respect of war damage to a hereditament, there shall be made, in addition to that payment, a payment (in this Act referred to as a 'temporary works payment') of an amount equal to the proper cost of any works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage, being (a) where a payment of cost of works is made, works, other than those taken into account in computing the amount of that payment, executed between the occurrence of the damage and the time when it is made good."

Section 6 (2) (b) deals with a value payment case.

The case for the county council may be formulated as follows. These works were temporary in that they were not intended to be permanent. They were make-shifts until permanent work could be done. They were necessary if the hospital was to be brought back into use and were, therefore, reasonably executed to meet "the circumstances created by the damage." As the county council said in their statement, what was done could in no sense be regarded as the equivalent of that which was in use prior to the occurrence of the damage, or as a making good of the damage by alterations to the hereditament. If the words of s. 6 (2) are read apart from their context, the phrase "the . . . cost of any works . . . executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage," might cover the cost to a man, whose factory had been destroyed, of putting up on a different site a building where work could be carried on. The county council do not suggest that this would be covered. They submit, however, that, if the works are within the area of the hereditament, though in an undamaged portion of it, their cost is covered. This would be illogical, but may be the effect of the words used. The words must be read in their immediate context and in the context of the Act as a whole. I agree with the learned judge that "temporarily" means that the works are to be superseded by works intended to be permanent. In the present case, when this damaged building is repaired, the substituted operating theatre will remain an operating theatre and the kitchen a kitchen capable of being used as such. The distinction which I draw is well illustrated by the learned judge's examples. Under the heading of temporary repairs he instances ([1948] 2 All E.R. 447) the insertion of fabric materials in windows to be later glazed, or the patching-up of holes in a roof which will later be re-slatted. They are "make-shifts" for meeting the physical circumstances caused by the damage where that damage occurred, and not make-shifts constructed elsewhere, as in this case, to enable effective, or more effective, use to be made of the undamaged parts of the building, together with such damaged part as can be repaired at the time. The learned judge also, I think, rightly regarded what he described as "works of precaution" as covered by the clause. A protective fence round a crater to keep people from falling into it is a work where the damage occurred, and it temporarily meets the circumstances because, when the damage is made good, there is no danger from which people would need to be protected. Part of it, at least, would have to be removed when the crater was filled up. The fact that as a matter of physical possibility, however unlikely, the remainder or, indeed, the whole might be left standing to serve some other purpose, or no purpose, would not, I think, affect the matter.

A The learned judge's other example, an outside staircase, to take the place of an interior one which had been damaged and became insecure, was referred to in the argument as a difficult, and, perhaps, border-line case. It is distinguishable from the present case in that the work would be done to that part of the building which was damaged. It would be there to enable the building, or the upper part of it, to be used as a building, whatever purpose it were put to. It is not necessary to decide the point, but I think that, if the commission were satisfied that it was the reasonable method of meeting the physical circumstances of the damage to the staircase, it would be within the words. In both classes of case the physical circumstances created by the damage are met temporarily on the site of the damage. In most cases the works of physical necessity are removed when the damage is made good. In some cases their removal may not be a matter of physical necessity, but, looked at objectively as a part of the structure or on the land, they are there to be removed when the damage is made good. It was said that, if the narrower construction for which the War Damage Commission contend had been intended, a simpler formula would have been used. On the construction which I give to the word "temporarily," which sets the primary limits of the clause, I think the latter words are natural. "Temporarily repairing the damage" would have been too narrow, as it would have excluded the "works of precaution," to use the learned judge's phrase. The nature of the damage that might be caused could not be foreseen, and, the general limits having been set by the use of the word "temporarily," it seems to me natural that the later words should give a certain latitude.

E The conclusion to which the learned judge came, with which I agree, is reinforced by the fact that it is only "works" which are to be paid for. F It would be illogical if a factory owner, who built a shed on an undamaged part of his hereditament, could recover the cost, whereas, if he leased a shed next door, he could not. The Act is concerned with physical damage and not with the cost of alternative or substituted accommodation. I would like to add that, if the words are not construed in this sense, but cover substituted accommodation erected at a distance from the damage, I find it difficult to restrict their scope, as counsel for the county council sought to do in argument, to works within the developed hereditament. No such limitation is expressed, and it must, therefore, be implied. So far from its being necessary to give the provision reasonable effect, it would, as it seems to me, make it capricious and unfair. One man has room to put a shed in his yard, and he will or may get indemnified for the cost. Another has to put up a similar shed for a similar purpose in an empty plot he obtains near by, and he cannot get paid for it. G If the words cover substituted accommodation at a distance from the damage, I find it difficult to restrict them. H I myself am clear that they do not.

I should say a word in regard to para. 6 of the Case, which reads as follows :

"In the opinion of the commission the works referred to in para. 5 looked at as a whole would with ordinary care have an effective physical life of about twenty-five years and some of the works would individually have a life of from forty to fifty years."

I agree with the learned judge that, if the substituted accommodation of the kind contended for by the county council was within s. 6 (2) of the Act, it would not be necessary to show that the works were likely to decay at an early date. They would, of course, have to be reasonably executed, and, therefore, not made (if there was a choice) of unnecessarily durable material. On the construction which I put on the clause, the works in this case are not within s. 6 (2) for the reasons which, I hope, I have made plain. The appeal will be dismissed.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I confess that I have felt considerable difficulty in regard to this case, and not the less so because, according to the correspondence which has been before us, the earlier view of the War Damage Commission appeared to be favourable to the council's case. But, having had the advantage of seeing in advance the judgments of my brethren and the clear conclusions they have reached, I have, on the whole, come to the conclusion that the decision of the learned judge ought not to be disturbed. In the circumstances I shall state very briefly the reasons which have led me to this conclusion.

The phrase "works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage" is, prima facie, one of broad import, and it is to be noted that it is to be contrasted with the phrase in s. 2 (1) (b)—"measures taken . . . to mitigate the consequences of such damage." I am, however, satisfied (i) that the Act does not contemplate any payment under this head in respect of losses of profit or amenities to the owner as a result of war damage, and (ii) that the "works" to be undertaken must be executed on or in the single entity, namely, the developed or undeveloped "hereditament" which has sustained the damage. The owner is, therefore, disentitled to make a claim in respect of temporary works executed by him to provide substituted accommodation for himself or his business elsewhere than on the damaged hereditament, notwithstanding that such works could, in other contexts, be fairly said to have been executed for the purpose of "temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage." Is he also disentitled to claim in respect of similar works executed on the "hereditament" which has been damaged, although on land separate from that on which the damaged building stands, or on a part of the damaged building or group of buildings removed from the scene of the damage? And, if not, where should the line be drawn?

I think myself that clearly the phrase in question covers something more than works of mere temporary repair or protective works—to take the examples cited during the argument, the insertion of fabric windows or the railing of a crater. In my judgment, the words are apt to cover also the case put by the learned judge of an outside staircase to take the place, temporarily, of an interior one rendered insecure, or the case put by me of the (temporary) replacement of a lift by a staircase. To some extent, therefore, regard must be had to the use and the means of user of the hereditament, and counsel for the commission conceded as much. The real difficulty to my mind, therefore, lies in deciding how far substituted accommodation of the kind above mentioned extends? Does it extend to works reasonably executed to parts of the hereditament other than those damaged for the purpose of temporarily enabling the hereditament as a whole to continue, more or less, to perform its previous function? On the whole, I agree that regard to the use of the buildings should be limited to their use as buildings and ought not to extend to their use for some particular business or purpose or for some special function. If this is not the correct view, then it would, at any rate, appear to follow that, so long as the works were executed in or on the hereditament in question, the "circumstances" would cover the disturbance of the particular business carried on by the owner or the special use to which he had put the building, and (subject, of course, to the important qualification that the works must have been "reasonably executed") might entitle him to claim in respect of extensive works executed by him on other parts of the hereditament to enable him "temporarily" to continue the business or special use, and the continued use of such works would by no means be necessarily inconsistent with the restoration of the damaged part of the hereditament. I am, therefore, on the whole not prepared to say that the cost of the works here in question falls within the ambit of s. 6 (2) on the ground that they were works reasonably done to parts of the premises other than those parts damaged (or, at least, unrelated to any damage in fact done to them) in order to make the premises as a whole temporarily (i.e., for the time being and not by way of permanent substitution) usable in the way in which they were being used before the damage occurred.

I only add that I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that the durability of any works done is not, or, at any rate, is not necessarily, the test of their temporary character. Baulks to shore up a dangerous wall must obviously be capable of lasting a very long time, and a temporary staircase must be substantial enough to bear safely any traffic to which it may be subjected. In the circumstances, I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : This appeal involves the construction of the phrase in s. 6 (2) of the War Damage Act, 1943 :

" . . . the proper cost of any works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage . . . "

The facts on which the appeal arises are set out in the Case Stated as amplified by the correspondence, which by agreement between the parties was read in the court below in amplification of the Case, and those facts have also been referred to by SOMERVELL, L.J., in his judgment. I need not, therefore, refer to them further.

Two possible constructions have been put forward. That put forward by counsel for the county council has been described by counsel for the commission as unreasonably wide, while that put forward by counsel for the commission has been described by counsel for the county council as unreasonably narrow. I have been unable to discover any half-way house, and I think one must choose between those two constructions. It is plain from the language of the words under consideration that the "damage" referred to is the cause and "the circumstances" referred to are the effect. The damage is the physical damage sustained by the hereditament in question while the circumstances to be met mean the position resulting from that damage. It is clear that some limit must be placed on the right of a claimant to claim for a payment as a temporary works payment in respect of the cost to him of dealing with the position created by physical damage to the hereditament. This was realised by counsel for the county council in his attractive argument, and he submitted that the limitation, but the only limitation, must be that the work should be done to or on the hereditament. Such a formula would clearly allow the cost of providing substituted accommodation, and must involve the proposition that the section intends that regard should be had to the particular user of the premises or the user for which the premises were designed or adapted at the time of or immediately preceding the damage. This proposition does not find any place in s. 6 (2) by way of express provision, and it can, therefore, be sound only if it follows by necessary implication from the language under consideration. It can, if at all, be extracted only from the words "for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage." I think that, if those words were to be construed in vacuo, they could be said to be wide enough to warrant the proposition. But clearly those words cannot be construed in vacuo. They must be considered in the light of the other relevant sections of the Act and in the light of the scheme of the Act to be deduced therefrom.

It is clear from a study of such sections as ss. 2 and 5 that the damage which is contemplated by the Act is limited to damage to land and buildings, and from a study of the scheme of the Act that damage consisting of loss or profit or the cost of providing alternative accommodation is not damage in respect of which the War Damage Commission is to be liable to make payment. From this it appears to me that what is contemplated by s. 6 (2) in providing for temporary works payments is essentially something limited in conception. A
It is the cost of dealing in an essentially temporary manner with the direct result of the damage. That does not mean that the work concerned is limited to repair. The example of railing off the crater, which was put in argument and in the judgment of the learned judge, is sufficient to demonstrate that. B
For my own part I am content to adopt the contention put forward by counsel for the War Damage Commission in his forceful argument that the phrase, "the circumstances created by the damage," was inserted in the Act because until the end of the war, during which new engines of destruction were continually being evolved, it could not be known with certainty what would be the circumstances or position resulting from particular damage. To take the simplest case, a high explosive bomb might blow a hole in a wall, but if there were gas in the bomb or if the high explosive bomb were followed by a gas bomb, or a bomb which created a high degree of radio-activity, different or additional considerations might obtain. The draftsman of the Act, therefore, may well have said deliberately to have phrased the sub-section to meet the possible, but not accurately foreseeable, results of such occurrence. So read, full effect is given to the phrase, "to meet the circumstances created by the damage," D on the basis that it imports, as it must import, a wider meaning than mere repair of the damage, while at the same time not involving such a wide meaning as to allow of payments in respect of the provision of substituted accommodation, even within the curtilage of the hereditament.

This result avoids the illogicality which must result from the argument of counsel for the county council if one takes two possible cases which seem to me permissible to test the argument. Suppose a hereditament of considerable acreage area, on part only of which a factory is erected. Suppose the building incurs serious damage. The damage is such that it will ultimately rank for a cost of works payment, but no temporary repairs possible in war time will enable it, or, anyhow, the major part of it, to be used as a factory. There is room on the unbuilt-on part of the hereditament to construct buildings in which the apparatus and activities of the factory, or that part of it put out of action by the bomb, can be carried on as before. On the argument of counsel for the county council, if this work was done, any necessary licences being obtained, the cost would be the subject of a temporary works payment, though the result in reality is a new works arising and subsisting by the side of the ruins of the old. I cannot bring myself to believe that this is the necessary consequence of the words of s. 6 (2) of the Act, the policy of which Act is, as I have already remarked, not to provide compensation for loss of profit or the cost of the provision of alternative accommodation elsewhere. E

Contrast with this case a hereditament, consisting of a building covering the whole area of the land in question. The building receives a direct hit and is so damaged that, while it will form the subject of a cost of works payment, no work of temporary repair will enable the building to be used for its previous purpose until the permanent work of repair and reinstatement is undertaken. F
Suppose the building to have housed a factory or commercial undertaking : suppose it to have been a private dwelling-house : it matters not which. G
One thing is clear : the Act does not cover the cost of obtaining alternative accommodation. The only difference, however, between this and the previous example is that in the first there was the accident that the building did not H cover the whole of the hereditament, while in the second case it did. If the argument of the county council is right, then in the first case the owner can claim the cost of providing substituted accommodation, while in the second case he cannot. For my part, I feel driven to the narrower construction, which, after all, is not so narrow, for it includes not merely works of repair, but works of precaution and any other work directly related to the damage as the nature of the damage requires by way of temporary work. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

VICTORIA LAUNDRY (WINDSOR), LTD. v. NEWMAN INDUSTRIES, LTD. (COULSON & CO., LTD. (Third Party)).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), March 18, 21, 22, 23, April 12, 1949.]

Damages—Remoteness of damage—Loss of profit—No notice to defendant of special circumstances—Purchase of boiler for use in business—Need to extend business—Seller ignorant of need—Delay in delivery.

The defendants, an engineering company, agreed to sell a boiler to the plaintiffs, a company of launderers and dyers. The defendants knew at the time of the contract of the type of business carried on by the plaintiffs, that the boiler was required for that business, and that the plaintiffs wanted the boiler for immediate use. They did not know that it was required to extend the business. The boiler was damaged while being dismantled by the third party, sub-contractors employed by the defendants to load it on the plaintiffs' transport vehicle, and delay in delivery resulted :

HELD : (i) damages for loss of profit were recoverable if it was apparent to the defendants as reasonable persons that the delay in delivery was liable to lead to such loss by the plaintiffs, and it was not necessary for the defendants to be specifically informed of the particular purpose for which the boiler was required ; on the facts, the defendants had means of knowledge that some loss was likely to result ; and they were, therefore, liable to the plaintiffs.

HELD, further : the fact that the boiler only constituted a part of a profit-making machine was only significant in so far as it bore on the capacity of the defendants to foresee the consequences of non-delivery.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs against a decision of STREATFEILD, J., dated Oct. 15, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 806, limiting damages to £110 in respect of a breach of contract by the defendants.

The plaintiffs were a company of launderers and dyers who required a boiler for use in an extension of their business. They contracted to purchase a boiler from the defendants who employed the third party to dismantle and load the boiler on the plaintiffs' transport vehicle sent to collect it. In the course of dismantling the boiler was damaged, and delay resulted in delivery. STREATFEILD, J., held that the defendants were liable for damages for breach of contract notwithstanding that the delay arose from the fault of the third party, but that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover as part of the damages any loss of profits resulting from the enforced delay in extending their business, such damages in his opinion being too remote. Against the second part of this judgment the plaintiffs now appealed, and the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. D

Cur. adv. vult. F

Apr. 12. ASQUITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs against a judgment of STREATFEILD, J., in so far as that judgment limited the damages to £110 in respect of an alleged breach of contract by the defendants which is now uncontested. The breach of contract consisted in the delivery of a boiler sold by the defendants to the plaintiffs some twenty odd weeks after the time fixed by the contract for delivery. The short point is whether, in addition to the £110 awarded, the plaintiffs were entitled to claim in respect of loss of profits which they say they would have made if the boiler had been delivered punctually. G

The defendants are and were at all material times a limited company which described itself on its invoices as "Electrical and Mechanical Engineers and Manufacturers." They did not manufacture the boiler in question. They just happened to own it. The plaintiffs were at all materials times a limited company carrying on the business of laundrymen and dyers in the neighbourhood of Windsor. In January, 1946, the plaintiffs were minded to expand their H business, and to that end required a boiler of much greater capacity than the boiler they then possessed, which was of a capacity of 1500-1600 lbs. evaporation per hour. Seeing an advertisement by the defendants on Jan. 17, 1946, of two boilers which appeared suitable (they were "vertical Cochran boilers of 8000 lbs. per hour capacity heavy steaming"), they negotiated for the purchase of one of them, and by Apr. 26, 1946, had concluded a contract for its purchase at a price of £2,150, loaded free on transport at Harpenden.

A Seeing that the issue is as to the measure of recoverable damages and the application of the rules in Hadley v. Baxendale (1), it is important to inquire what information the defendants possessed at the time when the contract was made as to such matters as the time at which, and the purpose for which, the plaintiffs required the boiler. The defendants knew before and at the time of the contract that the plaintiffs were laundrymen and dyers and required the boiler for purposes of their business as such. They also knew that the plaintiffs wanted the boiler for immediate use. On the latter point the correspondence is important. The contract was concluded by, and is contained in, a series of letters. In the earliest phases of the correspondence—that is, in letters of Jan. 31 and Feb. 1, 1946—which letters, as appears from their terms, followed a telephone call on the earlier date) the defendants undertook to make the earliest possible arrangements for the dismantling and removal of the boiler. The natural inference from this is that in the telephone conversation referred to the plaintiffs had conveyed to the defendants that they required the boiler urgently. Again, on Feb. 7 the plaintiffs write to the defendants: "We should appreciate your letting us know how quickly your people can dismantle it," and finally, on Apr. 26, in the concluding letter of the series by which the contract was made: "We are most anxious that this" (that is, the boiler) "should be put into use"—we call attention to this expression—"in the shortest possible space of time." Hence, up to and at the very moment when a concluded contract emerged, the plaintiffs were pressing on the defendants the need for expedition, and the last letter was a plain intimation that the boiler was wanted for immediate use. This is none the less so because when, later, the plaintiffs encountered delays in getting the necessary permits and licences, the exhortations to speed come from the other side, who wanted their money, which, in fact, they were paid in advance of delivery. The defendants knew the plaintiffs needed the boiler as soon as the delays should be overcome, and they knew by the beginning of June that such delays had by then, in fact, been overcome. The defendants did not know at the material time the precise role for which the boiler was cast in the plaintiffs' economy, e.g., whether (as the fact was) it was to function in substitution for an existing boiler of inferior capacity, or in replacement of an existing boiler of equal capacity, or as an extra unit to be operated side by side with and in addition to any existing boiler. It has, indeed, been argued strenuously that, for all they knew, it might have been wanted as a "spare" or "stand-by," provided in advance to replace an existing boiler, when, perhaps some time hence, the latter should wear out, but such an intention to reserve it for future use seems quite inconsistent with the intention expressed in the letter of Apr. 26 to "put it into use in the shortest possible space of time." In this connection, certain admissions made in the course of the hearing are of vital importance. The defendants formally admitted what in their defence they had originally traversed, namely, the facts alleged in para. 2 of the statement of claim. That paragraph reads as follows:

"At the date of the contract hereinafter mentioned the defendants well knew as the fact was that the plaintiffs were launderers and dyers carrying on business at Windsor and required the said boiler for use in their said business and the said contract was made upon the basis that the said boiler was required for the said purpose."

On June 5, the plaintiffs, having heard that the boiler was ready, sent a lorry to Harpenden to take delivery. Mr. Lennard, a director of the plaintiff company, preceded the lorry in a car. He discovered on arrival that four days earlier the contractors employed by the defendants to dismantle the boiler had allowed it to fall on its side, receiving damage. Mr. Lennard declined to take delivery of the damaged boiler in its existing condition and insisted that the damage must be made good. He was, we think, justified in this attitude, since no similar article could be bought in the market. After a long wrangle, the defendants agreed to perform the necessary repairs, and, after further delay through the difficulty of finding a contractor who was free and able to perform them, completed the repairs by Oct. 28. Delivery was taken by the plaintiffs on Nov. 8 and the boiler was erected and working by early December. The plaintiffs claim, as part—the disputed part—of the damages, loss of the profits they would have earned if the machine had been delivered in early June instead of November. Evidence was led for the plaintiffs with the object of establishing that, if the boiler had been punctually delivered, then, during the twenty odd weeks between then and the time of actual delivery (1) they could have taken on a very large number of new customers in the course of their laundry business, the demand for laundry services at that time being insatiable—they did, in fact, take on extra staff in the expectation of its delivery—and (2) that they could and would have accepted a number of highly lucrative dyeing contracts for the Ministry of Supply. In the statement of claim, para. 10, the loss of profits under the first of these heads was quantified at £16 a week and under the second at £262 a week. The evidence, however, which promised to be voluminous, had not gone very far when counsel for the defendants submitted that in law no loss of profits was recoverable at all, and that to continue to hear evidence as to its quantum was mere waste of time. He suggested that the question of remoteness of damage under this head should be decided on the existing materials, including the admissions to which we have referred. The learned judge accepted counsel's submission, and on that basis awarded £110 damages under certain minor heads, but nothing in respect of loss of profits, which he held to be too remote. It is from that decision that the plaintiffs now appeal. It was a necessary consequence of the course which the case took that no evidence was given on behalf of the defendants, and only part of the evidence available to the plaintiffs. It should be observed parenthetically that the defendants had added as third party the contractors who, by dropping the boiler, so causing the injuries to it, prevented its delivery in early June and caused the defendants to break their contract. Those third party proceedings have been adjourned pending the hearing of the present appeal as between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The third party, nevertheless, was served with notice of appeal by the defendants and argument was heard for him at the hearing of the appeal.

The ground of the learned judge's decision, which we consider more fully later, may be summarised as follows. He took the view that the loss of profit claimed was due to special circumstances, and, therefore, recoverable, if at all, only under the second rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (1), and not recoverable in the present case because such special circumstances were not at the time of the contract communicated to the defendants. He also attached much significance to the fact that the object supplied was not a self-sufficient profit-making article, but part of a larger profit-making whole, and cited in this connection Portman v. Middleton (2) and British Columbia, etc., Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship (3). Before commenting on the learned judge's reasoning, we must refer to some of the authorities. The authorities on recovery of loss of profits as a head of damage are not easy to reconcile. At one end of the scale stand cases where there has been non-delivery or delayed delivery of what is on the face of it obviously a profit-earning chattel, for instance, a merchant or passenger ship: see Fletcher v. Tayleur (4); Re Trent and Humber Co., Ex

p. Cambrian Steam Packet Co. (5); or some essential part of such a ship, for instance, a propeller, in Wilson v. General Iron Screw Colliery Co. (6), or engines, Saint Line, Ltd. v. Richardsons, Westgarth & Co., Ltd. (7). In such cases loss of profit has rarely been refused. A second and intermediate class of case in which loss of profit has often been awarded is where ordinary mercantile goods have been sold to a merchant with knowledge by the vendor that the purchaser wanted them for re-sale, at all events, where there was no market in which the purchaser could buy similar goods against the contract on the seller's default: see, for instance, Borries v. Hutchinson (8). At the other end of the scale are cases where the defendant is not a vendor of the goods, but a carrier: see, for instance, Hadley v. Baxendale (1) and Gee v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry. Co. (9). In such cases the courts have been slow to allow loss of profit as an item of damage. This was not, it would seem, because a different principle applies in such cases, but because the application of the same principle leads to different results. A carrier commonly knows less than a seller about the purposes for which the buyer or consignee needs the goods or about other "special circumstances" which may cause exceptional loss if due delivery is withheld.

Three of the authorities call for more detailed examination. First comes Hadley v. Baxendale (1) itself. Familiar though it is, we should first recall the memorable sentence of ALDERSON, B. (9 Exch. 354) in which the main principles laid down in this case are enshrined:

"Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it."

The limb of this sentence prefaced by "either" embodies the so-called "first" rule; that prefaced by "or" the "second." In considering the meaning and application of these rules it is essential to bear clearly in mind the facts on which Hadley v. Baxendale (1) proceeded. The headnote is definitely misleading in so far as it says that the defendants' clerk, who attended at the office, was told that the mill was stopped and that the shaft must be delivered immediately. The same allegation figures in the statement of facts which are said (ibid., 344) to have "appeared" at the trial before CROMPTON, J. If the Court of Exchequer had accepted these facts as established, the court must, one would suppose, have decided the case the other way round—must, that is, have held the damage claimed was recoverable under the second rule, but it is reasonably plain from the judgment of ALDERSON, B., that the court rejected this evidence, for he says (ibid., 355):

"... we find that the only circumstances here communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants at the time the contract was made, were, that the article to be carried was the broken shaft of a mill, and that the plaintiffs were the millers of that mill."

It is on this basis of fact that he proceeds to ask:

"... how do these circumstances show reasonably that the profits of the mill must be stopped by an unreasonable delay in the delivery of the broken shaft by the carrier to the third person?"

British Columbia, etc., Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship (3) annexes to the principle laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1) a rider to the effect that, where knowledge of special circumstances is relied on as enhancing the damages recoverable, that knowledge must have been brought home to the defendant at the time of the contract and in such circumstances that the defendant impliedly undertook to bear any special loss referable to a breach in those special circumstances. The knowledge which was lacking in that case on the part of the defendant was knowledge that the particular box of machinery negligently lost by the defendant was one without which the rest of the machinery could not be put together and would, therefore, be useless. Cory v. Thames Ironworks Co. (10) —a case strongly relied on by the plaintiffs—presented the peculiarity that the parties contemplated respectively different profit-making uses of the chattel sold by the defendants to the plaintiff. It was the hull of a boom derrick and was delivered late. The plaintiffs were coal merchants, and the obvious use, and that to which the defendants believed it was to be put, was that of a coal store. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, the buyers, in fact intended to use it for transshipping coals from colliers to barges, a quite unprecedented use for a chattel of this kind, one quite unsuspected by the sellers, and one calculated to yield much higher profits. The case, accordingly, decides, inter alia, what is the measure of damages recoverable when the parties are not ad idem in their contemplation of the use for which the article is needed. It was decided that in such a case no loss was recoverable beyond what would have resulted if the intended use had been that reasonably within the contemplation of the defendants, which in that case was the "obvious" use. This special complicating factor, the divergence between the knowledge and contemplation of the parties respectively, has somewhat obscured the general importance of the decision, which is in effect that the facts of the case brought it within the first rule of Hadley v. Baxendale (1) and enabled the plaintiff to recover loss of such profits as would have arisen from the normal and obvious use of the article. The "natural consequence," said BLACKBURN, J. (L.R. 3 Q.B. 191), of not delivering the derrick was that £420 representing those normal profits was lost. COCKBURN, C.J., interposing during the argument (ibid., 187), made the significant observation :

"No doubt, in order to recover damage arising from a special purpose the buyer must have communicated the special purpose to the seller ; but there is one thing which must always be in the knowledge of both parties, which is, that the thing is bought for the purpose of being in some way or other profitably applied."

This observation is apposite to the present case. These three cases have on many occasions been approved by the House of Lords without any material qualification.

What propositions applicable to the present case emerge from the authorities as a whole, including those analysed above ? We think they include the following : (1) It is well settled that the governing purpose of damages is to put the party whose rights have been violated in the same position, so far as money can do so, as if his rights had been observed : Wertheim v. Chicoutimi Pulp Co. (11). This purpose, if relentlessly pursued, would provide him with a complete indemnity for all loss de facto resulting from a particular breach, however improbable, however unpredictable. This, in contract at least, is recognised as too harsh a rule. Hence, (2) : In cases of breach of contract the aggrieved party is only entitled to recover such part of the loss actually resulting as was at the time of the contract reasonably foreseeable as liable to result from the breach. (3) What was at that time reasonably foreseeable depends on the knowledge then possessed by the parties, or, at all events, by the party who later commits the breach. (4) For this purpose, knowledge "possessed" is of two kinds—one imputed, the other actual. Everyone, as a reasonable person, is taken to know the "ordinary course of things" and consequently what loss is liable to result from a breach of that ordinary course. This is the subject-matter of the "first rule" in Hadley v. Baxendale (1), but to this knowledge, which a contract-breaker is assumed to possess whether he actually possesses it or not, there may have to be added in a particular case knowledge which he actually possesses of special circumstances outside the "ordinary course of things" of such a kind that a breach in those special circumstances would be liable to cause more loss. Such a case attracts the operation of the "second rule" so as to make additional loss also recoverable. (5) In order to make the contract-breaker liable under either rule it is not necessary that he should actually have asked himself what loss is liable to result from a breach. As has often been pointed out, parties at the time of contracting contemplate, not the breach of the contract, but its performance. It suffices that, if he had considered the question, he would as a reasonable man have concluded that the loss in question was liable to result: see certain observations of LORD DU PARCQ in Monarch Steamship Co., Ltd. v. A/B Karlshamns Oljefrabriker ([1949] 1 All E.R. 19). (6) Nor, finally, to make a particular loss recoverable, need it be proved that on a given state of knowledge the defendant could, as a reasonable man, foresee that a breach must necessarily result in that loss. It is enough if he could foresee it was likely so to result. It is enough, to borrow from the language of LORD DU PARCQ in the same case, if the loss (or some factor without which it would not have occurred) is a "serious possibility" or a "real danger." For short, we have used the word "liable" to result. Possibly the colloquialism "on the cards" indicates the shade of meaning with some approach to accuracy.

If these, indeed, are the principles applicable, what is the effect of their application to the facts of the present case? We have, at the beginning of this judgment, summarised the main relevant facts. The defendants were an engineering company supplying a boiler to a laundry. We reject the submission for the defendants that an engineering company knows no more than the plain man about boilers or the purposes to which they are commonly put by different classes of purchasers, including laundries. The defendant company were not, it is true, manufacturers of this boiler or dealers in boilers, but they gave a highly technical and comprehensive description of this boiler to the plaintiffs by letter of Jan. 19, 1946, and offered both to dismantle the boiler at Harpenden and to re-erect it on the plaintiffs' premises. Of the uses or purposes to which boilers are put, they would clearly know more than the uninstructed layman. Again, they knew they were supplying the boiler to a company carrying on the business of laundrymen and dyers, for use in that business. The obvious use of a boiler, in such a business, is surely to boil water for the purpose of washing or dyeing. A laundry might conceivably buy a boiler for some other purpose, for instance, to work radiators or warm bath water for the comfort of its employees or directors, or to use for research, or to exhibit in a museum. All these purposes are possible, but the first is the obvious purpose which, in the case of a laundry, leaps to the average eye. If the purpose then be to wash or dye, why does the company want to wash or dye, unless for purposes of business advantage, in which term we, for the purposes of the rest of this judgment, include maintenance or increase of profit or reduction of loss? We shall speak henceforward not of loss of profit, but of "loss of business." No commercial concern commonly purchases for the purposes of its business a very large and expensive structure like this—a boiler nineteen feet high and costing over £2,000—with any other motive, and no supplier, let alone an engineering company, which has promised delivery of such an article by a particular date with knowledge that it was to be put into use immediately on delivery, can reasonably contend that it could not foresee that loss of business (in the sense indicated above) would be liable to result to the purchaser from a long delay in the delivery thereof. The suggestion that, for all the supplier knew, the boiler might have been needed simply as a "stand-by," to be used in a possibly distant future, is gratuitous and was plainly negated by the terms of the letter of Apr. 26, 1946.

Since we are differing from a carefully reasoned judgment, we think it due to the learned judge to indicate the grounds of our dissent. In that judgment, after stressing the fact that the defendants were not manufacturers of this boiler or of any boilers (a fact which is indisputable), nor (what is disputable) people possessing any special knowledge not common to the general public of boilers or laundries as possible users thereof, he goes on to say ([1948] 2 All E.R. 809) :

"That is the general principle and I think that the principle running through the cases is that, if there is nothing unusual, if it is a normal user of the plant in question, it may well be that the parties must be taken to contemplate that a loss of profits may result from the non-delivery, or the delay in delivery, of the particular article. On the other hand, if there are—as I think there are here—special circumstances, I do not think that the defendants are liable for loss of profits unless the special circumstances were brought to their notice. In looking at the cases, I think there is a distinction between the supply of a part of the profit-making machine, as against the profit-making machine itself . . ."

Then, after referring to Portman v. Middleton (2) he continues (ibid.) :

"It is to be observed that, not only must the circumstances be known to the supplier or the carrier, but they must be such that the object must be taken to have been within the contemplation of both parties. I do not think that on the facts it can be said that it was within the contemplation of the suppliers that any delay in the delivery of this boiler was going to lead necessarily to loss of profits. There was nothing that I know of in the evidence to indicate how the boiler was to be used or whether delivery of it by a particular day would necessarily be vital to the earning of profits. I agree that it was no part of the contract and cannot be taken to have been the basis of the contract that the laundry would be unable to work if there was a delay in the delivery of the boiler, or that the laundry was extending its business or had any special contracts which could be fulfilled only by getting delivery of this boiler. In my view, therefore, this case falls within the second rule of Hadley v. Baxendale (1) under which the defendants would not be liable for the payment of damages for loss of profits unless there were evidence before the court—which there is not—that the special purpose of this boiler was drawn to their attention and that they contracted on the basis that delay in the delivery would make them liable to payment of loss of profits."

The answer to this reasoning has largely been anticipated in what has been said above, but we would wish to add, first, that the learned judge appears to infer that because certain "special circumstances" were, in his view, not "drawn to the notice of" the defendants, and, therefore, in his view, the operation of the "second rule" was excluded, ergo, nothing in respect of loss of business can be recovered under the "first rule." This inference is, in our view, no more justified in the present case than it was in Cory v. Thames Ironworks Co. (10). Secondly, while it is not wholly clear what were the "special circumstances" on the non-communication of which the learned judge relied, it would seem that they were or included the following :—(a) the "circumstance" that delay in delivering the boiler was going to lead "necessarily" to loss of profits, but the true criterion is surely not what was bound "necessarily" to result, but what was likely or liable to do so, and we think that it was amply conveyed to the defendants by what was communicated to them (plus what was patent without express communication) that delay in delivery was likely to lead to "loss of business"; (b) the "circumstance" that the plaintiffs needed the boiler "to extend their business." It was surely not necessary for the defendants to be specifically informed of this as a precondition of being liable for loss of business. Reasonable persons in the shoes of the defendants must be taken to foresee, without any express intimation, that a laundry which, at a time when there was a famine of laundry facilities, was paying £2,000 odd for plant and intended at such a time to put such plant "into use" immediately, would be likely to suffer in pocket from five months' delay in delivery of the plant in question, whether they intended by means of it to extend their business, or merely to maintain it, or to reduce a loss ; (c) the "circumstance" that the plaintiffs had the assured expectation of special contracts, which they could only fulfil by securing punctual delivery of the boiler. Here, no doubt, the learned judge had in mind the particularly lucrative dyeing contracts to which the plaintiffs looked forward and which they mention in para. 10 of the statement of claim. We agree that in order that the plaintiffs should recover specifically and as such the profits expected on these contracts, the defendants would have had to know, at the time of their agreement with the plaintiffs, of the prospect and terms of such contracts. We also agree that they did not, in fact, know these things. It does not, however, follow that the plaintiffs are precluded from recovering some general (and perhaps conjectural) sum for loss of business in respect of dyeing contracts to be reasonably expected any more than in respect of laundering contracts to be reasonably expected. Thirdly, the other point on which STREATFEILD, J., largely based his judgment was that there is a critical difference between the measure of damages applicable when the defendant defaults in supplying a self-contained profit-earning whole and when he defaults in supplying a part of that whole. In our view, there is no intrinsic magic, in this connection, in the whole as against a part. The fact that a part only is involved is only significant in so far as it bears on the capacity of the supplier to foresee the consequences of non-delivery. If it is clear from the nature of the part (or the supplier of it is informed) that its non-delivery will have the same effect as non-delivery of the whole, his liability will be the same as if he had defaulted in delivering the whole. The cases of Hadley v. Baxendale (1), British Columbia, etc. Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship (3) and Portman v. Middleton (2) which were so strongly relied on for the defence and by the learned judge, were all cases in which, through want of a part, catastrophic results ensued, in that a whole concern was paralysed or sterilised—a mill stopped, a complex of machinery unable to be assembled, a threshing machine unable to be delivered in time for the harvest, and, therefore, useless. In all three cases the defendants were absolved from liability to compensate the plaintiffs for the resulting loss of business, not because what they had failed to deliver was a part, but because there had been nothing to convey to them that want of that part would stultify the whole business of the person for whose benefit the part was contracted for. There is no resemblance between these cases and the present, in which, while there was no question of a total stoppage resulting from non-delivery, yet there were ample means of knowledge on the part of the defendants that business loss of some sort would be likely to result to the plaintiffs from the defendants' default in performing their contract.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the issue referred to an official referee as to what damage, if any, is recoverable in addition to the £110 awarded by the learned trial judge. The official referee would assess those damages in consonance with the findings in this judgment as to what the defendants knew or must be taken to have known at the material time, either party to be at liberty to call evidence as to the quantum of the damage in dispute.

Appeal allowed with costs. Costs on the issue of profit damages to be reserved to the official referee. No order as to third party costs of appeal.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HUNTER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Morris, J.), March 22, 23, 24, 1949.]

Customs—Smuggling—Forfeiture of vessel—Vessel owned by foreign citizen—Vessel proceeding outside permitted limit of navigation—Vessel “having had on board prohibited spirits”—“Use in importation of prohibited goods”—Transshipment of prohibited goods outside territorial waters—Vessel found in British port—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (c. 36), ss. 169, 170, 179, 202—General Regulations of Board of Customs, dated Aug. 31, 1895, reg. 3.

The defendant, who claimed to be a naturalised American citizen, was the owner of a motor vessel, the Taku, of registered tonnage 17.81 gross, a decked boat. In conjunction with others he prepared a scheme for smuggling wines and spirits from the Continent to England without payment of customs duties. In pursuance of this scheme, the Taku, on the occasion in question, went from Portsmouth to Cherbourg, took on board a quantity of spirits, liqueurs and wines there, and returned from Cherbourg to a rendezvous at sea outside territorial waters where the cargo was transferred to a landing craft which went to a point on the English coast where her cargo was landed and transferred to a lorry. Meanwhile, the Taku had set off to return to the French coast, but, owing to engine trouble, she altered course and put in at Portsmouth where she was seized by Customs officers. The Attorney-General claimed forfeiture of the vessel under ss. 169, 170, 172, 179 and 202 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876.

By s. 169 of the Act of 1876, the Commissioners of Customs are empowered to make such regulations as they deem expedient in respect of vessels and boats of a certain size and reg. 3 of the General Regulations of the Board of Customs, dated Aug. 31, 1895, provides that decked boats and vessels not exceeding forty tons burden are limited to employment within a distance of twelve leagues seaward of the part of the English coast in question save under special licence of the commissioners under reg. 7. Note 1 to the regulations provides that they are not to be applicable to boats and vessels exclusively used as private yachts and not for hire. Section 170 of the Act provides: “Every ship or boat which shall be used or employed in any manner contrary to the regulations prescribed by the Commissioners of Customs shall be liable to forfeiture . . .” If reg. 3 applied to the Taku, she had been used contrary to reg. 3, because she had proceeded to Cherbourg, more than twelve leagues from the English coast, without special licence of the commissioners, but the defendant contended that his vessel was not liable to forfeiture under s. 170 as having infringed reg. 3, because the words “every ship or boat” must be construed as applying only to British vessels and not to vessels owned by foreigners. He further submitted that his vessel was used exclusively as a private yacht.

Section 179 of the Act provides: “If any ship or boat shall be found or discovered to have been within any port, bay, harbour, river, or creek of the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, or within three leagues of the coast thereof if belonging wholly or in part to British subjects, or having half the persons on board subjects of Her Majesty, or within one league if not British, having . . . or having had on board . . . or conveying or having conveyed in any manner any spirits . . . which . . . are prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom . . . every such ship or boat . . . shall be forfeited . . .” By s. 202: “All ships, boats . . . made use of in the importation, landing, removal, or conveyance of any uncustomed, prohibited, restricted, or other goods liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts shall be forfeited . . .” The defendant contended that since the motor vessel transhipped the cargo outside territorial waters, these sections had no application.

HELD : (i) the words "every ship or boat" in s. 170 included vessels owned by a person who was not a British subject, and, therefore, the Taku was liable to forfeiture, she having been used in a manner contrary to regulations made under the section.

(ii) the note to the regulations made under s. 169 was not to be regarded as a part of the regulations, but only as an explanatory memorandum, but, in any event, at the material time the vessel was being used for smuggling and not exclusively as a private yacht.

(iii) the words "having had on board" in s. 179 meant "having had on board whether within or without territorial waters," and the Taku was shown to have had on board prohibited spirits and so was liable to forfeiture under the section.

A.-G. v. Schiers (1835) (2 Cr. M. & R. 286), applied.

(iv) the vessel had been made use of in the importation and landing of uncustomed, prohibited or restricted goods, within the meaning of s. 202, and was liable to forfeiture under that section also.

[FOR THE CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION ACT, 1876, ss. 169, 170, 172, 179 and 202, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 16, pp. 334, 335, 336 and 343.]

Case referred to :

(1) A.-G. v. Schiers, (1835), 2 Cr. M. & R. 286 ; 1 Gale 223.

INFORMATION filed by the Attorney-General claiming forfeiture of a motor vessel, the Taku, and of a binnacle and compass used in the carrying of prohibited goods and seized by the Commissioners of Customs on Apr. 14, 1947.

A writ of appraisalment had been issued on Dec. 11, 1947, on the information of a Customs officer, and pursuant to that writ an indenture was made on Dec. 20, 1947, valuing and appraising the ship and goods as set out in the indenture. The court held that the ship, binnacle and compass were forfeited to His Majesty. The facts appear in the headnote.

H. L. Parker and J. G. Foster for the Attorney-General.

Thorp, K.C., and Eric Myers for the defendant.

MORRIS, J., stated the facts and continued : It is said on behalf of the Attorney-General that forfeiture of the Taku and of the binnacle and compass should take place under ss. 172, 179 and 202, and under ss. 169 and 170 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, for the reason that the Taku is shown to have proceeded beyond the limits permitted to a vessel of her size, having regard to the regulations issued pursuant to s. 169. On behalf of the defendant it is said that he is an American citizen. A passport issued by the United States consulate in Southampton to him is produced and is relied on in support of that contention. It is said that, if he is, the Taku is not a British ship, and the regulations issued under s. 169 do not apply, and that, therefore, forfeiture under ss. 169 and 170 cannot be ordered. As regards ss. 172, 179 and 202, it is said that the evidence shows that the transfer of the liquor from the Taku to the landing craft took place more than one league from the British coast and that, therefore, nothing was done by the Taku within territorial waters which renders her liable to seizure. I think the evidence does support the view that the trans-shipment did take place more than a league from the coast.

The provisions of s. 169 of the Act give power to the commissioners to make such regulations as they deem expedient in respect of certain vessels, and the General Regulations of the Board of Customs, which were issued on Aug. 31, 1895, provide :

"3. Decked boats and vessels not exceeding forty tons burden shall be limited to a distance of four leagues seaward from that part of the coast of England which is between the North Foreland and Beachy Head, and to a distance of twelve leagues seaward from any other part of the coast of the United Kingdom, except those part of the coasts of England and Ireland which lie opposite to each other . . . 5. Boats and vessels not exceeding forty tons burden belonging to the Channel Islands, shall be limited only northward of the said islands, but in that direction they shall not exceed a distance of four leagues from the Casquets . . . 7. No extension of the limits . . . assigned will be allowed in respect of any boats or vessels unless on special application from the owner or the owners thereof to the commissioners, setting forth the ground of such application, and the purposes and object thereof; whereupon if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the . . . commissioners, or to the collector, that the grounds of such application are reasonable, and that (having regard to the general character of the master and owners of such boats or vessels, and other special circumstances) any extension of the prescribed limits may properly be conceded, the said commissioners, or the collector, will exercise the power vested in them of granting special licences . . .”

No special licence was granted in respect of the Taku. At the end of the regulations are two notes. Note 1 provides :

“The foregoing regulations are not to be applicable to boats and vessels exclusively used as private yachts and not for hire, nor to boats or vessels bona fide employed in fishing and for no other purpose, nor to boats or vessels assisting ships in distress beyond the prescribed limits, provided it shall appear to the satisfaction of the commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, or to the collector, that the said boats or vessels were so employed, and that the masters and owners are men of good character.”

It is submitted by counsel for the defendant that that note forms a part of the regulations. Counsel for the Attorney-General submits that it is not a part of the regulations, but is to be regarded as being by way of an explanatory memorandum showing the circumstances in which the commissioners would act, given certain conditions. Counsel for the defendant submits that, if the note applies as being a part of the regulations, the Taku comes within the words “vessels exclusively used as private yachts and not for hire.” He points to certain documents which have been produced on which the word “yacht” appears, and he submits that the Taku was a private yacht and that it was not for hire, and that, therefore, the regulations do not apply. That is a submission which he makes as a subsidiary one to his main submission that neither these regulations nor s. 169 applies save in the case of a British ship. My attention was also directed to a General Order of the Board of Customs, dated Oct. 21, 1901 (S.R. & O., 1901, No. 757), which cancelled reg. 6 of the regulations of Aug. 31, 1895, and provided that :

“ . . . for the future all vessels and boats not exceeding 100 tons burden, belonging to the Isle of Man, be governed generally by the regulations mentioned in so far as they relate to craft belonging to the mainland of Great Britain and Ireland.”

By s. 169 of the Act of 1876 : “The commissioners of Customs may from time to time . . . make such general regulations as they shall deem expedient in respect of vessels and boats” of a certain size. Counsel for the Attorney-General submits that, in the absence of a contrary indication, that section must apply territorially, and that, therefore, it applies to all vessels and boats within the jurisdiction. It is apparent from a consideration of many of the sections of this Act that in places the legislature is dealing with all ships and that in other places it is dealing only with British ships. For example, in s. 140 there is a reference to : “All trade by sea from any one part of the United Kingdom to any other part thereof” being “deemed to be a coasting trade,” and the section provides that “all ships while employed therein shall be deemed to be coasting ships.” Section 141 begins with the words : “Every foreign ship proceeding either with cargo or passengers or in ballast . . .” I have just referred to the opening words of s. 169, and s. 170 begins with the words: “Every ship or boat . . .”, and goes on to enact that every such ship or boat:

“ . . . used or employed in any manner contrary to the regulations prescribed by the Commissioners of Customs shall be liable to forfeiture, unless the same shall have been specially licensed by the Commissioners of Customs to be so used or employed, as next hereinafter provided.”

A Section 175 refers to: “The owner of every ship belonging wholly or in part to any of Her Majesty’s subjects . . .”; and s. 176 speaks of:

B “The owner of every vessel or boat, whether decked, partially decked, or open, not being of the burden of one hundred tons, and not belonging to any ship, shall paint or cause to be painted upon the outside of the stern of such boat in white or yellow Roman letters, of not less than two inches in length, on a black ground, the name of the owner of the boat and the port or place to which she belongs, on pain of the forfeiture of such boat not so marked, wherever the same shall be found.”

C That section, in my judgment, is of interest because the legislature speaks of “every vessel or boat” and refers to a port or place to which a vessel belongs. Those words clearly indicate the port or place where the vessel is based, or where she is normally kept or is ordinarily to be found. They do not have reference to ownership. Then it has been pointed out in the course of the submissions that s. 179 refers both to ships belonging to Her Majesty’s subjects and to foreign ships. Section 180 begins with the words: “If any ship or boat D belonging wholly or in part to Her Majesty’s subjects . . .” Section 183 refers to “any ship or boat,” and s. 202 to: “All ships, boats, carriages, or other conveyances . . .”

A consideration of the various sections in this part of the Act shows that when Parliament is limiting the application of the Act to foreign ships or in any other way, it so provides. In s. 169 it refers to vessels and boats without E a limitation, and, therefore, in my judgment, the regulations made under that section have effect territorially and have such effect even if it is shown that the craft or vessel otherwise covered by the regulations was owned by someone not a British subject.

In regard to the point taken by counsel for the defendant about Note 1, in my judgment Note 1 is to be regarded, not as a part of the regulations, F but as being by way of an explanatory memorandum. If the note did apply, counsel has submitted that the Taku came within the words “exclusively used as private yachts and not for hire.” The Taku does not appear to have been on hire, but on the facts before me it would be quite unjustifiable, in my judgment, to hold that she was used exclusively as a private yacht. The G Taku was used, on the occasion when she went to Cherbourg, as part of a highly organised plan whereby, in order, presumably, that gain should be made, prohibited and uncustomed goods should be brought into this country. In my judgment, it would be a violation of common-sense to say that the Taku on those night adventures was being used exclusively as a private yacht. In reference to this part of the case it is said by counsel for the defendant that the Attorney-General ought not to be allowed to rely on the breach of the H regulations, because documents are in existence which appear to suggest that it was shown on a previous occasion that the Taku was going from Ramsgate to Boulogne. It is said that Boulogne would be at a distance from the British coast beyond that permitted, apart from licence, to the Taku, and my attention was directed to a clearance label issued on Aug. 14, 1946, at Ramsgate and to a document issued on July 25, 1946, also at Ramsgate, which is a document by which an officer of His Majesty’s Customs and Excise gave a bill of health to the Taku. The part of the document relied on is as follows:

"Whereas the vessel called the Yacht 44259 of London, whose master is Lieut. P. Steinmann, is about to sail from the port of Ramsgate on July 25, 1946, and from thence for Boulogne and other places beyond the seas, with five persons on board including the master, Now know ye that I, the said officer, do hereby make it known to all men, and pledge my faith thereunto, that at the time of granting these presents, no plague, epidemic, cholera, nor any dangerous or contagious disorder exists in the above port or neighbourhood."

I think I can take notice of the fact that there must be many departments of His Majesty's Customs and Excise, and it is an unreasonable assumption to say that because somebody, in the performance of his duties in July, 1946, said that there was no plague, epidemic or cholera in Ramsgate, he was recognising that the Taku had authority to go to Boulogne. Whoever gave that certificate was not under a duty to ask the defendant whether he had complied with the law. The defendant could not take that bill of health as being some kind of permission from the Customs and Excise to do that which he was not entitled to do without a licence. There is, in my judgment, no validity in the contention advanced on the basis of those documents. It is said that the Customs authorities knew that the Taku was going to France. When analysed, it appears that somebody, giving a bill of health, did so on a form in which it is said that the Taku is going to Boulogne, but that does not imply that he is saying "and you need not comply with any other regulations imposed by the Customs Act."

In my judgment, whether the defendant is or is not an American citizen, forfeiture is justifiable because of a breach of the regulations made under s. 169.

I pass now to s. 202. That provides, so far as its operative words are concerned :

"All ships, boats, carriages, or other conveyances, together with all horses and other animals and things made use of in the importation landing removal or conveyance of any uncustomed prohibited restricted or other goods liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts shall be forfeited, and all ships, boats, goods, carriages, or other conveyances, together with all horses and other animals and things liable to forfeiture, and all persons liable to be detained for any offence under the Customs Acts, or any other Act whereby officers of Customs are authorised to seize or detain persons, goods, or other things, shall or may be seized or detained in any place either upon land or water by any of the following persons . . . and all ships, boats, goods, carriages, or other conveyances, together with all horses and other animals and things so seized, shall forthwith be delivered into the care of the collector or other proper officer of Customs at the nearest Customs House ; and the forfeiture of any ship, boat, carriage, animal, or other things shall be deemed to include the tackle, apparel and furniture thereof, and the forfeiture of any goods shall be deemed to include the package in which the same are found and all the contents thereof."

The binnacle and compass were clearly used on the landing craft, and were, therefore, used in the importation and landing of goods which have been shown to be prohibited and uncustomed goods. The arguments of counsel for the defendant on this part of the case cover the claims for forfeiture both under s. 179 and under s. 202. The operative words of s. 179 are these :

"If any ship or boat shall be found or discovered to have been within any port, bay, harbour, river, or creek, of the United Kingdom or the Channel Islands, or within three leagues of the coast thereof if belonging wholly or in part to British subjects, or having half the persons on board subjects of Her Majesty, or within one league if not British, having . . . or having had on board . . . or conveying or having conveyed in any manner any spirits . . . which . . . are prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom . . .

every such ship or boat, together with any such spirits . . . shall be forfeited."

A Counsel for the defendant submits that, if the transshipment occurred more than one league from the British coast, s. 179 does not apply, and that on similar reasoning s. 202 also does not apply. It is said by counsel that the Taku transferred her cargo to another vessel outside territorial waters and beyond the one league from the coast mentioned in the section, and that the words in the section "having had on board" are not referable to a case where a ship comes within territorial waters without prohibited goods on board but has had them outside the limit, but only refer to a case where a vessel comes within the one league with the prohibited goods and then is either found with the goods on board or within the distance of one league having had the prohibited goods on board within one league. B Counsel also said that, in any event, when the Taku put into Portsmouth she did not come in as part of the voyage in the course of which the liquor had been transhipped, his ground for that contention being that the defendant said that the Taku had set course for Le Havre and had then changed course. In my judgment, that is not a valid contention. Even assuming that the Taku did start for Le Havre, this was clearly the same C voyage. Then counsel said that when the Taku, outside the limit of the league from the shore, was transshipping the liquor, she was not dealing with prohibited goods. In my judgment, one must look at the whole of the facts and one must have in mind that this was a planned adventure and that it was one part of the plan that at a particular point these goods intended to be landed on the English coast without paying duty should be transhipped. In my judgment, that D contention of counsel is not a valid one.

I now come to the main submission on this part of the case. This point came up for consideration in Attorney-General v. Schiers (1) in the Court of Exchequer. Counsel for the defendant submits that the words of LORD ABINGER, C.B., in giving the decision of the court, should be regarded as being obiter in reference to this matter. The section then in question was not s. 179 E of the Act of 1876, but s. 2 of the statute 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 53. The wording of that section does not seem to me to differ in essentials, for present purposes, from the section that I am now considering, namely, s. 179. Section 2 of the older Act states :

F " . . . any such vessel or boat so found or discovered, having on board or in any manner attached thereto, or having had on board or in any manner attached thereto, or conveying or having conveyed in any manner, any spirits . . . "

In Attorney-General v. Schiers (1), the very point now raised was before the court. On the night of July 6, 1834, between twelve and one o'clock, certain Customs officers went on board a boat called La Marie, which was about G half a mile from the English shore. The officers found on the boat three French and two English sailors, without provisions or compass, and 71 casks of foreign spirits. Before they got to the shore they saw another boat, called the Bien Aimé, lying becalmed at a distance of three quarters of a mile from them and within half a mile of the shore. An officer went to that boat and when he boarded her he found there were marks of casks in the hold and a strong smell of spirits, H while the clothes of the boat's crew and other clear indications left no doubt that the boat first seized had taken contraband spirits from the Bien Aimé. The defendant's counsel contended that to support a condemnation under the statute on which the information was founded it must appear that the vessel had the prohibited goods actually on board within a league of the coast, and of that he contended there was no proof. The Chief Baron told the jury that, in his opinion, the vessel was liable to forfeiture if she unshipped the prohibited goods more than a league off the coast and afterwards came within that distance.

Then the matter was left to the jury who found a verdict for the Crown. The direction of the Chief Baron was of the essence of the case. The jury might have come to the conclusion that there was a transhipment beyond the league and that thereafter the Bien Aimé had come within territorial waters. It was obvious, therefore, that the jury must be told whether, if that was the view they formed on the facts, a forfeiture according to law should take place, and if the Chief Baron had wrongly directed the jury, a rule would have been granted. A
In the reserved judgment LORD ABINGER, C.B., said (2 Cr. M. & R. 288) :

“ In this case we delayed granting a rule until we had looked more fully into the statute. On looking into it we think there is no foundation for the distinction taken by Mr. Jervis. The provision which renders a vessel liable to forfeiture, having had contraband goods on board before entering the prohibited limits, is applicable only to the particular voyage in which she both discharges the goods and enters the prohibited limits. It cannot be supposed that the legislature contemplated anything so absurd as to provide against the case of a vessel having had prohibited goods on board somewhere or other twenty years before, and then coming, twenty years afterwards, within a league of the coast. The statute seems indeed to be directed against the very case of a vessel, having had goods on board in prohibited packages, discharging them before she enters the specified limits, and then following, to assist in the landing or receive back the crew. There will therefore be no rule.” B C

In my judgment, for the reasons I have given, that decision is directly in point in regard to the contention now raised, and, therefore, the words “ having had on board ” ought not, in my judgment, to be limited in the way suggested by counsel for the defendant who is, in effect, asking that the court should say that those words should be read as though they were “ having within the distance of one league had on board.” Parliament did not so enact. In my judgment, the provisions of ss. 179 and 202 are applicable to the facts of the present case. Under s. 202 it seems to me plain that the Taku was made use D E of in the importation and landing of uncustomed, prohibited or restricted goods.

It is all the more plain that that is so because the court knows that this was a plan devised in England with reference to craft in England, one of which craft was to go over to the French coast and then return, and, which craft in fact, did return to Portsmouth Harbour. Those considerations are not in themselves conclusive in regard to this section, but they make it all the more plain, in my judgment, F that this craft was “ made use of.” For these reasons the forfeiture is justifiable, whatever be the nationality of the defendant, and, therefore, I do not find it necessary to deal with that part of the case, and I declare and adjudge that the motor vessel and the binnacle and compass remain forfeited to His Majesty.

Declaration accordingly. G

Re PRESS CAPS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Evershed, L.J.J., and Wynn-Parry, J.), April 8, 11, 1949.]

Company—Compulsory acquisition of shares—Scheme—Dissenting shareholder—Fairness of scheme—Stock Exchange values of shares—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 209 (1) (6).

A The M.B. Co., Ltd., offered to acquire all the fully paid ordinary shares of P.C., Ltd., and to allot for every hundred 5s. ordinary shares in P.C., Ltd., seven £1 ordinary shares in the M.B. company. This scheme was based on a value of 7s. each for the ordinary shares of P.C., Ltd., being 9d. above the market value, and a value of £5 each for the shares of the M.B. company, the mean market quotation of which on the material date was £5 5s. There were 1,116 shareholders of P.C., Ltd., and all accepted the offer except one who applied under s. 209 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948, for an order that he was not bound to accept the offer.

B HELD: (i) it was not established on the facts that the scheme was unfair.

C (ii) it was right to take the Stock Exchange values of the shares at the material time as the basis of the terms of the transfer, and, therefore, the application must be refused.

Dictum of MAUGHAM, J., in Re Hoare & Co., Ltd. (1933) (150 L.T. 375), approved.

E APPEAL by the Metal Box Co., Ltd. (the “transferee company”) from a decision of VAISEY, J., dated Jan. 18, 1949, declaring that a dissenting shareholder was not bound to accept an offer made by the Metal Box Co. to acquire his shares in Press Caps, Ltd. (the “transferor” company) under s. 209 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948. The Court of Appeal held that the shareholder had failed to show that the proposal was unfair and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Upjohn, K.C., and T. D. Divine for the transferee company.

Raymond Jennings, K.C., and Hesketh for the dissenting shareholder.

G SOMERVELL, L.J.: This case turns on an originating summons taken out under s. 209 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948, which confers a power to acquire the shares of shareholders who dissent from a scheme by which one company desires to obtain the transfer to itself of the shares or a class of shares in another company. In its application to offers made before the Companies Act, 1948, was passed, certain amendments are made by sub-s. (6) which make s. 209 (1) read in precisely the same words as s. 155 (1) of the Companies Act, 1929, which was the section in operation at the time when the offer which we have to consider was made. The relevant parts of s. 155 (1) are as follows:

“Where a scheme or contract involving the transfer of shares or any class of shares in a company (in this section referred to as ‘the transferor company’) to another company, whether a company within the meaning of this Act or not (in this section referred to as ‘the transferee company’), has, within four months after the making of the offer in that behalf by the transferee company been approved by the holders of not less than nine-tenths in value of the shares affected, the transferee company may, at any time within two months after the expiration of the said four months, give notice in the prescribed manner to any dissenting shareholder that it desires to acquire his shares, and where such a notice is given the transferee company shall, unless on an application made by the dissenting shareholder within one month from the date on which the notice was given the court thinks fit to order otherwise, be entitled and bound to acquire those shares on the terms on which under the scheme or contract the shares of the approving shareholders are to be transferred to the transferee company."

In the present case the Metal Box Co., the transferee company, put forward a scheme for acquiring the total shareholding of Press Caps, Ltd., the transferor company, the offer being contained in a document dated Dec. 10, 1947, in the following terms :

"The Metal Box Co., Ltd., offers to acquire from the respective holders thereof the 17,232 fully paid 10% cumulative participating preference shares of 5s. each and the 500,000 fully paid ordinary shares of 5s. each issued by Press Caps, Ltd., upon the following terms. (2) Ordinary shares. For every hundred fully paid ordinary shares of 5s. each held by the holder thereof in the undertaking of Press Caps, Ltd., the Metal Box Co., Ltd., is prepared to allot and issue to such holder in exchange therefor seven fully paid ordinary shares of £1 each in the undertaking of the Metal Box Co., Ltd. The exchange of shares in the proportion before mentioned is based on a value of 7s. each for the ordinary shares of Press Caps, Ltd., being ninepence above the estimated market value and a value of £5 each for the ordinary shares of the Metal Box Co., Ltd., the mean market quotation of which on Dec. 1, 1947, was £5 5s. 0d. The holders of the said preference and ordinary shares of Press Caps, Ltd., will be entitled to receive and retain all dividends of Press Caps, Ltd., in respect of the year ended June 30, 1947, declared at the 1947 annual general meeting."

As a result of that document, some 95.5 per cent. in number and 96.8 per cent. in value of the shareholding accepted the offer. There followed a notice to dissenting shareholders, informing them that, unless they assented, their shares would be compulsorily acquired. Some of them voluntarily accepted the offer, and other shares were compulsorily acquired without applying to the court under s. 155 (1) of the Act of 1929, but the present applicant, a dissenting shareholder, applied to the court under that part of the section which enables the court to order that their shares shall not be compulsorily acquired.

The case in which the broad general principle was laid down and was decided by MAUGHAM, J., in 1933 is Re Hoare & Co., Ltd. (1). That was an application of a similar kind in respect of a scheme. In the course of his judgment, MAUGHAM, J., after referring to the fact that an application of this kind can only come before the court when ninety per cent. or more of the shareholders have accepted the offer, said (150 L.T. 375) :

"Accordingly, without expressing a final opinion on the matter, because there may be special circumstances in special cases, I am unable to see that I have any right to order otherwise in such a case as I have before me, unless it is affirmatively established that, notwithstanding the views of a very large majority of shareholders, the scheme is unfair."

I accept that criterion and, therefore, I turn to the reasons which are submitted on behalf of the applicants for saying that the offer here is unfair. The main point made, which was dealt with by VAISEY, J., is based on the balance sheet of 1947 which has this item : "Freehold property—at cost, less depreciation, as at July 1, 1946, £29,708 17s. 0d." There is a small addition during the year, a sum of £458 is written off, and a figure of £29,349 13s. 6d. appears as the freehold property at cost, less depreciation. It is common ground that the value of that freehold property was a very much larger figure, and was actually in the neighbourhood of £90,000. As I read the learned judge's judgment, it was because of that under-valuation that he made an order in favour of the applicant, and where I differ from the learned judge is that I cannot accept his view of the inference that should be drawn from this entry in the balance sheet. He says, and I think this is the key to the difference between the view I take and the view that he took :

A "If you find admitted so large a discrepancy as an under-valuation of the most important asset in the balance sheet of this company, an admitted under-valuation of no less than £60,000, I should have thought that threw a great deal of doubt on the appropriateness of the balance sheet as an estimate of value, and through that, therefore, it also threw doubt on the market prices of the shares."

B With respect, I cannot regard this figure in the balance sheet as a valuation. It does not purport to be. If, in making this offer, the Metal Box Co., Ltd., had said : "The freehold property of this company is worth to-day £30,000," all the strictures which the learned judge makes and all the conclusions which he draws would have had the greatest possible force, but this figure in the balance sheet in accordance with what is very common practice does not appear
C as a valuation of the property as at the date of the balance sheet, but is cost less depreciation. Therefore, it does not seem to me that there is anything misleading about it. That being so, the reasons which led the learned judge to the conclusion which he formed really go. It was said that certain expressions in his judgment suggested that he was applying what I may call a subjective test rather than an objective test, that is to say, whether the shareholder was
D being reasonable, or acting on a reasonable ground, in not wanting his shares purchased. The learned judge referred to the decision of MAUGHAM, J., but I do not think that the words which he relied on could really be taken out of the general setting of his judgment and repeated as the principle which he applied.

I am strengthened in that by a sentence from the judgment of VAISEY, J., in Re Evertite Locknuts, Ltd. (2), to which the learned judge himself referred,
E and in which he said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 403) :

"At the same time, if I were to accede to this present application, it seems to me that the whole matter would be left in a condition of quite intolerable uncertainty, and that it cannot be right that one shareholder owning one-seven-hundredth part of the shares affected by the proposal
F should be entitled to stand out against the decision of the 699/700ths of the share capital, merely because he has, as he thinks, been left somewhat in the dark in regard to the material facts."

In addition to the points to which I have referred, counsel for the transferee company also relied on these matters. He said that the valuation paid was more favourable, having regard to the Stock Exchange prices, than appeared
G in the offer. The offer referred to mean prices, whereas if you sought to sell a share in the transferor company you would get 5s. 9d. only. Therefore the 7s. was 1s. 3d. above the selling price ; and, with regard to the Metal Box Co., the five guineas again was the mean price, and if you sought to buy a share in the Metal Box Co. you would have to pay £5 7s. 6d. He also relied on the evidence of Mr. Ryan, a director of the respondent company who was cross-
H examined on his affidavit. Mr. Ryan said that the figure for patents and goodwill was an over-valuation, because the patents were running out and the position, at any rate as regards a considerable part of the business of Press Caps, Ltd., was that they were marketing articles manufactured for them by the Metal Box Co. That contract was running out shortly and it was a matter for the directors of the Metal Box Co. to consider whether they should or should not renew it. He also relied on the fact that the directors of Press Caps, Ltd., who at that time had no common director with the Metal Box Co., sent a letter which was enclosed with the offer, strongly recommending the offer: "Your directors have very carefully considered the offer and they are unanimous in their strong recommendation for its acceptance." No doubt could possibly be thrown on the bona fides of that recommendation. Counsel for the applicant pointed out that, as appears from the last paragraph of the document, the directors were getting compensation, some of which had been agreed and some of which was left outstanding, but I think counsel for the transferee company is entitled to rely on that as supporting the view that this was a fair offer. On these matters, therefore, the onus being on the applicant, he has not satisfied me that this offer was not a fair offer. I say that assuming that it has got to be fair to each individual shareholder, and each individual shareholder of small or moderately small parcels of shares. There is no evidence here that any one shareholder held a controlling interest.

Counsel for the applicant submitted that to take the Stock Exchange valuation was wrong, because s. 155 (1) refers to a scheme or contract in the singular. He said it contemplated a transaction other than that which, in fact, took place or would normally take place, but a transaction in which the shareholders as a body (no-one on this argument, having a controlling interest) were entitled to receive their proportions of what it might be assumed a purchaser would give for getting a controlling interest. I cannot myself see anything in the section which justifies that submission, but it is unnecessary to decide that point, because, assuming such a construction is possible, I am satisfied here that, having regard to the amount—some 25 per cent. or thereabouts—by which the sum offered was above the Stock Exchange relative buying and selling values, counsel for the applicant has failed to discharge the onus of showing that the offer was unfair, even on that assumed construction of the Act. There was no evidence which would enable the court to put any figure on what extra amount, in the case of a company of this kind and in the condition in which it was, would have been given by somebody getting control. If the contract to which Mr. Ryan referred was an important part of their business and was just running out, it might be very difficult to find anybody who would be willing to purchase a controlling interest.

Counsel's second submission was that in a case of this sort more detailed information should be given than was given here. I do not think that that submission helps him, partly, perhaps, because of the way in which I regard the item against which most complaint was made. It seems to me that if in the year 1947 someone sees a freehold property valued at cost, that is the plainest possible indication, unless there are some exceptional circumstances, that it will be worth in the market more than the figure that appears in the balance sheet, and if any of the people who received this offer were interested in following up the matter, a perusal of back balance sheets would show when the property was bought and what it cost. The broad relation between that figure and its valuation to-day would have been readily apprehended.

Counsel finally took the point that this is a matter of discretion and that we ought not to interfere with the learned judge's exercise of his discretion. That is an important consideration, but I think that it is a case in which it is right to come to a different conclusion, because I take a different view of the facts and the evidence on affidavit as it has been put before the court by the applicant. It is true there was the oral evidence of Mr. Ryan, but on that there is no difference and the learned judge did not refer to it in any detail, but I have come to the conclusion that the documents which have been put forward do not justify a conclusion that the offer was unfair. For these reasons, I think it is right that this court should allow the appeal and make the appropriate order on that basis.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I agree. This is a case in which an offer was made, pursuant to what is now s. 209 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948, to acquire 500,000 ordinary shares at 5s. from 1,116 holders. It is, of course, of the first importance to note that, of that 1,116, 1,115 have by now regarded the offer as one which they could fairly and properly accept. One has held out. In those circumstances, I regard as the appropriate guide to providing the answer to the application the language of MAUGHAM, J., which my brother has already read. In the light of that language, I, first of all, fail to find any such special circumstances in the present case as I think the learned judge had there in mind, with the result that, in my judgment, the onus on the single recusant is a heavy one. But counsel for the applicant has said that, nevertheless, in the end it is a matter for the discretion of the learned judge and that we ought not to disturb the exercise by him of his discretion. With the greatest respect to the learned judge, I do not think in this case that is a satisfactory answer, for I think that the learned judge took a view which was not justified on one particular matter in evidence, namely, the figure appearing in the Press Caps Co.'s last balance sheet as representing cost plus additions, less depreciation, of the freehold property. On the evidence it appeared that the property, in fact, is worth some three times the sum so arrived at in the balance sheet. I agree with what SOMERVELL, L.J., has said, that the figure in the balance sheet does not purport to be a valuation. I think, the learned judge misdirected himself by regarding it as being a valuation which was put to the shareholders as a relevant matter of fact for their consideration in determining whether or no to accept the offer. He was, therefore, led to conclude that that figure represented (and I use his own words) a gross under-valuation of the most important asset in the Press Cap Co.'s undertaking. Of course, one can well understand that, if a contract has been secured by some gross under-valuation on a material matter represented to the transferee, the court would be likely enough to say: "This contract is not one which I will enforce on an unwilling seller," but without repeating what has fallen from SOMERVELL, L.J., I venture to think that is not the right approach to this particular case. Indeed, counsel for the applicant has somewhat shifted his ground before this court, because the main burden of his argument has been that, in the circumstances of this case, to have taken as the basis of the offer the Stock Exchange valuations of the shares in the respective companies was unfair because this is an offer in which it is necessary, on the face of it, for the offeror to say: "I wish to acquire the entire shareholding of the transferor company," so that all the shareholders in that company are invited to join together in transferring to the transferee company the entire issued share capital and with it the control of the transferor company which that entire shareholding confers. Since, it is said, the Stock Exchange valuation neglects the element of control, it is in such a case not a fair approach or a fair basis for the offer. I would prefer to express no view whether in cases of this kind it is right that no element of control should be taken into account in making the offer, because in this case it seems to me the answer is provided in two ways—first, by a return to what I have already said, that since 1,115 shareholders out of 1,116 have accepted the offer, prima facie we should take it as fair and, to borrow the language of MAUGHAM, J., the court ought not to set up its own view of the fairness of the scheme in opposition to so very large a majority of the shareholders who are concerned, and, secondly, the figures do give a substantial, or, at least, by no means a negligible, addition to the price which would be arrived at by a simple calculation on Stock Exchange prices. I, therefore, think that counsel for the applicant, assuming in his favour that his premise is correct, fails to discharge the onus laid on him of showing that this scheme is not fair, and that the court, accordingly, ought to "order otherwise" within the terms of the section.

Counsel for the applicant invited the court to impose a greater stringency in the matter of disclosure on companies when an objector such as his client in the present case applies under the present section. The question of disclosure of documents is not one which is directly raised in this case and I do not think it would be right for me or for the court in the present circumstances to express any view on that matter. I am satisfied that there is no such absence of disclosure in the present case as would justify the court in saying that counsel has discharged the onus of showing the scheme unfair. For those reasons, as well as those already given, I think the learned judge was in error, and I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

A

WYNN-PARRY, J. : I agree. I think, with respect, MAUGHAM, J., stated the correct test in Re Hoare & Co., Ltd. (1), namely, that where the statutory majority have accepted the offer, the onus must rest on the applicant to satisfy the court that the price offered is unfair. He says (150 L.T. 375) :

"The other conclusion I draw is this, that again prima facie the court ought to regard the scheme as a fair one inasmuch as it seems to me impossible to suppose that the court, in the absence of very strong grounds, is to be entitled to set up its own view of the fairness of the scheme in opposition to so very large a majority of the shareholders who are concerned. Accordingly, without expressing a final opinion on the matter, because there may be special circumstances in special cases, I am unable to see that I have any right to order otherwise in such a case as I have before me, unless it is affirmatively established that, notwithstanding the views of a very large majority of the shareholders, the scheme is unfair."

VAISEY, J., accepted this test, but, with all respect, in my view he failed to apply it. He says :

"... I think all I have to be satisfied is that there is a reasonable ground to suppose that these shares are being taken over at less than what the shareholder, at any rate, thinks is their proper price, and I have further, I think, to make up my mind that the shareholder's belief in the inadequacy of the price is one which is not a mere matter of doubt or speculation but is based upon some reason and some intelligible ground."

It is true that later the learned judge says :

F

G

"I think all I should say is I take the view here that there was an inadequacy of price, which may be quite small, but, in my judgment, is not really a trifle," but, again, that is linked up with his view that the real test is what the shareholder says, because he continues and refers to something "which justifies this shareholder in saying : 'I will not be coerced. I will not have my shares expropriated. I will stand where I am. I know more about this property and the value of it than the other shareholders who have walked into this scheme like a flock of sheep.'"

H

In my view, he is substituting the view of the shareholder for the view of the court. A valuation is only an expression of opinion. It may be made on one of a number of bases, but the final test of what is the value of a thing is what it will fetch if sold. In some cases a sale has to take place, as one knows who exercises the administrative jurisdiction of the Chancery Division, but if there exists a market, as, for instance, the Stock Exchange in the case of shares in respect of which there is a quotation or in respect of which there is permission to deal, there may be no need to sell, and prima facie the Stock Exchange markings can be taken as a satisfactory indication of the value of the shares in question. For that reason alone it appears to me, with respect, that the view of MAUGHAM, J., as to where the onus lies under the section is justified. It, therefore, follows that to succeed the applicant must go behind the Stock Exchange prices, and that, undoubtedly, is a heavy task.

A It is alleged here that the balance sheet does not represent the true position. The learned judge seems to treat the balance sheet as containing a valuation of the freehold property. I do not so read it. The statement in the balance sheet does no more than accurately represent the state of the freehold property account in the books of the company. It is no more a valuation than the items: "Patents and goodwill—at cost less amounts written off—as at July 1, 1946, £45,113 5s. 0d." The evidence on that item satisfies me that there is ground for saying that that asset was not, at the date of the balance sheet, worth anything like £45,000. The result, therefore, is that if one has to write up the one item, one must write down the other. Thus, it seems to me that when one regards the balance sheet in the light of the evidence, it affords the applicant no sufficient ground for saying that he has discharged the onus which lies on him.

B It was argued by counsel for the applicant that VAISEY, J., had exercised his discretion and that we should not interfere with that exercise, but, as I have said, in my view, the learned judge misdirected himself because he treated the balance sheet as containing a valuation of the freehold property and, with all respect to him, I think that his whole judgment is coloured by this. In my view, the applicant has failed to discharge the admittedly heavy onus which lies on him. As regards counsel's argument on the question of control, I agree with what has been said by SOMERVELL, L.J., and I do not desire to add anything on that point. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

By R.S.C., Ord. 30, r. 1 (a): "Within seven days from the time when the pleadings shall be deemed to be closed, the plaintiff shall take out a summons for directions returnable in not less than seven days."

H In a libel action in which the plaintiff delivered a statement of claim claiming an injunction and damages, the defendants failed to deliver a defence. Instead of moving for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, the plaintiff took out a summons for directions and applied for the action to be tried by a judge and jury.

HELD: (i) R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, was merely permissive and did not exclusively provide for the rights which a plaintiff might exercise where there was default in delivery of defence, and a plaintiff who was within the rule could exercise rights other than those which the rule gave him.

for such directions as were appropriate to the position as it had arisen as the result of the defendant's inaction.

(iii) assuming that the plaintiff was not entitled to a summons for direction under R.S.C., Ord. 30, r. 1 (a), as the pleadings were not closed, nevertheless, as he was claiming damages and there was an issue outstanding, he was entitled to have his action set down for trial before a judge and jury and the court had inherent jurisdiction to make such an order.

(3) Henly v. Evening Standard, (1942), Annual Practice, 1948, 639 n.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the defendants in a libel action from an order of BIRKETT, J., dated Mar. 18, 1949, confirming an order of Master O'Donnell, dated Feb. 28, 1949, that the action be tried by a judge and special jury.

The plaintiff delivered a statement of claim, claiming an injunction and damages, but the defendants failed to deliver a defence. The plaintiff thereupon took out a summons for directions, on which the order complained of was made. The defendants contended that the only step which the plaintiff could take in the circumstances was to move for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11. The Court of Appeal now held that R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, was merely permissive, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the order for which he applied. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Pritt, K.C., and John Thompson for the defendants.

Quintin Hogg for the plaintiff.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : This interlocutory appeal arises in a libel action, and the parties to that action and the nature of the libel are irrelevant to the issue we have to decide. The point raised is one of importance and turns on the construction of certain Rules of the Supreme Court.

The plaintiff, in his statement of claim, claimed an injunction and damages. The defendants put in no defence. That brought the matter within R.S.C., Ord. 27, which deals with default of plea. It is common ground that the rule of R.S.C., Ord. 27, which is applicable is r. 11, which provides so far as is material :

" . . . if the defendant makes default in delivering a defence, the plaintiff may set down the action on motion for judgment, and such judgment shall be given as upon the statement of claim the court or a judge shall consider the plaintiff to be entitled."

The plaintiff did not proceed under that rule. He did not move for judgment, but he applied for directions to Master O'Donnell and asked that the action be tried in Middlesex by a judge and a special jury. Master O'Donnell made an order on those lines, and from that order the defendants appealed to BIRKETT, J. The learned judge dismissed the appeal, and the defendants now appeal to this court.

The first question is whether R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, prescribes the only step which a plaintiff in an action covered by the rule can take when there is default in delivery of defence. That turns on the words, "the plaintiff may set down the action on motion for judgment." Counsel for the defendants submitted that the word "may" was used there because a plaintiff cannot be compelled to go on with the proceedings which he has started. Counsel for the plaintiff submits that another course of procedure is open to the plaintiff, viz., the course which he took here of applying for and obtaining an order for the trial of the action before a judge and jury. Although the rules at the time were different, I think that that issue is concluded in favour of counsel for the plaintiff by the decision of this court in Morse v. Frost (1). The issue arose there under R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 4, which, as counsel for the defendants rightly pointed out, is in different terms. That rule deals with the case where the plaintiff's claim is for pecuniary damages only or for detention of goods with or without a claim for pecuniary damages, and the defendant makes default in delivering his defence. It provides that :

" . . . the plaintiff may enter an interlocutory judgment against the defendant or defendants, and a writ of inquiry shall issue to assess the value of the goods, and the damages, or the damages only, as the case may be."

If the plaintiff proceeded under that part of the rule, he would, as I understand it, get an interlocutory judgment which would be what I may call an administrative matter. The rule, however, goes on :

" But the court or a judge may order that, instead of a writ of inquiry, the value and amount of damages, or either of them, shall be ascertained in any way which the court or judge may direct."

There are no such words as those final words in R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, and, if the decision of the court in Morse v. Frost (1) had been based on the existence of those words in r. 4, it would not have covered 'the present case, but, as I read the judgments, it was not by that process of reasoning that the court arrived at their decision. What had happened there was that a plaintiff, being certainly within R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 4, in the sense that he could have taken advantage of any rights which r. 4 gave him, d'd not do so, but gave notice for trial under R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 11. That rule has been altered since then, and there were words at the end of it at that time which provided that notice of trial could be given at any time after the issues of fact were ready for trial. BANKES, L.J., in his judgment, said ([1927] 1 K.B. 234) :

" It is not necessary to decide whether Ord. 27, r. 13, gives the plaintiff the alternative right he claims, because I think Ord. 36, r. 11, does enable him to go before a judge and jury."

After reading the relevant part of that rule, he continued (ibid.) :

" In this case a statement of claim has been delivered, but there has been no defence ; so the plaintiff may, if he likes, enter an interlocutory judgment ; but he is not bound to do that, because, in my opinion, ' the issues of fact are ready for trial ' within the meaning of Ord. 36, r. 11. The statement of claim raises issues which are not disposed of. The amount of the damages is in issue, and so are the facts on which the special damages are founded. But even if no special damages were claimed there would still be an issue, because, although liability is admitted in the absence of a defence, the amount of damages is still in dispute. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to have the action set down for trial before a judge and a jury, and in my opinion it should be tried before a common jury."

ATKIN, L.J., said that he was of the same opinion, and added (ibid., 235) :

" But where damages are at stake to the very considerable amount claimed in this action, the case may properly be tried before a judge and jury in open court."

SARGANT, L.J., agreed.

It seems to me that Morse v. Frost (1) clearly decided that, although one was within R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 4, one had the right, under the rule dealing with notices for trial, to give notice of trial, and that right was not derived from any of the later words which occur in r. 4 but do not occur in R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, but existed because the plaintiff was not confined within r. 4. He could exercise rights other than those which that rule gave him. I think, therefore, that that decision applies and settles the first point, viz., that R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, does not exclusively provide for the rights which the plaintiff may exercise.

Counsel for the defendants next submits that the words on which the court proceeded in Morse v. Frost (1) in saying that the plaintiff could give notice of trial do not occur in the present R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 11, or r. 11A. I agree that that is so, but I think that before one gets to that point it is necessary to consider R.S.C., Ord. 30, on which counsel for the defendants also bases an argument. He said that there was no jurisdiction in the master to hear an application by the plaintiff for a summons for directions because R.S.C., Ord. 30, r. 1 (a) says :

“ Within seven days from the time when the pleadings shall be deemed to be closed, the plaintiff shall take out a summons for directions returnable in not less than seven days.”

He submitted, and counsel for the plaintiff agreed, that the pleadings in these proceedings cannot be deemed to be closed, and counsel for the defendants submitted that the rule means that one cannot take out a summons for directions until the pleadings are deemed to be closed. I do not take that view. The rule does not say that, if, by the default of the defendant, the pleadings are not closed, the plaintiff cannot apply for a summons for such directions as are appropriate to the position as it has arisen as the result of the defendant's inaction. There are plain indications in Morse v. Frost (1) that a plaintiff who is claiming damages ought to be entitled, if he so desires, to have his action set down for trial before a judge and jury, and that is what I may call the general position in cases of this kind. On that construction it is not necessary to decide the point, but, if that construction were wrong, I would have come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances which have arisen here, the plaintiff would be entitled to take out, and the court would have jurisdiction to entertain, a summons which would not be, on this view, the summons for directions contemplated by R.S.C., Ord. 30, r. 1 (a), but a summons for trial by judge and jury, and that the court would have inherent jurisdiction to consider whether the plaintiff should be entitled to have the issue which was outstanding—as it clearly is here, and as it was in Morse v. Frost (1)—determined in that way.

That, I think, disposes of the issues that have been raised. It is agreed that, this action being a King's Bench action to be tried in London, we are not concerned with R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 11. The order that is made on the summons provides for the time for setting down and—as I, at any rate, understand the position—the plaintiff can set down the case under the order, which I think he was entitled to apply for and to get, and no further matter remains outstanding for this court to deal with. I should, perhaps, add that counsel for the defendants said he was basing himself solely on the question whether an order could be made under the jurisdiction conferred by the rules. If there was jurisdiction to make such an order, he was not submitting or suggesting that he had any grounds on which he could ask this court to interfere with the discretion exercised by the learned judge. For these reasons in my opinion, the appeal must be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, seems to me in its natural meaning to be permissive. I think the purpose of the rule was to provide a cheap method for the plaintiff to obtain in most cases the relief he seeks, but circumstances might well arise in which a real hardship would be inflicted on a plaintiff if he was compelled to proceed by a motion for judgment and could not exercise the right which he would otherwise have of setting down the case for trial and having it come on for trial in the usual way. For instance, some of the relief he sought might be relief of a kind which it was not the practice of the Chancery Division to give on motion for judgment, such, e.g., as a declaration as to the construction of a document: see New Brunswick Ry. Co. v. British & French Trust Corpn., Ltd. (2) per LORD MAUGHAM, L.C., and LORD A RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. That case is a long way from the present matter, but it does seem to me to indicate that there may be circumstances in which real hardship would be inflicted on a plaintiff if he could not pursue the alternative remedy of setting down the case for trial in the usual way, and may explain why the word "may," which is deliberately permissive, has been used in the terms of R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11. I agree entirely with the reasons given by my B Lord for thinking that we are bound by authority to decide that R.S.C., Ord. 27, r. 11, is permissive in character and that either under the rule itself, if we accept the construction put forward by counsel for the plaintiff, or under R.S.C., Ord. 30, r. 1 (a), or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, there was power to make the order which the master made and which BIRKETT, J., has confirmed in this case. I would add that some authority seems to me to be derived for C that view from Henly v. Evening Standard (3) which is referred to in the note to R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 11, in THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1948, p. 639. For these reasons I agree that the appeal fails.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Lynskey, JJ.), April 26, 1949.]

F Food and Drugs—Sale of unsound food—Prosecution—Limitation of time—Bottle of milk deposited with customer—Handed by customer to sanitary inspector—Sanitary inspector also sampling officer—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 80 (1) (a).

G On Sept. 13, 1948, the respondents, milk salesmen and distributors, left at a customer's house a bottle of milk which looked dirty. The customer called in the sanitary officer, who was also a sampling officer for the purposes of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938. He took the milk away and submitted it to the public analyst for examination, but he did not follow the procedure laid down by ss. 70 and 71 of the Act for dealing with samples. The milk was found to contain deleterious matter and on Nov. 12, 1948, an information was laid against the respondents charging them with an offence against s. 9 (1) of the Act in that they had unlawfully deposited at a house H for the purpose of sale milk intended, but unfit, for human consumption. It was contended by the respondents that a sample had been procured under the Act and, therefore, under proviso (a) to s. 80 (1), the prosecution should have been commenced within 28 days from the time when the sample was procured.

HELD: in seizing the bottle of milk the sanitary officer was acting as a sanitary officer and not as a sampling officer; and, therefore, the limitation of 28 days under proviso (a) to s. 80 (1) did not apply.

[FOR THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1938, ss. 9 (1) and 80 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 31, pp. 258 and 303.]

CASE STATED by Surrey justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Mortlake on Dec. 7, 1948, an information was preferred by the appellant, the chief sanitary inspector of Barnes Borough Council, under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, charging the respondents, a company engaged in the business of selling and delivering milk, with having, on Sept. 13, 1948, unlawfully deposited at a house for the purpose of sale a pint of milk which was intended for, but was unfit for, human consumption, contrary to s. 9 (1) of the Act. The justices stopped the case and dismissed the information on the ground that, under proviso (a) to s. 80 (1) of the Act, the information was out of time as it was laid (and the summons was issued) on Nov. 12, 1948, more than 28 days after the sample had been taken. On an appeal from the decision of the justices the Divisional Court now held that this was not a prosecution in respect of an article of which a sample had been procured, and, therefore, proviso (a) to s. 80 (1) did not apply, and, accordingly, they allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the justices to conclude the hearing. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.

Scott Cairns, K.C., and Ahern for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for Surrey sitting at Mortlake, before whom the respondents, United Dairies, Ltd., were summoned for that they :

"... did unlawfully deposit at 40, Suffolk Road, Barnes, for the purpose of sale certain food, namely, a pint of milk, which was intended for, but was unfit for, human consumption, contrary to the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 9."

The justices dismissed the information without calling on the defence on the ground that the summons was not brought within 28 days as it should have been under proviso (a) to s. 80 (1) of the Act if it had been a case of a sampling officer taking a sample of food for analysis and then finding that it was not of the nature, substance or quality required, or had some other defect. The only question in this case was whether or not there was a "sample," and, in my opinion, the matter is really unarguable.

On Sept. 13, 1948, the respondents left at the house of one of their customers a bottle of milk which looked dirty. The customer rang up, not a sampling officer, but the sanitary inspector. It so happens that the sanitary inspector can also be a sampling officer for the purposes of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938. The sanitary inspector went to the house, and, seeing that the milk looked unfit for consumption, with the customer's consent he took it away. When it was analysed, it was found to contain deleterious matter. I refrain from saying anything about whether it was, in fact, fit for human consumption, because the justices stopped the case. It is said that the person who took the bottle of milk was a sampling officer taking a sample of food. He was nothing of the sort. He was a sanitary inspector and he did not take a sample, but seized the article of food which had been delivered to the customer. In those circumstances, if it was proved that the article of food that had been delivered to the customer was unfit for human consumption, no question about division of the sample into portions arises. If one takes the bulk, one is not taking a sample, and the person who took this milk was not purporting to act as a sampling officer. He was the sanitary inspector who was given by the purchaser an article which, the purchaser alleged, was unfit for human consumption. If, in those circumstances, the article was unfit for human consumption, under s. 80 (1) of the Act the offence could be prosecuted under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and the time limit under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 11, is six months. Accordingly, the case must go back with an intimation that the limitation of 28 days, under proviso (a) to s. 80 (1), did not apply in this case and that the justices must conclude the hearing and come to a conclusion whether this bottle of milk was or was not unfit for human consumption.

- BIRKETT, J.: I am of the same opinion. It is to be noted that this
- A prosecution was brought under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 9 (1). That is a governing factor of great importance in the consideration of the facts of the case. The charge was that the respondents did unlawfully deposit at a certain place for the purpose of sale food, to wit, a pint of milk. It so happened that, because of the manifest impurity of the milk which could be detected just by
- B by looking at it, the customer to whom it was delivered rang up the sanitary inspector at Barnes. He came and saw it and, as it was palpably impure from the point of view of appearance, he took the whole bottle away and in due course submitted it to the public analyst, who provided the certificate which has been incorporated in the Case. The whole point of this appeal lies in the fact that, by proviso (a) to s. 80 (1) of the Act of 1938, where a sample
- C has been procured under the Act no prosecution in respect of the article sampled shall be commenced after the expiration of 28 days from the time when the sample was procured, and counsel for the respondents said that that provision of the Act governed the whole situation. It was said that here a sample was procured and it was procured of the article sampled—which, I must confess, is a little difficult, but that is what was said—and, therefore, the provision with regard to 28 days comes into play. It is enough for me to say that, in
- D my view, no sample was taken, and, therefore, proviso (a) to s. 80 (1) has no application. It may be conceded that in a proper case the sanitary inspector may be deemed to be the sampling officer within the meaning of the Act of 1938, but I am satisfied that on this occasion he was acting, not as the sampling officer, but merely as an officer of the Barnes Borough Council who are responsible [under ss. 64 and 65 (2) of the Act] for enforcing s. 9 of the Act and seeing that
- E food which is to be sold to the public is not contaminated. This final word about it would seem to me to be very convincing. If, indeed, a sample had been taken in this case and the taking of the bottle of milk was to be so regarded, then the elaborate provisions [in ss. 70, 71] with regard to what happens when a sample is taken were wholly disregarded, and it seems to me, therefore, perfectly plain—and what I may term the common-sense view of the matter accords with
- F what I think is the law—that on the special facts of the case no sample was taken within the meaning of the Act. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the result of this case must be as my Lord has already announced.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Asquith and Denning, L.J.J.), April 26, 27, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Goodwill—Compensation—“Trade or business”—Solicitor—Agent for insurance companies and building societies—Relevant goodwill—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), ss. 4 (1), 17 (1).

A

By s. 4 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927: “The tenant of a holding to which this Part of this Act applies shall, if a claim for the purpose is made in the prescribed manner . . . be entitled, at the termination of the tenancy on quitting the holding, to be paid by his landlord compensation for goodwill if he proves to the satisfaction of the tribunal that by reason of the carrying on by him or his predecessors in title at the premises of a trade or business for a period of not less than five years goodwill has become attached to the premises by reason whereof the premises could be let at a higher rent than they would have realised had no such goodwill attached thereto.” Section 5 provides that, where it is shown that compensation under s. 4 to which the tenant would be entitled, would not compensate him for loss of goodwill, the tenant may, in lieu of claiming such compensation, serve a notice requiring a new lease of the premises. By s. 17 (1): “The holdings to which this Part of this Act applies are any premises held under a lease . . . and used wholly or partly for carrying on thereat any trade or business . . .”

The tenants, a firm of solicitors, besides conducting their considerable professional practice acted as agents for insurance companies and building societies. On an application by the tenants for compensation for goodwill or, alternatively, a new lease,

HELD: (i) the carrying on of a solicitor's business was not the carrying on of a “trade or business” within the meaning of ss. 4 (1) and 17 (1).

(ii) if it was shown that a trade or business in the statutory sense was carried on on the premises in addition to a profession, the only relevant goodwill for the purpose of the Act was that referable to the activities of the trade or business to the exclusion of goodwill, if any, attributable to the profession.

(iii) there being no evidence of any goodwill exclusively attaching to their trade or business activities, the tenants' claim failed.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE RAWLINS, sitting at Windsor County Court, dated Oct. 6, 1948, granting the tenants a new lease of the premises in which they carried on the business of solicitors and incidental to that business acted as agents for insurance companies and building societies. The Court of Appeal, allowing the appeal, held that the business of solicitors was not a “trade or business” within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, ss. 4 (1) and 17 (1), and that, since no goodwill attached to the tenants' other activities, they were not entitled either to compensation or a new lease. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

G

F. H. Lawton for the landlords.

C. Duveen and T. M. Figgis for the tenants.

H

LORD GREENE, M.R.: This appeal arises out of an application made under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, ss. 5 (1) and 4 (1), for the grant of a new lease or, alternatively, for compensation. The tenants are a firm of solicitors who carry on their profession both at Maidenhead and also at Nos. 15 and 16, Park Street, Windsor. No. 15 and No. 16 each has a separate entrance.

The Windsor business started as an off-shoot of the Maidenhead business and has now become the more lucrative part of the business. The application relates only to No. 15. No. 16, which comprises the larger part of their offices, is held under a lease which still has seventeen years to run. The approaching termination of the tenancy of the tenants' offices at No. 15 led them to apply under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, for the relief which I have mentioned,

A which is limited to that part of their offices. The tenants carry on the profession of solicitors on both parts of their premises. What I may call the strictly solicitors' business—I use that word without prejudice—forms the larger part of their activities and produces far the larger part of their profits. In connection with that business, they also have other activities. They act as agents for insurance companies and building societies. The tenants' application was referred to a referee under the Act and he reported to the county court judge. B When the matter came before the judge, he accepted the report in some respects, and, as a result of the conclusions to which he came, he made an order under which the tenants obtained the right to a new lease of No. 15.

There are certain questions that arise on this appeal and it is necessary to draw a distinction between them. The compensation for which the Act provides C is compensation in respect of what is called goodwill. Where it is shown that the tenant is entitled to compensation, he may also get, if the circumstances warrant it and the requirements laid down in the Act are complied with, instead of compensation an order entitling him to a new lease of the premises. The referee had before him, therefore, first, the question whether there was carried on on the premises, No. 15, what the Act describes as “a trade or D business,” because it is only in respect of “trades or businesses” that the Act comes into operation. The referee came to the conclusion that the tenants were carrying on a trade or business, but his finding was based on the fact that, of the actual activities carried on by them at No. 15, part was referable to what can properly be described as “a business,” namely, insurance and building society work. It was in reference to those activities alone that the referee held that the E tenants carried on a trade or business, and that conclusion was affirmed by the county court judge. The other crucial matter was whether or not there was the necessary goodwill, as required by the statute, which would entitle the tenants to make their claim for a new lease or, alternatively, compensation. That issue the referee found against the tenants, but the county court judge took a different view and found that the necessary goodwill was established. Those two issues F must be kept distinct, for, when the findings both of the referee and of the county court judge are examined, it will be found that the first question is very largely a question of fact. The second issue, on the other hand, calls for the solution of a problem of law, namely, what is the relevant goodwill which the Act requires to be established in such a case as the present. The report of the referee, the judgment of the judge, the argument of counsel for the tenants, and the evidence, G were all directed to the question what would be the relevant goodwill in circumstances such as these.

Counsel for the landlords submits that the referee and the judge misdirected themselves in law in holding that it was right to take into account the goodwill of the tenants' business of solicitors as such. That, he said, was based on a wrong construction of the Act. It was, however, argued by counsel for the H tenants that, if a trade or business, as distinct from a profession, is being carried on on certain premises, and it appears that the tenants carry on a profession in addition to the trade or business, then it is sufficient, to establish goodwill, to point to the goodwill attaching to the professional activities without the necessity of any reference to the trade or business activities. Counsel's first argument was that, on the true construction of this Act, the phrase “trade or business” includes a profession such as that of a solicitor. That must depend on the true construction of the document in which it is used and according to its context, and, whereas in some contexts the phrase "business" would, no doubt, include the carrying on of a profession like that of a solicitor, in other contexts such a profession equally clearly is excluded. Therefore, what we have to discover is not some abstract meaning, but the meaning of the phrase "trade or business" when used in the context of this Act.

The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, has as its preamble :

"An Act to provide for the payment of compensation for improvements and goodwill to tenants of premises used for business purposes, or the grant of a new lease in lieu thereof ; and to amend the law of landlord and tenant."

Section 1 of the Act lays down the principle that, in the circumstances mentioned there, the tenant of what is called "a holding to which this Part of this Act applies" is entitled to obtain compensation for improvement which he has made on the demised property. Section 4, provides :

"(1) The tenant of a holding to which this Part of this Act applies shall, if a claim for the purpose is made in the prescribed manner (i) in the case of a tenancy terminated by notice, within one month after the service of the notice on the tenant ; and (ii) in any other case, not more than 36 nor less than twelve months before the termination of the tenancy ; be entitled, at the termination of the tenancy on quitting the holding, to be paid by his landlord compensation for goodwill if he proves to the satisfaction of the tribunal that by reason of the carrying on by him or his predecessors in title at the premises of a trade or business for a period of not less than five years goodwill has become attached to the premises by reason whereof the premises could be let at a higher rent than they would have realised had no such goodwill attached thereto."

There follows a proviso which limits the amount of the compensation to such addition to the value of the holding as was the direct result of the carrying on of the trade or business.

That section relates to compensation in the circumstances mentioned, and the circumstances in which the relevant goodwill is to arise are very strictly and carefully circumscribed. The goodwill in question must be proved by the tenant to have arisen by reason of the carrying on of a trade or business and by reason of it the premises must be capable of being let at a higher rent. The mischief at which these provisions of the Act were aimed, and it is also true of the provisions which deal with compensation for improvements, was the acquisition by the landlord through the activities of the tenant, either by the tenant's improving the property or by his creating a goodwill therein, of the benefit of these improvements or goodwill when the lease came to an end. It was obviously thought by the legislature to be unjust that the landlord should obtain that type of unearned increment on the termination of a lease, and there have been, no doubt, cases where crafty landlords, observing that a tenant had created a very good business and had acquired a goodwill adherent to the premises in that way, deliberately brought the lease to an end or declined to renew it in order to secure the benefit of the increased value to himself.

Section 4 (1) (d) provides :

"The tribunal shall, in determining the amount of compensation for goodwill . . . (ii) disregard any value which is attributable exclusively to the situation of the premises."

Moreover, the very definition of "goodwill" appears to me to exclude the relevance of any personal goodwill attributable to the fact that the business which is said to have attracted the goodwill was being carried on, and owed its prosperity to, the personal qualifications of the person carrying it on. I say that because the Act is contemplating something that will adhere to the premises and will not cease or follow the tenant when he leaves the premises.

Section 5 deals with applications for the grant of a new lease and it applies where it is shown that compensation under s. 4 would not compensate the tenant for the loss of goodwill which he would suffer if he removes to and carries on his trade or business in other premises. In such a case he is entitled, in lieu of claiming compensation, to serve a notice requiring a new lease of the premises, and by sub-s. (2) :

- A "Where such a notice is served the tribunal . . . may, if it considers that the grant of a new tenancy is in all the circumstances reasonable, order the grant of a new tenancy for such period (being a term of years absolute) not exceeding fourteen years and on such terms as the tribunal may determine to be proper . . ."

Sub-section (3) provides :

- B "Where the tenant is the applicant, the grant of a new lease under this section shall not be deemed to be reasonable (a) unless the tenant proves that he is a suitable tenant and that he would be entitled to compensation under the last foregoing section . . ."

- C The matters, therefore, which have to be established in order to qualify the tenant for a new lease are, to begin with, those which would qualify him to compensation, and that throws him back, in considering whether or not he is entitled to a new lease, to the question : Is he or is he not entitled to compensation ? I now come to s. 17. The initial importance of this section is this. As I have pointed out, s. 1, dealing with improvements, and s. 4, dealing with goodwill, relate to cases where the applicant is the tenant of a holding to which this Part of the Act applies. That makes it necessary to show what are the holdings to which this Part of the Act applies, and that is provided in s. 17 (1) in these words :

"The holdings to which this Part of this Act applies are any premises held under a lease . . . and used wholly or partly for carrying on thereat any trade or business . . ."

- E Therefore, before the tenant can have any status to make a claim he has to show that he is the tenant of a holding within that definition, and that definition includes the qualification that the premises must be used wholly or partly for carrying on thereat a trade or business. Counsel for the tenants suggested that the only use of this section was to define a holding and it was not intended to be a definition of a tenant, but that seems to me to be an argument which is not maintainable for the reason that, before the tenant can have a locus standi to make an application, he must allege and prove he is the tenant of a holding, and, unless he can show that the holding of which he is a tenant comes within the definition of s. 17 (1), his application does not begin to get on its feet.

The next part of that section which I need read is part of sub-s. (3) :

- G "For the purposes of this section, premises shall not be deemed to be premises used for carrying on thereat a trade or business (a) by reason of their being used for the purpose of carrying on thereat any profession . . . Provided that, so far as this Part of this Act relates to improvements, premises regularly used for carrying on a profession shall be deemed to be premises used for carrying on a trade or business."

- H Then by sub-s. (4) :

"In the case of premises used partly for purposes of a trade or business and partly for other purposes, this Part of this Act shall apply to improvements only if and so far as they are improvements in relation to the trade or business."

I have said that the meaning of the phrase "trade or business" must depend on the particular context in which that expression is found, and, to my mind, if there is anything that the language of this section shows beyond any possibility of question, it is that the legislature is contemplating a distinct and important difference between a trade or business and a profession. It is left to the tribunal to say whether a particular activity falls within one category or another. In all cases where it is essential for the administration of the Act to decide whether an activity falls into one or the other category, that is a task which the tribunal has to perform, and, although there may be difficult cases, in general any person with a reasonable knowledge of affairs would not have much difficulty in saying what the legislature intended in regard to some particular activity. In a case where the context shows a distinction between a trade or business, on the one hand, and a profession, on the other, I should think it would require a very bold man to say that a solicitors' practice is to be put into the "trade or business" class and excluded from the professional class. It is quite clear from the context that the legislature is not contemplating that a particular activity would be in both. Therefore, in most cases people would be able to answer the question whether a particular activity fell within the professional class or within the trade or business class. It appears to me to be very reasonable that the legislature should have drawn the distinction, which I shall show it has drawn, between professions and trades or businesses, for the reason that to many minds the conception of a profession excludes altogether the idea of a goodwill adherent to premises which will be annexed by the landlord of the premises when the professional man's tenancy comes to an end. A professional man is selected for employment by reason of his professional skill. His position is not like that of the keeper of a shop where a trade or business is carried on. I am not saying there may not be things which can properly be called a profession where something in the nature of an adherent goodwill can be found, but in the case of a solicitors' profession I should have thought the very idea of a goodwill adherent to the premises, as distinct from the goodwill of the firm carrying on the profession, would be a novel one which the legislature could scarcely have contemplated. I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the carrying on of this solicitors' business is not the carrying on of a trade or business within the meaning of that phrase in this Act of Parliament.

The greatest stress was laid on the second argument. It was to this effect. Assuming that "trade or business" does not include a profession, yet, if you find that something which may properly be called a trade or business is carried on on the premises as well as a profession, then, in ascertaining whether or not there is such a goodwill as the Act contemplates as entitling the tenant to compensation or a new lease, one is entitled to bring into account any goodwill which is shown to be adherent to the premises although it arises from the carrying on of the profession. In other words, once you have established that the activities carried on comprise a trade or business, then, if you can show that a goodwill has attached to the premises by reason of any of those activities, even if it is referable to the professional side of them, that is enough. With all respect to that argument, I do not accept it. It seems to have been the argument which was accepted by the referee and it is, undoubtedly, the argument on which the judgment of the learned county court judge is based. The contrary view is that where it is shown that a trade or business in the statutory sense is carried on and that a profession is also carried on, the only relevant goodwill for the purpose of the Act is the goodwill referable to the activities comprised within the trade or business to the exclusion of such goodwill, if any, as may be attributable to the carrying on of the profession.

The submission of counsel for the landlords on the first of the two points which I mentioned as being found in the report and the judgment under review was that, on the evidence, it was not open to the county court judge to find that the activities in connection with the insurance and building society agencies, constituted the carrying on of a trade or business because they were merely small minor matters incidental to the carrying on of a solicitors' business, the sort of activities which many solicitors carry on as an off-shoot of their strictly professional business. We took the view that it was not desirable to examine that submission until we had considered the basis of the judgment on the second point to see whether there was a misdirection in law by the learned judge as to the finding of goodwill. On the assumption that the first of the points I have mentioned is in counsel for the tenants'

- A favour, and assuming that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that a separate severable trade or business, as distinct from the profession of a solicitor, was being carried on by the tenants on the premises, counsel's argument was that, once that is established, it becomes irrelevant to look for an adherent goodwill referable only to the activities which are properly described as a trade or business and it is sufficient to show goodwill generally
- B without showing that to any extent it flows from the trade or business activity as distinct from the profession. I do not propose to go through the referee's finding or the judge's judgment where that is dealt with. I think I am doing no injustice to either of them if I say that they accepted that argument. The only evidence before the referee, so far as it related to goodwill, related to the
- C goodwill of the solicitors' part of the business, or, perhaps, goodwill relating to the whole of their activities without any attempt to refer any goodwill to that part of their activities properly (as I assume) described as the carrying on of a trade or business. It is pointed out that, on the true construction of s. 17 (1), the holdings to which the Act applies include premises used wholly or partly for carrying on thereat any trade or business. What that appears to mean is this. Once you have shown that a trade or business has been carried
- D on on the premises, you are not to have your claim for compensation or a new lease defeated by having it pointed out to you that, in addition to the trade or business, you are doing something else there. A very common class of case is where you have a shop and dwelling rooms over it. It is not to be said that a tenant is not entitled to compensation when the lease of his shop comes to an end merely because the demised premises include the dwelling rooms.
- E The language is wide enough to cover the case where, in addition to a trade or business, the tenant carries on a profession, and, on the assumption on which I am acting, namely, that the non-solicitor activities carried on are properly called a trade or business, this is one of such cases.

The next stage which was taken by the judge and which was put forward by counsel for the tenants is one which I cannot accept. It related to what it is possible to include as relevant goodwill, once you get, so to speak, a mixture, partly trade or business and partly a profession. It is possible, it is said, to lump them both together, and, once you can find as a result of those combined activities there is a goodwill, then you can give the relief which the Act allows without establishing that there is a goodwill referable to the trade or business, and the trade or business alone. I will again read s. 17 (3) :

- G "For the purposes of this section, premises shall not be deemed to be premises used for carrying on thereat a trade or business (a) by reason of their being used for the purpose of carrying on thereat any profession."

That seems to me to have a double effect. First of all, if what you are doing is carrying on a profession and nothing else, you cannot use that fact to establish

H the necessary proposition that you are carrying on a trade or business. It also means that you must not use the fact that you are carrying on a profession to assist you in your necessary and vital assertion that you are carrying on a trade or business, and it is to be observed that it is only in respect of the carrying on of a trade or business that relevant goodwill arises. When you look back at s. 4 (1), what has to be proved to the satisfaction of the tribunal is that, by reason of the carrying on by the tenant of a trade or business, goodwill has become attached to the premises. I ask myself: How is that to be applied in a case where the tenant is carrying on two activities—one a trade or business and the other a profession? How can he show what the section requires him to show, namely, that, by reason of the carrying on of a trade or business, goodwill has become attached to the premises, otherwise than by proper evidence on which a court and the judge of fact can, so to speak, dissect his activities and ascertain what adherent goodwill is referable to the trade or business as distinct from adherent goodwill, if any, referable to the profession? It seems to me it flies in the teeth of the very language of s. 4 to introduce into the goodwill which you are seeking a goodwill attributable to anything but the carrying on of a trade or business. The proviso to s. 17 (3) appears to carry that argument home if it was necessary to rely on it, but I do not think it is:

“Provided that, so far as this Part of this Act relates to improvements, premises regularly used for carrying on a profession shall be deemed to be premises used for carrying on a trade or business.”

That makes it clear that, although the carrying on of a profession is excluded from the Act for all relevant purposes, yet it is brought into the Act by the proviso for the sole purpose of compensation for improvements to the premises and it extends to the tenant whether or not he carries on a trade or business in addition to his profession. Although he may have premises solely used for carrying on a profession, it would appear that the proviso entitles him to claim compensation for improvements which he makes. If he is carrying on a mixed activity and makes an improvement—perhaps solely for the purpose of his profession—he still would be entitled to claim for it, but the very fact that it is necessary to include a reference to the carrying on of a profession for the purpose only of dealing with improvements appears to add force to the argument that the profession must not be brought in when ascertaining compensation for the loss of goodwill or considering the grant of a new lease. In my opinion, therefore, the county court judge, in basing his judgment on the view that there was an adherent goodwill referable, at any rate, to the solicitors' part of the profession without attempting to discover whether or not there was any adherent goodwill referable to the non-solicitors' part of the business, namely, the insurance and so forth, misdirected himself in law and his finding cannot stand.

That, however, does not dispose of this appeal. Counsel for the tenants says that, if he is wrong in this contention, we ought not to ascertain what the true finding of fact was on the right basis of law, but our proper course would be to send the matter back for a new trial with a direction as to the true proposition of law on which the finding of fact should be based. We took the view that that argument would probably be sound if, on an examination of the evidence, there was evidence on which the judge, if he had properly directed his mind to the question of fact whether there was an adherent goodwill referable to the trade or business alone, could have so found. In such circumstances, I think, it would be a case for a new trial because it would raise a question of fact proper to be decided by the county court judge and no one else. On the other hand, we took the view that, if the evidence was such that it would not in law have been open to the county court judge to have found the existence of such a limited adherent goodwill, then we ought not to send the matter back because, obviously, if he had properly come to such a conclusion of fact when there was no evidence to support it, an appeal to this court would have resulted in the setting aside of his judgment. Counsel ingeniously argued that on a second attempt he might be able to do better in the matter of evidence, but I do not think that that argument ought to prevail. When the case was heard, the tenants presumably brought forward their best case and their best evidence. If the evidence which they brought forward would not have supported in law the necessary finding of fact, they would have failed, and to accede to counsel's argument would be, in effect, to give him two shots. In deciding whether or not we ought to grant a new trial, we ought to examine the evidence as it was given in the court below and see whether on that evidence it would have been permissible in law for the county court judge to have come to the necessary finding of fact. We have been through the relevant parts of the evidence and they entirely failed to establish any such severable and recognisable goodwill attributable alone to what I am assuming are the trade or business activities as distinct from the professional activities. In my opinion, the attempt that the tenants have made to get the benefit of this Act breaks down both on the facts and on the law. The appeal

A must be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree.

DENNING, L.J. : It is plain that the use of premises for professional purposes is not sufficient to found a claim for compensation or a new lease. The reason is obvious. The goodwill of the partners of a professional firm does not, as a rule, adhere to the premises on which they carry on their practice. It depends on their own personal qualities, on their reputation with their clients, and their name and connections. It does not depend on their precise address. In a few cases where the situation comes into it—as in the case of a solicitor who has offices opposite a police court—there may be a goodwill attached to the premises, but it is exclusively attributable to the situation of the premises. It was, no doubt, for reasons such as these that the legislature expressly excluded premises used for professional purposes from claims on the ground of goodwill. Of course, if on part of the premises a professional man carried on a separate trade or business, distinct from his profession, and in respect of that he had built up a separate adherent goodwill, he could claim compensation or a new lease on that account, but nothing of that kind appears here. It was suggested that the firm had a separate trade or business as agents for a building society, but, even assuming that they had, there was no evidence that there was any goodwill attaching to the premises on that account. An attempt was made to make up the deficiency by bringing in the goodwill of the solicitors as such, but that is not permissible. The only relevant goodwill is the adherent goodwill of the separate trade or business, and there was no evidence of any such goodwill. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs in both courts. Application for a new lease or for compensation for goodwill dismissed.

G TOWER CABINET CO., LTD. v. INGRAM.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Lynskey, JJ.), April 27, 28, 1949.]

Partnership—Partner—Person “holding out”—Debts incurred after dissolution—Liability of retiring partner—Unauthorised use of retiring partner's name—Partnership Act, 1890 (c. 39), ss. 14 (1), 36 (1), (3).

H The Partnership Act, 1890, s. 14, provides : “ (1) Every one who by words spoken or written or by conduct represents himself, or who knowingly suffers himself to be represented, as a partner in a particular firm, is liable as a partner to any one who has on the faith of any such representation given credit to the firm, whether the representation has or has not been made or communicated to the person so giving credit by or with the knowledge of the apparent partner making the representation or suffering it to be made.” Section 36 of the Act provides : “ (1) Where a person deals with a firm after a change in its constitution he is entitled to treat all apparent members of the old firm as still being members of the firm until he has notice of the change. . . . (3) The estate of a partner who . . . not having been known to the person dealing with the firm to be a partner, retires from the firm, is not liable for partnership debts contracted after the date of the . . . retirement . . .

On Apr. 22, 1947, a partnership between C. and I. carrying on business as household furnishers under the name "Merry's" was dissolved by agreement, C. continuing the business under the same name and undertaking to pay I. £3,000 as his share of the partnership. I. gave notice of the dissolution to the firm's bankers and arranged with C. to notify it to those persons who dealt with Merry's, but he did not advertise it, or procure an advertisement of it, in the LONDON GAZETTE. C. procured new notepaper for the purposes of the business, omitting I.'s name from the heading. In Jan., 1948, S., a representative of the T. Co., which had not previously had dealings with Merry's, obtained an order from the new firm of that name, and this order, in breach of the arrangement made with I. and without his knowledge or authority, was confirmed by C. by a letter on headed notepaper which had been in use by the partnership before the dissolution and bore I.'s name as well as C.'s name. On an application by the T. Co. for the issue of execution against I. on a judgment obtained against Merry's for the price of the goods supplied pursuant to the order obtained by S. :

HELD : (i) I. had not represented himself or knowingly suffered himself to be represented as a partner in Merry's within s. 14 of the Act of 1890 and his negligence or carelessness in not seeing that all the notepaper of the partnership firm had been destroyed when he left the business did not bring him within the terms of that section.

(ii) the words "apparent members" in s. 36 (1) referred to persons who appeared to be members to the person dealing with the firm, and, as the T. Co. had no knowledge of I.'s connection with Merry's except by the unauthorised use of notepaper bearing I.'s name after the dissolution, they were not entitled by s. 36 (1) to treat I. as a partner.

Farrar v. Definne, (1843) (1 Car. & Kir. 580; 2 L.T.O.S. 401), considered.

(iii) I. was not known to the T. Co. as a partner before the date of the dissolution of the partnership, and, therefore, under s. 36 (3) he was not liable for debts contracted with the T. Co. after that date.

APPEAL from a decision of a master on the trial of an issue under R.S.C., Ord. 48, r. 8.

The respondents, the Tower Cabinet Co., Ltd., obtained judgment against a firm called "Merry's," and applied for leave to issue execution under Ord. 48, r. 8, against the appellant, S. G. Ingram, as a member of the firm. The appellant disputed liability and it was directed that the issue of liability be tried by a master. Master Grundy held the appellant liable, and the appellant now appealed under Ord. 54, r. 22A, to the Divisional Court, who reversed the decision. The facts appear in the judgment of LYNKEY, J.

J. F. Donaldson for the appellant, Ingram.

Behrens for the respondents, the Tower Cabinet Co., Ltd.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: LYNSKEY, J., will give the first judgment.

LYNSKEY, J.: The respondent company, the Tower Cabinet Co., Ltd., claimed from Merry's, who in the writ were described as "sued as a firm," the sum of £323 17s. for the price of six suites of furniture sold and delivered.

- A Judgment was obtained, and the company then sought to render a Mr. S. G. Ingram liable for the debts of Merry's. They alleged that he was liable, first, under s. 14, and, secondly, under s. 36, of the Partnership Act, 1890. The matter was referred for trial before Master Grundy, the issue being whether Mr. Ingram had represented himself to be, or knowingly suffered himself to be represented to be, a partner under s. 14, or was liable under the provisions of s. 36 as a partner.

The facts found by the learned master were that in January, 1946, Mr. A. H. Christmas and Mr. Ingram commenced together to carry on business in partnership as household furnishers under the name of Merry's at Silver street, Edmonton. The partnership was registered under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, as being carried on by Mr. Christmas and Mr. Ingram. That partnership subsisted until Apr. 22, 1947, on which date the parties agreed to dissolve it. The master was satisfied that there was a dissolution of this partnership in April, 1947, and that Mr. Ingram had given notice to the firm's bankers that he had ceased to be a partner in the business carried on in the name of Merry's. From then until some time in May, 1948, Mr. Ingram had no connection with the partnership except that Mr. Christmas had agreed to pay

- C him for his share of the partnership a sum of some £3,000, and by May, 1948, about £1,000 had been paid by instalments. Mr. Ingram was not professionally represented at the time of the dissolution. He arranged with Mr. Christmas to notify those dealing with the firm that he (Mr. Ingram) had ceased to be connected with it, but he did not advertise or procure the advertisement in the LONDON GAZETTE of the fact that he had ceased to be a member of the firm.
- E After his cessation of membership, new notepaper was printed for use in the future business of the firm. While Mr. Ingram had been a partner, the notepaper had been headed "Merry's" and thereunder had borne the names: "A. H. Christmas and S. G. Ingram," indicating that they were both partners. After the dissolution the name "Merry's" appeared on the new notepaper, and "A. H. Christmas, Director," apparently as being the person responsible for
- F the running of the business.

In January, 1948, Mr. Christmas, or Merry's, were approached by the Tower Cabinet Company through their representative, a Mr. Harold Selbey, who obtained an order for six suites of furniture. He reported the order to one of the directors of the company, Mr. Jack Smead, who telephoned to Merry's and asked for a director in order to secure confirmation of the order. It is not

- G clear to whom he spoke. In pursuance of that conversation, a letter was written in the form of an order, and dated Jan. 5, 1947, in mistake for Jan. 5, 1948. That order form read: "Merry's, A. H. Christmas, S. G. Ingram. Household Furnishers. To Tower Cabinet Co., Ltd. Please supply six light bedroom suites . . . 168 units on delivery." It was signed by Mr. Christmas as the manager. That order or confirmation was given on the notepaper which had
- H been the notepaper of the firm at the time when Mr. Ingram was a member, but Mr. Christmas had no authority from Mr. Ingram to use it, and in using it he was acting in direct conflict with the arrangement that he had made with Mr. Ingram that he should notify people that Mr. Ingram was no longer interested in the firm.

In May, 1948, Mr. Ingram was worried about the state of the business, and he came to try and see if he could resuscitate it in order to salvage his share in the previous partnership. He seems to have put some £300 into the business, and to have endeavoured to take control again. A letter was written by Mr. Christmas to the company in May, 1948, saying :

“ Dear Sirs, I wish to advise you that as from today I am no longer connected with the above business. Mr. S. G. Ingram is now sole proprietor and responsible for all outstanding debts. Yours faithfully, (signed) A. H. Christmas.”

According to the evidence of Mr. Ingram, that letter was written without his knowledge and without his authority and he had no idea it was being sent, but it is not of any great materiality from the point of view of the questions which we have to decide in this case. It is clear on the master's finding that in January and February, 1948, when the goods were ordered and delivered Mr. Ingram was not in fact a partner in this business. The question is whether the company are able to make him liable as a partner by reason of the provisions of the Partnership Act, 1890, dealing either with holding out or with failure to give notice when a partnership has ceased and credit has been given to the partnership firm as if the outgoing partner were still a partner.

Section 14 of the Act of 1890 provides :

“(1) Every one who by words spoken or written or by conduct represents himself, or who knowingly suffers himself to be represented, as a partner in a particular firm, is liable as a partner to any one who has on the faith of any such representation given credit to the firm, whether the representation has or has not been made or communicated to the person so giving credit by or with the knowledge of the apparent partner making the representation or suffering it to be made.”

Before the company can succeed in making Mr. Ingram liable under this section, they have to satisfy the court that Mr. Ingram, by words spoken or written or by conduct, represented himself as a partner. There is no evidence of that. Alternatively, they must prove that he knowingly suffered himself to be represented as a partner. The only evidence of Mr. Ingram's having knowingly suffered himself to be so represented is that the order was given by Mr. Christmas on notepaper which contained Mr. Ingram's name. That would amount to a representation by Mr. Christmas that Mr. Ingram was still a partner in the firm, but on the evidence and the master's finding that representation was made by Mr. Christmas without Mr. Ingram's knowledge and without his authority. That being the finding of fact, which is not challenged, it is impossible to say that Mr. Ingram knowingly suffered himself to be so represented. The words are “ knowingly suffers ”—not being negligent or careless in not seeing that all the notepaper had been destroyed when he left.

The company also rely on s. 36 which provides :

“(1) Where a person deals with a firm after a change in its constitution he is entitled to treat all apparent members of the old firm as still being members of the firm until he has notice of the change. (2) An advertisement in the LONDON GAZETTE as to a firm whose principal place of business is in England or Wales, in the EDINBURGH GAZETTE as to a firm whose principal place of business is in Scotland, and in the DUBLIN GAZETTE as to a firm whose principal place of business is in Ireland, shall be notice as to persons who had not dealings with the firm before the date of the dissolution or change so advertised. (3) The estate of a partner who dies, or who becomes bankrupt, or of a partner who, not having been known to the person dealing with the firm to be a partner, retires from the firm, is not liable for partnership debts contracted after the date of the death, bankruptcy, or retirement respectively.”

It is really on the construction of those three sub-sections of that section that this case turns. That section has not been the subject of construction, so far as we have been informed, by any court. It is said by counsel for the company that sub-s. (1) deals with the case in which it appears to the world that a man is still a partner in a firm and notice must be given before his liability as a retiring partner can cease. Secondly, he says that sub-s. (2) equally applies to the position of a partner when it is apparent to the world that he was a partner.

Referring to the old authority of Farrar v. Deftinne (1), counsel for the company says that the distinction has to be drawn between what are described by CRESSWELL, J., in that case as notorious partners of the partnership and partners who are "profoundly secret" members of the partnership. Counsel says that this section, being in a codifying Act, re-enacts the law as it existed in 1843 and later. It should be noticed that even in Farrar's case (1) CRESSWELL, J., laid considerable emphasis on the question of actual notice. He said (1 Car. & Kir. 580):

"Todd and the defendant were once in partnership, but they have not been so since the year 1837. The plaintiff dealt with the firm during the partnership, and he continued to do so afterwards; and the question is, whether the defendant is liable in respect of such subsequent dealings now that the partnership is dissolved. The law stands thus: If there had been a notorious partnership, but no notice had been given of the dissolution thereof, the defendant would have been liable. If there had been a general notice, that would have been sufficient for all but actual customers; these, however, must have had some kind of actual notice. If the partnership had remained profoundly secret, the defendant could not have been affected by transactions which took place after he had retired; but if the partnership had become known to any person or persons, he would be in the same situation, as to all such persons, as if the existence of the partnership had been notorious. The question for you, therefore, is, was this partnership actually known to the plaintiff, either by general report, or by direct communication? Because, if it were, and he did not know, either from notice of the fact, or from surmise, that the dissolution had taken place, you must infer that he still dealt on the faith of the partnership, and the defendant will therefore be liable."

It is said by counsel for the company, who seeks to adopt this judgment in his favour, that s. 36 (1) and (2) are dealing with what are described in the judgment as "notorious" partnerships, and sub-s. (3) is dealing with cases of "profoundly secret" partnerships. Looking at the Act itself, I find difficulty in adopting that suggested construction. The words of sub-s. (1) are:

"Where a person deals with a firm after a change in its constitution he is entitled to treat all apparent members of the old firm as still being members of the firm until he has notice of the change."

The point depends, in my view, on what is the meaning in sub-s. (1) of "apparent members." Apparent to whom? Does it mean apparent to the whole world, or notorious, or does it mean apparent to the particular person with whom the section is dealing? In my reading of that sub-section, "apparent members" means persons who appear to be members to the person who is dealing with the firm, and they may be apparent either by the fact that the customer has had dealings with them before, or because of the use of their names on the notepaper, or from some sign outside the door, or because the customer has had some indirect information about them. Both sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2), in my view, deal with cases where they are apparent members.

Sub-section (3) again deals with the particular individual. It does not deal with the public at large. Its words are, to my mind, simple and obvious. It does not deal merely with questions of apparent members or non-apparent members. It applies the test: ". . . a partner who, not having been known to the person dealing with the firm to be a partner . . ." Whether he was to other people an apparent partner, or whether he was a dormant partner, the words seem to me to be equally applicable. If the person dealing with the firm did not know that the particular partner was a partner, and if that partner retired, then, as from the date of his retirement, he ceases to be liable for further debts contracted by the firm with that person. The fact that later the person dealing with the firm may discover he was a partner seems to me to be irrelevant, because the date from which the sub-section operates is the date of the dissolution. If the person who subsequently deals with the firm had no knowledge prior to the dissolution that the retiring partner was a partner, then sub-s. (3) comes into operation, and, in effect, relieves the person retiring from liability.

It is said by counsel for the company that the company did know that Mr. Ingram was a partner because the order for the goods contained a statement to the effect, or, apparently, to the effect, that he was a partner of the firm. In my view, that document, which only came into existence in January, 1948, was, no doubt, a representation by Mr. Christmas that Mr. Ingram was a partner at that particular date. That representation was untrue. He was not a partner at that date, and it seems to me one cannot draw the inference that that gave the company knowledge that, in fact, Mr. Ingram had been a partner prior to the date of his dissolution of the partnership in April, 1947. Even if it did give such notice, in my view, the section had already commenced to operate, and it would not avail, subject to s. 14 dealing with holding out, to render Mr. Ingram liable.

The result is that, in my view, the learned master was not correct in his view of the effect of the sub-section or of the decision which he quoted. In my view, it is established that the company had no knowledge that Mr. Ingram was a partner prior to the date of the dissolution. That being so, Mr. Ingram is brought directly within the words of sub-s. (3), and is, therefore, under no liability to the company in respect of the debts subsequently incurred by Mr. Christmas at a time when he was not a partner. This appeal ought to be allowed.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : I agree. I need only add that, in my opinion, the words "all apparent members" in s. 36 (1) mean all members apparent to the person dealing with the firm. Secondly, I think sub-s. (3) exactly applies to the facts of this case, and I can see no good reason for holding that it only applies to the case of a dormant partner. I think that the Act, which is a codifying Act, intends in this section to incorporate the law, except with regard to the notice in the LONDON GAZETTE, which was new, laid down by CRESSWELL, J., in Farrar v. Deffinne (1), to which my brother has referred, or, at any rate, to adopt the statement of law which he there lays down when he told the jury that the question for them was: "Was this partnership actually known to the plaintiffs, either by general report, or by direct communication?" I feel convinced that the true construction to put on this section is that there must be actual knowledge which may be acquired either because of the fact that it is notorious, or because it has been directly communicated, but it is not enough to say that other people knew. The fact may be so notorious that a jury would be justified in finding that the person did know a certain fact, but it does not follow because other people know it that he knew it. I think what CRESSWELL, J., meant in that case was that the jury must be satisfied that there was actual knowledge, which might be gained from either one of two sources.

BIRKETT, J. : I agree.

BAREFOOT v. CLARKE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ., and Wynn-Parry, J.), April 12, 1949.]

Debt—Committal—Need of evidence as to means—Debtors Act, 1869 (c. 62), s. 5 (2).

A Section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, provides : " Subject to the provisions hereinafter mentioned, and to the prescribed rules, any court may commit to prison for a term not exceeding six weeks, or until payment of the sum due, any person who makes default in payment of any debt or instalment of any debt due from him in pursuance of any order or judgment of that or any other competent court. Provided . . . (2) That such jurisdiction shall only be exercised where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the person making default either has or has had since the date of the order or judgment the means to pay the sum in respect of which he has made default, and has refused or neglected, or refuses or neglects, to pay the same."

B On Oct. 20, 1948, judgment was entered against the debtor in the county court for £20 and costs, but nothing was paid under that order. The judgment creditor thereupon took out a judgment summons. At the hearing of the summons in Dec., 1948, the debtor stated that she was without means and that her husband would not pay the debt. The court disbelieved the debtor's evidence, and, acting on the assumption that she would be allowed some money by her husband to spend on herself apart from money for necessities, made a committal order, providing that the order was to be suspended so long as the debtor paid instalments of £2 every 28 days.

C HELD : committal was a punishment for the proved offence of dishonestly using for other purposes funds which a debtor had available to meet either instalments of or, where no instalment order had been made, the total judgment debt ; in the present case, there was no evidence that the debtor had or had had means to pay the instalments ordered ; and, therefore, the order ought to be set aside.

G APPEAL by the debtor against a committal order made by His Honour JUDGE HURST, sitting at Reading County Court, dated Dec. 16, 1948. The learned judge, having previously given the judgment creditor judgment for £20 and costs, made a committal order on the first application of the creditor under a judgment summons issued some two months later. He directed, however, that the order should not be put into force if the debt was paid by instalments of £2 every four weeks. The Court of Appeal allowed the debtor's appeal. H The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Finer for the creditor.

Behrens for the debtor.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a committal order made on a judgment summons by His Honour JUDGE HURST whereby it was directed that the debtor should be committed to prison for 14 days, but that the said order should not be put into force if the sum of £32 1s. 4d. were paid into court by instalments of £2 every 28 days, the first of such payments to be made on Jan. 16, 1949.

The parties lived in adjoining houses, and the debtor was found to have trespassed and released two budgerigars, the property of the judgment creditor. On Oct. 20, 1948, judgment was given in favour of the creditor for £20 and costs of £11 0s. 4d. On Dec. 16 a judgment summons was taken out, and it came before the learned county court judge who made the order which is appealed against relating to £32 1s. 4d., the original judgment debt and the costs plus a guinea in respect of the costs of the judgment summons. A note made by the judge after the hearing reads :

"I took no notes on the hearing of the judgment summons, and I gave no reason at the time for making the order. I was satisfied that at the previous trial, the defendant [debtor] had deliberately not told the truth when giving evidence. On the hearing of the judgment summons, when the debtor stated that she had no means and that her husband was not interested, I thought from her demeanour that she did not intend to pay the debt and I was not prepared to accept what she said. I assumed that normally she would be given something by her husband to spend upon herself apart from money for necessities, and I, therefore, thought it right in all the circumstances to make an order against her."

This is the type of matter in which this court will not interfere with the county court judge unless it is satisfied that he has not applied the right principle of law. In a matter of this kind I would always assume in a county court judge's favour that he was having proper regard to what had happened at the trial and what he had got to know of the parties, and that it would be unnecessary for him to set out in full and in detail every fact which he took into account in coming to the conclusion that he was satisfied under s. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, that the debtor had the means to pay.

The leading case on the construction of that section is Re Judgment Debtor (1), the judgment in which of LUXMOORE, J., has always been accepted as stating the principles which all courts should apply in cases under the section. The first point which is made in that judgment is that it is unusual to make a committal order on the first judgment summons, or except in respect of default on an instalment order. The learned judge said (51 T.L.R. 525) :

"It is the fact, however, that (as LORD ESHER, M.R., stated in R. v. Judge of Brompton County Court (2) (18 Q.B.D. 217), the section does not enable the judgment creditor to ask merely for an instalment order. Before the judge can make an instalment order he must have before him an application for committal. It is accordingly the practice of the court always to require evidence of means to be filed on a judgment summons, and not to make a committal order on the first application (save in the most exceptional cases : see per LORD ESHER, M.R., in R. v. Brompton County Court Judge (2)), but to give the debtor an opportunity of meeting the judgment by paying instalments adjusted according to his means."

It was common ground between counsel that this is the normal practice in the county court and that the committal order made by the learned judge in the present case on the first application, no previous instalment order having been made, was unusual. The fact that he did make a committal order on the first occasion shows that he took, and, no doubt, rightly took, an adverse view of the debtor and her attitude, but the position when the matter came before the judge was that laid down in a later passage in the judgment of LUXMOORE, J. (ibid.), when he said :

“ Accordingly, before making a committal order it is essential (see the observations of LORD HERSCHELL in Stoner v. Fowle (2) (13 App. Cas. 30)) that the court should satisfy itself that, in respect of the sums for which the committal order is to issue, it can truly be said that since the respective due dates the debtor has had the means of paying them available, but has neglected to use those means for the purpose of paying them. It is obvious that the debtor’s future prospects of payment have no bearing on this question . . . Since the committal is a punishment for the proved offence of dishonestly using for other purposes funds which the debtor had available to meet the unpaid instalments, there is, prima facie, no reason why it should not issue forthwith.”

Those passages refer to instalments, but the principle applies in a case like the present where there has been no previous instalment order.

D

Reading the learned judge’s notes, I am driven to the conclusion that he did not address his mind to the question : “ Am I satisfied that the defendant has dishonestly appropriated to other purposes £32, today or prior to this date since the judgment, in the eight weeks that have elapsed since the order was made ? ” The last sentence in his note makes that plain, because what he was relying on and was entitled to rely on was that the debtor got money from her husband from time to time, and the amount which he assumed she would have available for meeting the judgment debt was indicated by his order that she was to pay £2 a month. If that was the extent of her means, that would only have produced some £4 in the two months that had elapsed since the date of the judgment. For these reasons, I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge did not apply the law laid down in the judgment of LUXMOORE, J., and that the appeal should be allowed.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I agree. I am not unmindful of the circumstances in which learned judges of the county court have to deliver judgment on judgment summonses, but, nevertheless, this is a case in which the judgment creditor elected to invoke the jurisdiction of the Debtors Act, 1869, in order to recover her judgment. The liberty of the subject is at stake, and we are bound to look with strictness at all that has been done on the summons. I do not desire to repeat what has already fallen from my Lord. The order made being unusual in its character, I cannot accept that the learned judge applied his mind to the point which is essential in these cases, as laid down by LUXMOORE, J. The result is that I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : I agree that this appeal, which has in it no merits, must succeed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), April 13, 1949.]

Costs—Taxation—Payment by trustee according to published and accepted scale—Shorthand writers' fees—Allowance on taxation.

C
A matter came before UTHWATT, J., by way of originating summons issued by the Public Trustee as trustee of the will of R., and was heard by him on Oct. 12, 24 and 30, 1945. On Oct. 30, 1945, it was ordered, inter alia, "that it be referred to the taxing master to tax as between solicitor and client the costs of the plaintiff and of the defendants of the application including in the costs of the plaintiff the costs of taking a shorthand note of the judgment and of one copy of the transcript thereof." The costs were ordered to be paid out of the estate in the matter of which the application had been made. The charge made by the shorthand writers for attendance on the three days of the hearing and for the shorthand note and the transcript of the judgment was £7 13s. 0d., which was paid by the Public Trustee. On taxation, the taxing master allowed only £5 12s. 0d. The amount £7 13s. 0d. was arrived at with reference to the shorthand writers' published scale of charges, which had shortly before been revised and had been published as the proper charges as from July 1, 1945. The revised scale had been submitted to the Council of the Law Society before publication, and no question had been raised by the council.

HELD: while it might in some cases be proper for a special bargain to be made with the shorthand writer, in the present case the full amount of £7 13s. ought to have been allowed because the Public Trustee could not do otherwise than pay the recognised charge which he had properly undertaken to pay.

[AS TO AMOUNT AND ALLOWANCE OF COSTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, pp. 100-103, paras. 189-193; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Practice and Procedure, pp. 926-958, Nos. 4688-4980.]

SUMMONS to review taxation.

F
The applicant, the Public Trustee, had paid the charges of shorthand writers for attendance at the hearing of a matter in the High Court, for taking notes of the judgment, and for a transcript thereof, according to the published and accepted scale, but on taxation the full amount of the charges was not allowed. VAISEY, J., sent the matter back to the taxing master to vary his certificate, with an intimation that the full amount should have been allowed. The facts appear in the judgment.

Gray, K.C., and F. B. Alcock in support of the summons.

H
VAISEY, J.: The item to which I have to direct my attention is a disbursement of £7 13s. 0d. for the charges of the shorthand writers in respect of which only £5 12s. 0d. has been allowed, a difference of £2 1s. 0d. The action was instituted by originating summons issued on Feb. 13, 1945, which raised certain questions of construction arising out of the will and codicil of the testatrix, Agnes Williamina Duff Robertson. The Public Trustee, as executor of the will, was the plaintiff and the defendants were various beneficiaries thereunder. The matter came before UTHWATT, J., on Oct. 12, 24 and 30, 1945, and on the last day an order was made by the learned judge in which it was (among other things) ordered:

"... that it be referred to the taxing master to tax as between solicitor and client the costs of the plaintiff and of the defendants of the application including in the costs of the plaintiff the costs of taking a shorthand note of the judgment and of one copy of the transcript thereof."

It was finally ordered that such costs, when taxed, be retained and paid by the plaintiff out of the testatrix's estate. On April 17, 1946, the taxing master made his certificate. The costs of the plaintiff were taxed at a total sum of £130 ls. 10d., and the costs of the defendants (as to which no question arises) at various amounts. Included in the £130 ls. 10d. is the sum of £5 12s. 0d., part of a sum of £7 13s. 0d. paid to the shorthand writers for their charges.

- A In his answers to the plaintiffs' objections the taxing master refers to the fact that the Institute of Shorthand Writers published a new schedule in various legal papers, which he describes, I think a little contemptuously, as something in the nature of an increase of fee by proclamation. There is one point in his observations which seems to me to be of major importance and may possibly afford a solution to the difficulty which has now arisen. The taxing master
- B states, as to the second of the three days to which I have referred, that is Oct. 24, 1945, that the parties attended and were told that the judge was sitting in the Court of Appeal, the case stood over, and the parties went away. On that point either the taxing master was misinformed or he misunderstood the information which had been supplied to him, because I now have a transcript of the hearing before UTHWATT, J., on Oct. 24, 1945, which makes it perfectly plain
- C that it is a complete misdescription of what occurred to say that "the case stood over and the parties went away," the insinuation being that there was no sitting in court at all on that day. The master allowed the sum of £5 12s. 0d., which he considered a fair and adequate figure, being two attendance fees of £2 2s. 0d. each, and £1 8s. 0d. for the transcript. As far as I can understand the matter, it seems to me that on the scale adopted
- D by the taxing master for the purposes of this charge, he would, if he had known the facts, have allowed three attendance fees of £2 2s. 0d. each and £1 8s. 0d. for the transcript, which would have brought the amount to 1s. more than the £7 13s. 0d. claimed.

- The matter of disbursements in a bill of costs seems to me to be one of considerable difficulty. I must always remember that I have no right to interfere
- E with the taxing master's discretion on a mere matter of quantum. But let me suppose a parallel case of the law stationers having announced that they would not copy documents except at a certain rate per folio. What is an unfortunate plaintiff, or other party, or solicitor, to do? He has to procure, in the case supposed, the services of a law stationer, and, although he may think that the law stationers are asking too much, he has really no option but to pay
- F the recognised and appropriate charges. If it be the fact that the charges which have been made in this case by the shorthand writers are according to a recognised scale, what is the plaintiff or other party to do if he requires a shorthand note to be taken of his case and a transcript made? It is very difficult for him to question the propriety of a charge properly made, and if it be the fact that a contractual obligation is imposed on the Public Trustee in this case to pay
- G the advertised, recognised and, if you like (following the expression of the taxing master) the proclaimed charges of the shorthand writers, whatever he may think of their propriety, it seems to me he is in a dilemma. He wants a note taken, and he wants a transcript, and he goes to people who can take the note and who can transcribe the note. Unless he makes a special bargain (the negotiation of which, even if it had been successful, might have added greatly
- H to the costs of the application) I should have thought that he was bound to pay the recognised charge. If that is so, it seems to me that it would be wrong to disallow it on taxation. I must not be taken to be holding, or suggesting, that any and every disbursement by an executor or trustee, however extravagant and improvident, is necessarily and, as it were, automatically to be passed and allowed on taxation, but the disallowance of a disbursement by an executor or trustee (and, particularly, in the case of the Public Trustee) is, in my judgment, a very serious step to take, amounting in fact to a finding that a breach of trust has been attempted. In this case, for example, the effect of the disallowance is, and I think must be, that the Public Trustee has paid away the sum of £2 ls. 0d. improperly and that he must be surcharged accordingly for that amount, with what result to himself and to the estate of his testatrix it is very difficult to appreciate.

Was the disbursement of £7 13s. 0d. in the circumstances proper or improper? Was it reasonable? Was it fair? Or was it extravagant and improvident, made recklessly and without regard to the obligations of an executor to preserve and protect the estate of the testatrix? To answer this question I must examine, not at length, the principle on which the shorthand writers' account was prepared. The position is explained to me in an affidavit sworn by Mr. Herbert George Wilde, the effect of which I may summarise as follows. He states that he is a member of the council of the Institute of Shorthand Writers and has been a member of it for 40 years, having three times been its president. No one can dispute or doubt for one moment the extent and completeness of Mr. Wilde's knowledge of the position. He tells me how the institute was registered under the Companies Acts, some 50 years ago, and that the institute has worked in conjunction with the Association of Official Shorthand Writers, another body which, as an association, was formed in 1937 by arrangement with the Lord Chancellor's Department to undertake official shorthand writing in witness actions. He tells me that the memorandum of association of that body confines itself to that particular work. The work of shorthand writers consists of "official work" and "non-official work." The official work he describes as being of two classes. The fees for the official work have always been fixed by arrangement between the institute, on the one hand, and His Majesty's Treasury, on the other. Then he tells me:

"The fees paid for non-official work are a matter for agreement by the party employing the shorthand writer, but the institute has for many years had a published scale of fees for non-official work which is binding on its members and represents the rates at which they are prepared to undertake non-official work. The fees set out in that scale have always been accepted by clients of members of the institute and have always been allowed on taxation."

He goes into the particulars of the scale which is charged, and he draws attention to the fact that the non-official scale was submitted for comment to the Law Society. The Council of the Law Society considered it, and, as is shown by some exhibited correspondence, the council had no question to raise in regard to it. Thereafter, the scale was published in the usual legal publications. Nobody can doubt that it was brought to the notice of the profession. Although, no doubt, it is always open to anyone who engages the services of a shorthand writer for non-official work to make some special bargain with regard to payment, I think it is fairly obvious that what may be colloquially termed "under-cutting" by any particular shorthand writer would probably be contrary to his obligations to his profession and would not be entertained.

That being the position, I see no objection to what the taxing master has called the "proclamation." It seems to me the only way in which any one who desires to sell his wares, be they the expert transcribing of possibly inaudible observations which are made in court, or whether it be the provision of sheets of foolscap or bottles of ink, the best thing is to tell everybody, as plainly as they can be told, by advertisement or otherwise: "If you want this particular service of this particular profession, this is what you will be expected to pay." The scale here, having been well known for nearly four years, is, I should have thought, the scale which, whether exorbitant or not—and I am not suggesting for one moment that it is exorbitant—people must pay if they want the services to which the scale refers. I do not see what the Public Trustee or a solicitor could do, having ordered the notes to be taken, but pay according to that scale. If the result of this disallowance is to oblige the Public Trustee or a solicitor to defray this surplus out of his own or somebody else's pocket, I think the results are extremely distressing. It seems to me that the non-official scale has been so advertised and brought to the notice of the profession, and has been so generally accepted, that it must be taken to be a contractual charge recoverable by the shorthand writer for his services, apart from any special bargain. In the present case I cannot think that the charge of £7 13s. 0d. is otherwise than one which should be accepted. I ought not to exclude the possibility of cases arising in which there has been an unreasonably slavish adherence to the scale or to say that the discretion of the taxing master is not fully exercisable to check a real case of abuse. It might, for instance, be argued that it was the duty of the trustee or executor, as the case may be, to attempt to make a special bargain in a particular case, but the same consideration must apply to other disbursements. It might in some circumstances be right to surcharge an executor who had paid too much for the foolscap paper, or pens and ink, which he had procured for the purpose of carrying out his duties.

While I have no material before me to show whether the opinion of the taxing master that the increase in the fees charged by shorthand writers is too much, or is putting too heavy a burden on litigants and others, is well founded, I base my decision on the fact that this was really a contractual charge which the Public Trustee was bound to pay because he had no choice. I think the result of it is that the deduction of £2 1s. 0d. was not justified and the matter ought to go back to the taxing master to vary his certificate with that intimation.

Order accordingly. No order as to costs of this application.

Re BIRKIN (deceased). HEALD v. MILLERSHIP AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), May 5, 1949.]

Will—"All nephews and nieces of my late sister L."—Intention of gift to children of L.

By his will, which was in his own handwriting, a testator gave legacies of £200 each to the children of his sister M., the children of his sister G., and the children of his deceased brother A. The testator then provided: "Also I give to the following £100 each free of duty . . . All nephews and nieces of my late sister L." After one charitable legacy, a legacy to each of his two executors and trustees, and certain other legacies to strangers in blood, the residue of his estate was given to his wife and three children equally. At the date of his will there were living the testator's wife and three children, his sister M. and her three children, his sister G. and her two children, the five children of his deceased brother A., his brother F. who had no children, and the five children of his deceased sister L. He also had a half-sister C. who had two children.

HELD: having regard to the will as a whole and to the evidence as to the state of the family at the date of the will, the court was entitled to infer that the word "children" had been omitted from the clause designating the legatees by reference to L. and to read it as making bequests to "all nephews and nieces children of my late sister L."

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the true construction of a bequest to "all nephews and nieces of my late sister L." HARMAN, J., held that the bequest should be read as a gift to the children of L. The facts appear in the judgment.

Rawlence for the plaintiff, one of the executors of the will of Joseph Birkin, deceased.

Tonge for the first, fifth, seventh and eighth defendants, a child of L., and residuary legatees.

Duffy for the second, third, fourth and sixth defendants, a nephew of L., infant children of the testator's half-sister C., and a son of the testator.

HARMAN, J. : When Joseph Birkin, the testator, made his will on Aug. 21, 1946, his wife and three children were living. He had five brothers and sisters, three of whom were living. The first, Millicent, was married to a man named Baxendale and had three children; the second, Gertrude, was married to a man named Watson and had two children; the third, Arthur, was then dead, but he had been married and had had five children; the fourth, Frederick, had no legitimate issue; and the fifth, Elizabeth, was then dead, but she had been married to a man named Millership and had been survived by five children. The testator also had a half-sister Cassandra, very much younger than his own brothers and sisters, who was married to a man named Harrison, and had two children born in the present decade. All the children of the testator's brothers and sisters, and those of his half-sister, were living at the date of the will.

The testator wrote his will with his own hand, and he appointed his son, Joseph William Birkin, and a Mr. Heald to be executors and trustees. He gave each of them £300, and his will continued :

"I give the following pecuniary legacies namely To my nephews in America Ronald and Eric sons of my sister Millicent (Mrs. Baxendale) and Lilian my niece sister to Ronald and Eric now residing in Chicago To my nephews George and Herbert Watson sons of my sister Mrs. G. E. Watson now residing in Schenectady U.S. To my nephews Frank William Philip and Arthur and niece Hilda sons and daughter of my late brother Arthur Birkin . . . To my brother Frederick Birkin the sum of £200 each free of duty."

Therefore, he had dealt with all the children of Mrs. Baxendale, all the children of Mrs. Watson, and all the children of Arthur, and with Frederick, who had no children. There remained unbenefited the children of Elizabeth and of the half-sister, Mrs. Harrison. The will continues in these terms: "Also I give to the following £100 each free of duty . . . All nephews and nieces of my late sister Lizzie (Mrs. Millership)." There is no mention of his half-sister, Mrs. Harrison. He then bequeaths a charitable legacy after the death of his daughter Edith, and specifically devises a house. He gives the residue to his trustees on trust for sale, and bequeaths it in equal shares to his wife and his three children. He died in 1947 and his will has been duly proved.

The question before me is as to the meaning of the words: "Also I give to the following £100 each free of duty . . . All nephews and nieces of my late sister Lizzie." When one considers the circumstances, it is borne in on the mind as a matter of necessary implication that the testator cannot have meant by those words what they appear to say. I decline to believe that when a man intends to benefit his own children he describes them as the nephews and nieces of his late sister. Nor do I believe that the testator, having given £200 each to the children of all his brothers and sisters except Lizzie, when he says "Also" and gives an extra £100 intends to benefit the same nephews and nieces over again. Thirdly, it seems to me ridiculous to suppose that he mentioned his late sister Lizzie merely to give a benefit to her nephews and nieces which he denied to her children. I feel convinced that he was meaning by this bequest to benefit the children of his late sister Lizzie.

- A That would be effective if one word is added so that the provision reads in this way: "All nephews and nieces children of my late sister Lizzie." That makes the bequest congruous with all the bequests to nephews and nieces of £200 which preceded it, because they are described as sons or daughters of a brother or late brother or of a sister. It is true that he does not mention the children of his sister, Lizzie, by name. Instead of that he puts the word
- B "all." That only means, in my view, that he was uncertain of the names of the children of his dead sister Lizzie, and, instead of naming them and risking being wrong, he said "all." There were five of them, and he may well have been uncertain how many there were and what their names were.

The difficulty I feel is that, if I add this word "children," I shall not only be conferring benefit on the children of Elizabeth, but I shall also be cutting out the two infant children of the half-sister Cassandra.

- C I say nothing about cutting out the other nephews and nieces of Elizabeth, because either they are his own children who receive the residue or they have already received £200, and it is, I think, not to be supposed that he intended to give them another £100, so they would not be disappointed of anything to which they could reasonably look. The infant children of his half-sister have much more reason to feel aggrieved, and it is submitted to me with a great deal of cogency by counsel for those interested in setting up the literal construction of the will, that where I find a gift which on the face of it is plain and unambiguous, a gift to a class whose members there is no difficulty in ascertaining, I am not entitled, because of the testator's circumstances, to ignore the words of the will, and by looking outside it to extrinsic circumstances, or, as counsel says (and this seems to me to be much more material) looking to other parts of the will, to find another meaning inconsistent with the words. Counsel argues that members of the class must not be dispossessed, however much one may think that they were not intended to take or that others were intended to take. By so doing, it is said I am, not construing the testator's will but making a new one for him, and that cannot be the function of the Court of Chancery.
- F I agree that I am not entitled to write a new will for the testator. On the other hand, I am entitled to look at the whole of the will which he has written. So, also, I am entitled to know his circumstances and those of his family and those named as beneficiaries at the time when he made his will. That is the kind of extrinsic evidence which is always admissible in construing a will, because no will can be construed without it. If, looking at the whole will and those
- G extrinsic circumstances, I am convinced that A is intended and that B is not, I conceive that, as a matter of construction, I am entitled to read the words rather as they should be than as they are, not in order to make a new will for the testator, but to make his will as I think he intended it, although for some reason some words have dropped out. I do not want to speculate how or why. There are various reasons why it might have been so. Counsel says
- H that this will, taken literally, is not so absurd as it seems to me to be, but I do not accept that submission. I feel no doubt that the testator could not have penned the words with the intention which they appear to bear. It is not a matter so much for cases, it is a question of principle. This has been recently discussed by VAISEY, J., at considerable length in Re Smith (1) where the learned judge took a step bolder than that which I am taking, for in that case there was a doubt, not whether the testatrix intended to benefit her husband, but what benefit she intended to confer on him. The learned judge was convinced that the husband was intended to take an absolute interest, and he so held, although there was no express gift of that kind in the will. It is true that there the judge was dealing only as between the husband and the next of kin. He was not defeating members of a class which on the face of the will was intended to take, but in principle I can see no difference between the two matters. In practice the inference that I draw is more easily drawn than the one which VAISEY, J., drew, because there can be no doubt what the interest intended to be given is, namely, a legacy of £100. In HAWKINS ON WILLS, 3rd ed., pp. 3-6, the whole of the law on this subject is summed up. I adopt the principles on which VAISEY, J., relied in Re Smith (1), and I hold that I am entitled to infer that the word "children" has been omitted by mistake and by implication to read it back into the will.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be taxed and paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

Re THOMAS (deceased). DAVIES AND OTHERS v. DAVIES AND ANOTHER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), March 10, 1949.]

Probate—County court—Jurisdiction—Power to pronounce for validity of will—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), ss. 60 (1), 61.

By s. 60 (1) of the County Courts Act, 1934, where on an application for a grant or revocation of probate, the registrar is satisfied that the personal estate of the deceased is under £200 and the real estate does not exceed £300 "the judge of the county court having jurisdiction in the place of abode of the deceased shall have the jurisdiction of the High Court in respect of any contentious matter arising in connection with the said grant or revocation."

The plaintiffs, as residuary legatees under a will dated May 5, 1943, claimed a pronouncement for that will as against a will purported to have been executed by the testatrix on Aug. 26, 1944, in which the two defendants were named, the one as executor and the other as residuary legatee. At the date of her death the testatrix, whose personal and real estate did not exceed the limits laid down by s. 60 (1), had a place of abode in A. and the parties applied for the action to be tried in the A. county court. The registrar, being doubtful whether a county court had power to pronounce for the validity of a will, referred the matter to the judge.

HELD: provided the requirements of s. 60 (1) as to the value of the estate and the place of abode were satisfied, the county court had jurisdiction, and the case should be transferred to A. county court.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS to determine whether the county court of the area in which the testatrix was residing at the date of her death had jurisdiction to try certain issues arising out of her testamentary dispositions. BARNARD, J., held that the county court had such jurisdiction and directed that the cause be transferred accordingly.

J. E. N. Russell for the plaintiffs, residuary legatees under the first will.

Simon for the defendants, the executors and the residuary legatee under the second will.

A BARNARD, J.: This summons which has been adjourned into court arises out of a probate action concerning the testamentary dispositions of Rachel Thomas, deceased. The personal estate of the testatrix is under £200 and the real estate does not exceed £300. When the testatrix died she had a place of abode within the jurisdiction of the county court of Aberdare, and both the plaintiffs and the defendants desire that the action should be tried in the county court at Aberdare.

The only difficulty with regard to this being done arises from a passage in TRISTRAM & COOTE'S PROBATE PRACTICE, 19th ed., p. 95, which reads as follows :

“ A county court judge has no power to pronounce for the force and validity of a will by decree ; he can only order a grant of representation to issue, or to be revoked (County Courts Act, 1934).”

C It is not inappropriate to look at some later pages in which the jurisdiction of county courts is referred to. At p. 575, where the learned authors are dealing with “ place of trial,” one finds set out the position, where the trial is, first, in Middlesex, secondly, at assizes, and, thirdly, in the county court. Again, at p. 585 dealing with “ notice of trial,” the learned authors refer to the requirements for entry for trial, first, in London, then in Manchester and Liverpool, thirdly, at other assizes, and fourthly, in the county court, and under the heading “ County Court ” there is the following passage :

“ The procedure in probate actions transferred to the county court will be found set out in the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 36.”

E It seems to me that the learned authors of this edition are speaking with two voices.

There can be no doubt that when the Court of Probate came into existence under the Court of Probate Act, 1857, which was followed by the amending Court of Probate Act, 1858, the county court had jurisdiction in all probate matters limited only by the size of the deceased's estate and by the deceased having a place of abode within the jurisdiction of the county court which was to deal with the probate matter. That was the position up to 1925 when the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act was passed. To give an example of that, it is only necessary to refer to one or two cases. In Dunn v. Dunn (1) the headnote is :

G “ Where, in a probate cause, the county court has jurisdiction, the court may, though application be made in behalf of all the parties to the cause for it to be tried at the assizes, still, in its discretion, direct it to be tried in the county court.”

It is clear that the validity of a will was in dispute there and that the will was being attacked on the ground that it was not the will of the deceased, that it was not duly executed, and that the deceased was not of sound mind at the time of its execution. SIR C. CRESSWELL, on an application to direct the issue to be tried at assizes, stated (1 Sw. & Tr. 521) :

“ The personal property may not amount to more than £200. If so, the cause would properly come under the jurisdiction of the county court . . . Although the parties may apply for a cause to be tried at the assizes, I may still consider it a proper one to send to the county court. Before I make any order, an affidavit must be brought in, showing the amount of the deceased's personal property.”

It so turned out in that case when the affidavit was brought in that the estate was above the amount which gave the county court jurisdiction and so the matter was sent to the assizes. There is another decision of SIR C. CRESSWELL in Norris v. Allen (2), the headnote of which is :

"When the judge of the Court of Probate is satisfied that the county court has jurisdiction, he will direct a cause to be tried before the judge of a county court having jurisdiction, and will also direct the papers in the cause to be transmitted to the county court for the purposes of the suit ; but he will give no directions as to the mode in which the cause shall be tried. It will be for the judge of the county court to decide whether the cause shall be tried before him with or without a jury."

In that case the plaintiff was propounding a codicil and the defendant, who was a legatee under the will and adversely affected by the codicil, pleaded several matters on which issue was joined. SIR C. CRESSWELL, in a short judgment, stated (2 Sw. & Tr. 602) :

"You should apply to the judge of the county court to direct the mode in which the cause is to be tried. I cannot give directions for the cause to be tried in any particular manner. I shall only direct that it be tried before the judge of the county court of Northamptonshire, and leave him to decide whether it shall be tried with or without a jury ; and I will also direct the papers in the cause to be transmitted to the county court."

It is necessary to see how the relevant sections of the Court of Probate Acts, 1857 and 1858, were affected by the Judicature Act, 1925. The Judicature Act, 1925, was in substance a consolidating Act and s. 150, provisos (a) and (b), substantially replace s. 59 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, and s. 10 of the Court of Probate Act, 1858. The vital words one has to look at which clothe the county court with jurisdiction are to be found at the end of s. 10 of the Act of 1858 :

". . . the judge of the county court having jurisdiction in the place in which the deceased had at the time of his or her death a fixed place of abode shall have the contentious jurisdiction and authority of the Court of Probate in respect of questions as to the grant and revocation of probate of the will or letters of administration of the effects of such deceased person, in case there be any contention in relation thereto."

Those words are replaced by these in s. 150 (b) of the Judicature Act, 1925 :

". . . the judge of the county court having jurisdiction in the place of abode of the deceased shall have the jurisdiction of the High Court in respect of any contentious matter arising in connection with the said grant or revocation."

I can see no difference whatsoever in the meaning of those two passages. I am satisfied that, if the legislature in 1925—and this equally applies when I come to deal with the County Courts Act, 1934—had any intention of depriving the county court of the jurisdiction which it had possessed during all those years, it would have said so specifically. In point of fact there is no difference in the two sections except merely in the way in which they are worded, the Judicature Act, 1925, putting the matter a little more concisely.

The County Courts Act, 1934, s. 60 (1) and s. 61, replaced provisos (a) and (b) of s. 150 of the Judicature Act, 1925. Section 60 (1) of the Act of 1934 is word for word the same as s. 150 (b) of the Judicature Act of 1925. If there is any doubt as to what the word "contentious" means, and I assume that it meant the same in 1858 as it did in 1925 and 1934 and as it does to-day, it is shown clearly by the judgment of SIR JAMES WILDE in Zealley v. Veryard (3). As counsel for the defendants pointed out, this was only one example of a probate action which was undoubtedly tried by the county court, but SIR JAMES WILDE says (L.R. 1 P.D. 197) :

- A “ In cases within the jurisdiction of a county court, it is competent to the party applying for a grant, or for the revocation of a grant, to go at once to the county court, or if the suit has been commenced in this court, to apply under s. 59 [of the Court of Probate Act, 1857] to have the cause sent to the county court and where ‘ it is shown to the Court of Probate that the state of the property and the place of the abode of the deceased were such as to give contentious jurisdiction to the judge of a county court, the Court of Probate may send the cause to such county court, and the judge thereof shall proceed thereon as if such application and cause had been made to and arisen in his court in the first instance ’ ”
- B I do not think that the position is any different to-day, owing to the passing of the Judicature Act, 1925, and the County Courts Act, 1934, from what it was in 1857 when the Court of Probate came into existence. I have no doubt that, provided the cause comes within the statute from the point of view of the value of the estate and the place of abode of the deceased, the county court has jurisdiction. It is very right and proper that it should have jurisdiction to deal with estates of small value. It would be putting an intolerable burden on the parties concerned with such estates to compel them to litigate in the High Court. I shall, therefore, make an order directing this cause to be transferred to the county court at Aberdare and the necessary papers in the cause to be sent to the judge of that court.

Order accordingly.

SAMPSON'S EXECUTORS v. NOTTINGHAM COUNTY COUNCIL.

- F [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Lynskey, JJ.), April 28, 29, 1949.)

Acquisition of Land—Compensation—Acquisition after passing of Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, but before appointed day—Agricultural land—No other permitted user practicable—Permanent restriction of development—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), ss. 51 (1), (2), 55 (1), (2), (3).

- G By a compulsory purchase order a local authority was authorised to acquire a piece of land forming part of a field owned by the claimants who claimed £124 as the value of the land in fee simple. At all material times the land was used for agricultural purposes, and it could not practicably have been put to any other use covered by sched. III to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The value of the land for agricultural purposes ascertained by reference to prices current immediately before Jan. 7, 1947, was £17. Before Aug. 6, 1947, the date of the Royal Assent to the Act of 1947, the land had a substantial building value for development as part of a potential building estate, and would have sold readily in the anticipation that planning permission for the development of it and the adjoining land of the claimants would not be indefinitely refused. At the rear of the land, though not immediately contiguous thereto, were a few good class houses, the amenities of which might have been affected if the land was built on. The notice to treat was served on Feb. 27, 1948, after the passing of the Act, but before its coming into force, and, therefore, the compensation for the land had to be assessed in accordance with the provisions of s. 55 of the Act. The local authority contended that the value of the land could not exceed its value for agricultural purposes devoid of any building value, viz., £17. The claimants contended that it was legitimate to have regard to the price that would have been obtained in the open market at the date of the notice to treat, subject to the necessity for obtaining permission to develop under the Act, but on the assumption that such permission would not be indefinitely withheld, and, alternatively, that the "amenity" value of the land should be taken into account.

HELD : (i) the value of the land must be fixed on the assumption that there was a permanent restriction prohibiting the carrying on of any development other than development of the classes specified in sched. III.

(ii) as the land could not practicably be put to any use permitted by sched. III, no compensation was payable in respect of "amenity" or "inducement" value.

(iii) therefore, the claimants were entitled to an award of £17 only.

[FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1947, ss. 51 (1), (2), 55 (1), (2), (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 40, pp. 288, 293, 294.]

CASE STATED by an official arbitrator appointed under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, s. 1 (1), for the opinion of the High Court as to the principles on which the value, subject to the provisions of s. 55 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, of certain land which had been compulsorily acquired by Nottinghamshire County Council should be fixed for purposes of compensation. The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

C. N. Shawcross, K.C., and Lord Vaughan for the claimants, the executors of Walter Sampson, deceased, and owners of the land.

Rowe, K.C., and Squibb for the local authority.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Special Case stated by an arbitrator who was sitting to value a piece of land in the county of Nottingham which is the subject of a compulsory purchase order made by the Nottinghamshire County Council and confirmed by the Minister of Town and Country Planning. The council desire to acquire the site in question for the purpose of erecting an extension to a school. The compensation has to be assessed under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, which provides in s. 2 (2) :

"The value of land shall, subject as hereinafter provided, be taken to be the amount which the land if sold in the open market by a willing seller might be expected to realise . . ."

Since that Act was passed there have been several Acts dealing with town and country planning, and the assessment of compensation has now to be made by the arbitrator with due regard to the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947.

Section 12, which is in Pt. III of the Act of 1947, provides that :

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this section and to the following provisions of this Act, permission shall be required under this Part of this Act in respect of any development of land which is carried out after the appointed day."

The appointed day is July 1, 1948. The Act received the Royal Assent on Aug. 6, 1947, the Bill having been introduced into Parliament in January, 1947. That has a certain bearing on this case because provision is made by

s. 55 (2) that for certain purposes regard shall be had to January, 1947, because otherwise people might, between the time when the Bill was first introduced into Parliament and that when the Act came into force, have changed the use of their land so that it should acquire an enhanced value. By s. 12 (2) "development" under the Act means :

- A " . . . the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land."

In other words, any change in the use of the land is regarded as development. Before any land can now be developed permission must be obtained from the appropriate authority. Section 51, which deals with compensation for compulsory acquisition after the appointed day, provides that :

- B " (1) Any compensation payable in respect of the compulsory acquisition of an interest in land by a government department or a local or public authority within the meaning of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, in pursuance of a notice to treat served on or after the appointed day . . . shall be assessed in accordance with the provisions of that Act as modified by the provisions of this and the three next following sections."
- C

These sections modify the power of the arbitrator to give what a willing seller would obtain in the market irrespective of the provisions of the Act of 1947. Sub-s. (2) provides that :

- D " The value of any such interest shall be ascertained on the assumption that planning permission would be granted under Pt. III of this Act for development of any class specified in sched. III to this Act, but would not be so granted for any other development."

Provision had to be made for the state of affairs which arises in the present case where compulsory acquisition was sought after the passing of the Act in 1947, but before July 1, 1948, when the Act came into force. It is provided in s. 55 that :

- E " (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act shall apply in relation to land compulsorily acquired in pursuance of a notice to treat served after the passing of this Act and before the appointed day as they apply in relation to land compulsorily acquired in pursuance of a notice to treat served after the appointed day ; and sub-ss. (3) and (4) of s. 53 of this Act shall apply in relation to land acquired by agreement in pursuance of a contract made after the passing of this Act as they apply in relation to land acquired by agreement in pursuance of a contract made after the appointed day."
- F

Then sub-s. (2), which is the most material sub-section, reads as follows :

- G " The value of any interest in land which is compulsorily acquired as aforesaid shall be ascertained by reference to prices current immediately before Jan. 7, 1947, and for that purpose the interest shall be deemed to have been subsisting immediately before that day subject to all incidents to which it is subject on the date of the notice to treat, and the land shall be deemed to have been immediately before the said seventh day of January in the same state as it is at the date of the notice to treat."
- H

Sub-section (3) of s. 55 provides :

" Sub-sections (2) to (6) of s. 51 of this Act shall not apply to any interest in land which is compulsorily acquired as aforesaid, but in calculating the value of any such interest it shall be assumed that the land was, at the time of the notice to treat, subject to a permanent restriction prohibiting the carrying out thereon of any development other than development of the classes specified in sched. III to this Act ; and for the purposes of this provision, s. 12 of this Act and the said sched. III shall have effect as if for the references therein to the appointed day there were substituted references to the date of the notice to treat."

As the notice to treat in this case was given on Feb. 27, 1948, the arbitrator has to assess the compensation having regard to the provisions of s. 55. Counsel for the claimants contended that we ought to distinguish between sub-s. (3) of s. 55 and sub-s. (2) of s. 51. Sub-section (2) of s. 51 contains two long provisos. The draughtsman might well have said : The provisos to sub-s. (2) of s. 51 shall not apply. He said the whole sub-section shall not apply, and then went on to say what principle is to be used in calculating the value of the land :

" . . . in calculating the value of any such interest it shall be assumed that the land was, at the time of the notice to treat, subject to a permanent restriction prohibiting the carrying out thereon of any development other than development of the classes specified in sched. III to this Act."

Schedule III is immaterial for the purposes of this case. We are asked to read the words " permanent restriction " as having some sort of an indefinite, temporary, meaning. It is clear that what the section means is that the value of the land must be fixed on the assumption that development will not be permitted. It is to be a permanent restriction, and, if there is a permanent restriction on the development of the land, no development can ever take place. That is the first thing which must be borne in mind. The further provision of s. 55 (3) :

" . . . s. 12 of this Act and the said sched. III shall have effect as if for the references therein to the appointed day there were substituted references to the date of the notice to treat," seems to me to mean no more and no less than that land in respect of which notice to treat has been served cannot be developed without permission after the date of the notice to treat. That restriction is permanent. If the use of the land has been altered between Jan. 7, 1947, and the date of the notice to treat, the arbitrator has then to calculate what the value of the land would have been on Jan. 7, 1947, if used in the way in which it was being used at the time of the notice to treat. The land in the present case was used at that time for agricultural purposes, and the arbitrator has found that the value of the land for agricultural purposes, ascertained by reference to the prices current immediately before Jan. 7, 1947, was agreed at £17. That being so, it seems to me that the sections to which I have referred show that the utmost compensation that can be paid, subject to one matter which I will mention, is £17. That is the agricultural value of the land, and the policy of the Act is that a person who is selling land is not to obtain any increased value which the land might bear because it is what is sometimes called " ripe for development " or may become ripe for development. He may only obtain the value of the land having regard to the use to which it was being put and on the basis that that use will always be made of it. Therefore, I have no doubt that we should answer the first question submitted to us by the arbitrator : " Whether I should as a matter of law award to the claimants the sum of £17," in the affirmative.

It is also argued by counsel for the claimants as a subsidiary point that it would be legitimate " to increase the sum of £17 above referred to by such additional sum as might be paid by the owner of a contiguous or neighbouring property in order to secure control and prevent development of the said land." The plan, which has been made part of the Case, shows that there are some houses in the neighbourhood and there is also the proposed site of a picture palace which was to be erected close-by. Counsel contends that in January, 1947, an adjoining owner—one of the owners of these houses or the proprietor of the cinema—might have been willing to pay some additional sum to get control of the land because it might be an advantage to him. The arbitrator, with regard to that, has found that :

“At all material times the said land was being used for agricultural purposes. It could not practicably have been put to any other use covered by sched. III to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. There are no buildings thereon.”

A

It is plain that, as this land is subject to the permanent restriction in the sense I have described, it must remain as agricultural land. It is said that this land might be brought within the curtilage of a dwelling-house because a dwelling-house might be put up on adjacent land under permission and then this land could be brought within the curtilage of that dwelling-house. I think that that is a fallacy, because once the land, which is at present agricultural land, is brought within the curtilage of a dwelling-house so that it becomes part of the dwelling-house, its use is altered and that is prohibited by s. 12 of the Act. Therefore, the arbitrator should not add anything to the value of the land on this ground. For these reasons, the Case will go back to the arbitrator with the intimations I have mentioned.

C

BIRKETT, J. : I agree.

LYNSKEY, J. : I agree. I would only like to add that by s. 12 (1) any development of land without permission is prohibited, subject to the proviso in sub-s. (2) setting out a number of operations which can take place in relation to land which do not come within the definition of the word “development.”

They only apply to particular types of works including, in one case, alterations in the use of buildings or land within the curtilage of a dwelling house for any purpose incidental to the enjoyment of the dwelling-house.

I entirely agree with my Lord as to the interpretation of s. 55 which, by sub-s. (2), provides that the land must be valued at prices current immediately before Jan. 7, 1947, but subject to the assumption that it was in the condition and subject to incidents that were in being at the date of the notice to treat. Sub-section (3) provides that :

E

“Sub-sections (2) to (6) of s. 51 of this Act shall not apply to any interest in land which is compulsorily acquired as aforesaid, but in calculating the value of any such interest it shall be assumed that the land was, at the time of the notice to treat, subject to a permanent restriction prohibiting the carrying out thereon of any development other than development of the classes specified in sched. III to this Act.”

F

I agree that the land must be valued on the assumption that at the material time there is a permanent restriction prohibiting the carrying on of any development. This being agricultural land, it must be valued on the basis that it is used for agricultural purposes, and an alteration in the use of the land itself, or any building on the land, will not be allowed by those having authority to give permission for such development under the Act.

I want to make it clear that I am not deciding that the subsidiary point taken by counsel must in all cases be ignored. It seems to me that in construing s. 55 (3) one has to have regard to the impossibility of development within the terms of the Act other than development of the classes specified in sched. III. I can imagine cases where there would be a possibility of development of the class specified in sched. III that might render it highly desirable to adjacent owners of similar agricultural land and it might well be that when the land came to be valued it would have a value in excess of its purely agricultural value. It might have an amenity value or, sometimes, what is called an inducement value, and, if such facts existed in the circumstances of the present case, I would be inclined to say that the valuer would have to take notice of it.

The arbitrator, however, has found as a fact that the land could not practicably have been put to any use permitted by sched. III to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and, in view of that finding of fact, this contention of counsel for the claimants fails.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : In dealing with this last point, I meant to confine myself immediately to the facts of this case, and not to give any opinion as to what might happen if any other point is brought up when the facts are different. I quite agree with the observations of LYNKEY, J., on this point. A Case remitted to arbitrator with intimation that award should be limited to £17. Costs to be dealt with by arbitrator.

BALL AND ANOTHER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Evershed and Singleton, L.JJ.), April 26, 27, 28, 1949.]

Negligence—Landlord—Liability—Gratuitous installation of domestic boiler—Boiler in dangerous condition—Tenant's daughter injured by explosion. D

In 1940, the landlords of a dwelling-house, during the tenancy thereof by B., installed gratuitously in the house a new domestic boiler to replace an old one. In February, 1947, owing to the fact that the water system in the house had frozen and that the boiler had not been fitted with a safety valve, the boiler exploded when B.'s daughter, C., had lit it, and C. was seriously injured. According to the evidence, it was the normal practice to fit safety valves on boilers, but there was no hard and fast rule in the matter. In an action by C. against the landlords claiming damages for negligence, STABLE, J., found as a fact that the boiler, as installed, was dangerous, and that its condition was known, or capable of being known, to the landlords. On appeal, E

HELD : (i) where a landlord, at the request of a tenant, entered into premises after they were let to carry out an operation, whether or not it was done gratuitously, the fact that he was the landlord did not absolve him from the duties which would otherwise attach to a contractor, or builder, or any other person called to carry out operations on the premises. F

(ii) although the work of installing the boiler had been negligently done, the boiler was not in the category of things which the law regarded as dangerous per se so as to impose a special degree of duty on those who fitted it, and, therefore, the landlords were not liable to strangers for their negligence in installing the boiler and C. had no cause of action. APPEAL by the defendants, the London County Council, the landlords of a dwelling-house, from a judgment of STABLE, J., dated Nov. 3, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 917, awarding damages to the plaintiff, Miss Ball, a daughter of the tenant, for personal injuries suffered by her as the result of the explosion of a domestic boiler which had been installed in the house by the defendants. The boiler, which was installed during the tenancy, was not fitted with a safety valve, and the explosion occurred when Miss Ball tried to light a fire during very cold weather. STABLE, J., found as a fact that the boiler was in a dangerous condition and that its condition was, or should have been, known to the defendants, and he held them liable in negligence to the plaintiffs, Miss Ball and the tenant, Mrs. Ball. The defendants appealed from this decision, but only pursued the appeal in respect of the order in regard to Miss Ball. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal on the ground that the boiler was not in the category of things which were dangerous per se so as to impose on the defendants a liability to strangers, and, therefore, Miss Ball had no cause of action. The facts appear in the judgments of TUCKER and SINGLETON, L.JJ.

Russell Vick, K.C., and Roderic Bowen for the defendants.
Sutton, K.C., and C. A. Morgan Blake for the plaintiffs.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of STABLE, J., in which he awarded to the first plaintiff, Mrs. Ball, the sum of five guineas and £888 18s. 2d., to the second plaintiff, Miss Ball.

F Mrs. Ball was the tenant of premises, No. 47, Woodberry Grove, Manor House, N.4, which had been demised to her and her husband as joint tenants. At the material time she was the sole surviving tenant, and the London County Council were her landlords. There was no written tenancy agreement between the parties, and it is common ground that the defendants were under no liability to Mrs. Ball for the repair of the premises. In or about 1940 the G defendants, as alleged in the statement of claim,

" . . . without any contractual or statutory obligation so to do, with the consent of the first-named plaintiff and her husband . . . entered upon the said premises and installed in the kitchen thereof an ' Ideal ' boiler and connected the same to the hot water system of the house for the purpose of heating water."

H Then it is alleged :

" In carrying out the said installation the defendants their servants or agents owed a duty to the first-named plaintiff, the members of her family, and all persons entering and being or likely to enter and be within the said kitchen to carry out the same in a proper and workman-like manner and so to instal the said boiler that it would be as safe for the said purpose as reasonable skill and care could make it."

The statement of claim then alleges breaches of that duty and consequential damage to the plaintiffs. All went well with the boiler after it had been installed until Feb. 23, 1947, when at 10.30 a.m. it exploded with the result that Miss Ball suffered injuries.

It is clear from the evidence that the boiler, which was a small "Ideal" boiler used for domestic purposes, had been installed without a safety valve. The reason why it exploded was that, in the severe weather of February, 1947, the water system of the house had frozen up. The fuel supplies were low, and Miss Ball had unwisely—I do not say negligently but in the circumstances, unwisely—attempted to light up the boiler when the pipes in the house were frozen up. The result was that, owing to the absence of a safety valve, the boiler exploded. I think the evidence showed that, in those circumstances, that was a highly probable event, and that, had there been a safety valve, it might not have happened—heat might have thawed the pipes and an explosion might have been avoided. As to the necessity or the desirability of having safety valves, there was some, but not very much, conflict of evidence. Mr. De Groot, the expert witness called for the plaintiffs, said this in chief:

"Q.—Is there anything very extraordinary about it, or would you call it an ordinary domestic hot water system? A.—It is an ordinary domestic hot water system, with one serious omission. Q.—And what is that? A.—And that is the fixing of a safety valve to the boiler itself. Q.—What is the common practice in England with regard to the fixing of safety valves on domestic boilers for heating domestic hot water supplies? A.—It is the usual precautionary measure that is taken."

In cross-examination it was put to him:

"Q.—I do not want to get you involved in questions with other engineers, but I put it to you, quite definitely, that there is no hard and fast rule about there being a safety valve to a boiler of this size in a house? A.—My only answer to that is that some local authorities insist on a safety valve being applied on any type of domestic boiler. There is no hard and fast rule. Q.—There is no hard and fast rule? A.—There is no hard and fast rule. Q.—And it is left to the discretion of the people who put the boiler in as to whether a safety valve is there or not? A.—It is usually left to the fitters themselves. Q.—It is left to the discretion of the fitters? A.—Yes. Q.—With regard to your view after the event, that a safety valve might have stopped this explosion, equally it might not? A.—Well, my view is that almost certainly it would have stopped the explosion."

Mr. Hutson, a chartered surveyor in the employ of the defendants, was called by them. He was asked:

"Q.—Do you express your view as to whether a safety valve was necessary with a boiler of that size or not? A.—I would say that a safety valve is not necessary for a boiler of this size. It is a low pressure boiler with the open expansion pipe that the other witness has referred to. Q.—Does that open expansion pipe lead out of the hot water tank and discharge over the cold water tank? A.—That is so. Q.—That is all inside the house? A.—Yes. Q.—What sort of defect would there have to be in the general pipe system before there would be any excessive pressure? A.—A blockage would be necessary in the flow in the return pipes from the boiler to the hot water tank."

In cross-examination there was put to him the following passage from FOWLER ON DOMESTIC HEATING BOILERS:

"Causes of boiler explosions. By stoppages in the pipes due to freezing of the water, by other taps or valves fixed on the circulation pipes, and by stoppages due to incrustation. To minimise explosions every boiler should be fitted with a small reliable safety valve fixed directly on the boiler by the flow-pipe connections protruding a short distance beneath the top of the boiler, and leaving a space for the accumulation of air."

He was then asked :

A "Q.—As an architect, do you agree or disagree with what Mr. Fowler says in what I understand is a standard work ? A.—I agree with his opinion.
A Q.—You agree with what he says ? A.—Yes, except that there is this. He speaks of the safety valve mounted on the boiler. Safety valves are sometimes mounted some distance from the boiler."

B Mr. Bright was also called on behalf of the defendants. He is a Master of Arts, took the mechanical science tripos at Cambridge, and is an associate member of the Institute of Electrical Engineers and of the Institute of Heating and Ventilating Engineers. He was asked this :

C "Q.—Would you tell my Lord and the members of the jury what your opinion is with regard to the necessity, in an installation of this kind, of having a safety valve ? A.—In small installations of this kind where there are two pipes, flow and return, both of which are capable of relieving any pressure, one through the expansion pipe and one through the hot water tank and again out through the expansion pipe, a safety valve is not necessary."

In cross-examination it was put to him as follows :

D "Q.—I think we are agreed about this, that, if by fitting stop valves at any point in the hot water system you seal the boiler off from the expansion pipe or the intake pipe, or both, it is essential to have a safety valve ? A.—If you are sealing them both, yes. Q.—If both exits are sealed off by frost, is it not equally essential to have a safety valve ? A.—There should either be a safety valve or the fire should not be alight. Q.—So, if there is any likelihood of the sealing off of the pipes by frost and the likelihood E of somebody lighting a fire, a safety valve is an essential precaution. Is that what you are saying ? A.—I would say yes. Q.—It is customary, is it not, to fit safety valves to domestic boilers ? It is a normal thing, is it not ? A.—Close to the boiler."

F In re-examination he made it clear that the practice is very often to fit the safety valve a little way along the pipes and not actually on the boiler itself. We were told, and I think it was agreed, that in fact this type of boiler is supplied without a safety valve because it is required to put dishes and so forth on it, but it is possible to purchase a safety valve to use in connection with it.

G I have referred to that evidence in some detail because I think ultimately it is on that evidence that we have to decide, as a matter of law, whether this boiler, as fitted in 1940, was what is called in law a dangerous thing, so as to impose on the person who fits it or erects it a special and peculiar duty to persons other than those with whom he is in contract or at whose request he is performing the work. As the learned judge stated in his judgment ([1948] 2 All E.R. 918) and as is conceded by counsel for the plaintiffs, the authorities show that, if a house, before it is let to a tenant or sold to a purchaser, is already defective to such an extent as to be a danger to the tenant and his family, or H to the purchaser, the landlord or vendor is absolved from liability. He is not under any duty in law resulting from the defective condition of the premises which he sells or lets. That position is so even if he is himself the person who has put the house into that condition and has knowledge of the dangerous condition in which it is. It follows that, if he is not under any obligation to the lessee or purchaser, equally he is not under any obligation to a stranger who happens to be visiting the premises. In those circumstances it is not necessary to refer to the authorities as a result of which that proposition of law finally emerges. But, says counsel for the plaintiffs, there is no authority which establishes that, once a landlord has let premises or has sold them, if thereafter he goes into those premises at the request of the tenant or the purchaser, the mere fact that he happens to be the landlord or the vendor absolves him from the duties which would otherwise attach to a contractor or builder or any other person who is called in to carry out operations on the premises. I am prepared to accept that as a correct statement of law. There is certainly no authority for the proposition that the immunity which attaches to a landlord as a result of the condition of the premises before a lease continues as some sort of magic protection to him at all times subsequent to the lease. I think, therefore, that it is necessary to look at the actions of the defendants in the present case without having regard to the fact that they happen to have been the landlords, and to see what their duties are, treating them merely as persons who came in, gratuitously it may be, but none the less at the request of the tenant, to carry out an operation on the premises.

With regard to that, one authority, Malone v. Laskey (1), which is binding on this court, was not before the learned trial judge. In that case the defendants were the trustees of a building society who were the owners of certain premises which were let to a tenant and also the owners of the adjoining premises. The plaintiff was the wife of the manager of a company, Witherby & Co., to whom the tenant had sub-let the premises, and at all material times the plaintiff resided on the premises with her husband. The defendants erected and placed on their adjoining premises large engines and plant for the purpose of generating electricity to light their property, and it was alleged that they worked the engines and machinery in such a manner as to constitute a nuisance to the occupiers of the adjoining property; that, by reason of the vibration, the premises in which the plaintiff resided were shaken, and that, in particular, a water tank fixed in the lavatory was rendered unsafe and dangerous to persons using the same; that, in consequence of complaints made by the plaintiff's husband and other occupiers of the premises, the defendants from time to time sent workmen to repair the damage and make the premises safe for habitation; and that the defendants through their workmen executed the repairs in a negligent and improper manner and in such a way as to leave the tank in a dangerous and improper condition for those using the lavatory. Those facts were proved, and that, as a result of the position in which the tank had been left in the lavatory, the plaintiff suffered damage. It is to be observed that counsel for the plaintiff in that case on appeal argued with regard to negligence as follows ([1907] 2 K.B. 146):

"... a heavy article like a bracket, placed at a considerable height above the floor, is a dangerous thing if insecurely fixed, and persons who, like the defendants, place such an article in such a position and neglect to make it secure are responsible for any injury occasioned in consequence to persons whose coming in the ordinary course of things into proximity to the article so placed they ought to have contemplated."

He then quoted certain authorities. Counsel for the defendants, in his reply, put the matter in this way (ibid., 148):

"There are only three classes of case in which the courts have laid down that, apart from any contractual obligation, such an action will lie, and they all turn upon the existence of a duty on the part of the person sought to be made liable. The first is where the act committed amounts to a public nuisance, which is a breach of duty alike to the public and to the person who sustains a particular injury from it. The second is where something that has been called a 'noxious thing' is left in a position in which an unknown person may come in contact with it; the thing so left must, however, fall within the class of noxious things. The third class is where a person, having the control of premises, invites another to come upon the premises."

Those having been the arguments submitted to the court, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover because the defendants owed no duty to her. It is clear from the judgments that the court must have rejected the contention of counsel for the plaintiff that a cistern put in this position could be classified as a noxious thing or dangerous thing, the handling of which by the defendants would impose on them an added obligation to take care. FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in giving his judgment, said (ibid., 154) :

"There was no obligation upon the defendants to do any repairs to the premises, nor was any suggestion to that effect made at the trial. The repairs to the cistern which they in fact did were done by them gratuitously. However, in order to test the plaintiff's case, I will suppose that the defendants did the repairs for reward to them from Witherby & Co. There would then be a contractual relationship between Witherby & Co. and the defendants, and the latter would be bound to exercise reasonable care to see that the work was properly done. If the work was done negligently, the defendants would be liable to Witherby & Co. for the damage done to them by the negligence or done to others under circumstances which involved a liability on the part of Witherby & Co. But that would be purely a liability on the part of the defendants to Witherby & Co., for no rights can be acquired under a contract except by parties to the contract, except in certain special cases having no bearing on the matters before us."

KENNEDY, L.J., stated that he felt more doubt about the question than the other members of the court had felt. None the less, he said, at the end of his judgment (ibid., 156) :

"I accept the finding that the result of the acts of the defendants' servants was to leave the premises in a dangerous condition, and I feel some doubt upon what certainly appears to me to be a difficult point upon that finding. Upon the whole, however, I am unable to dissent from the argument presented to us by [counsel for the defendants] that, assuming the findings of fact to be correct, the case cannot be brought within the class of cases where the defendants' liability depends upon his continuing control of the premises, for here the defendants had none in fact ; if the plaintiff had written a letter of complaint to the defendants, Witherby & Co. might well have refused to allow the defendants to come in to do the repairs in premises to which they (the defendants) had no right of entry. Neither does the case come within the class of case where there is something noxious or dangerous forming part of a building, which amounts to a public nuisance. I feel compelled to hold that no cause of action has been in point of law established . . ."

I think that Malone v. Laskey (1), which is binding on us and has never been overruled, prevents the plaintiff, Miss Ball, from succeeding in this action unless she can show—what the plaintiffs failed to show in that case—that the boiler was dangerous or noxious, or that the part of the premises where the boiler was installed was thereby rendered dangerous or noxious, within the meaning of those words in the cases which have decided that articles of that kind impose on persons installing them a high degree of duty. That kind of case is, I think, exemplified clearly in Parry v. Smith (2) and Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins and Perkins (3). The headnote in Parry v. Smith (2) is :

"The defendant, a gas-fitter, was employed by the plaintiff's master to repair a gas-meter upon his premises, and for the purpose of doing so took away the meter and in lieu of it made a temporary connection by means of a flexible tube between the inlet pipe and the pipe communicating with the house. The plaintiff having gone in the ordinary performance of his duty with a light into the cellar where the meter had been, gas, which had escaped by reason of the insufficiency of the connecting tube, exploded and injured him. The jury found that the work had been negligently done, and that the injury to the plaintiff proceeded entirely from such negligence, Held, that the defendant was liable."

LOPES, J., in giving his judgment, said (4 C.P.D. 327) :

"It was contended by [counsel for the plaintiff] that the action would lie, because the defendant knew he was dealing with gas, a thing highly dangerous in itself unless great care and caution were used in its management; that the plaintiff's right of action was founded, not on contract, but on the duty which attaches to the use or dealing with a thing in its nature highly dangerous and likely to cause damage, unless managed with great care and caution. I think the plaintiff's right of action is founded on a duty which I believe attaches in every case where a person is using or is dealing with a highly dangerous thing, which, unless managed with the greatest care, is calculated to cause injury to bystanders. To support such a right of action, there need be no privity between the party injured and him by whose breach of duty the injury is caused, nor any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment; nor need what is done by the defendant amount to a public nuisance. It is a misfeasance independent of contract."

In Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins and Perkins (3), LORD DUNEDIN, dealing with the case of the gas company, who were one of the defendants in the action, said ([1909] A.C. 646) :

"To come now to the position of the gas company. The gas company were not occupiers of the premises on which the accident happened. Further, there being no relation of contract between the company and the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs cannot appeal to any defect in the machine supplied by the defendants which might constitute breach of contract. There may be, however, in the case of any one performing an operation, or setting up and installing a machine, a relationship of duty. What that duty is will vary according to the subject-matter of the things involved. It has, however, again and again been held that in the case of articles dangerous in themselves, such as loaded firearms, poisons, explosives, and other things ejusdem generis, there is a peculiar duty to take precaution imposed upon those who send forth or instal such articles when it is necessarily the case that other parties will come within their proximity. The duty being to take precaution, it is no excuse to say that the accident would not have happened unless some other agency than that of the defendant had intermeddled with the matter. A loaded gun will not go off unless some one pulls the trigger, a poison is innocuous unless some one takes it, gas will not explode unless it is mixed with air and then a light is set to it. Yet the cases of Dixon v. Bell (4), Thomas v. Winchester (5), and Parry v. Smith (2) are all illustrations of liability enforced. On the other hand, if the proximate cause of the accident is not the negligence of the defendant, but the conscious act of another volition, then he will not be liable."

I think that those are the principles which we have to apply to the present case, treating the defendants as ordinary contractors and not as landlords. It is clear that, if this boiler, as constructed, is a dangerous or noxious thing within the meaning of those words of LORD DUNEDIN, then the defendants would be liable to strangers who might be contemplated as likely to visit the house, notwithstanding that the defendants had no contract with those persons and notwithstanding that the defendants' contractual obligations as between themselves and the tenant might be defined by the contract and be limited in their nature.

What is, or is not, a dangerous thing is an extremely difficult matter to decide. The difficulty which has been felt about this by learned judges is referred to, and some of their expressions of opinion are very conveniently summarised, in SALMOND ON TORTS, 10th ed., p. 570, where the well-known observations of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Hodge & Sons v. Anglo-American Oil Co. (6) are cited, where he said (12 Ll. L. Rep. 187) :

A “ ‘ Personally, I do not understand the difference between a thing dangerous in itself, as poison, and a thing not dangerous as a class, but by negligent construction dangerous as a particular thing. The latter, if anything, seems the more dangerous of the two ; it is a wolf in sheep’s clothing instead of an obvious wolf.’ ”

SALMOND ON TORTS (ibid.) then contains a reference to the language of LORD

B ATKIN ([1932] A.C. 595) in Donoghue v. Stevenson (7) :

“ LORD ATKIN regarded ‘ the distinction as an unnatural one so far as it is used to serve as a logical differentiation by which to distinguish the existence or non-existence of a legal right ’.”

The learned author goes on to observe :

C “ But all the members of the House in Donoghue v. Stevenson (7) appear to have agreed that the distinction, whether natural or not, is accepted in English law.”

He then states that LORD WRIGHT in Glasgow Corpn. v. Muir (8) ([1943] 2 All E.R. 52), gave illustrations of the category of dangerous things, such as a savage animal and a performance on a flying trapeze, and, in Wray v. Essex

D County Council (9) ([1936] 3 All E.R. 101), LORD WRIGHT :

“ . . . defined an inherently dangerous thing as ‘ something which if left, may at any moment, and under modern circumstances, cause damage,’ and said (ibid., 102) ‘ that a naked sword or a hatchet or a loaded gun or an explosive are clearly inherently dangerous, that is to say, they cannot be handled without a serious risk ’.”

E I do not propose to embark on the perilous course of attempting to define what is, or is not, a dangerous thing, nor do I think any of the learned Lords referred to in SALMOND ON TORTS, 10th ed., p. 570, were endeavouring to do so. I think it may often be very difficult to draw the line, but in the present case we are dealing with an ordinary domestic apparatus, and, according to the evidence, the practice differs with regard to the supply of these boilers with or without safety valves. That the provision of a safety valve is desirable and to be recommended is beyond dispute. That a boiler without a safety valve may be regarded as unsatisfactory is also clear from the evidence, and the learned judge so found. That, however, does not, in my view, put it into the category of things which are dangerous per se, and impose this extended liability on defendants in the position of the London County Council. It was a thing which operated without mishap for some seven years in the ordinary course of normal working. It was not as if it was something which had been supplied in such a condition that, directly steam was generated, there was bound to be an explosion. In the ordinary, normal way the steam was carried off. What caused the explosion were two very unusual circumstances—first, the very severe winter, and, secondly, the ill-advised action of Miss Ball in lighting this boiler when the pipes were frozen. I cannot myself think that a boiler so installed comes within the category of dangerous things with which the courts have dealt in the past. I do not think the case was framed in that way. In the careful pleading to which I have already referred the case was not put on that basis at all. The duty was alleged to be that :

H “ In carrying out the said installation the defendants their servants or agents owed a duty to the first-named plaintiff, the members of her family and all persons entering and being or likely to enter and be within the said kitchen to carry out the same in a proper and workmanlike manner and so to instal the said boiler that it would be as safe for the said purpose as reasonable skill and care could make it."

I think that the plaintiffs have to prove a much higher duty than that, and that they have failed to do so.

It is necessary to refer shortly to the learned judge's judgment, in which he dealt with this matter in some detail and with care. Putting himself in the position of the jury, who had previously been discharged by consent, STABLE, J., asked himself this question: "Was the boiler as installed by the London County Council dangerous?" and he answered that: "Yes." Then he asked himself: "Was that condition either known, or such as by the exercise of reasonable skill and care would have been known, to the London County Council?" and he answered that: "Yes." Then he absolved Miss Ball from negligence and found in her favour. He dealt with the authorities, and, finally, he came to Bottomley v. Bannister (10). There he relied on this observation of GREER, L.J., ([1932] 1 K.B. 478):

"The result is unsatisfactory, because in the present case, if the landlord, instead of doing the work himself before he sold the house, had done it afterwards as a contractor to Mr. Bottomley, he would have been liable if there were sufficient evidence that it was negligence on his part to have installed the Halliday boiler without a flue."

STABLE, J., then said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 919):

"He [GREER, L.J.] proceeds to deal with the facts and the evidence in in that case. The learned LORD JUSTICE there says that, had the landlord done the work after the commencement of the tenancy as a contractor, he would have been liable if there had been sufficient evidence that there was negligence on his part in installing the boiler without a flue. In my judgment, that principle applies even though the boiler was put in gratuitously without extra charge, and the duty arises, as I think GREER, L.J., clearly indicates it does, on the law of tort and not of contract. It is a duty that is owed to the persons who, in the ordinary course of human life, would use the things."

The criticism which I venture to make on that is that I think the position, as envisaged by GREER, L.J., was of a landlord coming in and doing work negligently after the sale or after the lease, which would, no doubt, impose a contractual liability on him to the tenant who had called him in. If GREER, L.J., was intending to say, as I do not think he was, that in the carrying out of that contract the landlord would owe a duty to strangers who happened to be injured by the negligent performance of that contract, he would have been saying something which was contrary to the decision in Malone v. Laskey (1). The matter has to be carried a stage further. A stranger can only recover if the operation is in connection with something which is a dangerous thing in itself. STABLE, J., does not appear to me in his judgment to have directed his mind to the question, which is a question of law, whether on the evidence given in this case this particular boiler comes into the category of things which the law regards as dangerous per se. For these reasons I have arrived at a different conclusion, and would allow this appeal.

It is only necessary to add that the whole of this argument has been confined to the claim of Miss Ball. As to the five guineas awarded to Mrs. Ball, counsel for the defendants, without in any way admitting that any liability is owed by the defendants to her, has not desired, having regard to the smallness of the sum in question, to argue that point, and has been content to confine his appeal to the case of Miss Ball.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I have come to the same conclusion, though I confess that I do so with some regret, feeling, as is natural enough, no little sympathy for the unfortunate Miss Ball who suffered serious injury as a result of work which, as the judge found, and, therefore, we must hold, was negligently done. As my Lord observed, we are concerned only with the case of Miss Ball. Counsel for the defendants has accepted, without conceding, his liability, small in amount, to Mrs. Ball ; and it may well be, though obviously in the circumstances I cannot say more about it, that he is wise so to do. For though, as it is conceded, the work at the house was gratuitously done, in the circumstances I can see at least an argument that it was done pursuant to some such undertaking or arrangement as formed the foundation of the decision of the judge of first instance [WROTTESELEY, J.] in Davis v. Foots (11). Miss Ball, however, is, on any view, a stranger to any such undertaking, arrangement, or contract, whether of tenancy or otherwise, within the language of LOPES, J., in Parry v. Smith (2), in the passage which my Lord has already read. She is a person between whom and the council there is no privity. The question, therefore, is : Assuming that the London County Council owed anybody any duty when they put in the new boiler, did they owe a duty to Miss Ball ? So expressed, it seems to me that the case falls within a small compass, and, in my judgment, it is governed by the principle of Malone v. Laskey (1)—a case which, I gather, unhappily was not cited to the learned judge in the court below. Had it been cited, I cannot help thinking that the formulation by the judge of any cause of action which he found Miss Ball to have would have been differently stated. The cause of action was framed (with a lucidity about which I do not desire to say anything further) by the learned counsel in his statement of claim, and my Lord has already read it, but both that formulation and the passage at the end of the learned judge's judgment which my Lord has also read seem to me to be too widely stated and, unless qualified, to be inconsistent with Malone v. Laskey (1).

I entirely agree with counsel for the plaintiffs that in the circumstances of this case it is an irrelevant consideration that the London County Council, who did the work in question, were the landlords of Mrs. Ball, but, if they are to owe a duty to some one with whom they had no privity, then it must be shown that the case falls within one of the three categories which were cited by counsel for the defendants, in his reply, in Malone v. Laskey (1). If I may take an example, suppose the London County Council had done some repair work to the roof negligently, so that the roof leaked, and as a result of that leak property of Miss Ball were damaged. On the footing of Malone v. Laskey (1) it seems to me impossible to say that the London County Council owed such a duty to Miss Ball as would make them liable for the damage flowing from their incompetent work on the roof. For the present purposes it seems to me that, as my Lord has already said, the case must be shown to fall within the category of which illustrations have been taken both from the judgment of LOPES, J., in Parry v. Smith (2) and from the speech of LORD WRIGHT in the citation from SALMOND ON TORTS, 10th ed., p. 570. There is no finding here that the boiler, as the London County Council left it, was a "dangerous thing" within those passages. True, there was a finding that it was dangerous and, indeed, it proved itself so in no uncertain fashion, but so was the cistern in Malone v. Laskey (1), and it is, perhaps, worth noting that the fourth question put to the jury and the answer in that case were as follows :

"Q.—Did the defendants, when they put up the bracket and placed the tank upon it, do this work in an improper or negligent manner, and leave the apparatus in a condition dangerous to anyone properly using the lavatory ? A.—Yes."

What, in fact, caused the calamity in the present case was, as my Lord has already stated, the combination of an exceptionally hard frost in the winter of 1947, and the somewhat temerarious conduct of Miss Ball in lighting the boiler fire in order to thaw out the frozen pipes. I do not wish to go through the evidence which TUCKER, L.J., has analysed. It seems to me impossible to say that the plaintiff, Miss Ball, has established a case that the boiler, as left, was ejusdem generis, so to speak, with the type of instances given in the citations above referred to, of loaded pistols, explosives, and such like. I say nothing whatever about the propriety of the London County Council in having not fitted, in the circumstances, a safety valve to this boiler. As I have already indicated, if what they did was done on the terms of any contract or arrangement with their tenant, it may well be that they would be liable to her for their negligent conduct in failing to fit a safety valve, and not only for any damage she personally may have suffered but also for any obligation which she herself might have been under to pay to other people. That, however, as I have indicated, in my judgment does not seem enough. In order that they may be held liable to strangers, the case must be, as I have said, within the category of dangerous things. For reasons which I do not wish further to repeat, the plaintiff, Miss Ball, in my judgment, has failed to bring the case within that category. I have stated my reasons briefly, because we are differing from the learned judge, but I also wish to endorse everything that has fallen from TUCKER, L.J., and, for the reasons which he has given as well as those which I have briefly stated, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

SINGLETON, L.J. [after stating the facts:] It seems to me that whether the plaintiff, Miss Ball, is entitled to succeed depends entirely on whether she comes within the words of LORD DUNEDIN ([1909] A.C. 646) in Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins and Perkins (3)—or, if I may put it in another way, whether she comes within the passage which my Lord has already read, and which I venture to read again, from the judgment of LOPES, J., in Parry v. Smith (2). The learned judge said (4 C.P.D. 327):

“I think the plaintiff’s right of action is founded on a duty which I believe attaches in every case where a person is using or is dealing with a highly dangerous thing, which, unless managed with the greatest care, is calculated to cause injury to by-standers. To support such a right of action, there need be no privity between the party injured and him by whose breach of duty the injury is caused, nor any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment; nor need what is done by the defendant amount to a public nuisance. It is a misfeasance independent of contract.”

So that, for Miss Ball to hold her judgment, it must be shown, as I think, that that which the defendants installed in her mother’s house was a highly dangerous thing, or, at least, a dangerous thing as installed.

The boiler was installed about seven years before the explosion, and it had worked, so far as we have been told, without any complaint. Mr. De Groot, an expert witness called on behalf of the plaintiffs, was asked:

“Q.—Is there anything very extraordinary about it, or would you call it an ordinary domestic hot water system? A.—It is an ordinary domestic hot water system, with one serious omission.”

The serious omission was the lack of a safety valve. If one asked: “What is the purpose of a safety valve?” the answer one would receive, I suppose, would be: “To promote safety or to give additional protection or safety.” The witness described the lack of a safety valve as a serious omission. He was cross-examined, and in answer to the question:

“I do not want to get you involved in questions with other engineers, but I put it to you, quite definitely, that there is no hard and fast rule about there being a safety valve to a boiler of this size in a house?”
—he said:

“My only answer to that is that some local authorities insist on a safety valve being applied on any type of domestic boiler. There is no hard and fast rule."

He was giving evidence in 1948; this installation was in the early days of the war, 1940 or thereabouts. If there was no hard and fast rule for local authorities in 1948, it is difficult to see that there could be any regular practice in 1940. Again, if there is, or was, no hard and fast rule among local authorities in matters of this kind, it is a little difficult to see that it is shown, on that evidence at least, that this boiler, as installed, was a dangerous or a highly dangerous thing. There were two other witnesses who were called on this matter. One was the defendants' representative, Mr. Hutson, who was asked:

"Do you express your view as to whether a safety valve was necessary with a boiler of that size or not?"

He answered:

"I would say that a safety valve is not necessary for a boiler of this size. It is a low pressure boiler with the open expansion pipe . . ."

The matter was not very fully pursued. There was no examination, so far as I can find from the transcript, as to the difference between a high pressure boiler and a low pressure boiler for this purpose. Mr. Bright, an expert witness called on behalf of the defendants, was cross-examined by the learned junior counsel for the plaintiffs, and was asked:

"Q.—If both exits are sealed off by frost, is it not equally essential to have a safety valve? A.—There should either be a safety valve or the fire should not be alight."

I would draw attention to the fact that, when the ordinary householder in the morning seeks to light the boiler to heat some water, he or she cannot always know whether the pipes are frozen or not. The witness was asked further:

"Q.—So, if there is any likelihood of the sealing off of the pipes by frost and the likelihood of somebody lighting a fire, a safety valve is an essential precaution. Is that what you are saying? A.—I would say, Yes. Q.—It is customary, is it not, to fit safety valves to domestic boilers? It is a normal thing, is it not. A.—Close to the boiler."

Then the witness agreed with some extracts from FOWLER ON DOMESTIC HEATING BOILERS which were read to him. The result of that experienced witness's evidence shows that, if there may be frost so that the external pipes are frozen, a safety valve is an essential precaution. Everyone knows that there may be frost and that pipes may become frozen. It is for that reason, I imagine, in part at least, that a safety valve is regarded as the usual or normal fitting on or near a boiler for heating purposes. The witness further showed that it was the normal practice to have a safety valve fitted close to a boiler, and I imagine he was dealing with a boiler of this kind.

I have been greatly troubled in this case to know why the London County Council departed from what was and is the normal practice. I asked several times in the course of the hearing and counsel on their behalf assured me that they were most anxious to keep nothing back, but, from what he told the court, they could for a few shillings have acquired a safety valve and their workman could have fitted it. Whether they had safety valves in stock at that time I do not know. It is right to say that it was in war-time and there may have been shortages. I wondered again, in the course of the hearing, what is the practice of the London County Council to-day. As far as I gathered from counsel, it may be just the same as it was, not to instal safety valves. I hope it is not. The trouble in deciding this case is to arrive at a true conclusion on the evidence as given in the court below. When one has an admission from the plaintiffs' expert witness that there is no hard and fast rule as to having safety valves, even at the time of the trial, and when one has, from a witness for the defendants, the fact that he thinks it is unnecessary to have a safety valve in a small boiler of this kind—indeed when one sees from that evidence that there is a divergence in practice—it seems to me difficult, to say the least, to come to a conclusion that that small boiler as installed was dangerous of itself. I regard a safety valve as necessary because of the danger of blocked pipes, either by frost or from some other cause, and, although I agree that in the result this appeal must be allowed, I am most anxious that it shall not go out from this court that a safety valve is unnecessary on boilers in general or even on such small boilers as this. I believe that, had one been fitted on this boiler, the terrible injury which the plaintiff, Miss Ball, suffered would have been avoided. It is for that reason that I thought it right to add something, because I do not think that the judgment of this court ought to be used in any sense as meaning that safety valves are unnecessary. If the evidence for this plaintiff had been a little different the judgment of this court might well have been in her favour.

Appeal allowed. Costs paid by the defendants in the court below to be returned. No other order as to costs.

SCOTTISH INSURANCE CORPORATION, LTD. AND OTHERS v. WILSONS AND CLYDE COAL CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Maugham, Lord Simonds, Lord Uthwatt*, Lord Normand and Lord Morton of Henryton), March 1, 2, 3, May 6, 1949.]

Company—Reduction of capital—Extinguishment of preference stock—Colliery undertaking—Assets transferred to National Coal Board—Voluntary liquidation intended later—Return to preference stockholders of their whole paid-up capital—Rights of stockholders—Articles—Construction—Companies Act, 1929 (c. 23), s. 55 (1) (c)—Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (c. 59), s. 25.

A company incorporated in 1876 to acquire and carry on colliery undertakings had, in September, 1947, a nominal capital of £850,000, and an issued capital of £725,000, divided into £40,000 7 per cent. cumulative first preference stock, £10,000 7 per cent. cumulative second preference stock, and £675,000 ordinary stock. By arts. 11 and 12 of its present articles of association (adopted in 1923), the company could issue new shares with a preferential or qualified right to dividends. By art. 17 the company was enabled from time to time by special resolution to reduce its capital. By art. 78 every unit of stock had one vote on a poll at any company meeting. Article 128, which dealt with rights to the profits of the company, provided that, after setting aside any amount which might be carried to any reserve fund or written off, the profits should be applied to the payment of a cumulative preferential dividend of 7 per cent. to the first and second preference stockholders in their order of priority and that the residue of profits should be divisible among the ordinary stockholders. Article 139 enabled the directors to set aside out of profits such sum as they might think proper as a reserve fund which might be used for (inter alia) making provision for paying off the preference capital. Article 141 (a) empowered the company by ordinary resolution to convert its undivided profits, including divisible profits arising by way of permanent appreciation in value of the company's assets, into capital and to distribute it by way of bonus among the ordinary stockholders. Articles 159 and 160 provided that, in the event of the company being wound-up, the first preference stock "shall rank before the other [stocks] of the company on the property of the company to the extent of repayment of the amounts . . . paid thereon," and that the second preference stock should similarly rank before the ordinary stock but after the first preference stock.

On Jan. 1, 1947, under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the colliery assets of the company were transferred to and vested in the National Coal Board with the result that the company could no longer pursue the objects for which it was incorporated, and it was its avowed intention in due course to go into voluntary liquidation. At an extraordinary general meeting on Sept. 26, 1947, the company passed a special resolution for the reduction of its capital from £850,000 to £462,500 divided into £337,500 ordinary stock and £125,000 ordinary shares, by returning their whole paid-up capital to the holders of the £50,000 preference stock, and extinguishing such stock, and by returning to the holders of the £675,000 ordinary stock 10s. for each £1 unit held by them. On a petition to the court under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 56 (1), for an order confirming the reduction, certain of the preference stockholders objected to the reduction on the grounds (a) that it deprived them prematurely of the advantages of a well-secured 7 per cent. investment, (b) that it deprived them of the right to participate, along with the ordinary stockholders, in the surplus assets of the company on liquidation, and (c) that it deprived them of the opportunity of obtaining a favourable adjustment of their interests under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 25.

HELD : (i) [LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON dissenting] on a true construction of the company's articles, subject to the payment to the preference stockholders of their capital and their preferential dividends, if any not yet paid, and subject also to the discretionary applications by the directors under arts. 139 and 141 (a), the whole of the reserve funds and other assets of the company, including the proceeds of sale of the capital assets, were appropriated to the ordinary stockholders to the exclusion of the preference stockholders : Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. ([1914] A.C. 11 ; 109 L.T. 754), applied ; and, therefore, as the preference stockholders had no right to anything beyond what they would receive under the proposed reduction of capital, and as the articles gave them clear notice that there was no assured permanence of their right to a cumulative 7 per cent. dividend, their complaint that payment off in the present circumstances was unfair and inequitable was groundless. In determining what was fair between the parties, the court could not properly have regard to the consideration that the incidence of income tax would be a deterrent to the use of the alternative measures available to the company under arts. 139 and 141 (a).

(ii) [LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON dissenting] arts. 159 and 160 contained a complete statement of the rights of the preference stockholders in the winding-up for the reason that the whole of the profits and assets of the company (subject to payment of the amounts called up and paid on the preference stock) had been appropriated before liquidation to the ordinary stockholders, and there was nothing in the articles to indicate that the rights of the preference stockholders, if they had not already been paid off, would be increased by attributing to them part of the profits and assets which had been appropriated to the ordinary stockholders : Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. ([1891] 2 Ch. 317 ; 64 L.T. 576), approved ; Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. ([1933] Ch. 142 ; 148 L.T. 82), overruled. Therefore, as the preference stockholders would not be entitled on a winding-up to anything more than a return of their paid-up capital, apart from any considerations arising out of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 25, their objections to the proposed reduction had no substance.

(iii) in the exercise of its jurisdiction under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 55 (1), the court should regard the provisions of s. 25 of the Act of 1946 as a factor to be included in its consideration of the fairness of a proposed reduction of the capital of a colliery company, but there was nothing in s. 25 to oust the jurisdiction of the court under the Companies Act, 1929. As, however, notwithstanding the publication of the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948, made under s. 25 (1) of the Act of 1946, it was still impossible to foretell what, if any, adjustment of interests as between different classes of stockholders would ultimately be made under s. 25, the possibility that the preference stockholders might ultimately get something better than the repayment of their capital in full did not justify the court in saying that the proposed reduction was not fair and equitable between the different classes of stockholders.

APPEAL by preference stockholders against an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session (LORD RUSSELL and LORD KEITH, the LORD PRESIDENT (LORD COOPER) dissenting), dated Feb. 17, 1948, and reported 1948, S.C. 360, repelling their objections to a petition by the respondent company for confirmation of a special resolution, dated Sept. 26, 1947, for the reduction of the capital of the company.

The respondent company was incorporated for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on colliery undertakings, and, on the transfer of its assets to the National Coal Board on Jan. 1, 1947, under the provisions of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, its effective business was brought to an end and its avowed intention was to go into voluntary liquidation when the compensation payable under the Act was assessed and paid. By the special resolution of Sept. 26, 1947, for the reduction of capital, the preference stock was to be extinguished by returning to the preference stockholders the whole of their paid-up capital. The preference stockholders contended that the court should not confirm the proposed reduction as it was not fair and equitable. The House now held (LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON dissenting) that there was no substance in the objections of the preference stockholders to the proposed reduction, and dismissed the appeal. The facts and the relevant articles of association appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

A Sir Cyril Radcliffe, K.C., Morison, K.C., and William Grant for the appellants (some of the preference stockholders).

The Dean of Faculty (John Cameron, K.C.), J. F. Gordon Thomson, K.C., and C. J. D. Shaw (all of the Scottish Bar) for the respondent company.

The House took time for consideration.

May 6. The following opinions were read.

B VISCOUNT MAUGHAM : My Lords, the facts in this case are sufficiently stated in the speech of my noble and learned friend, LORD SIMONDS, which I have had the advantage of studying in print, and I see no benefit to be gained by repeating them. I also agree with the conclusions which he has reached, and, if I think it is desirable to express my own opinion on the construction of the articles of association so far as they bear on the question whether the proposed
C reduction of capital is fair and equitable as between the ordinary shareholders and the preference shareholders, it is because there has been a difference of opinion in the First Division of the Court of Session and your Lordships have listened to the citation of a large number of authorities which are thought to bear on the matter in debate. I should, perhaps, add that I have arrived at my conclusion by somewhat different considerations from those on which LORD SIMONDS
D prefers to lay stress.

I will begin by treating the matter as if s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, did not enter into the case. The company as a matter of law is not in liquidation and I agree with the view that the circumstances that liquidation is contemplated in the near future ought not to affect the construction of the terms on which the preference shares were issued, that is, in
E this case the articles of association which are to be found set out in LORD SIMONDS's speech. We are not, therefore, entitled in considering the question of fairness to shut our eyes to the fact that the directors still have their powers as such and that they and the shareholders at any time before liquidation can exercise their rights under arts. 139 and 141 (a). My Lords, if I am right so far, I can see no great difficulty in the present case. We must first have regard to the
F plain terms of art. 128. It is a complete statement of the rights of the shareholders to the profits earned year by year by the company as a going concern, subject to two supplementary articles, 139 and 141 (a), which must be read with it. Article 128 begins with saving the rights of members entitled to shares issued on special conditions. The words in the article as to division of "the residue"
G (after the word "thirdly") are perfectly clear, and they beyond doubt show that, subject to a reserve fund and amounts written off for "depreciation or otherwise" (a far-reaching phrase) and to payment of cumulative preferential dividends due on the issues of preference shares, the whole residue is divisible among the holders of the ordinary shares in proportion to the amounts paid up or credited as paid up on their shares. The amounts of profits so distributed may obviously be less or greater than the amounts paid up or credited as paid
H up; but the preference shareholders have no share in the residue. So far the article has only dealt with the rights of the ordinary shareholders to the whole of the divisible profits (the so-called "residue") after paying the preference dividends, and there would remain the reserve fund, and any proper provision for depreciation and also, no doubt, sums carried forward which, of course, would come into the profit and loss account for the next year. The ordinary shareholders for obvious reasons are not given any immediate right to call for division of these amounts of profit, but arts. 139 and 141 (a) make clear provision that the items in question are only being retained among the company's undistributed assets so long as it is thought expedient, and it is these articles which, in my opinion, clinch the matter. Article 139, after elaborate provisions as to how the reserve fund is to be employed, and subject to a number of permissible applications for the general benefit of the undertaking, contains the following words as to distribution :

" . . . or for division by way of bonus to the ordinary shareholders or as bonuses to the employees of the company or for repaying any moneys borrowed by the company or for making provision for paying off the preference share capital or for such other purposes as the directors shall in their absolute discretion think conducive to the interests of the company or its shareholders."

I have italicised the words as to paying off the preference share capital. The words are none the less important because the reduction of capital would require the sanction of the court. They show, at least, that, if the transaction is fair and equitable, the article contemplates that the preference shareholders can be paid off with or without their consent.

Article 141 (a) is also of great importance and is in these terms :

"The company in general meeting may, on the recommendation of the directors, from time to time by ordinary resolution convert any undivided profits of the company available for dividends on its shares (whether such profits should stand to the credit of any reserve fund or reserve account or a profit and loss account of the company or otherwise, and including divisible profits arising by way of permanent appreciation in value of any of the company's assets) into capital, and appropriate and distribute the same among the members of the company who are holders of ordinary shares, in proportion to the amounts paid up on the shares held by them respectively, by way of bonus, or they may apply such undivided profits in or towards satisfaction of the amounts unpaid in respect of any shares in the capital of the company allotted among such ordinary shareholders or previously unissued."

It thus provides for the conversion into capital of undivided profits standing to the credit of a reserve fund, or a profit and loss account or otherwise, and including divisible profits arising by way of permanent appreciation in value of any of the company's assets and the distribution of these amounts among the members of the company who are holders of ordinary shares. My comment on the words I have here italicised is that, if the undertaking of the company had been sold for cash (and provision made out of a reserve fund or otherwise for payment of debts and liabilities and for paying off the preference share capital), every penny could be distributed among the holders of ordinary shares. I should add here that I agree with LORD KEITH that the suggestion that such a distribution is unlikely because of the sur-tax liability which might accrue to the richer of the recipients is an accidental consideration which ought not be to considered.

My Lords, for these and other reasons given by your Lordships, my conclusion is that, taking these articles together, it is reasonably clear that, subject to the payment to the preference shareholders of their capital and their preferential dividends, if any not yet paid, and subject also to discretionary applications by the directors under the terms of arts. 139 and 141 (a) as above set forth, the whole of the reserve funds and other assets of the company, including the proceeds of sale of the capital assets, are appropriated to the ordinary shareholders and in that sense belong to them to the exclusion of the preference shareholders. If then the question of the approval by the court falls to be considered in the light of the present position of the company, it must follow that the main argument of unfairness falls to the ground, but I am not prepared to deny that the admitted intention to go into liquidation might be one of the facts which the court ought to consider and I will, therefore, state my opinion on that footing. If there is a liquidation, arts. 159 and 160, which are sufficiently stated in the speech of my noble friend, will apply to the first and second issues of the preference shareholders. Are these articles a complete statement of the rights attached in a winding-up to the preference shares, or should such shares also have a right to participate with the ordinary shares in the remaining assets after payment of the amounts called up and paid up on the ordinary shares ? My Lords, I am of opinion that the articles in question must be construed as a complete statement of the rights of the preference shares in the winding-up for the reason that the whole of the profits and assets of the company (subject to payment of the amounts called up and paid on the preference shares) has been appropriated before liquidation to the ordinary shareholders, and that there is not a word to indicate that on liquidation the rights of the preference shareholders (if they have not already been paid off) would be increased, perhaps very materially, by attributing to them part of the profits and assets which have been appropriated to the ordinary shareholders. There might, perhaps, have been some doubt as to the compensation payable under the Coal Industry Capitalisation Act, 1946, s. 25, as being "surplus assets" of the nature of capital not distributable as dividend, and I will deal later with this point.

The view which I have suggested as to the effect of an appropriation of profits in favour of a certain class of shareholders is supported by a decision of LINDLEY, L.J., in the Court of Appeal in Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. (1), a sequel to the important case in this House of Birch v. Cropper (2). The facts were briefly these. The capital of the company was divided into preference and ordinary shares. The company was the owner of the Bridgewater and other canals which it sold in 1887 for £1,710,000 to the Manchester Ship Canal Co. It then went into liquidation. The liquidators paid all the debts and liabilities, and repaid to the preference and ordinary shareholders the amount of capital paid up on their shares. There remained in their hands a surplus of £550,000, and the question arose how this sum should be distributed between the ordinary and the preference shareholders. The latter were entitled under art. 85 while the company was a going concern to a preferential dividend of 5 per cent. and there was (in the view of this House) no other relevant term or condition as to their rights. On liquidation the article ceased to be applicable. Part of the £550,000 consisted of three distinct reserve funds for river improvements, insurance and depreciation, but none of these funds was actually set apart from the other assets of the company. In the books of the company they were sums deducted from profits which the ordinary shareholders might have divided among themselves ; they were the undrawn profits of the ordinary shareholders. But the House of Lords did not deal with these items. They decided (see per LORD MACNAGHTEN (14 App. Cas. 548)) (in the complete absence of any such articles as we have in this case) that, subject to the payment of the costs, charges and expenses of the winding-up and to the costs of the application :

" . . . the assets of the company remaining undistributed other than the reserve fund, which is not the subject of this application, ought to be distributed among all the shareholders in proportion to their shares."

When the question of the reserve funds came before the Court of Appeal [in Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. (1)] it was held that, since the assets or amounts in question consisted of the undrawn profits of one class, those profits ought to be distributed in the winding-up amongst the members of that class in the absence of some sufficient reasons to the contrary ; and there was no such reason. In the result the ordinary shareholders were exclusively entitled to the three reserve funds. I have no doubt that this was a correct decision, and there was no appeal. Apart, however, from any authority, I cannot see any sufficient reason for coming to a conclusion other than the one I have above indicated. In my view it is a sound prima rule that profits which have been appropriated, subject to possible application for the benefit of the company, to the ordinary shareholders to the exclusion of the preference shareholders must, in the absence of some other consideration, remain the property of the former on a winding-up. It should be observed that in Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. (1) there were no such articles as exist in the present case, which is an a fortiori one.

Much reliance is placed on behalf of the appellants on Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3). I must say that, in my opinion, that case was wrongly decided; and it should be noted that it is expressly stated that the bulk of the sum of £21,000 there in dispute was attributable to undistributed profits. It seems to me difficult to reconcile that case with the decision of this House in Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (4), and impossible to reconcile it on sound grounds with the decision of Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. (1). It is true that the general principle does not by itself apply to moneys arising from appreciations in value of capital, but in the present case I read art. 141 as showing that such appreciations are appropriated (in the sense in which I use the word) to the ordinary shareholders. Apart from that view it seems to me that any doubt as to the attribution of such special assets is removed by the terms of arts. 159 and 160 which refer to "the property of the company" as a whole, and do not justify the conferring of a further right to the preference shares beyond the amounts called up and paid thereon. Such a right would require definition and cannot, in my opinion, be derived as a matter of construction from the language of the two articles. I doubt whether there exist any such assets in the present case where the colliery assets were transferred compulsorily under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946. Counsel for the appellants in his forcible argument claimed—and, I think, with prudence—that his clients were entitled to share in the whole of the (so-called) surplus assets, and no distinction was drawn between different kinds of such assets.

The question that arises as to the effect, if any, of s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, is due to the difficulty of appreciating its purpose or its implications. I agree with the preliminary considerations stated by LORD GREENE, M.R., which are to be found in his judgment on the appeal of Re Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries, Ltd. (5), including his remarks as to the drafting of the regulations which are contemplated by the section. In particular, I agree with the following remarks of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 599):

"One thing the section clearly does not do. It does not purport expressly or impliedly to limit or affect in any way the existing provisions of the Companies Act, or the well-known practice of the courts thereunder, or to lay down any new principles for the court to follow."

The Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 2360), the regulations contemplated by the section, have now been published and the remark of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS applies with additional force. It would, I think, be going too far to say that, in confirming or refusing to confirm a reduction of the capital of a colliery company, the court ought to act as if the Act of 1946 had not been passed. On the other hand, I think that those who oppose the reduction by founding their argument on the provisions of s. 25 are bound to indicate how the section, or the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948, on any reasonable view of probability can operate in this case to give the preference shareholders any rights to share in the assets beyond those they now possess under the articles of association. Taking the view I have expressed as to the position of these shareholders either now or in a liquidation, and agreeing with my noble and learned friend, LORD SIMONDS, in the view that the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction should regard the provisions of s. 25 as a factor in its consideration of the fairness of a proposed reduction, I find myself unable to see any want of fairness in the proposed reduction of capital. I will summarise the grounds of my decision as follows. The case is one in which liquidation, when it comes, will have been brought about by the action of the legislature. If there were no reduction of capital, the holders of preference shares would not, in my opinion, be entitled in a winding up to anything more than a return of their paid-up capital. I am quite unable to see why they should claim more on the proposed reduction, nor why they should object to being repaid by means of the reduction the amounts so paid up which they would receive on the proposed liquidation. In my opinion, the decision of the judges of the Court of Session by a majority was right and the appeal must be dismissed. The answers should be repelled as irrelevant and the petition should now be remitted to a reporter. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

A LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, on Jan. 1, 1947, the colliery assets of the respondent company, Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd., which I will call the respondents, were in terms of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, transferred to and vested in the National Coal Board, which was constituted under that Act. Thus the effective business of the respondents was brought to an end and it is their avowed intention in due course to go into voluntary liquidation. But this they will not do until the compensation payable to them under the Act has been assessed and paid, an event which at the hearing of this appeal in March, 1949, could not be assumed to be immediately impending. In the meantime they have all the powers of a company which is not in liquidation and I cannot attach any legal significance to the description of them as "comatose," "moribund," or "having one foot in the grave." The respondents have had a long history. They were incorporated as a limited company in 1876 for the purpose of acquiring and carrying on certain colliery undertakings in Lanarkshire. Clause 5 of their memorandum of association provided that their capital should be £150,000 divided into 15,000 shares of £10 each with power to the company to increase their capital by the creation and issue of new shares either ordinary or having such preference, priority and special privileges attached thereto as might be determined by special resolution of the company. In exercise of this power the respondents from time to time increased or altered their capital until, at the date of the special resolution of Sept. 26, 1947, to which I shall refer, the nominal capital stood at £850,000 and the issued capital at £725,000, divided into £40,000 first preference 7 per cent. cumulative stock, £10,000 second preference 7 per cent. cumulative stock, and £675,000 ordinary stock. The first and second preference stock represented issues of preference shares which had been made in 1875 and 1894 respectively.

In 1923 the respondents by special resolution adopted new articles of association and, inasmuch as in one view the rights of the parties to this appeal depend to some extent on the meaning and effect of these articles, I must refer to some of them in detail. Article 11 provides that the company in general meeting may from time to time by special resolution increase the capital by the creation of new shares of such amount as may be deemed expedient. Article 12 provides that the new shares shall be issued on such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges annexed thereto as by the special resolution creating the same may be directed, and, if no direction shall be given, as the directors may determine : and, in particular, such shares may be issued with a preferential or qualified right to dividends and to ranking in the distribution of the assets of the company and with a special, or without any, right of voting, or partly in one of these forms and partly in another. This article is a re-statement in ampler form of part of cl. 5 of the memorandum. By art. 78 every shareholder, whether preference or ordinary, is to have one vote for every share held by him. Article 128 is of immediate importance. It provides that, subject to the rights of members entitled to shares issued on special conditions and subject as thereinafter provided, the profits of the company, after setting aside any amount which may be carried to any reserve fund, written off for depreciation, or otherwise, shall be applied in order of priority in manner following, viz.: First, to the payment of a cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up on the preference shares (first issue); secondly, to the payment of a similar dividend on the capital for the time being paid up on the preference shares (second issue); and, thirdly, the residue to be divisible among the holders of the ordinary shares in proportion to the amounts paid up or credited as paid up on their shares. As I have pointed out, the present holders of first and second preference stock have succeeded to the rights of these preference shareholders. Article 139 empowers the directors, before recommending any dividend, to set aside out of the profits of the company such sum as they may think proper as a reserve fund and this fund they are authorised to use for a wide variety of purposes, of which I will only mention the equalising or supplementing of dividends, the division by way of bonus to the ordinary shareholders, the repaying of any moneys borrowed by the company, and the making of provision for paying off the preference share capital. Article 141 (a) enables the company by ordinary resolution to convert its undivided profits available for dividends on its shares, whether such profits should stand to the credit of any reserve fund or reserve account or a profit and loss account of the company or otherwise, and including divisible profits arising by way of permanent appreciation in value of any of the company's assets, into capital and distribute the same amongst the ordinary shareholders by way of bonus. Finally, I refer to arts. 159 and 160. These articles provide that, in the event of the company being wound-up, the preference shares (first issue) "shall rank before the other shares of the company on the property of the company to the extent of repayment of the amounts called up and paid thereon" and that the preference shares (second issue) shall similarly rank before the ordinary shares but after the preference shares (first issue).

These, my Lords, being the articles which govern the rights of the ordinary and preference stockholders of this company, at an extraordinary general meeting held on Sept. 26, 1947, the company passed a special resolution for the reduction of the capital of the company from £850,000 (consisting of £40,000 first preference stock, £10,000 second preference stock and 800,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, of which 675,000 had been issued and converted into £675,000 ordinary stock), to £462,500 divided into £337,500 ordinary stock and 125,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and for effecting such reduction by returning to the holders of the first and second preference stocks £1 for each unit of stock held by them and extinguishing such stocks and by returning to the holders of the £675,000 ordinary stock capital to the extent of 10s. for each unit of such stock held by them. It appears that not all those who voted for the resolution were ordinary stockholders, nor did all the preference stockholders vote against it, nor do they all now oppose the reduction. I do not think that your Lordships can get any guidance from the way in which votes were given. The resolution, of which the formal validity is not challenged, having thus been passed, the respondents, as the Companies Act, 1929, s. 56, requires, presented a petition to the Court of Session for confirmation of the reduction, and on Feb. 17, 1948, in spite of opposition by the appellants, who hold about 45 per cent. of the first and second preference stock of the company and lodged answers, by which they averred that the proposed reduction was contrary to law and in any event unfair and inequitable, the First Division of the Court of Session consisting of the Lord President (LORD COOPER), LORD RUSSELL and LORD KEITH (the LORD PRESIDENT dissenting) repelled the answers as irrelevant in hoc statu and made an order for the usual procedure to follow. Against that interlocutor the present appeal is brought.

My Lords, apart from a special factor which is introduced into it by the provisions of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 25, I do not entertain any doubt about this case. The court should, in my opinion, confirm the reduction on which the respondents have resolved. The Companies Act, 1929, no more than its predecessors, prescribes what is to guide the court in the exercise of its discretionary jurisdiction to confirm or to refuse to confirm a reduction of capital. But I agree with the learned LORD PRESIDENT that, important though its task is to see that the procedure, by which a reduction is carried through, is formally correct and that creditors are not prejudiced, it has the further duty of satisfying itself that the scheme is fair and equitable between the different classes of shareholders: see e.g., British and American Trustee and Finance Corpn. v. Couper (6). But what is fair and equitable must depend on the circumstances of each case and I propose, ignoring for the moment the particular factor introduced by the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, to consider the elements on which the appellants rely for saying that this reduction is not fair to them.

In the formal Case which they have presented to the House the element of unfairness on which the appellants insist is that the reduction deprives them of their right to participate in the surplus assets of the company on liquidation and leaves the ordinary stockholders in sole possession of those assets. But in their argument both in the Court of Session and before your Lordships they have further relied on the fact that they have been deprived of a favourable seven per cent. investment which they cannot hope to replace and might have expected to continue to enjoy. They further contend that the deprivation of these rights, which would in any case have been an unmerited hardship, is rendered the more unfair because it is likely to be followed at an early date by the liquidation of the company or, as it is less accurately expressed because it is itself only a step in the liquidation of the company. The first plea makes an assumption, viz., that the articles give the preference stockholders the right in a winding-up to share in surplus assets, which I for the moment accept but will later examine. Accepting that assumption, I yet see no validity in the plea. The company has at a stroke been deprived of the enterprise and undertaking which it has built up over many years: it is irrelevant for this purpose that the stroke is delivered by an Act of Parliament which at the same time provides some compensation. Nor can it affect the rights of the parties that the only reason why there is money available for repayment of capital is that the company has no longer an undertaking to carry on. Year by year the seven per cent. preference dividend has been paid; of the balance of the profits some part has been distributed to the ordinary stockholders, the rest has been conserved in the business. If I ask whether year by year the directors were content to recommend, the company in general meeting to vote, a dividend which has left a margin of resources, in order that the preference stockholders might, in addition to repayment of their capital, share also in surplus assets, I think that directors and company alike would give an emphatic negative. And they would, I think, add that they have always had it in their power, and have it still, by making use of art. 130 or art. 141 (a) to see that what they had saved for themselves they do not share with others. I observe that the learned LORD PRESIDENT was of opinion that such a use of one or other of these articles would be an impropriety which would at least be open to challenge in a court of law, but learned counsel for the appellants candidly admitted that he could not support this view. Reading these articles as a whole with such familiarity with the topic as the years have brought, I would not hesitate to say, first, that the last thing a preference stockholder would expect to get (I do not speak here of the legal rights) would be a share of surplus assets, and that such a share would be a windfall beyond his reasonable expectations, and, secondly, that he had at all times the knowledge, enforced in this case by the unusual reference in art. 139 to the payment off of the preference capital, that at least he ran the risk, if the company's circumstances admitted, of such a reduction as is now proposed being submitted for confirmation by the court. Whether a man lends money to a company at seven per cent. or subscribes for its shares carrying a cumulative preferential dividend at that rate, I do not think that he can complain of unfairness if the company, being in a position lawfully to do so, proposes to pay him off. No doubt, if the company is content not to do so, he may get something that he can never have expected, but, so long as the company can lawfully repay him, whether it be months or years before a contemplated liquidation, I see no ground for the court refusing its confirmation. To combat the suggestion that, so far as any benefit to the preference stockholders is concerned, the position is substantially the same whether they are now repaid their capital or full use is made of arts. 139 and 141 (a), it was urged that the incidence of income tax would be a sufficient deterrent of this alternative measure. I do not, however, think that the court can properly have regard to such a consideration as this in determining what is fair between the parties. It might, indeed, be considered improper to do so if it drove the ordinary stockholders to a course less advantageous to themselves but no more advantageous to the preference stockholders. A B

It will be seen, my Lords, that, even making an assumption favourable to the appellants, I reject their first plea. But it is perhaps necessary, in case there should be a division of opinion which would make this a decisive issue, that I should shortly examine the assumption. It is clear from the authorities, and would be clear without them, that, subject to any relevant provision of the general law, the rights inter se of preference and ordinary shareholders must depend on the terms of the instrument which contains the bargain that they have made with the company and each other. This means that there is a question of construction to be determined and, undesirable though it may be that fine distinctions should be drawn in commercial documents such as articles of association of a company, your Lordships cannot decide that the articles here under review have a particular meaning, because to somewhat similar articles in such cases as Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) that meaning has been judicially attributed. I have earlier in this opinion stated the relevant articles, and, reading them as a whole, I come to the conclusion that arts. 159 and 160 are exhaustive of the rights of the preference stockholders in a winding-up. The whole tenor of the articles, as I have already pointed out, is to leave the ordinary stockholders masters of the situation. If there are "surplus assets," it is because the ordinary stockholders have contrived that it should be so, and, though this is not decisive, in determining what the parties meant by their bargain it is of some weight that it should be in the power of one class so to act that there will or will not be surplus assets. There is another somewhat general consideration which also, I think, deserves attention. If the contrary view of arts. 159 and 160 is the right one and the preference stockholders are entitled to a share in surplus assets, the question will still arise what those surplus assets are. For the profits, though undrawn, belong, subject to the payment of the preference dividend, to the ordinary stockholders, and, in so far as surplus assets are attributable to undrawn profits, the preference stockholders have no right to them. This appears to follow from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. (1), in which the judgment of the House of Lords in Birch v. Cropper (2) is worked out. This again is not decisive, but I am unwilling to suppose that the parties intended a bargain which would involve an investigation of an artificial and elaborate character into the nature and origin of surplus assets. C D E F G H

Apart, however, from those more general considerations the words of the specifically relevant articles, "rank before the other shares on the property of the company to the extent of repayment of the amounts called up and paid thereon" appear to me apt to define exhaustively the rights of the preference stockholders in a winding-up. Similar words, in Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (4), "rank, both as regards capital and dividend, in priority to the other shares," were held to define exhaustively the rights of preference shareholders to dividend, and I do not find in the speeches of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., or LORD LOREBURN in that case any suggestion that a different result would have followed if the dispute had been in regard to capital. I do not ignore that in the same case in the Court of Appeal the distinction between dividend and capital was expressly made by both COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and FARWELL, L.J., and that in Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3). ROMER, L.J., re-asserted it. But I share the difficulty, which LORD KEITH has expressed in this case, in reconciling the reasoning that lies behind the judgments in Will's case (4) and Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) respectively. In Collaroy Co., Ltd. v. Giffard (7) ASTBURY, J., after reviewing the authorities, including his own earlier decision in Re Fraser and Chalmers, Ltd. (8) said, in regard to capital and dividend preference respectively ([1928] Ch. 155) :

"But whether the considerations affecting them are 'entirely different' is a question of some difficulty."

He approved the proposition there urged by the ordinary shareholders that a fixed return of capital to shareholders in a winding-up is just as artificial as a provision for a fixed dividend, and that, if the latter is regarded as exhaustive, there is no prima facie reason why the former should not be similarly regarded. So, also, that learned judge was influenced by the consideration which appears to me to have much weight, that, if such an article as our art. 159 is regarded as a complete definition of the rights of the preference stockholders in a winding-up, then there is a logical consistency between their rights before and after the company is put into liquidation. In effect, I prefer the reasoning of ASTBURY, J., in Collaroy Co., Ltd. v. Giffard (7) to that of EVE, J., and the Court of Appeal in Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3). Counsel for the appellants in the present case sought to draw a distinction between the right to repayment of capital and the right to some further share in surplus assets and pointed to the fact that arts. 159 and 160 said nothing about surplus assets. But this distinction is not, in my opinion, in the present context a valid one. Articles 159 and 160 are the first two in a number of articles headed "Distribution of assets on winding-up," and there is nothing in them to suggest a distinction between "property of the company," the expression in fact used in arts. 159 and 160, required for repayment of capital or distributable as surplus assets. Nor, I think, is the latter expression used throughout the articles : it is perhaps an expression which is better avoided.

Finally, on this part of the case I ought to deal with an observation made by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Birch v. Cropper (2) on which counsel for the appellants relied. LORD MACNAGHTEN said (14 App. Cas. 546) :

"... they [the preference shareholders] must be treated as having all the rights of shareholders, except so far as they renounced those rights on their admission to the company."

But, in my opinion, LORD MACNAGHTEN can have meant nothing more than that the rights of the parties depended on the bargain that they had made and that the terms of the bargain must be ascertained by a consideration of the articles of association and any other relevant document, a task which I have endeavoured in this case to discharge. I cannot think that LORD MACNAGHTEN intended to introduce some new principle of construction and to lay down that preference shareholders are entitled to share in surplus assets unless they expressly and specifically renounce that right. For these reasons I reject the assumption on which the appellants' first plea is founded.

I can deal shortly with the other element of unfairness on which the appellants rely, viz., that they have been prematurely deprived of a favourable investment. Much that I have already said is equally applicable here. Funds being available for payment off of capital, the natural order is to pay off that capital which has priority and I see no glimmer of unfairness in the company doing so at the earliest possible moment, particularly if, their undertaking having been wrested from them, they can no longer earn 7 per cent. or anything like it on their money. I am of opinion then that, apart from the special considerations arising from s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the appellants' objections to the proposed reduction have no substance. I turn then to this section. I will not repeat its provisions. The appellants say (I quote their formal reasons) that the "proposed reduction of capital unfairly and illegally deprives the preference stockholders of their right to an adjustment of their interest in the company's assets as affected by the payment of compensation under s. 25" of the Act and that it "is contrary to or in any event frustrates, the object of s. 25 and therefore ought not to be sanctioned by the court." In argument it has been urged that the preference stockholders have a statutory right to adjustment, with which the court either cannot or should not interfere.

I dissent at once from the major proposition that in view of s. 25 it is no longer competent for the court to exercise its jurisdiction under s. 55 (1) of the Companies Act, 1929. It is impossible to read any such implication into s. 25 of the Act of 1946 or to suppose that the jurisdiction of the court could have been intended to be ousted except by express words. The greater difficulty lies in the alternative proposition that, at least in the exercise of a discretionary jurisdiction, the court ought not to preclude any interested party from the opportunity of such advantage as s. 25 might afford him. In support of this view it may be urged that, until the statutory compensation has been awarded, it is not possible to predicate of any class of shareholders what is a fair way of dealing with any of the assets of the company. I have felt the force of this argument. But, if it is accepted, the court must in the result hold its hand in every case in which a company carrying on a colliery undertaking proposes either to reduce its capital or to enter into a scheme of arrangement affecting classes of shareholders or debenture holders, perhaps, too, even where debenture holders take proceedings to enforce their security, on the ground that by exercising jurisdiction the court might prejudice the inchoate rights of some person under s. 25 of the Act of 1946. I cannot think it right to accede to a suggestion which would involve so much delay and inconvenience to companies which wish to re-arrange their affairs in view of the changes brought about by the Act. I prefer, therefore, to adopt the view put forward by the learned Dean of Faculty and to say that the court should, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, regard the provisions of s. 25 as a factor to be included in its consideration of the fairness of a proposed reduction, but no more than that. It is in that way that I propose to examine the section in relation to the present proposal. The section looks forward to regulations to be made in due course, which are to provide facilities for adjusting the respective interests of different classes in the company's assets so as to give effect, so far as may be, to their "relative expectations of income yield" and to their respective "rights of priority." At the date of the proceedings in the Court of Session no regulations had been made and it was legitimate to hope that, when they were made, they would throw further light on the way in which effect should be given to expectations of income yield and rights of priority. That hope has been disappointed, for the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 2360), have now been made, but they do not illumine the darkness. The court, therefore, has on the one hand to take into account all those factors with which I have already dealt in considering whether the proposed reduction apart from the Act of 1946 is fair, and the further, by no means negligible, factor that the interposition of further months and perhaps years of delay can be nothing but a hardship to the ordinary stockholders, and, on the other hand, the factor that the preference stockholders might at long last get something better than they are now getting, i.e., repayment in full of their capital, a possibility resting not on any sure guidance in the section or regulations, but on the speculative hope that, since there is no guidance, anything may happen. It does not appear to me, my Lords, that there is in this latter factor such weight as to justify the court in saying that the reduction here proposed is not fair and equitable between the different classes of shareholders. I do not want to prejudge what may happen in any similar case that comes before a tribunal to be set up under the Act of 1946. But I find it difficult to conceive circumstances in which preference stockholders, being repaid their capital in full and their claims to priority being thus satisfied, can yet assert with any hope of success that their expectations of income yield relative to those of the ordinary stockholders entitle them to something more. I am, therefore, of opinion that the court has properly exercised its jurisdiction in confirming the proposed reduction and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, on Jan. 1, 1947, the colliery assets of the respondent company were by the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, transferred to and vested in the National Coal Board. The immediate result was that the company could no longer pursue the objects for which it was incorporated and that it had on its hands investments and other assets which it could no longer employ remuneratively. It is not intended that the company should continue to carry on business and liquidation is inevitable. Liquidation is, however, postponed till the compensation provided under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, has been settled and paid. In the meantime and as a preliminary step towards liquidation a special resolution for the reduction of capital was passed by an extraordinary general meeting of the company on Sept. 26, 1947. The present appeal is against an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session repelling objections to the petition for confirmation of the reduction of capital.

At the passing of the resolution the capital of the company was £850,000 divided into £40,000 7 per cent. first preference stock, issued and fully paid, £10,000 7 per cent second preference stock issued and fully paid, £675,000 ordinary stock issued and fully paid, and 125,000 ordinary shares of £1 each unissued. By the reduction of capital now proposed their whole paid-up capital will be returned to the holders of the £50,000 preference stock and 10s. will be returned to the holders of the £675,000 ordinary stock for each £1 unit held by them. The appellants are certain of the preference stockholders who lodged answers to the petition for confirmation. Their objections to the proposed reduction are that it deprives them prematurely of the advantage of a well-secured 7 per cent. investment; that it deprives them of a right to participate in the liquidation along with the ordinary stockholders in the division of the property of the company, if any remains after repayment of the capital of all stockholders; and that it deprives them of the opportunity of obtaining a favourable adjustment of their interests under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946.

I shall begin by dealing with the first and second of these objections and it is first necessary for that purpose to consider what are the rights of the preference stockholders under the articles of association. Article 17 enables the company from time to time by special resolution to reduce its capital. Under art. 78 every share (now every unit of stock) has one vote in a poll at any company meeting. Article 128 deals with rights to the profits of the company, and it provides that, after setting aside any amount which may be carried to any reserve fund or written off, the profits shall be applied to the payment of a cumulative preferential dividend of seven per cent. to the first and second preference stockholders in their order of priority, and that the residue of profits shall be divisible among the ordinary stockholders. Article 139 enables the directors to set aside out of profit such sum as they may think proper as a reserve fund which may be used for, inter alia, making provision for paying off the preference capital. Article 141 (a) empowers the company in general meeting by ordinary resolution to convert undivided profits, including divisible profits arising by way of permanent appreciation in value of the company's assets, into capital and to distribute it by way of bonus among the ordinary stockholders in proportion to the amounts paid up. Articles 159 and 160 deal with the distribution of the property of the company between stockholders in the event of liquidation. Article 159 provides that the first preference stock shall rank before the other stocks on the company property to the extent of repayment of the amount paid. Article 160 confers on the second preference stock the same priority of ranking over the ordinary stockholders.

These articles give clear notice to the preference stockholders that there is no assured permanence of their right to a cumulative seven per cent. dividend, and there is no unfairness in abridging, if that were all, the brief period now remaining before liquidation, in which dividends might still be paid, by the use of the power to repay preference capital. The appellants' case, indeed, was not founded so much on the loss of their expectation of future dividends as on the deprivation of the major right which they said they had in the property of the company in a liquidation, and if their case on this major ground fails, their case on loss of expectation of dividend must fall with it. So much is this true that there would have been, I think, no opposition if a substantial pari passu repayment of the capital of all stockholders had been proposed. What the appellants object to is the complete extinction of their rights as stockholders by the repayment of their whole capital on the eve of liquidation, and their main claim is that, as corporators, they have an equal right with the ordinary stockholders to share in the company's property in a liquidation, unless that right is excluded by the terms of those articles by which their rights are conferred. The chief controversy is, therefore, whether arts. 159 and 160 contain an exhaustive statement of their rights in a liquidation, excluding any further right to share in what have been called the surplus assets of the company. But these articles can only be properly understood if they are read in conjunction with arts. 17, 78, 128, 139 and 141 (a). The cumulative effect of these articles is to give the ordinary stockholders power until liquidation begins to distribute among themselves in one way or another all accretions to capital which may arise either from the profits of the company or from the permanent appreciation of its assets, and I find it difficult to reconcile a power so comprehensive in its scope with an intention that the preference stockholders should, after liquidation takes place, retain an interest in the company's property beyond what is necessary to satisfy their prior claim for the return of their capital. The wording of arts. 159 and 160 appears to be well designed to give effect to this limitation of their rights. The appellants placed some reliance on the word "rank," which they said implied an ulterior right to participate in the company's property after their priority right to a return of capital and the ordinary stockholders' right to a like return were satisfied. In support of this view it was argued that there were three elements to be considered, the rights of the stockholders to dividends while the company was a going concern, and in a liquidation their rights, first, to a return of their capital and, secondly, to "surplus assets." I am unable to assent to these contentions. The word "ranking" may be used, and in Scottish legal practice it is habitually used, of an absolute and exhaustive right, and it carries no implication of an ulterior right not included in the ranking. Moreover, in art. 12, which empowers the issue of new shares "with a preferential or qualified right to dividends and to ranking on the distribution of the assets of the company," the word "ranking" is plainly used with reference to a right which may be exhaustive. The rights in liquidation are not two rights but one, a right to participate in the division of the company's property. In arts. 159 and 160 the priority ranking of the preference stockholders is expressly a ranking on "the property of the company" and there is no room for the suggestion that these articles leave over a further unexpressed ranking also on the property of the company. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that, subject to the argument based on s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the preference stockholders have no right to anything beyond what they will receive under the proposed reduction of capital.

My Lords, the same conclusion results from a consideration of the authorities and especially of Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (4). In that case art. 43 of the articles of association provided that new shares should be issued with such priority as regards dividends or in the distribution of assets as the company in general meeting might direct. The special resolution creating new shares declared :

" . . . that the holders thereof be entitled to a cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum on the amount for the time being paid up on such shares ; and that such preference shares should rank, both as regards capital and dividend, in priority to the other shares."

In the Court of Appeal it was held that the preference shareholders were not entitled in the distribution of profits to anything more than a 10 per cent. dividend. COZENS HARDY, M.R., said ([1912] 2 Ch. 576) :

"Sir Francis Palmer in his book, PALMER'S COMPANY PRECEDENTS, 11th edn., pt. I, p. 814, says : 'It is generally assumed that where the preference shares are given a fixed preferential dividend at a specified rate, that impliedly negatives any right to take any further dividend, and probably this assumption is well founded.' In my opinion that assumption is well founded."

FARWELL, L.J., agreed. But these learned judges were careful to confine their judgments to preferential dividend rights, and FARWELL, L.J., said (ibid., 580) that the considerations affecting capital and dividend were entirely different and that he did not think that you could reason from what will happen to capital in a winding up to what ought to happen to dividend while the company is a going concern. This House affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal, and VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., said ([1914] A.C. 17) :

"I should have thought that if we were dealing with an ordinary case of two individuals coming together, and if a document were produced saying 'You are to have a cumulative preferential dividend of ten per cent.' or whatever might be the equivalent in the circumstances of the bargain, it would be naturally concluded that that was the whole of the bargain between the parties on that point. You do not look outside a document of this kind in order to see what the bargain is ; you look for it as contained within the four corners of the document."

Later in his judgment he added (ibid.) :

"I think that FARWELL, L.J., called attention to what is really a cardinal consideration in this matter. Shares are not issued in the abstract and priorities then attached to them ; the issue of shares and the attachment of priorities proceed uno flatu ; and when you turn to the terms on which the shares are issued you expect to find all the rights as regards dividends specified in the terms of the issue."

With this opinion LORD LOREBURN and LORD ATKINSON agreed. My Lords, the ratio decidendi applies with equal force to priorities of participation in the company's property, and I see no ground on which it may be supposed that the declaration of rights as regards dividends is exhaustive but the declaration of rights as regards property is not exhaustive. There is as good reason and it is equally easy to define exhaustively the one set of rights as the other. In Re National Telephone Co. (9) SARGANT, J., said ([1914] 1 Ch. 774 :

" . . . it appears to me that the weight of authority is in favour of the view that, either with regard to dividend or with regard to the rights in a winding-up, the express gift or attachment of preferential rights to preference shares, on their creation, is, prima facie, a definition of the whole of their rights in that respect, and negatives any further or other right to which, but for the specified rights, they would have been entitled."

The decision of this House in Will's case (4) had not been pronounced when SARGANT, J., decided Re National Telephone Co. (9), and his opinion reflects his construction of the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The next case is Re Fraser & Chalmers, Ltd. (8) in which ASTBURY, J., held that the preference shareholders in the company were entitled to participate along with other shareholders in the company's property after repayment of the capital; but he explained later in Collaroy Co., Ltd. v. Giffard (7) that this decision was based on the particular terms of the special resolution and he retracted what he had said in Fraser v. Chalmers (8) so far as it controverted the opinion of SARGANT, J., in Re National Telephone Co. (9) which I have quoted. The last case calling for consideration is Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3). In that case EVE, J., repudiated the idea that an express direction as to ranking in priority for return of capital excludes any further pari passu ranking on surplus property, and held that the ordinary shareholders must establish that the preference shareholders had renounced their statutory rights as members of the company to share in the company's property in a liquidation. His judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. With respect to the learned judges who were parties to the decision, I have felt unable to reconcile it with the ratio of the judgment in Will's case (4). It is unnecessary for me to elaborate my reasons, because they are most clearly stated in the opinion of LORD KEITH in the present case and I could respectfully adopt what he has there said. It is, I think, not possible to distinguish Metcalfe's case (3) from the present case, and I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that it should be overruled and that the ratio of Will v. United Lankat Plantation Co., Ltd. (4) was correctly applied in Collaroy Co., Ltd. v. Giffard (7) and in Re National Telephone Co. (9).

I must now turn to s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, and I begin with what is common ground, that the statutory jurisdiction of the court to confirm reductions of capital is not ousted. It was, however, said that the court should decline to entertain applications for confirmation of a reduction of capital in the interval between the vesting date and the settlement and payment of compensation under the Act on the ground that the declared intention of Parliament is that the interests of different classes of shareholders or stockholders shall be subject to an adjustment under regulations made by virtue of s. 25. That, I think, is in accordance with the opinion of the LORD PRESIDENT (LORD COOPER). I share, however, the difficulty, which LORD GREENE, M.R., felt and expressed in his judgment in Re Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries, Ltd. (5), in appreciating what the declared intention of Parliament may be. It must be remembered that a court of law has no discretion whether it shall exercise its jurisdiction or not : judex tenetur impertiri judicium suum. The court, therefore, cannot be moved to suspend applications for confirmation of reduction of capital in order to give place to a tribunal created by a statute which has neither clearly ousted nor clearly suspended the jurisdiction. Its duty, therefore, remains, to consider whether the proposed reduction of capital is fair and equitable, but in discharging this duty it must have regard to the provisions of s. 25. If that section opens to the preference stockholders a prospect of advantage, of which they could be deprived only by a reduction of capital involving the extinction of their shares before liquidation, I would be prepared to hold that the reduction was unfair. But neither s. 25 nor the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 2360), which have been made under it since this case was before the Court of Session, justify any firm expectation of advantage to the preference stockholders. How the regulations will be applied by the tribunal is a matter of doubtful speculation.

A The ordinary stockholders are not bound to await the operation of the regulations before exercising powers which are committed to them by the articles. It was conceded that the payment of a dividend which would absorb all "surplus assets" or the distribution of a bonus which would exhaust the undivided profits could not be met by an interdict based on the plea that these were oppressive abuses of powers. Why, then, should they hold their hand if they desire to reduce the capital in the manner proposed rather than to take part in the doubtful hazard of proceedings before a tribunal constituted under s. 25?

B The company is not bound to satisfy the court that its proposals are not unfair. It has brought forward proposals which are intra vires, regular on the face of them, and in conformity with the usual practice as laid down in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACT, 11th ed., p. 120. If the objectors can find in the provisions of s. 25 or of the regulations anything which should stand in the way of the court's approval, it is for them to disclose it. If they fail to do this, the court has no material before it which would warrant a finding that the proposed reduction is unfair. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, the respondent company (hereafter called "the company") seeks to effect a reduction of its capital, by returning to the holders of its £40,000 first preference stock and £10,000 second preference stock capital to the full extent of £1 in respect of each £1 of such stock held by them respectively and thereby extinguishing these two stocks, and by returning to the holders of its £675,000 issued ordinary stock capital to the extent of 10s. in respect of each £1 of such stock held by them respectively. This reduction can only be carried out subject to confirmation

E by the court and the court will not confirm the reduction unless it is "fair and equitable." It is this discretion, vested in the court, which properly safeguards the interests of a dissenting minority: see British and American Trustee & Finance Corpn. v. Couper (6), per LORD HERSCHELL, L.C. ([1894] A.C. 406). The words "fair and equitable" are not used with any technical meaning, but

F "in the ordinary sense of those words": see per LORD MACNAGHTEN (ibid., 413). The appellants are a dissenting minority, of no fewer than 71 preference stockholders, holding among them about 45 per cent. of the preference capital, and there can, I think, be no doubt that the proposed reduction is detrimental to the preference stockholders and beneficial to the ordinary stockholders. Moreover, there is no reason for the proposed reduction, at this stage in the company's history, other than the desire of the ordinary shareholders to obtain

G a benefit for themselves at the expense of the preference shareholders. It is for your Lordships to determine whether, notwithstanding these facts, the proposed reduction is fair and equitable in all the circumstances of the present case.

In agreement with the LORD PRESIDENT (LORD COOPER) of the Court of Session, but in disagreement with the majority of the First Division, I have

H reached the conclusion that it is neither fair nor equitable. I shall first state my reasons and shall then proceed to expand them and to consider the arguments advanced at the hearing in favour of the proposed reduction. For the sake of brevity, I shall refer to the proposed reduction as "the scheme" and shall use the phrase "surplus assets" as a convenient phrase to describe the assets which remain, in the winding-up of a company, when all its creditors have been paid and all the members have been repaid the amounts paid up on the capital held by them. In so using the phrase I do not forget LORD MACNAGHTEN'S observation in Birch v. Cropper (2) (14 App. Cas. 546), that the "surplus assets" are :

" . . . part and parcel of the property of the company—part and parcel of the joint stock or common fund—which at the date of the winding-up represented the capital of the company. It is through their shares in the capital, and through their shares alone, that members of a company limited by shares become entitled to participate in the property of the company." A

My Lords, my reasons for the conclusion already stated are as follows. (i) In my view, the preference stockholders have, under the company's memorandum and articles, a right to share in the surplus assets in a winding-up. (ii) The company's substratum is gone and a winding-up is inevitable. Thus the scheme does not serve any useful business purpose connected with the carrying on of the company. The only results which will follow from it are : (a) the preference stockholders will cease to receive their interest at 7 per cent. forthwith, instead of continuing to receive it until winding-up ; (b) the preference stockholders will be excluded from any share in the surplus assets on a winding-up. The ordinary shareholders have used their voting power in order to secure these results, and for no other purpose ; there is no other reason why the company should not proceed to liquidation without taking this preliminary step. (iii) The opposition to the scheme does not come from a small or factious minority, but from a substantial minority who have excellent reasons for wishing to oppose the scheme. (iv) It is possibly of some importance that the scheme cuts out the preference stockholders from any chance of getting favourable adjustment of their interests in the company's assets under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946. As will appear hereafter, however, I attach very little weight to this point. B C D

My Lords, my first reason is of great importance. If the preference stockholders are not entitled to share in the surplus assets, the scheme at once assumes a different aspect. In the Court of Session LORD KEITH thought that they were not so entitled, and the question is, of course, one of construction. The respective rights of preference and ordinary stockholders depend entirely on the company's memorandum and articles of association, to which I now turn. By cl. 5 of the memorandum the company has power to increase its capital : E

" . . . by the creation and issue of new shares, either ordinary, or having such preference, priority and special privileges attached thereto as may be determined by special resolution of the company." F

It is, I think, unnecessary to trace the stages by which the company's capital reached its present amount. In 1923 the company by special resolution adopted new articles of association. Before that date, all the preference stock had been issued, and, in my view, no other document is material for determining the present rights of all classes of stockholders. The articles must, of course, be read as a whole, and in reading them it is important to bear in mind that (to quote LORD MACNAGHTEN in Birch v. Cropper (2) (14 App. Cas. 543)) : G

" Every person who becomes a member of a company limited by shares of equal amount becomes entitled to a proportionate part in the capital of the company, and, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, entitled, as a necessary consequence, to the same proportionate part in all the property of the company . . . " H

Thus, in the present case the preference stockholders are entitled to share in the surplus assets with the ordinary stockholders in proportion to their respective holdings, unless the articles of the company otherwise provide.

I turn first to arts. 159 and 160, since they are the only articles which deal directly with the matter in issue, though, of course, they must be read in conjunction with all the other articles, in order to get a complete picture. I shall quote these two articles, as they have not yet been read in full :

" 159. In the event of the company being wound-up, the preference shares (first issue) shall rank before the other shares of the company on the property of the company, to the extent of repayment of the amounts called up and paid thereon.

A 160. In the event of the company being wound-up, the preference shares (second issue) shall rank before the ordinary shares but after the said preference shares (first issue) on the property of the company to the extent of repayment of the amounts called up and paid thereon."

B As these two articles are similar in their terms, mutatis mutandis, it will be sufficient to examine one of them in detail. Certainly neither of them contains any words which expressly exclude the preference stockholders from sharing in the surplus assets, although such words are very commonly found in a company's articles, and they appear, for instance, in the articles of Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries, Ltd., the respondent company in the next appeal before this House*. The omission of any words of exclusion is, I think, somewhat significant. The new articles were adopted in 1923, and in 1919 ASTBURY, J., had decided in Re Fraser and Chalmers, Ltd. (8) that the preference shareholders in the company then in question were entitled to share in the surplus assets, pointing out ([1919] 2 Ch. 120) that :

D "All shareholders are entitled to equal treatment unless and to the extent that their rights in this respect are modified by the contract under which they hold their shares."

This was the last relevant decision before the company in the present case adopted its new articles, and I think that, if it had been intended to exclude the preference shareholders from any share in the surplus assets, express words of exclusion would have been inserted in arts. 159 and 160. Are there any words which raise an implication of such an exclusion ? My Lords, I cannot find them. Article 159 is concerned simply with the order in which shares shall rank "on the property of the company," and the extent to which the first preference shares (now stock) shall rank before the other shares of the company. They are to rank before the other shares, on that property, to the extent of repayment of the amounts paid up. Surely the implication is that, except to the extent

E just stated, the preference shares are to have no priority, but are to rank equally on any property of the company which is left after the paid-up capital has been repaid ? If, however, there is no such implication, there is not a word which raises the implication that they are to be excluded from the ordinary right, as corporators, to share equally with other corporators in a winding-up on this portion of "the property of the company." Turning now to the other articles,

G I look in vain for any words which expressly or impliedly exclude the preference shareholder from the right just mentioned. I would first note that art. 12 has no relation to the existing preference stock, as it had all been issued before this article was adopted. I do not think it matters whether or not there was an earlier article in the same terms, as the present rights of all stockholders depend on the 1923 articles. Counsel for the company relied particularly on arts. 128,

H 139 and 141 (a). I shall have to return to these articles later, and I have no desire to minimise the marked difference between the position of the preference and the ordinary stockholders in regard to the profits, while the company is a going concern. But, with all respect to those who think otherwise, I cannot obtain from these three articles any light on the respective positions of the preference and the ordinary stockholders when the company goes into liquidation. As ROMER, L.J., said ([1933] Ch. 161) in Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) :

"... because . . . the preference shareholders, as regards dividend, are entitled to nothing more than the fixed preferential dividend expressed to be given to them, it does not in the least follow that so far as regards their rights in a winding-up they are only entitled to the privileges of preference expressly given to them in that respect."

In order to find out how the company's property is to be dealt with when that event happens, one has to return to the articles dealing with the position in a winding-up. I have already dealt with arts. 159 and 160, and, having travelled full circle, I have discovered nothing which expressly or impliedly deprives the preference stockholders of their ordinary right as corporators to share in the surplus assets in a winding-up.

My Lords, I hope and believe that I have avoided approaching this question of construction "with any obsession or preconceived idea as to the inherent equality between shareholders in a company," to quote again ROMER, L.J. ([1933] Ch. 159) in Metcalfe's case (3). I have construed the memorandum and articles with an entirely open mind, and having construed them I fall back on that inherent equality which is, to my mind, in no way disturbed by the regulations of the company. I leave the articles by asking, and answering to the best of my ability, two questions : (a) What would have been the position as to the distribution of the company's property on a winding-up if the articles had contained no provisions at all as to how that property was to be distributed ? In that event there could, I suppose, be no doubt that the balance remaining after payment in full of the creditors would have been divisible equally among all the stockholders, preference and ordinary alike, under ss. 211 and 247 of the Companies Act, 1929 : see Birch v. Cropper (2) per LORD MACNAGHTEN (14 App. Cas. 546, 547). (b) To what extent is the position altered by the memorandum and articles of this company ? Answer—The only provisions as to this are contained in arts. 159 and 160, and they do no more than confer a priority on the preference stockholders "to the extent of" repayment of their capital.

My Lords, in every case the answer to the question now under consideration depends on the true construction of the regulations of the company in question. I am, however, strengthened in the view which I have formed by the closely reasoned judgment of EVE, J., in Metcalfe's case (3), unanimously accepted by the Court of Appeal as correct. There are, of course, differences, in the wording of the memorandum and relevant articles, between the present case and Metcalfe's case (3). The articles are very shortly set out in the report, which does not show whether or not there were any articles on the same lines as arts. 128, 139 and 141 (a) in the present case, but counsel for the ordinary shareholders argued ([1933] Ch. 144) :

"... the moment before the winding-up the ordinary shareholders could have passed a resolution dividing the whole of the surplus assets or accumulated profits between them."

This argument was dealt with by EVE, J. (ibid., 151, 152). I think, therefore, that any distinction which exists between the present case and Metcalfe's case (3) must be an extremely fine one.

Metcalfe's case (3) settled, so far as regards the Court of Appeal, a long-standing difference of judicial opinion which is fully set out in the judgments. It is not binding on your Lordships' House, but, in my view, the decision, and the reasoning on which it was founded, were correct. I also agree with the reasoning and the decision in Liquidators of Williamson-Buchanan Steamers, Ltd. (10). I have not overlooked Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. (1). If the preference stock were to continue in existence until liquidation, interesting questions might arise whether that case was rightly decided, and, if so, whether the facts of the present case would support any claim by the ordinary stockholders similar to the claim successfully put forward in the Bridgewater case (1). I do not, however, find that case, in which the facts were of a very special nature, of any assistance on the question of construction which arises on the present case.

A It is, of course, necessary to consider carefully the decision of this House in Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (4). I would observe, first, that the House was then dealing only with a question of the rights of the preference shareholders in respect of dividend while the company was a going concern, but certain observations of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., were much relied on by counsel for the company. My Lords, for my part, I do not think that B VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., was addressing his mind in the slightest degree to the rights which the preference shareholders would have in a winding-up. These rights were not in dispute in this House: see Collaroy Co., Ltd. v. Giffard (7) ([1928] Ch. 154, n.). VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., was delivering an impromptu opinion on one topic only, and I do not think he intended his words to be applied to any other topic. The other noble and learned Lords also C concentrated on the topic with which alone the case was concerned. I cannot form any idea what view the House would have taken if the rights of the preference shareholders to surplus assets in a winding-up had been under consideration. I am supported in my view that Will's case (4) is of no assistance in the present problem by the following facts. (a) When Will's case (4) was heard in the Court of Appeal COZENS-HARDY, M.R., clearly thought that the preference shareholders would share in surplus assets in a winding-up D ([1912] 2 Ch. 578), while FARWELL, L.J., said (ibid., 580):

“To my mind the considerations affecting capital and dividend are entirely different. The preference given to capital is in the winding-up, and the preference claimed to be given to dividend here is in a going concern; and I do not think that you can reason from what will happen to capital in a winding-up to what ought to happen to dividend while the company is a going concern. As to what may happen in a winding-up I express no opinion. SIR FRANCIS PALMER says this, immediately following the passage read by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in PALMER'S COMPANY PRECEDENTS, 11th ed., pt. i, p. 814: ‘Where preference shares are given a preference as regards capital, that does not impliedly exclude them from sharing in the surplus assets in winding-up, after clearing off the whole of the paid-up capital: Re Espuela Land and Cattle Co. (11). It is, therefore, open to contention that the attachment of a preferential dividend does not impliedly exclude the right to participate in surplus profits after paying a like dividend on the subordinate shares. In order, however, to preclude any question on this point, it has for some time past been customary to insert express words negating the right of preference shareholders to participate in further profits.’” E F G

If this House, in affirming the Court of Appeal, had disagreed with these observations, it would seem likely that some member of the House would have criticised them. The absence of any such criticism may indicate that their Lordships either formed no view upon the observations of COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and FARWELL, L.J., or agreed with those observations. (b) In Metcalfe's case (3) all the members of the Court of Appeal mentioned Will's case (4), and clearly did not think it contained anything adverse to the reasoning of EVE, J. (c) It may possibly be material to note that in Will's case (4) this House had to consider the joint effect of the second resolution of July 13, 1891, which (to quote VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C. ([1914] A.C. 16)) “gave the authority to make the bargain and defined the terms which the bargain was to contain” when the preference shares were issued, and the articles of the company, in H particular, art. 43. In the present case the first preference shares were created in 1878, and the second preference shares in 1892 and the present rights of the shareholders are defined by the articles adopted in 1923. Your Lordships do not know, nor, in my view, is it now material to know, what were the terms of the original offer of preference shares at the time when they were created. For these reasons, my Lords, I am of opinion that the preference shareholders in the present case are entitled to share in the surplus assets, and that the authorities furnish no good ground for a contrary conclusion. A

I now come to my second reason for thinking that the scheme is unfair and inequitable, and I should like to adopt, respectfully, the summary of the situation given by the learned LORD PRESIDENT (LORD COOPER) (1948 Sc. L.T. 276):

“What are the admitted facts? This company’s capital structure consists of preference and ordinary stock in the ratio of roughly 1 to 13. Its business was coal-mining, and on Jan. 1, 1947, its collieries and working assets passed to the National Coal Board in exchange for a share, as yet undetermined, in the global sum of compensation. Liquidation is inevitable. The company’s substratum is gone. Its remaining assets, consisting of investments and cash, can no longer be employed in prosecuting the objects for which it was formed. No resumption of business is in contemplation. It survives, with one foot in the grave, solely for the purposes of being wound-up, and it will be wound-up as soon as the compensation has been ascertained. There is no question in this case, as in earlier cases, of recasting the company’s finances in its interests as a trading entity. There is no question here of discretionary forecasts of business men as to the company’s commercial future. This company’s future is behind it. Its creditors are provided for. There is only one active controversy, viz., the division of the assets amongst the shareholders. These assets, even without taking into account the compensation from the National Coal Board, are ‘much more than sufficient’ to meet all liabilities, and a glance at the balance sheets is enough to show that at the end of the day there are bound to be considerable surplus assets. Faced with this situation (which must have a parallel in many other concerns affected by nationalisation of the industries in which they have previously been engaged), this company determined to wind-up by instalments and to die by inches. On Sept. 26, 1947, a special resolution was passed (by a majority) reducing the capital from £850,000 to £462,000 by returning capital to the shareholders to the extent of £388,000, described as being in excess of the wants of the company, as it manifestly is. Had this return of capital been effected rateably, no objection could have been stated. But the proposal is to pay off the whole preference stock at par and to return 10s. in the £ to the ordinary stockholders, who, if the scheme is approved, will be left in undisputed possession of the field. In answer to a protest on behalf of the preference stockholders, the secretary of the company wrote on Sept. 17, 1947: ‘In view of the passing of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the liquidation of this company sooner or later is inevitable. The proposed reduction of capital is only the first step in that direction, the directors being unwilling to proceed with formal liquidation until further progress has been made with the adjustment of the company’s claims . . .’ (The italics are mine). Confirmation is now opposed not by a single obstructive shareholder, or a small coterie of dissentients, but by 71 preference stockholders holding 45 per cent. of the preference stock.” B C D E F G H

Later, the LORD PRESIDENT said (ibid., 277):

“If it were not anticipated by both parties that there will be a substantial surplus after repaying to all the shareholders their subscribed capital—and on the accounts this anticipation is plainly well founded—this case would be academic. Both parties see that, if there is no ‘first step’ of a reduction of capital to extinguish the preference stock at par, the surplus assets will have to be divided between all the shareholders, whereas if this reduction is confirmed, the whole of the surplus assets will be appropriated by the ordinary stockholders, and the preference stockholders will get nothing but the par value of their stock. The ordinary stockholders have used their voting predominance with the object of cutting the preference stockholders out, and the question for us is whether in the circumstances that is, in a business sense, fair and equitable.”

Finally, he observed (ibid.) :

“ . . . it can make no appreciable difference to these ordinary stockholders whether they get 10s. in the £ now at the ‘first step’ in the winding-up, or whether the relative investments continue to be held by the company until the ‘formal liquidation.’ On the other hand, it is impossible on any business view of the matter to see how in the inevitable liquidation the preference stockholders could ever get less than 20s. in the £ for their stock ; and if they are forced to accept 20s. now and to forego their right to a seven per cent. dividend and to participation in the surplus assets in the liquidation, they are being bought off for less than a just equivalent, and this loss is being inflicted upon them not in the interests of the company but solely in order that the ordinary stockholders may eventually appropriate 13-13ths of the surplus assets instead of 12-13ths. This is not my idea of what is just or equitable, and I do not believe that any jury of business men would so regard it.”

My Lords, these passages express so clearly my own views on this branch of the case that I would only add this—there is no question in the present case of a “continuing burden” on the company in paying the dividend on the preference stock. Winding-up is inevitable, the sum required to pay this dividend only amounts to £3,500 gross per annum, and this sum cannot seriously be regarded as a burden, having regard to the free assets of the company and the “interim income” provisions of the Act of 1946 [ss. 19 (2) and 22.]

My third reason, as to the nature of the opposition to the scheme, is also dealt with in the passages quoted above. I would only add that it is not, of course, to be supposed that the holders of the remaining 55 per cent. of preference stock support the scheme, merely because they have not appeared in these proceedings. Indeed, I find it difficult to imagine that any well-informed preference stockholder would support the scheme, unless he were also a still larger holder of ordinary stock. I do not place much weight on my fourth reason, because it is impossible to foretell with any accuracy what (if any) adjustments of interests will ultimately be made under s. 25 of the Act of 1946, if the preference stock continues in being. There may be cases in which it can be said that an adjustment will probably be made in favour of preference stockholders, but I am not satisfied that this is such a case. The existence of s. 25 is, I think, of little importance in the present case, one way or the other. It certainly cannot be regarded as suspending the power of the court to approve a reduction of capital ; it is merely a circumstance to be taken into account when the court is exercising its discretion.

My Lords, I now turn to the reasons urged by counsel in favour of the scheme. First, it is said that it is the ordinary practice, where money is to be returned to the shareholders in a company, to return it in the same manner as capital is repayable in a winding-up. Counsel referred, as part of his argument, to a passage in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 11th ed., p. 120, which has appeared in a number of editions of that work, including at least one which LORD WRENBURY himself prepared. There is a striking lack of authority on this point, but I would agree that in an ordinary case, where a company is intending to carrying on business and desires to pay off any paid-up share capital under s. 55 (1) (c) of the Act of 1929, the practice is as stated in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACT. It is still necessary, however, for the court to consider with care in each case whether a scheme is fair and equitable in the circumstances of that particular case. It is not enough for those supporting a scheme to say "the company is still in being and the proposed repayment is in accordance with the ordinary practice." If that were enough, the court's discretion would be cut out and the ordinary shareholders would be able to treat preference shares as being redeemable, at their option, as soon as sufficient capital, in excess of the wants of the company, became available for the purpose. The practice can, at most, have the effect of making it necessary for objectors to point to some circumstances which distinguish the case under consideration from the ordinary run of cases. Here they can point at once to the taking over of the company's business by legislative action, the imminence of liquidation, and the absence of any reason, from the standpoint of the company's business, for any repayment of capital at this stage. Thus I think that the practice in question is of little assistance to the respondent company's argument. The ordinary stockholders are, in effect, seeking to use to the detriment of the preference stockholders a priority in respect of capital which was intended to be for their benefit. I would call attention, on this point, to the contrast drawn between the position of a company intending to continue its business and a company whose business is at an end in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Re Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries, Ltd. (5) which your Lordships are about to consider*. The considerations which make the practice prima facie a fair and convenient one in the former case have no application in the latter case.

Next, reliance is placed on art. 139, and, in particular, on the power expressly given to the directors to set aside, out of the profits, a reserve fund to be used, inter alia, "for making provision for paying off the preference share capital." This provision formed, I think, the basis for LORD RUSSELL's approval of the scheme, but, with all respect, I feel that he gave too little weight to the fact that this article gave the ordinary stockholders no contractual right to pay off the preference. If and when provision had been made for this purpose, it would still have been necessary to bring the proposal before the court for its confirmation or rejection. In this House it was argued that this article "gave warning" to the preference stockholders that they might be paid off some day, and, therefore, they could not properly complain if this event happened. No doubt, any stockholder who read art. 139 would be given this warning. But, in the case of every company whose articles contain no provision as to the redemption of its preference shares, every preference shareholder who reads s. 55 of the Act of 1929 is given warning that, subject to confirmation by the court, a scheme may provide for the payment off of his shares. The preference stockholders in this company are in exactly the same position; they may be paid off if the court, in its discretion, thinks fit, and they will not be paid off if the court does not think it fair and equitable. I cannot see why the existence of this "warning" in art. 139 should be of any real assistance to this House in deciding the question whether payment off, in the present circumstances, is fair and equitable. It may not be irrelevant to note that no funds have ever been set aside for the express purpose of paying off the preference stock, which has stood at the figure of £50,000 for over 50 years. I think that the LORD PRESIDENT was justified in observing (1948, Sc. L.T. 277) that:

"... but for the Act of 1946, the investment would in all human probability have continued to yield seven per cent. for an indefinite time..."

Lastly, and this is, I think, the point which was most strongly pressed, it is said that there can be nothing unfair or inequitable about the scheme, because the profits (after payment of the preference dividend) are divisible among the ordinary stockholders under s. 128; any surplus assets are due to the abstinence of the ordinary shareholders as regards dividends in the past, and the ordinary shareholders could now, if they thought fit, use their voting power to divide the surplus assets among themselves, either (a) by declaring a vast ordinary dividend under art. 129, or (b) by capitalising all undivided profits under art. 141 (a) and distributing the resulting capital among themselves by way of bonus. My Lords, I was at first impressed by this argument, but I have come to the conclusion that it is of little weight. Article 128 merely expresses that which is the ordinary rule in companies having preference shares, and no doubt there were good reasons, from the point of view of the company's business, why no larger ordinary dividends were paid in the past. Now comes an event, imposed on the company from without, which puts an end to the company's business. The fact that there are surplus assets arises partly from this event and only partly from the past abstinence of the ordinary stockholders. I have already said why I think it would be unfair if the preference stockholders were now cut out by the proposed reduction of capital. In my view, it would also be unfair if at this stage the ordinary stockholders were to adopt either course (a) or course (b) already mentioned. It is quite true that they have a contractual right to do so, but it is easy to think of many cases in which it becomes unfair for a man to exercise a contractual right in a particular way—cases in which some unexpected event happens, giving rise to a state of circumstances utterly different from that which the parties contemplated. In the present case, nationalisation has come on the company and has made liquidation inevitable. The preference stockholders are about to lose an investment which they would have liked to keep; the ordinary stockholders would probably have preferred the company's business to continue. In these circumstances it does not avail the ordinary stockholders to say: "This scheme is not unfair, because we could have achieved the same result by employing either of two other methods." I would reply: "Be it so; the adoption of either of these two methods would be unfair. It may be that the court could not prevent you from achieving your ends by either of these methods, but you have chosen a third method which gives the court a discretion to stop you, and you will be stopped." For these reasons I do not think that your Lordships' decision should be affected by the "alternative methods" argument. The only question before you is in regard to this particular scheme for getting rid of the preference shareholders. Is it fair and equitable or not? I think it is not. I would allow the appeal, with the result that the company's petition for confirmation of the reduction of capital would meet with the fate which, in my view, it richly deserves, that of dismissal with costs.

* See p. 1094 post.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE CO., LTD. AND OTHERS
v. CHATTERLEY-WHITFIELD COLLIERIES CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Maugham, Lord Simonds, Lord Uthwatt,* Lord Normand and Lord Morton of Henryton), March 3, 7, May 6, 1949.]

Coal—Nationalisation of industry—Colliery company—Reduction of capital—Rights of shareholders under Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (c. 59), s. 25 (1). A

A colliery company, whose capital of £400,000 was divided into 20,000 six per cent. preference shares of £10 each and the same number of ordinary shares of a like nominal value, passed a special resolution, as empowered by its articles of association, to reduce its capital to £200,000 by returning to the preference shareholders the whole capital paid up on their shares. The articles conferred on the preference shareholders a right to a cumulative preference dividend of 6 per cent., and on winding-up, in priority to ordinary shareholders, to repayment of capital together with any arrears of dividend down to the date of such repayment in priority to the claims of the holders of ordinary shares, but to no other participation in the assets. On Jan. 1, 1947, under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the company's colliery undertaking became vested in the National Coal Board, and, pending the payment of compensation, the company was entitled under s. 22 (3) of the Act to interim income, and under s. 22 (2) to interest on the amount of the compensation. The Act provides by s. 25 : " (1) Provision shall be made by regulations for due regard being had, as between classes . . . of members . . . of a company being an owner of transferred interests, to what their relative expectations of income yield from their respective interest in the company would have been if this Act had not been passed, and for that purpose the regulations shall provide facilities for adjusting the respective interests of such classes in the company's assets as affected by the substitution of the compensation under this Act for the transferred interests of the company so as to give effect, so far as may be, on the one hand to the said expectations and on the other hand to the rights of priority conferred on such classes respectively by the . . . memorandum and articles of association of the company." Certain preference shareholders dissented from the resolution to reduce capital in the proposed manner and opposed the petition to confirm it. It appeared that the company was not contemplating liquidation, but was prospecting for coal in Ireland and had other activities in view. B C D E F

HELD: the jurisdiction of the court to adjudicate on the proposed reduction of capital was unaffected by the provisions of s. 25, and it was the duty of the court not to postpone consideration of the proposed reduction, but, giving such weight as it thought proper to s. 25, to dispose of the matter ; in accordance with the principles on which the jurisdiction was exercised the proposal in the present case was fair and equitable ; and, therefore, it was proper to be confirmed. * LORD UTHWATT died on April 24th, 1949, before the opinions were delivered.

A APPEAL by dissenting preference shareholders from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., and ASQUITH, L.J., EVERSHED, L.J., dissenting), dated July 30, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 593, reversing an order of His Honour JUDGE PEEL, K.C., Deputy Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy and County Palatine of Lancaster, reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 911, and confirming a proposal by a colliery company to reduce its capital by repayment of the whole of its preference capital. The House of Lords now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD SIMONDS.

Sir Cyril Radcliffe, K.C., Ungood-Thomas, K.C. and Raymond Walton for the appellants (the dissenting preference shareholders).

Christie, K.C., and Eric Griffith for the company.

B The House took time for consideration.
May 6. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT MAUGHAM : My Lords, the facts in this appeal are sufficiently stated in the speech of my noble and learned friend LORD SIMONDS and no useful purpose would be served by my repeating them. It is not in dispute that, if the company had thought fit to pass a voluntary resolution for a winding-up, or to do so in the near future, the rights of the preference shareholders (apart from any possible action by the tribunal appointed under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946), would be to receive a repayment of their share capital together with any arrears of preference dividend and they would have no other right to participate in the assets of the company. The unusual position is that the appellants, as holders of a substantial number of preference shares, object to the proposed reduction of capital by a repayment in full of their preference capital. Desiring to retain their preference shares though the undertaking of the company has been entirely changed, they invite the court to hold that the proposed repayment is unfair and inequitable and that the reduction ought not, therefore, to be approved. They acquired their shares on the footing that, subject, no doubt, to the approval of the court, they might be paid off under art. 43 of the company's articles of association, but this they urge at the Bar is not the occasion or the method which should be adopted for such a reduction. They, perhaps, wisely do not tell us when that course would, in their view, be appropriate.

My Lords, I do not propose to state the grounds on which the majority in the Court of Appeal or my noble friends in this House have declined to accept this contention, but I should like to add a few observations of my own, for the simplest arguments sometimes escape attention merely because they are assumed. In the present case the main fact is that the undertaking of the company has been compulsorily acquired by the National Coal Board under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946. There is no longer, therefore, any reason for the retention by the company of the assets and funds of great value which have been slowly added to year by year with a view to meeting contingencies or spending enormous sums in improving or re-constructing or enlarging the colliery undertaking. The obvious thing to do would be to wind-up and distribute all the assets after paying debts and liabilities in accordance with the articles. It is not, I think, suggested that the holders of preference shares could properly object to such a course. They would cease to own a well-secured six per cent. investment, and the ordinary shareholders would no longer possess shares paying in recent years double that amount in dividend. The object of the Coal Act was not, of course, the benefit of shareholders, but, if we ask whether in this case preference or ordinary shareholders are the most injured by the transfer subject to compensation of the colliery undertaking to a State enterprise, I think the current view of commercial men would probably be that the ordinary shareholders are the greater victims. The company, however, proposes not to go into liquidation, at any rate at present, but to embark on two entirely new ventures in Eire and Northern Ireland, one of them a new colliery, if prospective operations should prove satisfactory, and the other the business of digging for clay and the manufacture of tiles and like articles. The necessary working capital for those enterprises is only a fraction of the available existing funds of the company, and, accordingly, the special resolution duly passed by the company in general meeting on Oct. 30, 1947, provided for the reduction of the capital of the company from £400,000 to £200,000 by returning to the preference shareholders the amounts paid up on their shares. It is, in my opinion, from the point of view of those shareholders an accidental circumstance that a large majority of the ordinary shareholders have approved of the starting of two entirely new, and it may be highly speculative, enterprises with which the preference shareholders, if the reduction goes through, will obviously have no concern. If the preference shares are not paid off, and the new undertaking proved to be a success, the preference shares would become more and more valuable as the assets of the company became increasingly substantial. If, on the other hand, the undertaking were unsuccessful, those shares might nevertheless be worth par in a winding-up while the ordinary shares might have become valueless. The risk, in short, would be the risk of the ordinary shareholders, while the gain might well be that of the preference shareholders. That proposal does not commend itself to me as a fair one, and the same objection, with smaller figures affected, must apply to a proposal for a pari passu reduction of the ordinary and the preference shares. In short, like my noble friend LORD SIMONDS, I am at a loss to see what other method of reduction is to be preferred as more fair and equitable in the circumstances of this case.

The question of the effect of s. 25 of the Coal Act on the present case is one with which your Lordships have dealt in the very recent case of the Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1). That was also the case of a company whose undertaking was a colliery, and the dispute, as here, was between two classes of shareholders, but that company proposes to go into liquidation as soon as the amount of compensation payable under the Coal Act has been ascertained, and the preference shareholders were claiming (but unsuccessfully) to be entitled to rank equally in the winding-up with the ordinary shareholders in the surplus assets of the company, that is, in the assets available after payment of debts and liabilities and the amounts of capital paid on the ordinary and preference shares. Counsel for the preference shareholders there, as here, relied on s. 25 of the Coal Act and said that the proposed reduction of capital deprived the preference shareholders of their right to an adjustment of their interest in the company's assets. Your Lordships have now dealt with the appeal in that case and have considered the regulations [the Coal Industry Nationalisation (Company Adjustment) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 2360)] which have now been made under s. 25. They have held that there was no ground in that case for postponing the decision of the court on the petition before the court, and they were not persuaded that there was good reason for thinking that the apparent fairness of the proposal before the court would be affected or displaced by any order which was in the least likely to be made under the jurisdiction derived from s. 25. The reduction here proposed, in my opinion, is in itself fair and equitable, and there is here, as in the previous case, no real ground for the speculation that the tribunal might give the preference shareholders anything more than they would become entitled to receive in a liquidation. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords this appeal is from an order of the Court of Appeal reversing an order of His Honour JUDGE PEEL, K.C., sitting as the deputy of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster. That learned judge had dismissed a petition presented by Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries,

A Ltd., which I will call the company, under s. 55 of the Companies Act, 1929, for confirmation of the reduction of its capital by repayment of the whole of its preference capital. The Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., and ASQUITH, L.J., EVERSHED, L.J., dissenting) reversed his decision and confirmed the reduction. Hence this appeal by two large holders of preference shares. Apart from a question that arises under s. 25 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, which I will call "the Coal Act," the case is, I think, free from difficulty.

B The company was incorporated in 1891 with the principal objects of acquiring certain properties from the North of England Trustee Debenture and Assets Corporation, Ltd. and carrying on the business of colliery proprietors, and since its incorporation its principal business has been that of a colliery undertaking in Staffordshire. It is a private company. Clause 5 of the company's memorandum of association provides that the capital is £400,000 divided into 40,000 shares of £10 each with power to increase the same and to issue any shares with any preference or priority. The capital has at all times been £400,000 divided into 40,000 shares of £10 each, of which 20,000 are preference and 20,000 ordinary shares. All the shares have been issued and are fully paid. C The preference shares were issued and fully paid many years ago. The ordinary shares were also issued many years ago, but the final call of £2 10s. per share was not made in respect of them until 1939. The present articles of association of the company were adopted by special resolution on Apr. 28, 1944. I think it necessary to mention few of them. By art. 7 (which, in effect, replaced one of the original articles) the holders of preference shares have the right to a fixed D cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the amount paid up thereon, and, in the event of the winding-up of the company, to repayment of capital together with any arrears of dividend down to the date of such repayment in priority to the claims of the holders of ordinary shares, but have no other right to participate in the assets of the company. Article 43 E empowers the company by special resolution to reduce its capital in any manner authorised by law. Article 65 provides that on a show of hands every member present in person shall have one vote and that on a poll every member present in person or by proxy shall have one vote for every share held by him. Article 109 provides for the creation of a reserve fund which may be used for any purpose for which the net profits of the company may lawfully be used.

F On Jan. 1, 1947, the company's colliery undertaking vested in the National Coal Board under the provisions of the Coal Act. The company thereupon became entitled to receive from the Crown a sum by way of compensation for the expropriation of its property. The major part of this sum, which is to be ascertained by means of (a) the ascertainment by arbitration of the value of the assets of the industry as a whole ; (b) the division of the sum so ascertained by award of a Central Valuation Board among the several mining districts in G the country ; and (c) the division by awards of District Valuation Boards of each district's share among the colliery owners of the district, will ultimately be satisfied by an issue of government stock. On the other hand, the compensation to be paid in respect of certain assets such as stores and coal stocks is payable in cash. It is further provided by s. 22 (2) and (3) of the Coal Act that interim income is payable by the Crown at a prescribed rate for the first H two years after the vesting date, and that thereafter the colliery owner shall be entitled to interest on the sum ultimately found due to him, also at a prescribed rate, but such interest is not payable until the compensation is finally paid. Before I further examine the impact of these provisions on the affairs of the company I will say a few words about its history.

From the time of its incorporation the company carried on its colliery business with a considerable measure of success. It earned large profits, and, after paying the 6 per cent. preference dividend, was able during the 12 years before national-isation to pay an average dividend of 12 per cent. on its ordinary shares and to build up a substantial reserve fund and to carry forward a very large sum on Jan. 1, 1947. The profits in the last year of working were exceptionally large, but the picture as a whole is of a successful and prosperous company which had been conservative in its financial policy and could look to the future with confidence. The main undertaking of the company has now gone, but it does not propose to go into liquidation. It intends to carry on coal mining in Northern Ireland if the prospecting in which it is now engaged proves successful, and also through a subsidiary company to carry on the business of digging for clay and manufacturing drain pipes and other articles, but there is no dispute that the effect of nationalisation with its provision for compensation in cash and in stock is to leave the company with liquid assets far in excess of its needs. It is, therefore, the natural and obvious course for it to pursue to reduce its capital by repayment of some part of its share capital. I do not understand that this proposition is disputed by the appellants. It is the proposed method of reduction that is challenged. On Oct. 30, 1947, a meeting of the company was held at which a resolution was passed as a special resolution for reducing the capital of the company from £400,000 to £200,000 by returning to the holders of the 20,000 preference shares the capital paid up thereon. 30,217 votes were cast for the resolution and 6,000 against it. Some attempt has been made to analyse the votes cast for the resolution in order to show that with few exceptions those who so voted either held ordinary shares only or had a greater interest in ordinary than in preference shares. I do not intend to pursue this matter, which would, I think, only be of importance if the preference shareholders made out a prima facie case that the result was in any way unfair to them and such as could only have been reached by the influence of some improper or, at least, extraneous consideration, but this is far from being the case, for, apart from the special element introduced by the Coal Act, I am wholly at a loss to see what other method of reduction is to be preferred as more fair and equitable. LORD GREENE, M.R., has stated in language, on which I cannot hope to improve, the principles on which the court has acted and should continue to act in its discretionary jurisdiction to confirm or refuse to confirm a reduction of capital. In accordance with those principles the reduction of capital in this case by repayment of the preference shareholders is fair and equitable and proper to be confirmed, unless the Coal Act induces a different conclusion.

In Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1), which has been appealed to this House from the Court of Session, your Lordships have had to consider the incidence of s. 25 of the Coal Act on the jurisdiction of the court in company matters and I would not repeat at length what I said in that case. It was conceded at the Bar that the jurisdiction of the court is not ousted, but the practical result of the able argument of counsel for the appellants would be to require the court to hold its hand in every case, in which a party interested, ordinary or preference shareholder, or, I suppose, debenture holder, might possibly apply to the tribunal which is to be set up under the Act. A simple reduction of capital, a more complicated scheme of arrangement, even, I think, a debenture holder's action, where a colliery undertaking is involved, must await the deliverance of the tribunal. Neither s. 25 nor the regulations now made under it give any guidance as to the way in which the rights of interested persons are to be adjusted, and, though now in 1949 the ascertainment of the compensation payable to the company and the setting up of tribunals under the Act may be regarded as appreciably nearer than they were in 1947 when the special resolution for reduction was passed, it is not possible to give any real content to the claims of the preference shareholders or to predict when they may be adjudicated on by any tribunal. In these circumstances I am satisfied that it is the duty of the court not to postpone the consideration of a new proposed reduction, but, giving such weight as it thinks proper to s. 25, to dispose of the matter. Dealing with the petition in this way I can see no reason for thinking that a claim by preference shareholders to be repaid more than the nominal amount of their capital has any substance in it. Counsel for the appellants, being asked to indicate the sort of adjustment that the preference shareholders might fairly claim, suggested that they might get £12 for every £10 of capital on their submitting to be paid off. As I said

A in the recent appeal from the Court of Session, I should not wish to prejudice any similar claim that may come before a statutory tribunal, but I see no slightest justification for such a claim. Of the two elements that have to be considered, "rights of priority" and "relative expectations of income yield,"

B the first is fully satisfied in favour of the preference shareholders by the repayment of their capital in full before any payment is made to the ordinary shareholders. The second is more difficult to evaluate, but it is surely the ordinary shareholders whose position has been prejudiced by the expropriation of the company's property. The preference shareholders may or may not eventually find a 6 per cent. investment for their money. Probably they will not, but it is in the highest degree unlikely that the ordinary shareholders will receive an income commensurate with what they might reasonably have expected if

C the Act had not been passed. It is, therefore, to put it at the lowest, so unlikely that the preference shareholders can get anything more than the full amount of their capital returned to them, that the court should not depart from its well-known and familiar practice in dealing with a petition to confirm a reduction of capital. This practice would, as I have already pointed out, lead to a confirmation of the reduction proposed in this case. I am of opinion, therefore,

D that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, your Lordships have just decided in Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1), with only one dissident, that the proposed reduction of the capital of Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd., is fair and equitable. The reasons which led your

E Lordships to that conclusion seem to me to apply with even more force to the circumstances of the present appeal, and I, therefore, concur in the motion proposed.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I agree with the opinions delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack and by my noble and learned friend

F LORD SIMONDS. I would only add that the judgment pronounced today in Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1) necessarily leads to the conclusion that the appeal in this case fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), May 6, 1949.]

Will—Gift—Uncertainty of object—Direction to set aside fund to provide £2 per week to be paid to the cause for which appeal broadcast on Sunday.

By her will, dated June 22, 1938, a testatrix, who died in September, 1946, devised and bequeathed the whole of her estate to her trustees on trust for sale. She directed her trustees to set apart a fund, called the B.B.C. trust fund, sufficient to produce £104 per annum, and continued: "I declare that my trustees shall hold the B.B.C. trust fund upon trust . . . out of the income . . . to pay or cause to be paid each week the sum of £2 towards the funds of the society, institution or body corporate or incorporate on behalf of which an appeal shall have been transmitted on the Sunday from the National station of the British Broadcasting Corporation or other body corporate or incorporate authority or government department for the time being exercising the functions now exercised by the British Broadcasting Corporation And I declare that if by reason of alteration of existing arrangements or circumstances it shall become impossible for my trustees to carry out the foregoing trust provisions my trustees shall apply the income of the said B.B.C. trust fund in such manner as shall in the opinion of my trustees carry out the objects of the trusts thereof as nearly as may be." It was accepted that the cause for which an appeal might be made would not necessarily be charitable, but it was argued that the bequest was good for 21 years.

HELD: the gift had no object which was certain or could be made certain by the directions given by the testatrix, but the object depended on the decision of someone else, and, therefore, the gift failed for uncertainty.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the true construction of a will a gift to provide £2 per week for the causes for which appeals were broadcast on Sundays by the British Broadcasting Corporation was a valid charitable gift, or, in the event of its being held not to be charitable, whether the gift was (a) wholly valid, (b) wholly void, (c) valid for 21 years from the testatrix's death, or (d) valid for some other, and, if so, what, period. HARMAN, J., held that the gift was wholly void for uncertainty. The facts appear in the judgment.

Geoffrey Cross, K.C., for the plaintiff, one of the executors.

McMullen for the first and second defendants, interested in the residuary estate.

J. A. Wolfe for the third defendant, the Distressed Gentlefolks' Aid Association, for whom an appeal had been broadcast since the testatrix's death.

Danckwerts for the Attorney-General.

HARMAN, J.: Irene Constance Wood made her will on June 22, 1938, and died in September, 1946. One of her executors now brings before the court the question of a bequest contained in cl. 12 of her will, which after a devise and bequest of the entirety of her estate to her trustees on trust for sale, she directed them to set apart a fund which she describes as the B.B.C.

trust fund, sufficient to produce what she called £104 a year, which is meant, I think, to be £2 a week. Then she went on :

A “And I declare that my trustees shall hold the B.B.C. trust fund upon trust to invest the same so far as not consisting of investments of such kind as aforesaid and out of the income of the investments thereof to pay or cause to be paid each week the sum of £2 towards the fund of the society, institution or body corporate or incorporate on behalf of which an appeal shall have been transmitted on the Sunday from the National station of the British Broadcasting Corporation or other the body corporate or incorporate authority or government department for the time being exercising the functions now exercised by the British Broadcasting Corporation And I declare that if by reason of alteration of existing arrangements
B or circumstances it shall become impossible for my trustees to carry out the foregoing trust provisions my trustees shall apply the income of the said B.B.C. trust fund in such manner as shall in the opinion of my trustees carry out the objects of the trusts thereof as nearly as may be.”

C It appears to be admitted that this is a reference to a feature which, as I understand it, has long been part of the B.B.C. programme on Sunday evenings, whereby a speaker speaks on behalf of what is called “The Week’s Good Cause.” It is clear from the evidence before me, and it was admitted, that “The Week’s Good Cause” was not necessarily a charity. Therefore, this bequest could not prevail on the footing of its being a charitable bequest.
D Nevertheless, it was argued that this was a bequest of £2 week by week, and could be supported for the period of 21 years as not being obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities which, it was admitted, would apply to it after that date.

E I have heard a very interesting discussion on the question of perpetuities, but it seems to me that there is an earlier obstacle which is fatal to the validity of this bequest, namely, that a gift on trust must have a cestui que trust, and, there being no cestui que trust here, the gift cannot be good. You cannot leave it to another to make a will for you, as LORD HALDANE pointed out in the House of Lords in Houston v. Burns (1) ([1918] A.C. 342), except in the case of a gift to a charity. This is not a gift to charity. You cannot simply say :
“I give part of my estate to the British Broadcasting Corporation if and when they decide on any Sunday during the next 21 years to issue an appeal on behalf F of some cause or another and I am willing to leave to them the entire discretion as to which cause it is.” There is no cestui que trust there, and the gift must fail on that ground.

I have been referred to a number of cases on the question of perpetuity, and to a work for which I have the very greatest respect, Mr. GRAY’s book on PERPETUITIES. It is there argued (3rd ed., p. 359, para. 410 (a)) :

G “Suppose property is devised to trustees in trust to pay the income to a class of persons forever (or for a period exceeding 21 years). If there be no requirement as to the time when the income shall be paid, as it may not be paid over till a too remote period, the whole trust is void.
But suppose there is a direction that the annual income shall be paid over annually to those who on a certain day in each year answer a particular H description, e.g., to those who shall then be the heirs of the testator.
What then ? Such trust is clearly bad as a whole. Is it good for 21 years ? ”

The learned author seems to argue that it is, but during the 21 years in question there must be persons who are heirs of the testator. Here there is no class and no certainty. It is supposed that the British Broadcasting Corporation will continue this feature, and, secondly, that it will name a particular institution as the good cause in question. It is apparent from the evidence that there is one Sunday in the month during which seven good causes are broadcast in different parts of the country. Of which of them can it be said that it is the cestui que trust? The same thing is illustrated by Re Kelly (2), to which I was referred, where a gift to maintain the testator's dogs was held good for a period of 21 years. There the learned judge was very careful to say that the point that there was no cestui que trust had not been taken before him, and that people were not bound to take a point if they did not wish. Therefore, all the rest of the reasoning, as he said very carefully, was only dealing with what he called the perpetuity point. He quite plainly hinted that a dog could not be a cestui que trust. There was not a cestui que trust, and if that point had been taken the gift must have been held to be bad, so that the case is no authority against the view I am putting forward. I hold that this gift is bad. It has no object, no cestui que trust, which is either certain or can be made certain by the directions which the testatrix has given. It can be only made certain by somebody else's will and decision. That is delegation of the testamentary power which, except in the case of a charity, is not good. Consequently, I hold that the whole of this bequest is bad.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be taxed and paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

Street Traffic—Motor vehicle—Insurance against third-party risks—Using vehicle, and permitting vehicle to be used, on road without policy of insurance in force—Disqualification for holding licence—"Special reasons" for refraining from disqualification—"Reasons" special to the offence—Lonely road, absence of traffic, short distance—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1), (2).

The owner of a motor car, which was insured against third-party risks while any person holding a driving licence was driving it, allowed his wife, who did not hold a driving licence, to drive it one afternoon along a lonely moorland road where the only other traffic at the time was a motor cycle ridden by a police officer. The wife drove the car only about 150 yds., and very slowly, and the owner was in the car at the time. The owner and his wife were each convicted of an offence against the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), but the justices held that there were special reasons, within the meaning of s. 35 (2), for not disqualifying either of them for holding and obtaining a licence.

HELD: the facts (a) that the offence was committed in broad daylight on a lonely moorland road where little traffic was to be expected, (b) that the wife drove only for a short distance and very slowly, and (c), that the owner was in the car at the time, were mitigating circumstances, and, as they were reasons special to the facts which constituted the offence and not special to the offender, they were "special reasons," within the meaning of s. 35 (2) of the Act of 1930, for not imposing on the owner or his wife disqualification for holding and obtaining a licence.

(2) R. v. Crossan, [1939] N.I. 106.

CASE STATED by justices for the county of Durham.

A At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Consett on Nov. 22, 1948, the first respondent was convicted of having on Oct. 19, 1948, used a motor vehicle on a road without a policy of insurance against third-party risks being in force in relation to that user, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), she not being the holder of a driving licence, and the second respondent was convicted of having permitted the motor vehicle to be so used by the first respondent on that day. The justices fined each respondent £2, but for special reasons did not disqualify either of them under s. 35 (2) B for obtaining and holding a driving licence. The "special reasons" were (a) that there was no risk of accident because it was a moorland road where traffic at any time would be light and, at the time of the offence, except for the motor cycle ridden by the police officer who saw the offence, there was no other traffic on the road; (b) the second respondent was in the car with C the first respondent; and (c) the car was driven slowly and for a short distance (100-150 yds.) only. The prosecutor appealed against the order on the ground that no special reasons for not disqualifying the respondents existed. The Divisional Court now dismissed the appeal.

H. G. Garland for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear.

D LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The only question raised in this Case stated by justices for the county of Durham is whether or not there were facts which could amount to "special reasons," within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (2), so as to justify the justices in not imposing on the respondents, under that sub-section, disqualification for holding or obtaining a driving licence after convicting them of having, respectively, used a vehicle, and E permitted a vehicle to be used, on a road without a policy of insurance against third-party risks being in force, contrary to s. 35 (1) of the Act. The respondents were husband and wife, and the husband was insured only if he himself was driving or if he was allowing the car to be driven by a person holding a driving licence. On the afternoon in question the car was stopped by a police officer when the wife was holding the driving wheel. I am not here concerned F to consider—it may arise in another case—whether or not the husband was, in fact, the driver of the car (i.e., whether he was controlling the driving so that he was the driver), because both respondents pleaded Guilty. Therefore, we must assume that the wife was the driver and that the husband was permitting her to drive in the full sense of the term. As the respondents had pleaded Guilty, the justices imposed a fine, but they came to the conclusion, G as they are entitled to do under s. 35 (2) of the Act, that there were special reasons which would justify them in not imposing the additional penalty of disqualification.

The law laid down by this court on the subject is that, to constitute a "special reason" within the meaning of s. 35 (2), the reason must be special to the facts which constitute the offence and not special to the offender. That is H why it cannot be a "special reason" that the offender is a first offender and has never been convicted before, or that he is a lorry driver who drives for his living, or that great financial hardship may be caused. Those are matters which are special to the offender and not to the offence, and if the justices had refrained from imposing the disqualification because the first respondent was the wife of the second respondent, or because she was a woman, that would have been a circumstance special to the offender and not to the offence. In this case the offence was committed in the afternoon (i.e., in broad daylight) on a lonely moorland road where there was very little traffic ever to be expected—there was, in fact, no traffic at the time except a motor cycle ridden by the policeman who saw the offence. It was also found by the justices that the first respondent (the wife) had driven only about 150 yds., and very slowly. It was just what often happens, i.e., a driver of a car was allowing someone else to hold the wheel for a short distance. I am far from saying that there may not be cases in which, if that were done, the penalty of disqualification would most properly be applied—e.g., if a person in the street of a town, or even of a village, chose to let an uninsured person drive in such circumstances that the car was uninsured, it would be a serious matter and disqualification ought to follow, because one could not say that there was some special reason there which would mitigate the offence.

On the facts which the justices found, however, and which induced them to refrain from disqualification in this case, I think it would be impossible for us to say that no such facts existed as would justify them in holding that there were "special reasons" within the meaning of s. 35 (2) of the Act. It is perfectly true that when justices have found the facts, the question whether they can amount to "special reasons" is a question of law. In every case the justices are entitled to express their own opinion, and the court must see that they have applied their minds to the proper facts. If there are facts which can amount to "special reasons" and the justices have found them, it is not for this court to reverse their decision. In this case I think that it would be impossible to say that the facts which the justices found did not constitute "special reasons" within the meaning of s. 35 (2), i.e., there were mitigating circumstances which, while they did not amount to a defence, entitled the justices to mitigate their decision. Therefore, we see no reason to differ from the justices, and the appeal is dismissed.

BIRKETT, J. : I am of the same opinion. In Whittall v. Kirby (1) my Lord cited ([1946] 2 All E.R. 555) these words of ANDREWS, C.J. ([1939] N.I. 112) delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division of Northern Ireland in R. v. Crossan (2) :

"A 'special reason' within the exception is one which is special to the facts of the particular case, that is, special to the facts which constitute the offence. It is, in other words, a mitigating or extenuating circumstance, not amounting in law to a defence to the charge, yet directly connected with the commission of the offence, and one which the court ought properly to take into consideration when imposing punishment."

When this case originally came before this court the opinion of the justices, as there stated, concluded with these words :

"We came to the conclusion that the facts amounted to a special reason for not disqualifying either of the respondents and considered that the fines were sufficient punishment."

On that this court directed that the Case should go back for the justices to state more fully the reasons which had impelled them to the conclusion to which they had come. Accordingly, the fuller facts are now before the court, and it is quite clear, when those fuller circumstances are read, that the justices manifestly addressed their minds to the question on the lines laid down in Whittall v. Kirby (1) and, that being so, I concur fully with my Lord that there was adequate and sufficient material for them to come to the conclusion to which they came, and, as they exercised their judgment properly on those facts, I see no reason to differ from them. For these reasons I agree with the judgment expressed by my Lord.

LYNSKEY, J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Adultery—Justices—Wife's summons for maintenance—Charge of adultery by husband—Need for particulars of charge—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 6.

A By s. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 : " No orders shall be made under this Act on the application of a married woman if it shall be proved that such married woman has committed an act of adultery."

B The parties were married in 1920. In 1942 the wife left the husband because he persistently made general charges of adultery against her. In December, 1948, the wife took out a summons alleging desertion and wilful neglect to maintain. At the hearing the husband, without giving any particulars, made general charges of adultery against her. The wife did not apply for an adjournment, nor did she ask for further particulars of the charges, and the justices dismissed the summons, having found that at some time between 1942 and the date of the hearing she had committed adultery.

C HELD : whenever a charge of adultery is made in a matrimonial matter which comes before a court of summary jurisdiction full particulars of the charge must be given. The husband having failed to comply with these requirements in the present case, the wife was entitled to an order.

D Dicta of LORD MERRIVALE, P., and HILL, J., in Broadbent v. Broadbent (1927) (43 T.L.R. 186, 187), applied.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. This decision follows naturally from that in Ginesi v. Ginesi ([1947] 2 All E.R. 438) that in a matrimonial case the same strict proof is required of adultery as is required in criminal cases of criminal offences properly so called. It is a fundamental principle of criminal practice that adequate particulars of the offence charged should be given to the alleged offender. The parallel between criminal cases and those wherein adultery is alleged was also illustrated in the recent case of Fairman v. Fairman (p. 938, ante) which decided that evidence of adultery given by an accomplice in the act should generally be corroborated, an application of the well known rule in criminal cases laid down in R. v. Baskerville ([1916] 2 K.B. 658) and other authorities. Those who set out to prove a charge of adultery must, as in criminal cases, rebut the presumption of innocence enjoyed by the person charged by evidence which, to use the words of DENNING, J., in Miller v. Minister of Pensions ([1947] 2 All E.R. 372, 374), " turns the scale definitely " in their favour.]

H APPEAL by the wife from a decision of the Grimsby justices, dated Dec. 18, 1948, dismissing a summons taken out by her based on desertion and wilful neglect to maintain. At the hearing before the justices the husband made various unspecified charges of adultery against the wife, and the justices, holding that adultery had thereby been proved, dismissed the summons under s. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

J. R. T. Hooper for the wife.

Grieve for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is an appeal from Grimsby borough justices by a wife against the dismissal on Dec. 18, 1948, of her summons based on desertion and wilful neglect to maintain. The justices dismissed these charges on the grounds—(i) that she had committed adultery and (ii) that she had left the matrimonial home without reasonable cause.

The parties were married in 1920, and there is a child aged 16. They parted in July, 1942, and have never lived together since. The wife said in her evidence that she left her husband because he persisted in making general and unspecified charges of adultery against her. She said that six or eight months after they had parted she took out a summons, but he asked her to withdraw it and to return to live with him, and he threatened that, if she went on with the summons, he would “drag her through the mud,” or words to that effect, by making charges of adultery, unspecified as before. Finally, when she came to court she was confronted with a charge of adultery, again unspecified as to the time, the place, or the identity of the person with whom she was alleged to have committed adultery. Thus confronted with a charge of adultery as a complete answer to her summons under s. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, the wife made no application for an adjournment, nor, indeed, even at the hearing does it appear that any particulars were asked for. That, I recognise, puts some difficulty in the way of the wife, but I regard the obligation to give proper particulars of such a charge as this as paramount to all considerations of tactics at the hearing. In Broadbent v. Broadbent (1), LORD MERRIVALE, P., and HILL, J., put the matter in a way which is unanswerable and is unlimited in its application to any circumstance in which a charge of adultery may arise before a court of summary jurisdiction. It was sought to be argued that this was not a case where the husband had issued a summons to discharge an existing order under s. 7 of the Act of 1895, in which case, it was admitted, he would have had to give particulars of the adultery he was charging. This, it was said, was only resisting a wife’s application for an order on the ground that the justices had no jurisdiction to make it because she had committed adultery.

That is beside the point. No more serious charge can be made against a woman, and it is natural justice that she should not be called on to face such a charge without having some idea when and where she is supposed to have committed the offence and with whom, and it was with that in mind that LORD MERRIVALE, P., said (43 T.L.R. 186), speaking in relation to the jurisdiction of courts of summary jurisdiction in 1927 : “The situation is that, for a limited purpose, a woman may be found guilty of adultery by justices.” The very use of the words “for a limited purpose” shows plainly that the learned President was intending to cover all aspects of the matter, whichever of the limited purposes might happen to be the one in question, and by the use of the word “limited” he meant that it could not produce a decree of divorce, but it could produce every result which is possible under the statutes governing courts of summary jurisdiction. He went on (ibid.) :

“In this court and in every court which has exercised in this country a jurisdiction such as this court exercises, the utmost care has been taken to secure that so grave a matter as a conviction of adultery shall not take place without full compliance with all the ordinary requirements of the administration of justice. The first of them is that the accused party shall have notice of the charge. The charge here was a charge against a woman, separated from her husband for twelve years, that since the separation order she had been guilty of adultery.”

In that case those remarks were addressed to a situation in which some sort of notice had been given of the charge. In the present case no notice was given. I wish to emphasise, as has been emphasised repeatedly by this court, that it is of the utmost importance that, whenever a charge of adultery is made, in whatever context, under the summary jurisdiction procedure, full and proper particulars should be given. The particulars required are stated plainly in the concurring judgment of HILL, J., who said (ibid., 187) :

A "I agree with every word that my Lord has said, and I only want to emphasise that, in my judgment, this case will not be properly re-heard until the preliminary particulars of the time, the place of adultery, and the alleged adulterer have been given to the wife . . ."

B He was saying that with reference to a case in which one of the witnesses had come into court on behalf of the husband and said : " I know the name of the adulterer perfectly well, but I decline to give it." In case there is any doubt about it still let it be plainly understood from this moment onwards that this court is laying down once more, in the most emphatic terms, the necessity for the giving of these particulars.

C ORMEROD, J. : I agree. The wife's complaint in this case is that her husband deserted her, and the desertion which is alleged is that she was forced to leave the house because her husband without any justification accused her of committing adultery. It is on that desertion that she makes her claim for an order. In the justices' court she gave evidence of the allegations which her husband had made against her. The husband did not choose to go into the witness box to justify these allegations, and at no time during the hearing of the case was there any attempt made by him or anybody on his behalf to justify the allegations which he had made against the wife before she left. In those circumstances it seems clear to me that, unless it can be shown that either D at that time or at a later date the wife had committed adultery, there has been desertion of the wife by the husband, and, therefore, there must be an order. The justices, however, say that they find that at some time between 1942 and the time when the case came before them, the wife was living in adultery, If E they were justified in coming to that finding, it is clear that that is an answer to the charge and there can be no order. My Lord has made it clear that the evidence said to prove adultery by the wife which was given in this case should not have been accepted in any court to substantiate so serious a charge. I am satisfied that this appeal must be allowed. In conclusion, it cannot be emphasised too strongly that in cases where adultery is alleged, whatever the circumstances in which it is alleged, full particulars must be given. Other- F wise, the wife is faced with the burden of attempting to answer a charge which is extremely serious and may have implications of all kinds without having any idea of the nature of the allegations made against her. I agree, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

The Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, provides : “For the purpose of preventing the avoiding by individuals ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom of liability to income tax by means of transfers of assets by virtue or in consequence whereof . . . income becomes payable to persons resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom, it is hereby enacted as follows :—

(1) Where such an individual has by means of any such transfer, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, acquired any rights by virtue of which he has, within the meaning of this section, power to enjoy, whether forthwith or in the future, any income of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom which, if it were income of that individual received by him in the United Kingdom, would be chargeable to income tax by deduction or otherwise, that income shall, whether it would or would not have been chargeable to income tax apart from the provisions of this section, be deemed to be income of that individual for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts : . . . (3) An individual shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have power to enjoy income of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom if—(a) the income is in fact so dealt with by any person as to be calculated, at some point of time, and whether in the form of income or not, to inure for the benefit of the individual ; or (b) the receipt or accrual of the income operates to increase the value to the individual of any assets held by him or for his benefit ; or (c) the individual receives or is entitled to receive, at any time, any benefit provided or to be provided out of that income or out of moneys which are or will be available for the purpose by reason of the effect or successive effects of the associated operations on that income and on any assets which directly or indirectly represent that income ; or (d) the individual has power, by means of the exercise of any power of appointment or power of revocation or otherwise, to obtain for himself, whether with or without the consent of any other person, the beneficial enjoyment of the income ; or (e) the individual is able in any manner whatsoever, and whether directly or indirectly, to control the application of the income . . . (5) For the purposes of this section—(a) a reference to an individual shall be deemed to include the wife or husband of the individual . . .”

The Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, provides : (2) If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that—(a) any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future, and whether with or without the consent of any other person, to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof ; and (b) in the event of the exercise of the power, the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor will or may become beneficially entitled to the whole or any part of the property then comprised in the settlement or of the income arising from the whole or any part of the property so comprised; any income arising under the settlement from the property comprised in the settlement in any year of assessment or from a corresponding part of that property, or a corresponding part of any such income, as the case may be, shall be treated as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person: . . . (3) If and so long as the settlor has an interest in any income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, any income so arising during the life of the settlor in any year of assessment shall, to the extent to which it is not distributed, be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year, and not as the income of any other person . . . (4) For the purpose of the last foregoing sub-section the settlor shall be deemed to have an interest in income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in that settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever . . .”

By a lease, dated Dec. 29, 1921, made between W.V. and E.V., of the first part, the U.C.S. Co., Ltd. (hereafter called “the company”), of the second part, and three persons living in Paris (hereafter called “the Paris trustees”), of the third part, W.V. and E.V. demised or agreed to demise certain properties situate abroad to the company for a term of 21 years from Apr. 10, 1921, determinable by W.V. and E.V. and by the company on six month’s notice. The company undertook to pay therefor to the Paris trustees the rent of £960,000 per annum by quarterly instalments. W.V. and E.V. had power under the lease to withdraw any part or parts of the demised premises from the lease, and thereafter the rent was to be reduced by such amount as should be agreed. This power was exercised on several occasions, although on all occasions but one W.V. and E.V. substituted other properties. It was common ground that, if no further document had been executed, the Paris trustees would have received the rent as bare trustees for W.V. and E.V. On Dec. 30, 1921, however, a trust deed was made between W.V. and E.V., of the one part, and the Paris trustees, of the other. The lease was recited and that the deed was made in consideration of the natural love and affection of W.V. and E.V. for the beneficiaries. The operative part provided: “1. The expression ‘authorised persons’ used herein means the settlors jointly during their lives and the survivor of them during his life and after the death of such survivor the following four persons namely (a) the two eldest of the beneficiaries of 25 years of age and upwards for the time being entitled to share in William’s fund hereunder but preferring males to females so that no such female beneficiary shall be included amongst the authorised persons so long as there are two male beneficiaries of that age and (b) such two persons as the said [E.V.] may appoint during his lifetime or by his will and in default of such appointment [P.C.V.] and [R.A.V.] and in the case of the death of either of such authorised persons such person as the survivor for the time being shall appoint by deed writing or will to fill the vacancy the said [E.V.] expressing the opinion that it is advisable to select a member of the family of the said [E.V.] to fill such vacancy provided that the person making such appointment considers such member of the said family is fit for the position provided that if the authorised persons being not more than two in number cannot agree the trustees shall act on the direction of the majority but in case of equal voting by the authorised persons the trustees shall exercise their own discretion. 2. The trustees shall receive the aforesaid rent payable to them in accordance with the terms and during the continuance of the said lease (subject to any refund or rebate they may be liable to make thereunder to the said lessees as aforesaid) and shall capitalise the same until the expiration of twenty years from the death of the last surviving grandchild now living of the settlors (hereinafter referred to as 'the time of distribution') by investing the same subject as hereafter provided in or upon any of the investments and in manner hereby authorised that is to say the settled fund shall (at the direction in writing of the authorised persons or a majority thereof and in the event of an equality of voting by such authorised persons at the trustees' discretion) be invested in the names or under the legal control of the trustees in or upon stocks funds shares securities or other investments of whatever nature and wheresoever (but where involving liability only with the consent of the trustees) or upon personal credit or upon loans to any company or companies wheresoever domiciled and with or without security and with the like power of varying such investments from time to time to the intent that the said trustees shall (subject to such direction as aforesaid) have the same full and unrestricted powers of investing and transposing the investments of the settled fund in all respects as if they were absolutely entitled thereto beneficially." The subsequent clauses provided (inter alia) for the division of the residue of the income arising from the settled fund into two parts, called "William's fund" and "Edmund's fund" respectively, and for the accumulation of the two parts. After the expiry of the period of accumulation, the two accumulated funds were to be held in trust for the benefit of the children or remoter issue (and their wives or widows) of W.V. and E.V. as W.V. and E.V. might by deed or will respectively appoint. In default of and subject to such appointments, the funds were to be divided among the issue of W.V. and E.V. The trust deed reserved a power to W.V. and E.V. to appoint by will any interest in William's fund or Edmund's fund in favour of the "widow of the appointor." On Nov. 26, 1935, W.V. irrevocably appointed by deed all funds both capital and income which he had power to appoint to his issue, but he did not release his power to appoint to his widow. On Dec. 31, 1935, E.V. irrevocably appointed to his issue by deed part of the property over which he had power to appoint, and on Mar. 31, 1937, he irrevocably appointed the remainder of the said property to his children and extinguished his power to appoint to his widow. The Crown made claims against W.V. and E.V. for income tax and sur-tax for the years 1936-1941 in respect of the rents payable under the lease and in respect of the income arising from the investments and accumulations under the trust deed of Dec. 30, 1921.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the trust deed the power of the authorised persons to direct how the rent payable by the company should be invested by the Paris trustees was a fiduciary power and must be used, not to benefit themselves, but in the best interests of the beneficiaries, and it was not an interest or a power within either s. 18 or s. 38.

(ii) the lease and deed of trust together constituted an "arrangement" within s. 41 (4) (b) of the Act of 1938 and consequently a "settlement" for the purposes of pt. IV of that Act, but the only property "comprised in the settlement" within the meaning of s. 38 at any time was the rent payable by the company together with any property resulting from the investment of the rent and from the accumulation of income arising from such investment, and, therefore, even if the determination of the lease was a determination of a provision of the settlement within s. 38 (2) (a), the exercise of the power so to determine it would not have the effect of rendering W.V. or E.V. or the wife of either entitled to property comprised in the settlement within s. 38 (2) (b), for it would leave undisturbed the trusts concerning rents already accrued.

Chamberlain v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1943] 2 All E.R. 200), applied.

Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Morton, 1941 S.C. 467, no longer law.

(iii) the existence of the power of appointment in favour of the widow of W.V. and E.V. respectively did not have the effect of bringing any income within the ambit either of s. 18 or s. 38. Section 38 (4) referred to payments to a wife and payments to someone not answering that description at the date of payment, e.g., a widow, would not be within the sub-section.

Gaunt v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1941] 2 All E.R. 662; 165 L.T. 168), sub nom., Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Gaunt ([1941] 1 K.B. 706), overruled.

(iv) the words "where . . . an individual has . . . acquired any rights" in s. 18 (1) referred to the acquisition of rights by an individual alone, and not to their acquisition by a group of persons, and therefore W.V. and E.V. had each acquired two rights only within s. 18 (1) by virtue of the trust deed, viz., the power to appoint to his widow and the power to appoint to his issue and their wives. Those rights were obtained by such a "transfer of assets" as is mentioned in s. 18 (1), and were not merely reserved to themselves by W.V. and E.V.

(v) W.V. had not at any relevant time "power to enjoy" within s. 18 (1) by virtue of his two powers of appointment because, as regards his power to appoint to his widow, (a) there were no findings of fact by the Special Commissioners to which s. 18 (3) (a) could be applied; (b) s. 18 (3) (b) did not apply because, although in view of s. 18 (5) (a) the words "or for the benefit of his wife" should be added, the power was to appoint to his widow and not his wife; (c) s. 18 (3) (c) was inapplicable because neither W.V. nor his wife received or was entitled to receive any income by virtue of the power; (d) W.V. could not obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of any income within s. 18 (3) (d); and (e) the "income" for the purposes of s. 18 (3) (e) was that of the Paris trustees and W.V. could not by exercise of the power prevent the Paris trustees from dealing with the income, in any of the years under consideration, strictly in accordance with the trust deed. As regards W.V.'s power to appoint to his issue and their wives, only para. (e) of the paragraphs of s. 18 (3) could be material, and while that paragraph properly could not apply even before the execution of the appointment of Nov. 26, 1935, as soon as he made that irrevocable appointment W.V. prevented its application. The same reasoning applied to E.V.'s powers of appointment, and the fact that E.V. did not finally exercise his powers until the second appointment, dated Mar. 31, 1937, did not render him liable to tax in 1936-37 because the limited power which he retained until that date did not give him power "to control the application" of any income within the meaning of s. 18 (3) (e).

(vi) the words "payable to" in s. 38 (4) did not apply to payment made by way of loan, and, therefore, although W.V. and E.V. could direct the payment to themselves of money on loan and although the fact that having regard to their fiduciary capacity W.V. and E.V. would be bound to pay a commercial rate of interest did not prevent such a loan being a benefit to them, the benefit arising from such a loan was not an application of money "for the benefit of" W.V. and E.V. within the sub-section.

Per LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: To argue that, having regard to r. 18 of the General Rules in sched. I to the Income Tax Act, 1918, the taxpayer could not be assessed in respect of income which was to be "treated" as his income under s. 38 of the Act of 1938 or "deemed to be" his income under s. 18 of the Act of 1936, was to place too narrow a meaning on r. 18, and could not be accepted.

APPEALS by the taxpayers and cross-appeals by the Crown from orders of the Court of Appeal made on appeals by the Crown and cross-appeals by the taxpayers from two orders of MACNAGHTEN, J. The Crown claimed income tax and sur-tax under the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, and the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, in respect of certain rents and income payable to persons abroad. The claims depended largely on three questions : (1) whether the right of the "authorised persons" under the trust deed dated Dec. 30, 1921, to direct how trust property, i.e., the rent under the lease dated Dec. 29, 1921, should be invested was a fiduciary power which could not be used for the benefit of the "authorised persons"; (2) whether the "settlement" within the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38 (2) was the trust deed alone, or the trust deed together with the lease, and what was the "property comprised in a settlement" within the meaning of that sub-section; and (3) whether the existence of a power of appointment in favour of a widow of a settlor had the effect of bringing income within the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, or the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38. The House of Lords held (1) the right was fiduciary; (2) the deed of trust and the lease together constituted the "settlement," but the property comprised therein was only the rent reserved by the lease; and (3) the power to appoint to a widow of the appointor did not cause s. 18 or s. 38 to operate in respect of the income. The appeals were allowed and the cross-appeals were dismissed. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON.

Millard Tucker, K.C., Scrimgeour, K.C., and Heyworth Talbot for the taxpayers. The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.), Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., J. H. Stamp and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The House took time for consideration.

May 6. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, the several appeals and cross-appeals which your Lordships have to consider raise questions of some difficulty and, though I have had the privilege of reading the opinion which my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, is about to deliver and agree with his reasons and conclusions, I think it right to state in my own words why I do not think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal can stand. I will not, however, repeat the facts which are fully narrated by him.

The determination of these appeals involves a consideration of certain sections of two Acts of Parliament which were designed to bring within the ambit of taxation to income tax and sur-tax income which would otherwise escape that burden. For that reason and because the ways of those who would avoid liability to tax are often devious and obscure, the sections are framed in language of the widest and most general scope and in the case of one of the Acts (I refer to the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18 (4)) the operative sub-sections are reinforced by a provision which appears to exhort the assessing authority, and presumably the court, to let the balance, wherever possible, be weighted against the taxpayer. But, this notwithstanding, I think that it remains the taxpayer's privilege to claim exemption from tax unless his case is fairly brought within the words of the taxing section, and it is in this light that I examine the applicability of the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, and the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, to the circumstances of the late Lord Vestey and his brother Sir Edmund Vestey.

A My Lords, I do not doubt that the two deeds of Dec. 29 and Dec. 30, 1921, of which you have heard so much, were parts of a single design. By the former document, which I call "the lease," the Vestey brothers demised or agreed to procure the demise to the Union Cold Storage Ltd., a company of their own creation, of properties, cattle, lands, freezing works and other assets situate
B in divers parts of the world. The term was for 21 years from Apr. 10, 1921, determinable by either party on six months' notice. The rent was £960,000 per annum reducible in certain events, and it was payable, not to the lessors, but to three gentlemen residing in Paris whom I will call "the Paris trustees." The lease contained a number of usual covenants and one unusual provision by which the lessors were authorised to withdraw properties from the lease,
C the rent in that case being proportionately reduced. By the second document, which I call the deed of trust, the Vestey brothers, as settlors, declared the trusts on which the Paris trustees were to hold the rent payable under the lease as and when received by them. These trusts are of a curiously elaborate character, but in general outline they follow the usual form of a family trust in conformity with the premise that the settlement is made in consideration
D of the natural love and affection of the settlors for the beneficiaries. It is sufficient at this stage to say that no beneficial interest in the ordinary sense of that expression is reserved to the settlors, but they have (a) a special power of appointment in favour of issue, and (b) a special power of appointment in favour of a widow. The latter of these powers gives rise to a question that I will mention later. By means of these documents the Vestey brothers obtained
E immunity from tax in respect of the very large income which was ultimately derived from the rent payable under the lease up to at least 1938. The question is whether s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, or alternatively s. 38 of the Act of 1938, was so framed as to make them liable for all or any part of it.

I find it convenient, following the course taken by the Court of Appeal, to refer first to s. 38 of the later Act. There the first question arises under sub-s.
F (2) of the section, and the argument for the Crown is as follows. The lease and the deed of trust (I ignore any other documents) together form the settlement for the purpose of the section. They point to the wide definition of "settlement" in s. 41 (4) (b): "The expression 'settlement' includes any disposition trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement." The whole thing, they say, is an arrangement. Therefore, it is a settlement. Next, they say, the lease is part
G of the arrangement. Therefore, it is "a provision of the settlement." Therefore, the power, vested in lessors or lessee, to determine the lease is a power to determine a provision of the settlement. And, finally, when this has been done, the settlors will or may become beneficially entitled to the whole or part of the property then comprised in the settlement. This view, which commended itself to the majority of the Court of Appeal but not to EVERSHED, H L.J., is not, in my view, tenable in face of the decision of this House in Chamberlain v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). True it is, that, as was there observed, each case must be judged on its own facts, but I think that the principle of that decision clearly is that the steps which are taken towards a settlement are not to be confused with the settlement itself and (what is all important to the present case) that the "property comprised in the settlement" is that property alone in respect of which some beneficial interest is created. Applying this principle, which apart from authority that constrains me commends itself to my reason, I find that the only property comprised in the settlement is the rent payable under the lease to the Paris trustees with the investments and accumulations of income arising from it. If so, no person has power to determine the settlement or any provision thereof in such manner that the settlors will become entitled to the property comprised in the settlement or any part of it and the sub-section is not applicable. I may add that in any view I should be reluctant to do such violence to the ordinary meaning of words as to hold that to determine a lease is "to revoke or otherwise determine a settlement or any provision thereof."

I turn next to s. 38 (3) and (4). Here the question is whether Lord Vestey (or Sir Edmund Vestey, but for convenience I will take Lord Vestey) had during any year of assessment "... an interest in any income arising under or property comprised in a settlement. He must be deemed to have had such an interest :

"... if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in the settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever."

Here are very wide words. But, apart from the question of the special power of appointment in favour of a widow which I leave for later consideration, counsel for the Crown do not, I think, suggest that Lord Vestey had any interest within the meaning of the sub-section except that to which I now refer. In doing so I would observe that this is a matter which is of equal importance to a consideration of s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1936. The alleged "interest" of Lord Vestey on which counsel for the Crown rely arises in this way. Under the deed of trust the Paris trustees are bound to invest the rent received by them "at the direction in writing of the authorised persons or a majority thereof and in the event of an equality of voting by such authorised persons at the trustee's discretion" in their names or under their control :

"... in or upon stocks funds shares securities or other investments of whatsoever nature and wheresoever ... or upon personal credit or upon loans to any company or companies wheresoever domiciled and with or without security."

The expression "authorised persons" is defined earlier in the deed. It means the settlors during their joint lives and the survivor of them during his life and after the death of such survivor the following four persons, namely, (a) the two eldest of the beneficiaries of 25 years of age and upwards for the time being entitled to share in the fund therein called William's fund but preferring males to females as therein mentioned, and (b) such two persons as Sir Edmund might appoint during his lifetime or by his will and in default of such appointment Percy Charles Vestey and Ronald Arthur Vestey and in the case of the death of either of such authorised persons such person as the survivor for the time being should appoint by deed writing or will to fill the vacancy, Sir Edmund expressing the opinion that it was advisable to select a member of his family to fill such vacancy provided that the person making such appointment considered such member of the family fit for the position. There is, finally, a proviso that, if the authorised persons, being more than two in number, cannot agree, the trustees are to act on the direction of the majority, but in case of equal voting by the authorised persons they are to exercise their own discretion. I have cited at length this definition of "authorised persons" for it may well have some bearing in considering what is the nature of the right or power entrusted to them.

The first question here for consideration is what is the nature of the right to direct investment which is vested in the authorised persons. On behalf of the Crown it is urged that it is not a fiduciary power or right, but a right exercisable by the authorised persons for their own benefit, so that they can require the trustees to invest the trust funds by way of loan to themselves or any company in which they are interested at any rate of interest whether or not such an investment is or is intended to be for the benefit of the trust estate. It is, therefore, in this view some kind of beneficial interest, albeit a kind, I think, hitherto unknown to the law. So far as s. 38 (3) and (4) is concerned, I observe that, even if the argument for the Crown so far prevails, it must still be established that by reason of the settlor's right to direct investment the income or property arising under or comprised in the settlement is "payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor." I am clearly of opinion that it is not. I think that these words contemplate an out-and-out parting with the trust property or income by payment to the settlor in money or money's worth. They are as familiar words as any in the conveyancing art. Investment is the very antithesis of this, for it contemplates the retention of something as part of the trust property. I think, therefore, that in any case the claim of the Crown on this head under s. 38 (3) and (4) must fail.

As I have said, however, the nature of this right to direct investment is of crucial importance on s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, also, and this is the moment to pursue it. My Lords, I cannot bring myself to regard this right as anything but a fiduciary right and, if so, it appears to me to follow that it is not to be regarded as conferring any kind of benefit on its holders. I do not ignore the surrounding circumstances, on which so much reliance was placed. I am content to bear in mind what happened after 1921, though such events can have no bearing on the deed of that year. But, if I ask how any court of equity would regard this power, it seems to me that the only answer must be that it is a fiduciary power to be exercised with a single eye to the benefit of the beneficiaries. Let me suppose that the authorised persons, who may for this purpose be either the Vestey brothers or those who later answer that description (since the character of the power will not vary with those who exercise it) direct the trustees to invest the trust funds by way of loan to themselves at a low rate of interest without security, and that the trustees, regarding such an investment as very precarious, apply to the court and ask whether they must comply with the direction. In such a case it would, as it appears to me, be an irrelevant plea by the authorised persons that the right to direct investment was merely a part of a scheme for avoiding liability to income tax. The court could see nothing but a settlement with a wide power of investment of the trust funds and a mandate to the trustees to invest at the direction of certain persons. Nothing short of the most direct and express words would, I think, justify a construction which would enable those who exercised the power of direction to disregard the interests of the beneficiaries. If it is said that such a construction defeats the general intention of the scheme, I would reply that it may be that those, who framed it, dug a pit for themselves and have assumed a duty where they thought to acquire a right.

Concluding, then, that this power to direct investment is a fiduciary power and that it is not an "interest" within the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, I turn now to the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18. It is not claimed that the transactions that I have outlined were effected mainly for some purpose other than the purpose of avoiding liability to taxation. The operation of s. 18 (1) is, therefore, not excluded by the proviso to that sub-section, and it is necessary to examine its language somewhat closely.

In the first place it is necessary to remember that, though your Lordships are for convenience dealing with the cases of Lord Vestey and Sir Edmund Vestey together, each appeal is a separate one and the case of each taxpayer is to be considered as if he alone were concerned. I, therefore, approach this section as if Lord Vestey were "the individual" concerned and I use that expression because I find it in the section. The question then is whether by means of such a transfer as is referred to in the opening words of the section, either alone or in conjunction with associated transactions, Lord Vestey "acquired any rights by virtue of which" he had within the meaning of this section the "power to enjoy," which in the section is elaborately defined. It is the essential condition of the section being brought into operation that he, the individual, Lord Vestey, should have acquired "rights by virtue of which, etc." It was at this stage that counsel for the taxpayers urged that Lord Vestey could not be said to have "acquired" any rights at all. He distinguished, if I followed his argument, between the reservation and the acquisition of a right and contended that, whatever right Lord Vestey had, he had it by way of reservation out of what passed by the transfer and associated operations. This is, in my opinion, an artificial and inaccurate way of regarding the transaction. The true view is that, after Lord Vestey had joined in the transactions that I have described, any rights that he had, whether enforceable against the trustees or against the settled property, were derived from the settlement, and his interest, whatever it might be, was acquired by virtue of those rights. A

I do not, however, dissent from counsel's further argument—it is indeed implicit in what I have already said—that s. 18 (1) can only operate if it can be predicated of the individual, Lord Vestey, that it is by virtue of some right that he has the power to enjoy income as defined in one or other of the paragraphs of s. 18 (3). I agree that the blending of the governing words with the words of the paragraphs leads to clumsy phraseology, but they are the governing words and cannot be disregarded. It must be asked then what relevant right or rights Lord Vestey acquired. Let me make my meaning clear by an illustration. In the view which I take, s. 18 could have no operation in a case where a settlor in defiance of the terms of the settlement violently resumed possession of the settled property. I recur then to that right, on which alone (apart from the special power of appointment in favour of a widow) the Solicitor-General appeared to rely, viz., the right to direct investment. At once, as it appears to me, the difficulty arises that Lord Vestey as an individual acquired no individual right. I agree with my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, in thinking that here the Interpretation Act, 1889, cannot be invoked to convert singular into plural. The context does not admit of it. Just as it is the income of an individual that is being assessed, so it is the right of that individual that must be regarded. Whatever view, then, is taken of the right to direct investment, that was not a right of Lord Vestey alone and it cannot be said that by virtue of that right he is brought within the section. C D

I would not, however, dispose of this appeal finally on that short ground. Four other aspects of this case were fully argued and deserve consideration. I shortly consider each in turn of the paragraphs of sub-s. (3). With regard to para. (a), there was some discussion whether the Crown had before the commissioners or in the courts below relied on this paragraph. I cannot find that it was specifically dealt with in any of the judgments and the House has not the advantage of the considered opinion of the learned judge or Lords Justices upon it. This is the more to be regretted as the opening words of the paragraph emphatically indicate that the question is one of fact—"the income is in fact so dealt with, etc." If, therefore, reliance is placed on it, there should be an explicit finding of fact. There is not any such finding. If there was, then, assuming that there was any evidence to support it, the only question of law would be whether it was by virtue of any right that the income was, in fact, so dealt with. I find it convenient to deal finally with this matter when I consider para. (c). The consideration of para. (b) can be short. I will assume that a right to direct investment might come within the extended meaning of "assets" as defined by s. 18 (5) (b), if it could be held that the right was not fiduciary, but, holding as I do that it is fiduciary and exerciseable with a single eye to the interests of the beneficiaries, I find it impossible to say that the receipt of the income, i.e., the receipt of the rent by the Paris Trustees, operates to increase its value to Lord Vestey, though it may add to his responsibility. E F G H

Paragraph (b), therefore, is excluded. Paragraph (c) opens with the words "the individual receives or is entitled to receive" and it is, I think, important to remember that both alternatives are subject to what I have called the governing words. It must be by virtue of some right that the individual either "receives" or is "entitled to receive." Here, too, reliance is placed by the Crown on the right to direct investment. It follows from what I have said that the individual Lord Vestey is in this respect "entitled" to receive nothing.

- A Nor, if he in fact receives anything, does he receive it by virtue of any right. But there is another grave difficulty here in the way of the Crown, and I now refer to a matter which I reserved in my consideration of para. (a). Let it be assumed, contrary to my opinion, that it is immaterial whether Lord Vestey has any rights so long as he in fact has "power to enjoy any income." Then, whether it is sought to bring the case within (a) or (c), there must be a clear and explicit finding of fact. The learned Solicitor-General claimed that in the Case Stated there was such a finding either express or implicit, and, alternatively, asked that the case should be remitted to the Special Commissioners for further findings. My Lords, I am clearly of opinion that there is no such finding in the Case Stated. If it is a condition of the taxpayer's liability that certain facts should be proved, nothing is more necessary, nor anything more easy,
- C than that there should be a clear and explicit finding. I will not examine the Case Stated in detail. I agree with EVERSHED, L.J., that the facts which would satisfy the conditions of either of those paragraphs are not found. It may be that they are not found because the Special Commissioners did not feel justified in finding them. Ought the case then to be remitted for further finding? I think not. It was open to the parties, when the case was settled,
- D to obtain a more explicit statement, if indeed the Special Commissioners thought that the circumstances warranted it. After this lapse of time, especially as one of the commissioners who stated the Case has ceased to hold that office, I do not think that your Lordships would be justified in remitting the case. I turn then to para. (d). Here the individual, Lord Vestey, is liable if he has power, by means of the exercise of any power of appointment or power of
- E revocation or otherwise, to obtain for himself, whether with or without the consent of any other person, the beneficial enjoyment of the income. Once more it is the right to direct investment that is relied on, but it appears to me that, apart from all other difficulties, to say that a man, who may direct that the trust income should be invested in a loan to himself, has the beneficial enjoyment of that income is a misuse of language which not even sub-s. (4) would justify.
- F So also with para. (e). Here Lord Vestey is liable if it can be said of him that he is able in any manner whatsoever, and whether directly or indirectly, to control the application of the income, but, leaving aside the fact that by himself Lord Vestey can do nothing, a right to direct investment is not a control of the application of the income. The latter words point to an out and out disposal of the income for the benefit of some person or persons and are wholly inappropriate to an investment by way of loan. I agree, too, with my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, that the words of this paragraph are not apt to cover a special power of appointment in favour of a class of persons which includes neither the holder of the power nor his wife.

- I have so far ignored one aspect of the case, which in any view has only a limited operation. I refer to the special power of appointment in favour of a
- H widow. This concerns Lord Vestey only. The question here is whether for the purpose of either the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, or of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, "wife" includes "widow." On this point the courts below followed, as they were bound to do, the previous decision of the Court of Appeal in Gaunt v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) and held that the one word included the other. My own opinion has fluctuated, but, as I understand that your Lordships are agreed in thinking that for the reasons given by my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, the decision in Gaunt's case (2) was wrong, I will not occupy time by expressing my own doubts. The taxpayers, the executors of Lord Vestey, raised a further point. They contended that no assessment could validly be made on them as executors under the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18. On this question too the courts below were bound by the previous decision in Cottingham's Executors v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3). I do not think it necessary to say more on this point than that that case was clearly rightly decided. In the result, I am of opinion that the appeals of the executors of Lord Vestey and of Sir Edmund Vestey must be allowed with costs and the cross appeals of the Crown dismissed and I move accordingly.

My Lords, I must conclude by saying this. In the hearing of this appeal your Lordships were assisted by our late lamented colleague, LORD DU PARCQ, who had written and left behind him a speech which, had he been here, he would have delivered. It would not be proper for me to say more about it than this, which I am happy to say, that LORD DU PARCQ agreed in the conclusions to which your Lordships have come.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the judgment which will be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON. I agree with the conclusions which he has reached on all the questions at issue in these appeals, and in general with the reasons on which they are founded. It will, therefore, not be necessary for me to enter into a detailed consideration of each section and sub-section of the relevant statutes, or to repeat or summarise the facts of the case. Since, however, I am unfortunate enough to disagree with the decisions of the courts below it is proper that I should express my opinion on some of the more fundamental differences of construction which are involved.

The first and most fundamental question concerns the proper approach to the construction of the statutory provisions dealing with attempts to evade taxation and of the documents by which a transfer of assets is effected within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, or of the documents included in a "settlement" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38. The hypothesis of both sections is that the documents to be construed are the instruments of a scheme of tax avoidance, and the purpose of each section is to subject to taxation the income in each year of assessment which would, but for the section, have escaped taxation through the operation of the scheme. But each section has its own specialties, which may be relevant. Section 18 (4) requires that regard shall be had to "the substantial result and effect of the transfer and any associated operations" in determining whether the individual assessed "has power to enjoy income," and the "settlements" aimed at by s. 38 of the Act of 1938 are widely defined by s. 41 (4) (b) so as to include "any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement." It is this definition in its relation to s. 38 that has in the past given rise to the general problems of construction which I am now discussing, and it will, therefore, be convenient to deal with them primarily in relation to that section.

It was a possible view that the intention of s. 38 was that the court should first determine what was the whole "arrangement" devised with the object of avoiding tax, and having done so should then treat all assets transferred, or leased, or affected by any document forming part of the "arrangement" as "property comprised in the settlement." That was the view taken by the Court of Session in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Morton (4). In that case, the court held that the "arrangement" included the agreement of a husband and wife to transfer their assets to a company, the formation of the company, the company's memorandum and articles, the transfer of the assets to the company in return for an allotment of preference shares to the husband and wife and of ordinary shares to a son and to trustees, and the deeds of trust by which these trustees were directed to pay the income arising from the shares to daughters of the settlors. The majority of the court next held that as that was the arrangement

(and by definition the "settlement") the "property comprised in the settlement" was the assets transferred by the settlors to the company. LORD MONCRIEFF dissented. He held that "settlement" remained the dominant word and that a settlement meant "the charging of the property of the settlor with rights constituted in favour of others." From that it followed that the "property comprised in the settlement" could only be the shares transferred by the settlors to the trustees and held by them under trust for the payment of the income to the settlor's daughters. That case did not go further. In Chamberlain's case (1) the Court of Appeal took the same view, as I read the judgment, as the majority of the Court of Session had taken in Morton's case (4), but this House reversed the decision and construed "settlement" in relation to the words "property comprised in the settlement" as LORD MONCRIEFF had construed it in Morton's case (4). LORD MACMILLAN, indeed, expressly adopted LORD MONCRIEFF's words above cited, which are the very pivot of his dissent. There were additional grounds on which the judgment of this House was based, but the rule to be deduced from the case is that the property comprised in the settlement is that and that only in respect of which some beneficial right is created in favour of beneficiaries under the settlement. I think also that it is implicit in the judgment of this House, that documents which form part of an "arrangement" within the meaning of s. 41 (4) (c) of the Finance Act, 1938, are to be construed as they would be if they were unconnected with a purpose of tax avoidance.

If I am correct in my understanding of Chamberlain's case (1), it will follow in the present case that, even if the lease and the deed of settlement may both be properly treated as components of the "arrangement," yet the property "comprised in the settlement" is the property settled by the deed of settlement, that is, the rents under the lease, and not the property or properties which were the subjects of the lease. And from that it will follow that there can be no liability under s. 38 (2), for the only power to revoke in the case is a power to revoke the lease and the exercise of that power would merely end the payment of the rent without conferring on the settlors any rights in the property comprised in the settlement or in the income arising from it. I have not yet mentioned the words "in any circumstances whatsoever" (s. 38 (4)), for, as it happens, all the questions, numerous as they are, in these appeals can be decided without reference to them, and their precise meaning and effect were not the subject of close debate. All I will say of them is that they do not affect the construction of the documents constituting an "arrangement" for they apply only to the effect of such documents after they have been construed.

In these matters of construction no distinction can be drawn between s. 38 and s. 18. In s. 18 (4) the direction that regard shall be had "to the substantial result and effect of the transfer and any associated operations" does not, in my view, authorise any laxity in construing any of the documents by which the transfer or the associated operations are effected. The court must first determine the meaning and effect of the documents before this provision is applied, and it must then consider whether their effect, though in form not beneficial to the settlor, is so in substance. The contrast is between substance and form, so, if it can be shown in the present case that the effect of the transfer and the associated operations is to vest a benefit in (e.g.) a company over which the settlor has complete control, the court may then say that, though in form the company benefits, in substance the company and the settlor are one, and the settlor, therefore, benefits, but the court cannot take this last step unless it is shown that the settlor has himself the legal control, and no reliance must be placed on his influence over others who are not in law bound to follow his directions. This is of importance in relation to the power to direct the investment of the rents received by the trustees. It was argued on s. 18 (3) (c), for example, that the settlors as "authorised persons" might direct the trustees to lend to the Western Co. at a commercial rate of interest and that money in the hands of the Western Co. was substantially money in the pockets of the settlors. But this argument, assuming all other objections overcome, fails because the settlors did not between them hold a majority of the management shares of Western. It is perhaps not wholly superfluous to say that nothing in either s. 18 or s. 38 authorises resort to extrinsic evidence to ascertain intention, or warrants an assumption that breach of trust will be committed or tolerated.

In supplement of these observations on construction, I would add that one must be on one's guard against reading the two sections so as to cover something which the language cannot without torture be made to cover. For example, it is, I think, impossible, without abuse of the words, to describe a fiduciary power to direct investment as an asset, or to say that by virtue of such a power the donee is "able in any manner to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of the income of the trust" or "to control the application of the income." Even if the power is not fiduciary and if the donee may use it to direct a loan to be made to himself, the words "receive or entitled to receive," or "beneficial enjoyment of the income," or "application of the income" or "payable or applicable for the benefit of the settlor" do not appear in the context of s. 18 to have been intended to refer to loans. It was argued for the taxpayers that the Finance Act, 1938, s. 40, is the section appropriate for dealing with loans made to settlors. For this there may be much to be said, though it is not necessary to decide in these appeals what is the true ambit of s. 40. But it is at all events true that the provisions of s. 40 are very much more tender to the assessee than the provisions of s. 18, or s. 38, and I find it difficult to understand why a loan should be more rigorously dealt with, if it is within either s. 18 or s. 38, than "a capital sum paid directly" to the settlor under s. 40. Parliament in its attempts to keep pace with the ingenuity devoted to tax avoidance may fall short of its purpose. That is a misfortune for the taxpayers who do not try to avoid their share of the burden, and it is disappointing to the Inland Revenue. But the court will not stretch the terms of taxing Acts in order to improve on the efforts of Parliament and to stop gaps which are left open by the statutes. Tax avoidance is an evil, but it would be the beginning of much greater evils if the courts were to overstretch the language of the statute in order to subject to taxation people of whom they disapproved.

On the question whether the power to direct investment is fiduciary (cl. 2 of the trust deed) I feel no doubt. It is a power to direct the investment of a fund which is subject to a properly constituted trust. If the settlors or their successors as "authorised persons," who might eventually be strangers to the Vestey family and its interests, were to claim to exercise this power for their own advantage and without consideration for the interests of beneficiaries they would, I think, receive short shrift from a court of equity.

The next question is raised by s. 18 (5) (a) of the Act of 1936, which provides that "a reference to an individual shall be deemed to include the wife or husband of the individual"; by the references to the "wife or husband of the settlor" in s. 38 (2) of the Act of 1938; and by the provision in s. 38 (4) that for the purpose of s. 38 (3):

"... the settlor shall be deemed to have an interest in income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in that settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever."

Under cl. 11 of the settlement, Sir William Vestey and Sir Edmund Vestey had power respectively by will or codicil to create an interest in William's fund or Edmund's fund respectively by directing payments to be made thereout in favour of the widow of the appointor for her life or any shorter period. Is this power of appointment a power to appoint in favour of the "wife" of the appointor, within the meaning of the enactments referred to? It was held in Gaunt's case (2) by the Court of Appeal reversing LAWRENCE, J., that the word "wife" in s. 38 (4) includes a widow. The ground of the judgment of LAWRENCE, J., was that the object of the statute was to prevent the settlor from getting the benefit of a provision during his lifetime. CLAUSON, L.J., said in the Court of Appeal ([1941] 2 All E.R. 664):

- A "The question is who are the people whose interests in the fund under the settlement, (or under a possible substitution for it under the power of revocation), are of such a character that the legislature thinks that a very remarkable result should ensue as regards taxability of income. When one realises that that is the point of it, there does not seem to be any sense in making the matter depend upon the possibility of a wife obtaining a benefit in her husband's lifetime. One does not see why, because the benefit which she is to get is to be after her husband's death, the position should be any different from what it is if the benefit is to be before her husband's death. The husband's death seems to have no relevance. Prima facie, therefore, one would suppose that the word 'wife' means that which is its true natural meaning, a lady who, during the latter part of the joint lives of herself and a man, has been the wife of that man. That is the meaning of the word 'wife.' It is perfectly true that the word 'widow' is used to express the position of a lady when her husband has died. In one sense, when a lady has become a widow, she is no longer a wife. That is perfectly true, but the description in this section of her as a wife refers to the lady, and has nothing to do with the matter of time."
- C
- D Counsel for the Crown relied on this reasoning though they modified the statement of it. They said that the wife, if there is one, in the year of assessment, is the persona designata by the words "the settlor's wife" and if that persona may take a benefit within the meaning of any of the relevant provisions at any future time, the requirements of the statute are satisfied. There can, therefore, they said, be no persona designata if in the year of assessment the settlor is a
- E bachelor or widower; but if the settlor is married a power to appoint in favour of his wife is the equivalent of a power to appoint in her favour as if she was named. I think that this could lead to some strange and unexpected results; but these I pass over. I respectfully think that the Court of Appeal in Gaunt's case (2) and the argument for the Crown in this case leave out of account the important consideration that ss. 18 and 38 are income tax sections, and that it is a principle of income tax law, embodied in r. 16 of the General Rules that
- F for income tax purposes a husband and wife living together are one. I see no reason to doubt that the purpose of the provisions in s. 38 by which a benefit for the wife or husband of the settlor falls to be treated as a benefit for the settlor was intended to give effect to this principle not only in cases where the income is enjoyed by the settlor or his wife in the year of assessment, but also
- G in those cases in which the settlement provides a postponed enjoyment of the income either by the settlor or by his wife in his lifetime. The same considerations apply mutatis mutandis to the provisions of s. 18. I do not agree that the "wife of the settlor" in the year of assessment is treated as a persona designata, but even if it were so the question would still remain whether the interest of the persona designata, if it only takes effect after her marriage has been dissolved,
- H is obnoxious to the provisions of these sections.

My Lords, on what remains of the questions to be decided I have already said that I agree with my noble and learned friend LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON. I will, therefore, not detain your Lordships further than to say that I agree that the appeals should be disposed of as has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, the first two appeals before your Lordships' House are original appeals by taxpayers and cross-appeals by the Crown from two orders of the Court of Appeal dated July 30, 1947. The orders of the Court of Appeal were made on original appeals by the Crown and cross-appeals by the taxpayers from two orders of the King's Bench Division (MACNAGHTEN, J.) dated Nov. 4, 1946. Lord Vestey's executors and Sir Edmund Vestey appealed to the King's Bench Division on two separate Cases stated by the Special Commissioners, one of which raised questions as to the liability of Lord Vestey and of his brother, Sir Edmund Vestey, to sur-tax, and the other raised questions as to their liability to income tax, in respect of rent payable to trustees under a lease dated Dec. 29, 1921, and in respect of income arising from the investment and accumulations of such rent under a voluntary deed dated Dec. 30, 1921.

The claims to tax arising on the first two appeals are claims based only on the provisions of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38. Claims to tax against the same taxpayers in respect of similar income for earlier years, based on the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, are the subject of the third appeal, which arises out of a third Case stated by the Special Commissioners. There are three distinct statutory provisions on which claims to tax against each taxpayer are based: (i) those contained in s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, (ii) those contained in sub-s. (2) of s. 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, and (iii) those contained in sub-ss. (3) and (4) of the last mentioned section. The claims under s. 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, and those under s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, so far as they relate to the same years of assessment, are alternative claims. The effect of the judgments in both courts below in the present appeals, stated briefly, is to affirm the liability to tax of each taxpayer under s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, in respect of all the income in question, but to affirm liability under s. 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, in respect of part only, the decision of the Court of Appeal under s. 38 being more favourable to the Crown than that of MACNAGHTEN, J. The cross-appeals of the Crown to this House are directed against the decision of the Court of Appeal so far only as it restricted the liability under s. 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, and are addressed to establishing liability under that section in respect of all the income in question.

The relevant facts are fully set out in the three Cases Stated, all of which are dated Sept. 14, 1945, and I shall only go into the history of the matter so far as is necessary for the purpose of stating my views on the various questions which arise for decision in your Lordships' House. By a lease (hereafter called "the lease") dated Dec. 29, 1921, and made between Lord Vestey, then Sir William Vestey, Bt., and Sir Edmund Vestey, Bt., of the first part, the Union Cold Storage Co., Ltd., (a company having its registered office in England and hereafter called "Union"), of the second part, and three persons residing in Paris named Kennerley Hall, Drabble and Stirling (hereafter called "the Paris trustees"), of the third part, the Vesteyes demised or agreed to demise certain properties situate abroad to Union for a term of 21 years from Apr. 10, 1921. Clause 3 of the lease is of an unusual kind, and should be set out in full:

"The lessees shall pay therefor to the said Kennerley Hall, Drabble and Stirling (whose receipt only shall be a good discharge of the same) yearly during the said term hereby granted and so in proportion for any less time than a year the rent of £960,000 to be paid to the said Kennerley Hall, Drabble and Stirling by quarterly instalments on Jan. 1, Apr. 1, July 1 and Oct. 1 in each year . . . provided always and it is hereby agreed that if on making up at the end of each financial year ending on Dec. 31 the accounts of the lessees (as to which the certificate of the auditors for the time being of the lessees shall be final and binding) it is found that in respect of the then past financial year the result of the lessees' operations after providing for the rent hereinbefore reserved shall be insufficient to enable the lessees to pay the aggregate of the following sums namely the interest on the debentures or debenture stock issued by the lessees for the time being outstanding and the interest on the amount owing on all specific mortgages heretofore or hereafter created by the lessees and for the time being outstanding the dividend at the fixed rate of interest on all the preference shares issued by the lessees for the time being outstanding a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum at least on the ordinary shares issued by the lessees for the time being outstanding then the rent aforesaid for such financial year shall be abated to the extent of the deficiency so ascertained and any rent already paid by the lessees in respect of that particular year shall be repaid to them by the said Kennerley Hall, Drabble and Stirling to the extent of the rebate necessary."

It is to be noted that the rent was not to be paid to the lessors, but to the Paris trustees and that the rent payable was related to the annual profits of Union in the manner and to the extent mentioned in the clause just quoted. Clause 4 contained covenants by Union for themselves and their assigns with the lessors (and as a separate covenant with the Paris trustees as regards the covenant for payment of the said yearly rent) that Union would during the continuance of the term granted by the lease pay to the Paris trustees the said yearly rent and would during the said term pay and discharge all rates taxes and other outgoings payable in respect of the demised premises or the owner or the occupier in respect thereof.

The lease contained provisions of a usual kind as to repair, insurance and other matters and a power for either the Vestey's or Union to determine the lease on six months notice in writing. It also contained the following power of withdrawal:

"Provided further that the lessors may at any time during the term hereby granted on giving to the lessees six calendar months previous notice in writing expiring on one of the aforesaid quarterly days withdraw any part or parts of the premises hereby demised from this demise in which case the rent hereinbefore reserved to the said Kennerley Hall, Drabble and Stirling shall as from the date of such withdrawal be reduced by such amount as shall be agreed upon between the lessors and lessees and as from the date of such withdrawal the provisions hereof shall cease to apply to the premises so withdrawn but as regards the remainder of the said demised premises shall continue in full force and effect subject to the reduction of the said rent as hereinbefore provided."

On a number of occasions the Vestey's exercised this power of withdrawal by withdrawing a number of properties originally comprised in the lease. Save in one case, they substituted other properties. Certain subsidiary documents were executed by the Vestey's for the purpose of more effectively vesting in Union, for the term of the lease, certain properties agreed to be demised whereof the Vestey's did not hold the legal estate. Nothing turns on these documents, which may be treated as part of the lease for the purposes of the present appeals.

It is common ground between the parties that, if no further document had been executed, the Paris trustees would have received the rent under the lease as bare trustees for the Vestey's, who were beneficially entitled thereto in equal shares. On Dec. 30, 1921, a document which may conveniently be called "the trust deed" was made between the Vestey's, of the one part, and the Paris trustees, of the other part. The lease was recited, and it was also recited that the Vestey's:

"... executed and granted the said lease reserving the rent thereunder to the trustees to the intent that such rent as and when received by the trustees shall be held by them upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions hereinafter expressed and declared."

The trust deed was expressed to be made "in consideration of the natural love and affection of the settlors for the beneficiaries hereinafter referred to and for divers other good causes and considerations" and it was thereby agreed that the Paris trustees should hold :

" . . . all rent and sums of money payable to them in accordance with the terms and during the continuance of the said lease and which they may receive subject to any refund or rebate they may be liable to make thereon to the lessees (all of which are hereinafter called " the settled fund ") and the the investments for the time being representing the same and the accumulations thereof "

on the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions therein set forth.

Clauses 1 and 2 of the trust deed are so important that they must be set out in full :

" 1. The expression ' authorised persons ' used therein means the settlors jointly during their lives and the survivor of them during his life and after the death of such survivor the following four persons namely) (a) the two eldest of the beneficiaries of 25 years of age and upwards for the time being entitled to share in William's fund hereunder but preferring males to females so that no such female beneficiary shall be included amongst the authorised persons so long as there are two male beneficiaries of that age and (b) such two persons as the said Sir Edmund Hoyle Vestey may appoint during his lifetime or by his will and in default of such appointment Percy Charles Vestey and Ronald Arthur Vestey and in the case of the death of either of such authorised persons such person as the survivor for the time being shall appoint by deed writing or will to fill the vacancy the said Sir Edmund Hoyle Vestey expressing the opinion that it is advisable to select a member of the family of the said Sir Edmund Hoyle Vestey to fill such vacancy provided that the person making such appointment considers such member of the said family is fit for the position Provided that if the authorised persons being not more than two in number cannot agree the trustees shall act on the direction of the majority but in case of equal voting by the authorised persons the trustees shall exercise their own discretion.

2. The trustees shall receive the aforesaid rent payable to them in accordance with the terms and during the continuance of the said lease (subject to any refund or rebate they may be liable to make thereunder to the said lessees as aforesaid) and shall capitalise the same until the expiration of 20 years from the death of the last surviving grandchild now living of the settlors (hereinafter referred to as ' the time of distribution ') by investing the same subject as hereafter provided in or upon any of the investments and in manner hereby authorised that is to say the settled fund shall (at the direction in writing of the authorised persons or a majority thereof and in the event of an equality of voting by such authorised persons at the trustees' discretion) be invested in the names or under the legal control of the trustees in or upon stocks funds shares securities or other investments of whatever nature and wheresoever (but where involving liability only with the consent of the trustees) or upon personal credit or upon loans to any company or companies wheresoever domiciled and with or without security and with the like power of varying such investments from time to time to the intent that the said trustees shall (subject to such direction as aforesaid) have the same full and unrestricted powers of investing and transposing the investments of the settled fund in all respects as if they were absolutely entitled thereto beneficially."

There is no evidence that any direction in writing was ever given by the Vestey's to the Paris trustees in regard to the investment of the rent or the settled fund.

The effect of subsequent clauses of the trust deed may be briefly summarised as follows. They provided (inter alia) for (a) the division of the residue of the income arising from the settled fund when invested, after meeting certain costs, etc., until the time of distribution, into two parts, called respectively "William's fund" and "Edmund's fund," and (b) for the accumulation and investment as therein mentioned of William's fund and Edmund's fund respectively until the respective deaths of William and Edmund or for 21 years from the date of the deed whichever might be the earlier date, when the two funds with the accumulations thereof (respectively described as William's accumulated fund and Edmund's accumulated fund) should be held in trust for the benefit of the children or remoter issue (and their wives and widows) of William and Edmund as William and Edmund might respectively from time to time by deed revocable or irrevocable or will or codicil appoint (but so that no appointment either of a lump sum or of any specific investments should be made otherwise than in the shape of a capital payment). In default of and subject to any such appointment the funds were to be divided as therein mentioned among the lineal descendants of William and Edmund respectively. The Vesteyes had no power to give any directions as to the investment of any sums other than the rent coming to the hands of the Paris trustees.

Clause 11 of the trust deed reserved a power to William and Edmund respectively, notwithstanding anything contained in the deed, to appoint by will or codicil any interest in William's fund or Edmund's fund in favour of "the widow of the appointor" for her life or any shorter period. By cl. 17 and 19 of the trust deed the "authorised persons" were given power to fix the remuneration of the trustees, to remove trustees from their office and to appoint other trustees in their place. In exercise and by virtue of the relevant power given or reserved to them by cl. 4 of the deed or any other relevant powers the Vesteyes made the following appointments: (1) By deed dated Nov. 26, 1935, William irrevocably appointed and directed that the Paris trustees should from and after Apr. 1, 1942, or the earlier determination of the lease hold the whole of William's share, William's fund and William's accumulated fund both capital and income and also any part of the rent mentioned in cl. 2 of the trust deed which might belong or might have originally belonged to him and might not be effectively disposed of by inclusion in the said funds in trust for his eldest son if then living and in default in trust for that son's son. (2) By deed dated Dec. 31, 1935, Edmund irrevocably appointed and directed that the Paris trustees should from and after Apr. 1, 1942, or the earlier determination of the lease hold the whole of Edmund's share, Edmund's fund and Edmund's accumulated fund both capital and income including all income accruing in the meantime (except as hereinafter provided) and also any part of the rent not effectively disposed of by inclusion in the said funds in trust for his third son if then living, and in default in trust for such son of his third son as should first or alone attain the age of 21 years. Except and provided that the said deed should not appoint or affect the investments moneys and properties which on Oct. 31, 1935, represented Edmund's fund and Edmund's accumulated fund. (3) By deed dated Mar. 31, 1937, Edmund irrevocably appointed the investments and property left unappointed by the last mentioned deed in trust for his third son as from June 1, 1937, if then living, and in default in trust for his elder daughter and wholly released and extinguished in respect of all funds and income the power to appoint an interest therein in favour of his widow if and so far as such power had not already been extinguished. The Vesteyes, in exercise of the special powers of appointment reserved to them by the deed and of all other relevant powers, appointed a number of capital sums in favour of their children or children's issue, but these appointments (of which particulars are set out in the Cases Stated) are not material to any of the issues raised in the appeals.

The events leading up to the execution of the lease and the deed of trust, including the history of Union and of another company, the Western United Investment Co., Ltd. (hereafter called "Western"), are conveniently set out in the Cases Stated and in the printed case before your Lordships' House in the case Adamson v. Union Cold Storage Co., Ltd. (5), which is incorporated by reference in the Cases Stated. It is sufficient for the present purpose to state the following facts. Western was incorporated on Aug. 26, 1918, with a capital of £1,000,004 divided into 1,000,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and four management shares of £1 each. At all material times the four management shares, which gave the holders complete control but no beneficial interest in profits or assets, were held by Lord Vestey and his son and Sir Edmund and his son. By certain transactions, which need not be set out in detail, Western came to own the whole of the ordinary shares in Union and by Nov. 28, 1930, the Paris trustees had come to own the whole of the ordinary shares in Western. Western acted as bankers and financial agents for Union, the Paris trustees and the Vesteyes. The Cases Stated set out in some detail certain dealings between the Paris trustees and Western and between Western and the Vesteyes, but on the view which I take of the case these dealings are not material to the decision of the matters now before your Lordships.

My Lords, I have already said that certain of the assessments now in question were made under the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, while others were made under the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38. The relevant sections must now be quoted. The former section is in the following terms :

" For the purpose of preventing the avoiding by individuals ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom of liability to income tax by means of transfers of assets by virtue or in consequence whereof, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, income becomes payable to persons resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom, it is hereby enacted as follows :—(1) Where such an individual has by means of any such transfer, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, acquired any rights by virtue of which he has, within the meaning of this section, power to enjoy, whether forthwith or in the future, any income of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom which, if it were income of that individual received by him in the United Kingdom, would be chargeable to income tax by deduction or otherwise, that income shall, whether it would or would not have been chargeable to income tax apart from the provisions of this section, be deemed to be income of that individual for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts : Provided that this sub-section shall not apply if the individual shows in writing or otherwise to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners that the transfer and any associated operations were effected mainly for some purpose other than the purpose of avoiding liability to taxation. (2) For the purposes of this section an associated operation means, in relation to any transfer, an operation of any kind effected by any person in relation to any of the assets transferred or any assets representing, whether directly or indirectly, any of the assets transferred, or to the income arising from any such assets, or to any assets representing, whether directly or indirectly, the accumulations of income arising from any such assets. (3) An individual shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have power to enjoy income of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom if—(a) the income is in fact so dealt with by any person as to be calculated, at some point of time, and whether in the form of income or not, to inure for the benefit of the individual ; or (b) the receipt or accrual of the income operates to increase the value to the individual of any assets held by him or for his benefit ; or (c) the individual receives or is entitled to receive, at any time, any benefit provided or to be provided out of that income or out of moneys which are or will be available for the purpose by reason of the effect or successive effects of the associated operations on that income and on any assets which directly or indirectly represent that income ; or (d) the individual has power, by means of the exercise of any power of appointment or power of revocation or otherwise, to obtain for himself, whether with or without the consent of any other person, the beneficial enjoyment of the income ; or (e) the individual is able in any manner whatsoever, and whether directly or indirectly, to control the application of the income. (4) In determining whether an individual has power to enjoy income within the meaning of this section, regard shall be had to the substantial result and effect of the transfer and any associated operations, and all benefits which may at any time accrue to the individual as a result of the transfer and any associated operations shall be taken into account irrespective of the nature or form of the benefits. (5) For the purposes of this section—(a) a reference to an individual shall be deemed to include the wife or husband of the individual ; (b) the expression ‘ assets ’ includes property or rights of any kind, and the expression ‘ transfer,’ in relation to rights includes the creation of those rights ; (c) the expression ‘ benefit ’ includes a payment of any kind . . . (6) The provisions of sched. II to this Act shall have effect for the purpose of carrying this section into effect and otherwise for supplementing the provisions of this section, and this section is referred to in that schedule as ‘ the principal section.’ (7) The provisions of this section shall apply for the purposes of assessment to income tax for the year 1935-36 and subsequent years, and shall apply in relation to transfers of assets and associated operations whether carried out before or after the commencement of this Act : Provided that, for the year 1935-36, no income shall be charged to tax at the standard rate by virtue of the provisions of this section, but sur-tax shall be assessed and charged as if any income which would, but for this proviso, have been charged as aforesaid had in fact been so charged.”

Schedule II contains provisions not necessary to be quoted in regard to relief against double taxation, deductions and reliefs and other matters.

The Finance Act, 1938, s. 38, so far as material, is as follows :

“(1) If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that—(a) any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future, and whether with or without the consent of any other person, to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof and, in the event of the exercise of the power, the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor will or may cease to be liable to make any annual payments payable by virtue or in consequence of any provision of the settlement ; or (b) the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor may, whether immediately or in the future, cease, on the payment of a penalty, to be liable to make any annual payments payable by virtue or in consequence of any provision of the settlement ; any sums payable by the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor by virtue or in consequence of that provision of the settlement in any year of assessment shall be treated as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person : Provided that, where any such power as is referred to in para. (a) of this sub-section cannot be exercised within the period of six years from the time when the first of the annual payments so referred to becomes payable, and the like annual payments are payable in each year throughout that period, the said para. (a) shall not apply so long as the said power cannot be exercised. (2) If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that—(a) any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future, and whether with or without the consent of any other person, to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof ; and (b) in the event of the exercise of the power, the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor will or may become beneficially entitled to the whole or any part of the property then comprised in the settlement or of the income arising from the whole or any part of the property so comprised ; any income arising under the settlement from the property comprised in the settlement in any year of assessment or from a corresponding part of that property, or a corresponding part of any such income, as the case may be, shall be treated as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person : Provided that, where any such power as aforesaid cannot be exercised within six years from the time when any particular property first becomes comprised in the settlement, this sub-section shall not apply to income arising under the settlement from that property, or from property representing that property, so long as the power cannot be exercised. (3) If and so long as the settlor has an interest in any income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, any income so arising during the life of the settlor in any year of assessment shall, to the extent to which it is not distributed, be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year, and not as the income of any other person : Provided that—(a) if and so long as that interest is an interest neither in the whole of the income arising under the settlement nor in the whole of the property comprised in the settlement, the amount of income to be treated as the income of the settlor by virtue of this sub-section shall be such part of the income which, but for this proviso, would be so treated as is proportionate to the extent of that interest ; and (b) where it is shown that any amount of the income which is not distributed in any year of assessment consists of income which falls to be treated as the income of the settlor for that year by virtue of either of the last two foregoing sub-sections, that amount shall be deducted from the amount of income which, but for this proviso, would be treated as his for that year by virtue of this sub-section. (4) For the purpose of the last foregoing sub-section the settlor shall be deemed to have an interest in income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in that settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever . . . (7) The foregoing provisions of this section shall apply for the purposes of assessment to income tax for the year 1937-38 and subsequent years and shall apply in relation to any settlement, wherever made and whether made before or after the passing of this Act : Provided that—(a) for the year 1937-38 no income shall be charged to tax at the standard rate by virtue of this section, but sur-tax shall be assessed and charged as if any income which would, but for this proviso, have been charged as aforesaid had in fact been so charged ; and (b) for the purpose of granting relief from tax at the standard rate in respect of any income which for the year 1937-38 is treated as the income of a settlor by virtue of sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) of this section but would be treated as the income of some other person but for that sub-section, that income shall be treated as the income of that other person.”

Section 40 of the Act of 1938 provides :

“(1) Any capital sum paid directly or indirectly in any relevant year of assessment by the trustees of a settlement to which this section applies to the settlor shall—(a) to the extent to which the amount of that sum falls within the amount of income available up to the end of that year, be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year ; (b) to the extent to which the amount of that sum exceeds the amount of income available up to the end of that year but falls within the amount of the income available up to the end of the next following year, be treated for the purposes aforesaid as the income of the settlor for the next following year ; and so on. (2) For the purpose of the last foregoing sub-section the amount of income available up to the end of any year shall, in relation to any capital sum paid as aforesaid, be taken to be the aggregate amount of income arising under the settlement in that

A year and any previous relevant year which has not been distributed, less—
 (a) the amount of any other capital sums paid to the settlor in any relevant year before that sum was paid; and (b) so much of any income arising under the settlement in that year and any previous relevant year which has not been distributed as is shown to consist of income which has been treated as income of the settlor by virtue of sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) of s. 38 of this Act; and (c) any income arising under the settlement in that year and any previous relevant year which has been treated as the income of the settlor by virtue of sub-s. (3) of s. 38 of this Act; and (d) any sums paid by virtue or in consequence of the settlement, to the extent that they are not allowable, by virtue of the last foregoing section, as deductions in computing the settlor's income for that year or any previous relevant year; and (e) an amount equal to tax at the standard rate on—(i) the aggregate amount of income arising under the settlement in that year and any previous relevant year which has not been distributed, less (ii) the aggregate amount of the income and sums referred to in paras. (b), (c) and (d) of this sub-section. (3) For the purpose of this section, any capital sum paid to the settlor in any year of assessment by any body corporate connected with the settlement in that year shall be treated as having been paid by the trustees of the settlement in that year. (4) Where the whole or any part of any sum is treated by virtue of this section as income of the settlor for any year, it shall be treated as income of such an amount as, after deduction of tax at the standard rate for that year, would be equal to that sum or that part thereof. (5) This section applies to any settlement wherever made and whether made before or after the commencement of this Act, and in this section—(a) the expression 'capital sum' means—(i) any sum paid by way of loan or repayment of a loan; and (ii) any other sum paid otherwise than as income, being a sum which is not paid for full consideration in money or money's worth; but does not include any sum which could not have become payable to the settlor except in one of the events specified in the proviso to sub-s. (4) of s. 38 of this Act; (b) the expression 'relevant year' means any year of assessment after the year 1937-38; (c) references to sums paid to the settlor include references to sums paid to the wife or husband of the settlor."

Section 41 of the Act of 1938 provides:

F "... (4) For the purposes of this Part of this Act . . . (b) the expression 'settlement' includes any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement, and the expression 'settlor' in relation to a settlement means any person by whom the settlement was made."

My Lords, it often happens that when claims are made by the Crown under s. 18 of the Act of 1936, the taxpayer relies on the proviso to s. 18 (1) of that Act. Before the Special Commissioners, the Vestey's sought to claim the benefit of this proviso, and this claim is dealt with in the following passage taken from the findings of fact in the Cases Stated :

C

“The benefit of the proviso to s. 18 in its original and amended form is claimed and we have been referred to Lord Vestey's evidence in 1919 before the Royal Commission on the Income Tax. It does not appear that he complained that United Kingdom tax made it difficult for him to compete against American firms but only that his profits which he did not spend or give away were subjected to that tax whilst the profits of his foreign competitors were not. To avoid United Kingdom taxation the Vestey's betook themselves abroad from 1915 to 1921. It is said that having removed the business from the area of taxation they could not in 1931 have had a purpose of avoiding taxation and that the primary and, indeed, sole object of the lease was to restore the business back to England. In our view it was the Vestey's' personal desire to reside in this country which led to the lease and deed and the main purpose of the creation of the rent and its transfer to the settlement trustees was the avoidance of the United Kingdom taxation which would normally accrue on their becoming resident.”

F

For some 15 years after 1921 this “main” purpose appears to have been completely achieved. Payments in the nature of income flowed in to the Paris trustees year by year from five sources, the rent paid by Union, the income from William's fund and Edmund's fund respectively, and the income arising from investments representing accumulations of the income of William's fund and Edmund's fund respectively. No part of this income was ever paid away as income, and substantial funds rolled up annually for the benefit of the beneficiaries under the deed of trust. Moreover, Union was successful in the above-mentioned case of Adamson v. Union Cold Storage Co., Ltd. (5). In that case the Crown tried in vain to convince this House, on assessments made on Union for 1923-24 and 1924-25, that as the rent payable under the lease was dependent on the profits made by the company and reducible in the events therein mentioned, and as the tenure by Union of the properties for which the rent was paid was under the control of the Vestey's as lessors, the rent ought to be regarded as a distribution of profits by the company to the Vestey's and not as a deductible expense in computing the profits of the business of the company for income tax. Then came the Act of 1936, followed by the Act of 1938, and the assessments already mentioned which relate entirely to income received by the Paris trustees by virtue of the lease and the deed of trust. The Vesteyes have contended throughout, and now contend, that not one penny of the sums received by the Paris trustees comes under the scope of either s. 18 of the Act of 1936 or s. 38 of the Act of 1938.

The claims of the Crown in the present case depend to a large extent upon three matters :—(1) the power of the “ authorised persons ” to direct the investment by the Paris trustees of the sums received by them from Union ; (2) the contention of the Crown that all the properties comprised in the lease are “ comprised in the settlement ” within s. 38 (2) (b) of the Act of 1938 ; (3) the power of appointment in favour of a widow contained in cl. 11 of the deed of trust. For this reason, before considering in detail the relevant sections already quoted and their application to the income received by the Paris trustees, it is desirable to consider three questions of construction :—(a) Is the right or power of the “ authorised persons ” under the trust deed to direct how the rent payable by Union shall be invested by the Paris trustees a power of the kind conveniently described as a fiduciary power, which must be exercised in the best interests of the beneficiaries under the trust deed, or is it a right or power which the authorised persons are entitled to exercise, if they so think fit, in any way which best serves their own interests ? (b) Is the “ settlement ” which falls to be considered under s. 38 (2) of the Act of 1938 the trust deed alone, or the trust deed together with the lease, and what is the “ property comprised in the settlement ” within the meaning of the same sub-section ? (c) Does the existence of the power of appointment in favour of the widow of Lord Vestey and Sir Edmund respectively have the effect of bringing any income within the ambit of either of the two sections in question ? When these three questions have been answered, your Lordships will have gone a long way towards a solution of the numerous questions argued on these appeals.

In arguing question (a), which is a question of construction, counsel for the Crown sought to pray in aid such matters as the history, prior to and after 1915, of the vast business controlled by the Vesteyes, the structure and history of the various companies in which they were interested, and the various steps whereby the Vesteyes sought to reside in England and yet to avoid, so far as they legally could, the taxation which usually falls on persons so resident. It is said on behalf of the Crown that cl. 3 of the lease (already quoted) put the annual profits of Union into the hands of the Paris trustees, and that the power to direct investments, vested in the “ authorised persons,” was the means by which the Vesteyes were able to obtain, out of these profits, the cash necessary for financing the businesses which they controlled. It is further said that certain passages in the Cases Stated show that the power was, in fact, used for this purpose. My Lords, in my view, one must solve this question of construction on a consideration of the words used in the trust deed, by which alone this right or power is constituted, applying to these words the ordinary principles of construction, without regard to the fact that this deed is part of a scheme of tax avoidance. If it appears that there is some latent ambiguity in the deed itself, one can seek to resolve it by a consideration of the relevant surrounding circumstances.

It is important to note, at the outset, that if, as is contended by the Crown, the power to direct is not a fiduciary power, the authorised persons are quite unrestricted in their choice of an investment. They could, for instance, direct the Paris trustees to lend any instalment of rent to the authorised persons, without security, at $\frac{1}{2}$ per centum interest per annum. They could not, I think, direct the Paris trustees to make such a loan free of interest, for such a loan would no more be an “ investment ” than would be the placing of cash in a stocking ; but provided that the directed application of moneys can fairly be described as an “ investment,” I can see no limit on the powers of the authorised persons, if the Crown's contention is correct, nor could counsel for the Crown suggest any limit.

With this in mind, I approach the consideration of the terms of the trust deed. By cl. 2 the authorised persons are to select the investments, and the Paris trustees are to hold the funds and make the investments and to exercise their discretion in selecting the investments if the authorised persons are equally divided or (as I think) if no direction is given by the authorised persons. Turning to the other provisions of the deed one finds that it is made "in consideration of the natural love and affection" of the Vestey family for the beneficiaries, while cl. 1 contains careful provision as to the persons who are to be "authorised persons." It is to be observed that the power is not reserved only to the settlors, and two facts are particularly to be noted in regard to Sir Edmund's successors. First, Sir Edmund desires that a member of his family shall be selected "provided that the person making the appointment considers such member of the said family is fit for the position." I think this indicates that the person selected is to be someone who can exercise a wise judgment in selecting suitable investments. Secondly, it may happen that two, at least, of the authorised persons may be persons who are not members of the Vestey family and are not beneficially interested in any way. Now it is clear that the nature of this power of direction must be the same throughout the duration of the trust, and I cannot believe that the Vestey family would have entrusted their successors with an arbitrary power or right to direct an investment greatly to the benefit of themselves and greatly to the detriment of the beneficiaries, such as an unsecured loan to the authorised persons at a rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ per centum interest. To my mind, all the indications in the deed are in favour of the view that this power of direction is a fiduciary power. To test the matter further, let it be assumed that the Vestey family or their successors direct the Paris trustees to make an investment of the kind just described, that one of the beneficiaries objects, and that the trustees ask the court, by originating summons, whether they are or are not bound to obey this direction. In my view, the court would hold that they were not so bound, and it would hardly avail the Vestey family to contend that, as this settlement was part of a scheme to avoid tax, they must be deemed to have inserted this power of direction in order to retain a valuable right for themselves. It is not, I think, irrelevant to note that the language used in this deed bears a strong resemblance to the wording of the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 22 (2), which was in force at the date when the deed of trust was executed. That section provides that the investment or other application of capital money by the trustees "shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life, and in default thereof, according to the discretion of the trustees," and it is clear that in giving such a direction the tenant for life is acting in a fiduciary capacity: see s. 53 of the Act of 1882 and (for instance) Re Peel's Settled Estates (6) ([1910] 1 Ch. 395). It seems to me hardly likely that the Vestey family would have used similar words in the deed of trust if they had intended the power in question to be non-fiduciary.

The result is that, in my view, on the true construction of the trust deed, the power of direction is a fiduciary power, and the authorised persons are not entitled to use it for the purpose of obtaining a benefit for themselves. They must exercise it bona fide in what they consider to be the best interests of the beneficiaries. This is not, to my mind, a case of latent ambiguity. I think that the Vestey family could have directed the trustees to lend trust moneys to Western, or even to themselves, but such a direction could only be justifiable if the loan were made at a commercial rate of interest and if the Vestey family honestly thought that it was in the best interests of the beneficiaries. If the trustees were to advance moneys to any company or to either of the Vestey family free of interest, they would commit a breach of trust, but there is no finding in any of the Cases Stated that this was ever done.

As to question (b) there can be no doubt that the deed of trust is a settlement in the ordinary sense of the word, and I do not dissent from the Crown's contention that the lease and the deed of trust together constitute an "arrangement" within s. 41 (4) (b) of the Act of 1938 and are consequently a "settlement" for the purposes of pt. IV of that Act. In my view, however, whether one looks for this purpose at the deed of trust alone, or at the deed of trust and the lease together, the only property "comprised in the settlement" at any time was the rent payable by Union under the lease, together with any property resulting from the investment of the rent, and from the accumulation of the income arising from such investment.

My Lords, it was contended on behalf of the Crown that all the properties demised or agreed to be demised to Union by the lease were "comprised in the settlement" within the meaning of s. 38. I cannot agree with this contention, and I think it is wholly inconsistent with the decision of this House in Chamberlain v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). In that case LORD MACMILLAN said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 204), in reference to the decision of the First Division of the Court of Session in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Morton (4) :

"I agree with LORD MONCRIEFF that the settlement or arrangement must be one whereby the settlor charges certain property of his with rights in favour of others. It must comprise certain property which is the subject of the settlement: it must confer the income of the comprised property on others, for it is the income so given to others that is to be treated as, nevertheless, the income of the settlor."

In the present case, immediately before the execution of the lease, the Vesteyes owned or controlled the properties about to be comprised in the lease. Immediately after the execution of that document, the freehold interest remained in the Vesteyes subject to the lease; the leasehold interest was vested in Union; and the rent was payable to the Paris trustees who would hold it as bare trustees for the Vesteyes. So far, no property had been "settled," but it remained in the power of the Vesteyes either to settle the freehold interest in the demised properties, subject to the lease, or to settle the rent which still belonged beneficially to them. They chose the latter course, and settled the rent by the deed of trust. It is, in my judgment, quite impossible to say that either the freehold interest, which the Vesteyes retained, or the leasehold interest, which remained the property of Union, was the subject of any settlement or "comprised in" any settlement, having regard to the reasoning of your Lordships' House in Chamberlain's case (1). I would add that, in my view, Morton's case (4) can no longer be regarded as good law. I think that in Chamberlain's case (1) this House agreed with LORD MONCRIEFF on the vital point on which he differed from the majority of the First Division in Morton's case (4).

It is convenient to consider at once what is the result of the view which I have just expressed on the Crown's endeavour to bring this case within s. 38 (2) of the Act of 1938. It is contended on behalf of the Crown that as Union, on the one hand, and the Vesteyes, on the other hand, had power to determine the lease, each of these parties had power to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or a "provision" thereof, within s. 38 (2) (a). Clearly they had no power to determine the settlement itself, for even if the lease was determined, the trusts declared by the deed of trust concerning rents already accrued would continue undisturbed; and I gravely doubt whether the lease can be regarded as a "provision of the settlement." However, it is unnecessary to resolve this doubt, for even if the Crown can bring this case within para. (a) of s. 38 (2), it clearly does not come within para. (b). Once it is ascertained that only the rent and property derived therefrom is "comprised in the settlement," it becomes clear that if the lease is determined neither Lord Vestey nor Sir Edmund nor the wife of either of them "will or may become beneficially entitled to the whole or any part of the property then comprised in the settlement" or of the income arising therefrom. The determination of the lease would make no difference at all to the position of any of these persons in regard to the property comprised in the settlement or the income thereof; it would merely have the effect that no further rent would reach the hands of the Paris trustees.

Question (c) should, in my opinion, be answered in the negative. A different view was taken by the Court of Appeal in Gaunt v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) and the Court of Appeal in the present case naturally followed that decision. Gaunt's case (2) has already been criticised by my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND. I agree with his criticisms, but out of respect for the Court of Appeal I shall add some observations of my own. For the sake of example I shall take s. 38 (4) of the Act of 1938, and shall disregard for the moment the appointments of 1935 and 1937 already noted. Could it be said, in any of the years of assessment, that any income comprised in the settlement might become payable to the wife (for instance) of William within the meaning of s. 38 (4)? In my view, it could not. To my mind, if a payment is to come within the sub-section it must be made to a lady who answers the description of a wife at the time of payment. No such payment could ever be made, because no payment could be made until after the death of William; the income then becomes payable, not to his wife, but to his widow. I do not propose to travel all through the language of s. 38 of the Act of 1938 or of s. 18 of the Act of 1936. I can find no passage in either section which is inconsistent with the view which I hold. Further, I think that the intention of each reference to a wife of the settlor is reasonably clear. It was thus stated by LAWRENCE, J., in Gaunt's case (2) ([1941] 2 All E.R. 85):

"On the second point, I am of opinion that the object of the section is to prevent the settlor from getting the benefit of the trust fund during his lifetime. It is not to prevent his wife from enjoying the trust fund after his death, and I do not think that the word 'wife' is apt to describe the settlor's widow. The income must be capable of being paid to, or for the benefit of, the wife, which, in my opinion, means while she is his wife."

My Lords, I entirely agree with this passage. I think that the treatment of husband and wife by the legislature, for income tax purposes, rests on the view that any income enjoyed by one spouse is a benefit to the other spouse. It is not surprising, therefore, that in the sections now under consideration a benefit to the wife of the settlor is treated as being a benefit to the settlor; but it seems to me unlikely that this principle is being extended, by these sections, to the widow of the settlor. Further, if, for instance, s. 38 (4) of the Act of 1938 is to be read as applying to the widow of the settlor, there would seem to be no reason why it should not have been extended to the children of the settlor. If it be said that the provision of a benefit for the widow of the settlor benefits the settlor himself, because he would naturally desire to make provision for his widow, exactly the same reasoning could be applied to the provision of a benefit for the settlor's children. Finally, although I do not myself think that there is a real ambiguity in the use of the word "wife" throughout these sections, if there is such an ambiguity it must be resolved in favour of the subject, according to principles which have been laid down many times. If I had come to a different conclusion on this point, it would have been necessary to consider how far the appointments of 1935 and 1937 precluded any appointment thereafter to a widow of either of the Vestseys, but this point does not arise, having regard to the view which I have just expressed.

Having determined the answers to these three questions of general importance, I now turn to a more detailed consideration of s. 18 of the Act of 1936. The opening words are:

"For the purpose of preventing the avoiding by individuals ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom of liability to income tax by means of transfers of assets by virtue or in consequence whereof, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, income becomes payable to persons resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom, it is hereby enacted as follows . . .”

- It is pointed out by counsel for the Crown that the Vesteyes were individuals ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom in December, 1921, that they carried out a transfer of assets by virtue or in consequence whereof income became payable to persons resident outside the United Kingdom, namely the Paris trustees, and that these steps were taken by the Vesteyes with the object of avoiding liability to income tax. That is all true, but it must be borne in mind that the section only applies to a case which comes within sub-s. (1). If neither of the Vesteyes had had any rights or powers of direction or appointment under the deed of trust, both of them would have avoided all liability to tax. Your Lordships have simply to consider whether the existence of these rights or powers brings the present case within the ambit of the section, and for this purpose the provisions of sub-ss. (2), (4) and (5) must be borne in mind throughout. It is first necessary to consider whether Lord Vestey had at any relevant time, by means of any such transfer as is described in the opening words of s. 18 (either alone or in conjunction with associated operations), acquired any rights by virtue of which he had, within the meaning of s. 18, power to enjoy (whether forthwith or in the future) any income of the Paris trustees. It is necessary to consider separately the case of each of the two Vesteyes. They have been assessed separately, and, in my view, it is necessary to inquire, in the case of each of them, whether he was, at the material time, “an individual” in the position described in s. 1. I have not, of course, overlooked the fact that, by reason of s. 1 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, the word “individual” in s. 18 (1) would be construed as including the plural unless the contrary intention appears, but in considering whether any income is to be deemed to be income of a particular individual under s. 18 (1) I feel no doubt that one must have regard only to rights acquired by the same individual, and not to rights acquired by a group of individuals, however small, which includes him. Difficulties would arise from any other construction of s. 18 (1) which are, I think, so apparent that they need not be further discussed.

- As a preliminary matter one must inquire whether Lord Vestey acquired any rights at all by virtue of the deed of trust. I think he acquired only two rights, namely the power of appointment in favour of his widow conferred by cl. 11 and the power of appointment in favour of his children or remoter issue of their wives or widows conferred by cl. 4. During the whole of the relevant period, Sir Edmund was alive, and the various powers conferred by the trust deed on the “authorised persons” were powers vested jointly in the two brothers. The words “has acquired” are not followed by any such words as “either alone or jointly with some other person or persons” and this omission becomes very significant when one observes, by way of contrast, that the words “either alone or in conjunction with associated operations” are inserted immediately after the words “by means of any such transfer.” Compare also sub-s. (3) (d) “the individual has power . . . to obtain for himself, whether with or without the consent of any other person, the beneficial enjoyment of the income.” I cannot believe that sub-s. (1) would have been in its present form if the legislature had intended to include among the “rights” mentioned in the sub-section any rights which the individual held jointly with another person. It may be that the failure of the sub-section to cover such a joint power opens the door to easy evasion of the provisions of s. 18. If so, it is for the legislature to fill the gap and not for your Lordships to put a strained construction on the words: “Where such an individual has . . . acquired any rights. . .”

The next question is: Did Lord Vestey acquire these two rights by virtue of such a transfer of assets as is mentioned in sub-s. (1), either alone or in conjunction with associated operations. I think he did. Before the lease was executed, Lord Vestey and his brother owned or controlled certain properties. By s. 18 (5) (b) the expression "assets" includes property or rights of any kind and the expression "transfer" in relation to rights includes the creation of those rights. By the lease, the Vesteyes created a right, namely the right to receive the rent payable by Union. That right was an asset. By the creation of it, and by the joint effect of the lease and deed of trust, income (namely the rent) became payable to the Paris trustees on the trusts of the deed of trust, and Lord Vestey "acquired" his two powers of appointment by virtue of the deed of trust. It was contended on behalf of the taxpayers that Lord Vestey did not "acquire" these rights, but merely "reserved" them when he and his brother transferred assets to which they were absolutely entitled. This contention places too narrow a meaning on the word "acquired." Before the deed of trust was executed, none of the various funds mentioned in it existed. After it was executed Lord Vestey possessed two rights or powers of appointment over one of these funds. I think he "acquired" these two rights, which did not exist before, by means of the "transfer of assets" already described. A B

The next question is: Had Lord Vestey, at any relevant time, by virtue of either of his two powers of appointment, "power to enjoy" within the meaning of s. 18 (1) any income of the Paris trustees. In order to answer this question, one must turn to sub-s. (3), bearing in mind that that sub-section merely puts an enlarged meaning on the words "power to enjoy" and never comes into play unless the circumstances described in the various paragraphs of sub-s. (3) arise "by virtue of" the right or rights described in sub-s. (1). I shall first consider these paragraphs in relation only to Lord Vestey's power of appointment in favour of his widow. My Lords, I share the difficulty which the Court of Appeal felt in linking up with sub-s. (1) the various paragraphs of sub-s. (3), but your Lordships need not, I think, be unduly troubled by para. (a). That paragraph depends on a question of fact, and there is no finding of fact by the Special Commissioners on which the Crown can rely. This is not surprising, as para. (a) was not relied on before the Special Commissioners, although the Crown sought to rely on it before MACNAGHTEN, J., and in the Court of Appeal. Your Lordships were asked by the Solicitor-General to remit this case to the Special Commissioners in order that they should arrive at findings of fact under paras. (a) and (c), but in all the circumstances of the present case I do not think that this suggestion should be accepted. The Crown had ample opportunities, of which much use was made, to obtain information as to the various dealings between the Paris trustees, Western, Union and the Vesteyes, and could have obtained further findings of fact from the Special Commissioners if its advisers had thought fit to do so. C D E

As to para. (b), the first question is: Is the power of appointment conferred on Lord Vestey by cl. 11 of the deed of trust as "asset" held by him for his benefit—and I think one must add "or for the benefit of his wife"—in view of sub-s. (5) (a). My Lords, in my view, it is not such an asset, for the short and simple reason that "wife" does not include "widow" and that this power of appointment is held by Lord Vestey only for the benefit or possible benefit of his widow. This being so, it is unnecessary to consider whether this power of appointment is an "asset" within the meaning of para. (b) or whether the value thereof will be increased by the receipt or accrual of the rent. Turning to para. (c), it is sufficient to say that neither Lord Vestey nor his wife received or was entitled to receive at any material time any benefit by virtue of Lord Vestey's power of appointment. Paragraph (d) cannot apply, because the only person who can obtain the beneficial enjoyment of any income under this power of appointment is Lord Vestey's widow. I would add that, even on the assumption that the joint power to direct investments falls to be considered under this head by reason of the words "with or without the consent" F G H of any other person", I do not think that the existence of this joint fiduciary power could possibly be said to enable Lord Vestey to obtain for himself the beneficial enjoyment of any of the income received by the Paris trustees. He could only obtain such beneficial enjoyment by means of a grave breach of trust. In considering para. (e) one must first ask—what is "the income" there referred to? The answer must be, as regards each year of assessment "it is the income of the Paris trustees attributable to that year of assessment."

- A Taking, as an example, 1936-37, one must ask: Had Lord Vestey power to enjoy (whether forthwith or in the future) any income of the Paris trustees attributable to that year? If so, "that income" to quote sub-s. (1), must be deemed to be income of Lord Vestey for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts. Now it is clear that Lord Vestey had no power to enjoy the income of the Paris trustees attributable to 1936-37 either forthwith or in the future in the ordinary sense of the words "power to enjoy", but in view of para. (e) one must go further and inquire whether Lord Vestey was able in any manner whatsoever, and whether forthwith or in the future, and whether directly or indirectly, to control the application of that income. The answer is that his power of appointment under cl. 11 did not enable him to do this. No exercise of Lord Vestey's power of appointment under cl. 11 could prevent the Paris trustees from dealing with their income for 1936-37 strictly in accordance with the terms of the trust deed, and no income accruing to the Paris trustees during Lord Vestey's life is affected by any exercise of Lord Vestey's power of appointment under cl. 11. Your Lordships are not concerned in these appeals with any income accruing to the Paris trustees after Lord Vestey's death.

- D I now turn to the question whether Lord Vestey's power to appoint in favour of his children or remoter issue or their wives or widows can be brought within any of paras. (a) to (e) of sub-s. (3). It is at once apparent that the only paragraph which can possibly be material for this purpose is (e). Even apart from the appointment of Nov. 26, 1935, I do not think that the existence of this power brought Lord Vestey within this paragraph, for reasons which will appear later, and as soon as he executed the deed of irrevocable appointment of that date, Lord Vestey put the matter beyond all question. It is true that if both of the appointees under that deed had predeceased Lord Vestey, his power would have revived; but that event did not happen. It is also true that Lord Vestey might have made a subsequent appointment to take effect only in the event of both of the appointees failing to take a vested interest; but the fact that Lord Vestey might have made such an appointment could not, on any construction of para. (e), render him "able to control the application of the income" in the year of assessment. Even with the assistance of the words "in any manner whatsoever and whether directly or indirectly," the paragraph cannot be stretched to cover such a case. In considering whether Lord Vestey had power to enjoy income within the meaning of sub-s. (1), read in conjunction with all the paragraphs of sub-s. (3), I have borne in mind the terms of sub-s. (4), but I cannot find that the terms of that sub-section alter in any way the conclusions stated above.

- H The result is that, in my view, the attempt of the Crown to render Lord Vestey liable to tax under s. 18 of the Act of 1936 wholly fails. All the reasoning set out above applies equally to the case of Sir Edmund Vestey, except that I must deal separately with Sir Edmund's position in regard to para. (e). So far as regards the property which Sir Edmund appointed by the deed of Dec. 31, 1935, he is in the same position as Lord Vestey. But he excepted from the operation of that deed the investments moneys and properties which on Oct. 31, 1935, represented Edmund's fund and Edmund's accumulated fund. Thus, until he executed his second appointment, dated Mar. 31, 1937, Sir Edmund retained a power to appoint these funds among a limited class of persons, in addition to his power to appoint to his widow under cl. 11 of the trust deed. It is arguable that Sir Edmund is assessable for 1936-37 in respect of the income of these two funds, on the ground that he had "power to enjoy" that income within s. 18 (1) and (3) (e), and the point is one of some difficulty. I do not think, however, that this limited power of appointment gave Sir Edmund power "to control the application" of any income, within the meaning of para. (e). He could only make an appointment "in the shape of a capital payment" in favour of one or more of his issue or their spouses and if such a power were intended to be caught by sub-s. (3) I think that it would have been included in para. (d), which deals expressly with powers of appointment. That paragraph is, however, limited in its operation to powers which enable the individual to obtain the beneficial enjoyment of income. A

My Lords, I cannot help feeling some regret that my opinion as to s. 18 should rest partly on the somewhat narrow ground that the joint power to direct investment, possessed by the Vesteyes jointly as "authorised persons", is not a right which either Lord Vestey or Sir Edmund, as an individual, acquired within the meaning of s. 18, and at one time I contemplated considering each paragraph of sub-s. (3) on the assumption that this joint power fell within sub-s. (1). On further reflection, however, I feel that the adoption of this course would only produce a rich crop of obiter dicta which might be an embarrassment, rather than an assistance, to those who may consider this case hereafter. For this reason I shall only say that, even if this joint power (which I have already held to be of a fiduciary nature) is a right which "such an individual" has acquired within the meaning of sub-s. (1), I am by no means satisfied that the Crown could bring the present case within the terms of any paragraph of sub-s. (3). It is, of course, well settled that a person in a fiduciary position is not entitled so to use his position as to make a profit for himself; and if he does so use his position, he is liable to account for the profit so made. The position would have been different in many respects if this House had taken the view that the power in question, on the true construction of the deed of trust, was one which the Vesteyes were entitled to use to serve their own ends. In that event, it would have been necessary to go into a number of matters which are irrelevant if the power is a fiduciary one. B C D

My Lords, I must now turn again to s. 38 of the Act of 1938. The Crown does not rely on sub-s. (1) and the claim of the Crown under sub-s. (2) is ill-founded, for the reasons which I have already given. As to sub-s. (3) it is clear that this sub-section can have no application, when one has arrived at the conclusion that the property comprised in the settlement only includes the rent and the property derived therefrom. Sub-section (4) however raises two questions. First, it is said that by reason of the joint power to direct investments, income arising under or property comprised in the deed of trust might become payable to or applicable for the benefit of either Lord Vestey or Sir Edmund, because the Vesteyes might at any time direct trust money to be lent to either of themselves on the personal credit of the borrower. It is said truly that the fact that the power is a joint one does not affect this argument adversely, by reason of the words "may become . . . in any circumstances whatsoever." As to this argument, I would first observe that, as the power to direct is of a fiduciary nature, any such loan would have to be at a commercial rate of interest. Assuming that such a loan were made, would the money lent be "payable to" the borrower within the meaning of sub-s. (4). Notwithstanding the words "in any circumstances whatsoever" I cannot believe that the words "payable to" were intended to apply to a payment made by way of loan. If these words were read quite literally, they would apply if the settlor were merely used as a channel for conveying the money to someone else, or if money were lent to the settlor on a mortgage of his lands. The phrase "payable to or applicable for the benefit of" is a well-known one, frequently used in settlements where money either is to be paid to a beneficiary, who can then use it as he pleases, or is to be applied by trustees in some manner which will benefit the beneficiary. Reading the phrase as a whole, I am satisfied E F G H that the words "payable to" are directed only to an out-and-out payment, with no obligation on the payee to return the money. As to the words "applicable for the benefit of the settlor." I think that a loan may well benefit a person, even if it is made at a commercial rate of interest, as it may tide him over a difficult period; but I do not think that, if money is so lent, it is applied "for the benefit of" the debtor within sub-s. (4).

A Section 40 of the Act of 1938 goes far to confirm me in the views which I have just expressed. I need not review its provisions in detail, but it would apply to any "capital sum," defined as meaning inter alia any sum paid by way of loan, which might be paid directly or indirectly, in any relevant year of assessment, by the Paris trustees to either of the Vesteyes. To a limited extent, particularised in the section, any such capital sum would be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the recipient for that year. B It seems to me incredible that the mere possibility of a loan being made should bring on the settlor the severe consequences set out in s. 38 (4), if the actual making of a loan only brings about the less severe consequences set out in s. 40. My Lords, I desire to confine my observations on s. 38 (4) to a case such as the present case, where any loan to either settlor must be made at a commercial rate of interest. C Any case in which such a loan could be made free of interest can be dealt with as and when it arises.

Lastly, I should mention a contention on behalf of the taxpayers that Lord Vestey's executors could only be assessed in respect of income which was in fact income of Lord Vestey, and not in respect of income which was to be "treated" as his income under s. 38 of the Act of 1938, or "deemed to be" D his income under s. 18 of the Act of 1936. This argument rests on the construction of r. 18 of the General Rules in sched. I to the Income Tax Act, 1918. Such income, counsel for the taxpayers contended, was not income which "arose or accrued" to Lord Vestey within the meaning of r. 18. In the events which have happened, it is unnecessary for counsel to rely on this argument, but it may be put forward in some other case hereafter. This being so, I think E it right to say that I cannot accept this argument and that, in my view, it gives too narrow a meaning to r. 18. The same argument could have been advanced in Cottingham's Executors v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3), but was not advanced. In my view, however, if the argument now in question had been advanced in Cottingham's case (3), it would have been rightly rejected.

The result is that it is not established that any income received by the Paris F trustees in any of the relevant years ought to be treated as the income of either Lord Vestey or Sir Edmund for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts. My Lords, I am conscious that in arriving at this conclusion I am differing, to a very large extent, with the views of the majority of the Court of Appeal, and, to a lesser extent, with the views of EVERSLED, L.J., and that I have said very little about their judgments. These judgments have received my most G careful and respectful consideration, and I have refrained from discussing them in detail for very simple and compelling reasons. No one of the learned Lords Justices thought that the power of the "authorised persons" to direct investment of the rent was a fiduciary power, and, thinking rightly that they were bound by Gaunt's case (2), they thought that the word "wife" in the relevant sections included a widow of the settlor. Building on this foundation, H they naturally took a different view, on several points, from the view which I have expressed. It would therefore serve no useful purpose to discuss their judgments in detail. In my judgment, all the assessments in question should be discharged. The appeals by the taxpayers should be allowed with costs, and the cross-appeals by the Crown should be dismissed with costs.

LORD REID: My Lords, I agree with your Lordships and I only add a brief statement of my reasons in my own words because I am differing from the Court of Appeal on several difficult and important questions.

For the Crown to succeed in this case it must be shown that the facts bring the case within one or more of the provisions of the Finance Act, 1936, s. 18, or of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38. I shall refer to these two sections simply as s. 18 and s. 38. Section 18 applies if individuals ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom seek to avoid liability to income tax by transferring assets so that income becomes payable to persons resident out of the United Kingdom. It is not now denied that the late Lord Vestey and Sir Edmund Vestey were both ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom in December, 1921, and that they sought to avoid liability to income tax by transferring assets in that month so that income became payable to three persons resident in Paris who are referred to as the Paris trustees. That being so the section enacts :

"(1) Where such an individual has by means of any such transfer, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, acquired any rights by virtue of which he has, within the meaning of this section, power to enjoy, whether forthwith or in the future, any income of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom which, if it were income of that individual received by him in the United Kingdom, would be chargeable to income tax by deduction or otherwise, that income shall, whether it would or would not have been chargeable to income tax apart from the provisions of this section, be deemed to be income of that individual for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts."

For this sub-section to come into operation an individual must acquire rights by virtue of which he has power to enjoy, within the meaning of the section, income of a person resident or domiciled abroad. The phrase "power to enjoy" is expanded in sub-s. (3) to cover a variety of cases and sub-s. (4) provides that :

"In determining whether an individual has power to enjoy income within the meaning of this section, regard shall be had to the substantial result and effect of the transfer and any associated operations . . ."

but there is nothing in the section to expand, qualify or modify the requirement that the individual who is to be assessed must have acquired rights by virtue of which he has power to enjoy. It is necessary, therefore, to determine the nature of the rights which the Vesteyes acquired. After the execution of the lease on Dec. 29, 1921, and the deed of settlement on Dec. 30, 1921, the only rights relevant to the present case which the Vesteyes had with regard to the moneys which came into the hands of the Paris trustees were rights to appoint certain funds to their issue, rights to appoint life interests to their widows, and a joint right to direct the investment of the settled fund. I think that these rights must be held to have been "acquired" by them within the meaning of this section : these rights were brought into existence in connection with the transfer of assets whereby income became payable to the Paris trustees. No doubt the Vesteyes gave up other and more extensive rights when they made the transfer but these were rights of a different character. Before the transfer there were no Paris trustees and there were no settled funds. The Vesteyes' rights against those trustees and with regard to those funds must, I think, be held to have been acquired by means of the transfer in conjunction with the operations associated with it.

The next question is whether by virtue of any of these rights either of the Vesteyes had, during any of the years with which this case is concerned, any power to enjoy any part of the income of the Paris trustees— bearing in mind the very wide meaning attached to the words "power to enjoy" by sub-ss. (3) and (4). Before the first year with which this case is concerned, 1936-37, Lord Vestey had made an irrevocable appointment covering the whole of the funds which he was entitled to appoint to his issue and Sir Edmund Vestey had irrevocably appointed part of the funds which he was entitled to appoint to his issue. For the reasons which have been given by my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, I think that these appointments preclude any liability under s. 18 which might have arisen in their absence and I also agree with my noble and learned friend with regard to that part of the fund which Sir Edmund Vestey did not irrevocably appoint until Mar. 31, 1937. Sir Edmund also released and extinguished his power to appoint an interest in favour of his widow : but Lord Vestey retained his power to appoint in favour of his widow. This power could only affect Lord Vestey's liability under s. 18 or s. 38 if references in those sections to " wife " can be held to include " widow." Section 18 provides " (5) For the purposes of this section (a) a reference to an individual shall be deemed to include the wife or husband of the individual." Section 38 (2) applies if in the event of the exercise of a power to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof " the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor will or may become beneficially entitled " to property comprised in the settlement or income arising therefrom. Section 38 (4) deems the settlor to have an interest :

" . . . if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in that settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever."

I agree with your Lordships that references in the two sections under consideration to the wife of a settlor do not include his widow. I do not find any clear indication in the sections themselves of an intention either to include or to exclude widows. The learned judges who decided Gaunt's case (2) in the Court of Appeal took the view that " wife " was intended to include " widow," and if there were nothing beyond the terms of the sections to point to the intention of the legislature I might not venture to disagree though I would have doubts. But there are two reasons which were not discussed in that case but which seem to me to be important. In the first place there is a very obvious reason why the legislature should treat a benefit to a settlor's wife as equivalent to a benefit to the settlor. In the great majority of cases a husband does in fact derive benefit from a pecuniary benefit to his wife : indeed the benefit to a husband arising from such a benefit to his wife may often be as great or almost as great as if that benefit had accrued directly to him. This fact is recognised in the rule that for income tax purposes the incomes of husband and wife are in the general case treated as one. But there is no obvious reason why a benefit to a settlor's widow should be treated as a benefit to him : he can never enjoy it directly or indirectly. It is of great importance to a husband that his wife should be provided for after his death—so it is also that his children should be provided for—but the benefit to the husband from making such provisions is of an entirely different kind from the benefit which he can enjoy from a provision to his wife while he is alive. It is not something which could reasonably be regarded as part of his income.

The second reason arises in this way. The argument for the Crown in this case was that " wife " means the person who is the settlor's wife during the particular year of assessment, and that if a benefit may come to her in the future it matters not whether her husband is then alive or dead ; she is still the same person and it is the benefit to her that the statute is concerned with. It was admitted that this view must lead to the result that if in a particular year of assessment the settlor is unmarried there is no wife in that year to whom the section can apply. So if a bachelor or a widower makes a settlement which contains a provision for sums being set aside to provide payments to his wife during his lifetime, those sums would not be deemed to be part of his income unless or until he marries. It appears to me in the highest degree unlikely that this was the intention of the legislature, but no way was suggested by counsel of avoiding this result if the argument for the Crown is well founded.

This difficulty confirms me in my view that "wife" was never intended in these sections to include "widow," and of course the same argument applies to husband and widower.

There remains the joint right to direct investment of the settled fund. I agree with your Lordships that this must be held to be a right of a fiduciary character. It was argued for the Crown that there was plainly a comprehensive plan by the Vesteyes so to deal with their assets as to minimise their liability to pay taxes in the United Kingdom and at the same time to retain control over the use of those assets. This, it was said, shows that the power to direct investments was intended to be a power which the Vesteyes could use for their own purposes and not one which they must use in the interests of the beneficiaries. I think that there is a two-fold answer to this argument. In the first place the words of the deed point so clearly to the power being a fiduciary one that it is not relevant to consider other matters: but if it were relevant I should not accept the inference sought to be drawn from them. It may well be that the Vesteyes' advisers deliberately introduced a fiduciary power having in mind that death duties were payable on settled property unless it was retained by trustees to the entire exclusion of any benefit to the settlor by contract or otherwise. If this right or power to direct investment is fiduciary, I find it very difficult to see how it could confer any power to enjoy income within the meaning of s. 18. It is possible that a person having a fiduciary right may misuse it for his own benefit, but then he would not get the benefit by virtue of his right and s. 18 would not apply to it. But I need not pursue this matter because I agree that a right which an individual can only exercise in conjunction with some other person is not a right by virtue of which he has power to enjoy anything within the meaning of this section. I think that it is plain that in s. 18 the singular "individual" does not include the plural. The section is referring to the individual whose taxable income is being determined and to him alone.

I am, therefore, of opinion that none of the assessments under appeal which were made under s. 18 can stand, and I turn to consider the case under s. 38. Sub-section (1) admittedly does not apply to this case. Section 38 (2) involves issues of a different character. It must be considered in conjunction with the definition of settlement in s. 41. It enacts:

"If and so long as the terms of any settlement are such that (a) any person has or may have power, whether immediately or in the future, and whether with or without the consent of any other person, to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof; and (b) in the event of the exercise of the power, the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor will or may become beneficially entitled to the whole or any part of the property then comprised in the settlement or of the income arising from the whole or any part of the property so comprised; any income arising under the settlement from the property comprised in the settlement in any year of assessment or from a corresponding part of that property, or a corresponding part of any such income, as the case may be, shall be treated as the income of the settlor for that year and not as the income of any other person."

Section 41 (4) (b) enacts:

"The expression 'settlement' includes any disposition, trust, covenant, agreement or arrangement, and the expression 'settlor' in relation to a settlement means any person by whom the settlement was made."

Reading the sub-section, at least four questions suggest themselves: (1) What is included in the settlement? (2) Is there any power in any person to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision of it? If there is such a power, (3) what is the property comprised in the settlement? And (4), in the event of the power being exercised, may the settlor become beneficially entitled to any of that property or of the income arising from it ? This sub-section was fully considered in this House in Chamberlain v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). In that case the settlor formed a company called Staffa with an unusual structure so that he retained control of the company. He then sold to it a number of shares in Commercial Structures, Ltd., which yielded a considerable income, and acquired a number of shares in Staffa. He then transferred to trustees for his family a sum which they invested in shares in Staffa. This was in March, 1936, and apparently the terms of this trust were not thought suitable for this purpose. So in December, 1936, he caused the ordinary shares of Staffa to be divided into five classes each of which was only to be entitled to such dividend as the company in general meeting should determine. No dividend was ever paid on the A shares held under the earlier trust, but four more trusts were set up for each of the settlor's infant children. These trusts were declared irrevocable and the trustees directed to accumulate the income. The trustees under these trusts invested further sums supplied by the settlor in B, C, D and E shares in Staffa. Dividends were paid on these shares, and re-invested by buying more shares in Staffa. It was contended for the Crown that, in view of the terms of s. 41 (4) (b), the whole of these operations must be regarded as the arrangement or settlement so that the whole assets of Staffa were property comprised in the settlement and the whole income of Staffa was income arising under the settlement and therefore to be treated as income of the settlor. That contention was held to be wrong. LORD THANKERTON said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 203) that the formation of Staffa was :

" . . . part of the arrangement conceived by the appellant, whereby a convenient and profitable investment was made available for the moneys respectively settled under the five deeds of settlement . . . the sums settled under these deeds were the funds provided for the purpose of the settlement . . . "

LORD MACMILLAN said (ibid., 204, 205) referring to Morton's case (4) :

" I agree with LORD MONCRIEFF that the settlement or arrangement must be one whereby the settlor charges certain property of his with rights in favour of others . . . It is, I think, fallacious to confuse the steps taken by the appellant with a view to effecting a settlement or arrangement with the settlement or arrangement itself . . . It was not until he granted the trust deeds that he entered the legal stage of the settlement. All that he did previously was preparatory to making settlements."

LORD ROMER said (ibid., 206) :

" If a man enters into a contract to buy 1,000 shares in a company with a view to settling 500 of them on his daughter and does so settle the 500 shares by deed, it may well be that, consistently with s. 41 (4) (b) of the Finance Act, 1938, the settlement can be described as consisting of the contract and the deed together. But the property comprised in the settlement is the 500 shares settled by the deed and not the whole of the 1,000 shares."

I think that Chamberlain's case (1) shews that the most profitable course to follow is first to determine what was the property comprised in the settlement, and that the way to find that property is to look for property charged with rights in favour of beneficiaries. I do not think that any hard and fast rule is laid down in Chamberlain's case (1). The ingenuity of those who devise these schemes is such that it might be rash to say that property can never be comprised in a settlement unless it is charged with rights in favour of others, but I think that as a general rule this must now be the test.

The Solicitor-General sought to distinguish Chamberlain's case (1) on the ground that in that case there was no finding that there was an " arrangement" comprising anything more than the deeds of settlement, and that in this case he was free to argue that there was an "arrangement" within the meaning of the Act which comprised both the deed of settlement and the lease, and then to proceed that as the stations were comprised in the lease they were therefore comprised in the arrangement, and were therefore property comprised in the settlement within the meaning of s. 38 (2). But, in my view, that is just the argument which was rejected by this House, and I am satisfied that the decision in Chamberlain's case (1) makes it impossible in this case to hold that any property was comprised in the settlement other than that which the Paris trustees were entitled to get under the deed of settlement. I think that it follows that the Crown case fails on the double ground that the power to determine the lease on six months' notice was not a power within the meaning of s. 38 (2) (a) to revoke or otherwise determine the settlement or any provision thereof, and that, if the lease were determined, the Vestey's would not as required by s. 38 (2) (b) become beneficially entitled to any part of the property comprised in the settlement or of the income arising therefrom.

There remains only the claim under sub-ss. (3) and (4) of s. 38. Sub-section (3) would only apply if the Vestey's had "an interest in any income arising under or property comprised in" the settlement. If the stations had been property comprised in the settlement the Vestey's would have had such an interest because they remained owners of the stations and on the termination of the lease they were entitled to resume possession of them. But, on the footing that the property comprised in the settlement is only that which the Paris trustees were entitled to get under it, the Vestey's had no interest in that property or in the income arising under the settlement. Sub-section (4) provides :

"For the purpose of the last foregoing sub-section, the settlor shall be deemed to have an interest in income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in that settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever."

The only way in which any part of the sums which the Paris trustees got under the settlement could become in any sense "payable to or applicable for the benefit of" the Vestey's would be by means of a loan to them. If I am right in thinking that the Vestey's' power to direct investment of the settled fund was of a fiduciary character, then no loan could lawfully be made of the trust funds to the Vestey's except at a commercial rate of interest. I do not think that such a loan could come within the scope of s. 38 (4) especially as loans are separately dealt with in s. 40. I find it impossible to hold that a sum of money lent at a commercial rate of interest is "payable to or applicable for the benefit of" the borrower in the sense of this section. I am, therefore, of opinion that none of the assessments under appeal which were made under s. 38 can stand and I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeals allowed with costs. Cross-appeals dismissed with costs.
